PREFACE TO THE 1901 EDITION.

WHEN Ælfred was crowned king of Wessex, it seemed as if the Danes were to blot out not only the English power but the English tongue, and put Danish in the place of English throughout these islands. The same Ælfred who made the first Cyclopædia of earlier English song and story saved the English land and folk and speech from Danish thralldom. The English language held its own when, later, Danish kings did rule the land; it showed its irrepressible vitality during three centuries of depression under Norman-French supremacy, and triumphantly reasserted itself in greater flexibility and vigour than before. The area of its currency has grown with the political and commercial sway of the people who speak it. In Ælfred's time the Low Dutch dialects called English, and spoken by a few hundred thousand islanders, were unknown outside the island. Queen Elizabeth ruled scarcely three million subjects, many of whom were not of English speech; while to many more in the north and west, who heard it or essayed to read it, Shakespeare's literary London dialect was barely intelligible. And now English, with no essential differences, is the mother-tongue of more than a hundred and twenty millions of men and women, scattered over all the quarters of the planet. Some fifty millions of Britons at home and abroad rule about a fourth of the inhabitants of the globe. In the United States the daughter nation now reckons her seventy-five millions, mainly of British stock, and, with trifling exceptions, all of English speech. To multitudes of the darker-skinned subjects of the British crown, English is only less familiar than their own vernaculars, and English literature a main instrument of education. English is becoming more and more the language of commerce among men of all kindreds. And the writings of English authors, now read and studied by the educated of all races, are an element of culture in every civilised country.

For it is not by reason of the vast numbers of those who speak it, or of the other myriads for whom it is a second vernacular, an indispensable lingua franca, that English claims rank amongst languages, but in virtue of the thoughts that breathe and burn in English words. English literature is in the fullest sense of the term a great literature; the English pen has been mightier than the English sword or the English steam-engine. Is it the irony of history that in the nation of shopkeepers one singer after another should be found endowed with a double portion of the spirit of poesy? And if it be said—as often it is said—that we are the most materialistic nation on the face of the earth, we have a cloud of witnesses to the contrary: our divines, our sages, our poets, our storytellers, our men of science, our historians, have uttered in our tongue words which the world will not willingly let die. It is no dream indeed that the other sheaves have made obeisance to our sheaf; Shakespeare is not the only Englishman who has won the willing homage of the world.

In that vast English library which has been steadily growing for fourteen hundred years, there is happily much that concerns us not, much that is no part of our national inheritance. There are more than enough of books that are no books, of literature that does not deserve the name, of poems that are not poetry, of prose which is a mere waste of weary words. Even so, of English books new and old that it is worth our while to know, or know about, there are many more than would suffice for a lifetime of hard reading. British publications multiply by thousands in a year, and American volumes at an almost equal rate. The flood, constantly swelling, threatens to engulf even the strongest swimmer. Year by year the need becomes greater for an approved mentor, a comprehensive guide; and such a Vademecum Dr Robert Chambers devised and called, not unjustly, a CYCLOPÆDIA OF ENGLISH LITERATURE, the first of its kind in Britain.

On a plan greatly more comprehensive than the time-honoured Elegant Extracts of Vicesimus Knox, this Cyclopædia of English Literature—like all the old cyclopædias systematic and not alphabetic, and following the chronological order as obviously the only practicable one—aimed to give a conspectus of our literature by a series of extracts from the more memorable authors set in a biographical and critical history of the literature itself. Dr Chambers laid the plan in 1841, and for realising it secured the help of his friend Dr Robert Carruthers of Inverness. The outcome of their joint labours, which began to appear before the close of 1842, was completed in two volumes in 1844, and was brought down to date and reprinted in 1858. It was revised and extended under the charge of Dr Carruthers in 1876; and a fourth reissue, again incorporating new matter, took place a dozen years later. But a keener interest in our older literature and a fuller knowledge of it, new facts, new theories, and new light on a thousand points, the increasing supply of new materials for selection, the continued activity of accepted authors, the rise of new and brilliant stars, and all that is implied in the unabated continuity of the literary life of the nation, have rendered necessary a much more thorough-going revision and reconstruction; a completely new edition is imperatively demanded.

'Tis sixty years since—just sixty years since Dr Chambers began work on the first edition. Coleridge had then been dead for half-a-dozen years, but Southey was still laureate and Wordsworth was in vigorous health. Tennyson had not yet published those two volumes that gave him a secure place amongst English poets. Ruskin and Matthew Arnold were still at Oxford, Kingsley was at Cambridge, and William Morris was a schoolboy. Marian Evans had as yet no literary ambitions, and George Meredith had not sent his first contribution to Chambers's Journal. Macaulay was M.P. for Edinburgh, but had not published his Lays or begun his History. The reputation Carlyle had made by the French Revolution was but five years old, Thackeray's first volume was lately published, and Dickens had issued only a very few of the long series of his stories. Darwin had not yet put on paper the first rough sketch of his evolution theory, and Huxley was a young medical student. Emerson was hardly known in England; Longfellow and Lowell had each published but one volume of original verse; and 'The Autocrat of the Breakfast-Table' had made but a few desultory efforts in literature. Howells was an infant, and Henry James was not yet born. A vast proportion of what gives character to modern letters had not yet been written or thought out. Upper and Lower Canada had just been united, the New Zealand Company had only begun to plant the colony, and the first great rush of free settlers had not yet given promise of the future Commonwealth of Australia.

Sixty years after Dr Chambers and Dr Carruthers addressed themselves to their task, we stand in a new century, and, as regards literature, in a new world. In the new edition, of which the first volume now appears, the essential plan has been retained. The aim has been to carry that plan out even more perfectly, and to make the new work more fully representative of our present and past literary history at the commencement of the Twentieth Century than the first edition was for the middle of the Nineteenth. Neither then nor now has a pedantic attempt been made to draw a hard-and-fast line between what is by right and what is not a part of pure or national literature, and to include only what wholly approves itself before the strictest canons of the higher criticism of the day. The selection was made on a more catholic, comprehensive, and historical plan: nobody being excluded whom the general consensus of the ages has adjudged worthy of remembrance. In literature more than in most things human die Weltgeschichte ist das Weltgericht, history is the supreme and final judge; in the end it is the best books that live.

Our enterprise has a quite definite aim, and from the nature of the case its scope is limited—severely limited by the boundlessness of the materials with which it deals. It is not, and is not meant to be, an anthology of the perfect models of our prose and verse, a chrestomathy of purple patches, a collection of elegant extracts. The acknowledged gem should be there, if the man is mainly known by some one noble passage, one sonnet, one song, one aphorism or sententious saying; but something there should be, as a rule, to illustrate his average achievement, the standard by which he may fairly be judged. Nor does the work profess to be a marrow of our literature, or to give the spirit and quintessence of the several authors; still less does it aim to render its readers independent of the authors themselves or relieve them from the duty and pleasure of studying the original works. In no case will one rise from articles of ours flattering himself that now he knows his author and may consider that subject settled. What we give him is little more than a catalogue raisonné, an illustrated conspectus, a finger-post to the best books, a guide to that of which he is in search, to what he needs, to what will interest him, to what he can read with pleasure and profit. The very shortness and fewness of the excerpts is a security that they shall only be taken as samples; they are meant to whet the appetite, to stimulate curiosity, to be stepping-stones to the veritable books.

The essential plan of the original Cyclopædia of English Literature, approved by generations of diligent readers and the testimonies of many who have themselves earned the best right to testify, has been adhered to and developed. The extension from two to three volumes of like size has made room for the much-required addition of new materials in all sections of the work. Old English literature, formerly discussed in three pages, now occupies more than ten times the space; Middle English has no longer only some twenty pages allotted to it, but ninety. In the first volume alone over fifty authors not named or hardly named in the older issues are treated—shortly, but it is hoped fairly—and illustrated by selections from their works: Roper and Cranmer, Sir Thomas North and Philemon Holland, Florio and Zachary Boyd, Gervase Markham and Kenelm Digby, William Prynne and Samuel Rutherford. And as it is profitable to glance at the handiwork of the eccentric, of the hopelessly mediocre, and even of those justly or unjustly condemned to the lower circles of literary lost souls, the Ogilbys and the Flecknoes, the Stanyhursts and the Drunken Barnabys, Coryate's Crudities and Boorde's Peregrinations, are treated as having their part in our literary history.

The inconvenient arrangement by which an author was dealt with as poet, dramatist, novelist, essayist, and historian in separate sections of the work has been departed from. Johnson no longer has a hundred and thirty pages intercalated between the sections devoted to him, nor Scott upwards of two hundred pages; each author is presented continuously and once for all.

A very large proportion of the articles are entirely new; a larger number have been almost completely rewritten; and in all the others historical facts have been verified and corrected, and critical judgments carefully reconsidered. In very many cases the illustrative extracts are all different from those formerly given; where the passages in the old issue seemed well suited for the purpose in hand, they have been scrupulously collated, and often extended and added to. There has been a constant effort to secure passages interesting in themselves, and least likely to suffer through separation from their context. Appropriating a famous classification, we trust there may in our three volumes be found no passages that are not for some reason worth reading at least once, few that are worth reading once but once only, far more that are worth at least two or three readings in a lifetime, and very many that are worth reading again and again for ever.

The work of the editorial staff has been much more largely supplemented than formerly by contributions from writers of approved authority. In the first volume old English literature as a whole and all the writers who used to be called Anglo-Saxon—Cædmon, Bæda, Ælfred, and the rest—are dealt with by Dr Stopford Brooke. Mr A. W. Pollard charged himself with Middle English and almost all the writers down to Reformation times. There are essays from the pen of Mr Gosse on the Elizabethan and Jacobean literature, on the Anthologies, on the Elizabethan Song-Writers, on the Elizabethan Sonnet-Cycles; as also on Sidney, Spenser, Webster, Ford, and Shirley. Shakespeare is by Sir Sidney Lee. To Dr Samuel Rawson Gardiner we owe the essay on the Puritan movement; to Mr A. H. Bullen that on the Restoration literature. The section on the Ballads is by Mr Andrew Lang. Professor Saintsbury's contribution to the first volume is on Dryden. Professor Hume Brown commented on James I., Knox, and Buchanan.

Among notable contributions to the second volume are the introduction on the Eighteenth Century Literature by Mr Austin Dobson, and the same accomplished writer's authoritative articles on Richardson, Fielding, and Goldsmith; Professor Saintsbury's on Swift, Pope, and Sterne; Professor Gregory Smith's Addison, and Mr Robert Aitken's Steele; Mr James Douglas's Blake; and Dr William Wallace's Ramsay, Fergusson, and Burns.

The third volume opens with a remarkable essay on the Renaissance of Wonder in Poetry by Mr Theodore Watts-Dunton, who is author also of the articles on Byron and Borrow. Wordsworth and Scott are by Professor W. P. Ker; Coleridge is treated by his grandson, Mr Ernest Hartley Coleridge; Shelley by Mr Swinburne; Keats by Professor A. C. Bradley; Lamb and Hood by Canon Ainger; Jeffrey and De Quincey by Professor Gregory Smith; Hazlitt and Leigh Hunt by Dr Nichol Smith; Carlyle by Dr W. Wallace; Matthew Arnold by Professor Dowden; Darwin, Huxley, and A. R. Wallace by Professor J. Arthur Thomson; Thackeray by Mr J. A. Blaikie; Dickens by Mr Rudolph Lehmann; Beaconsfield by Mr Charles Whibley; Macaulay, Green, Freeman, and Stubbs by Professor Richard Lodge; Froude and Gardiner by Professor Hume Brown; the Brontës, Mrs Gaskell, and Thomas Hardy by Sir W. Robertson Nicoll; George Eliot by R. Holt Hutton; Ruskin and Stevenson by Mr J. W. Mackail; the Rossettis by Sir Walter Raleigh; William Morris by Mr Robert Steele; Buckle, Herbert Spencer, and Morley by Mr Hector Macpherson; 'Festus' Bailey, Swinburne, and Watts-Dunton by Mr James Douglas; Moore and Mangan, Lever and Lover, and other articles on Irish authors, by Mr Litton Falkiner.

Professor Woodberry has written the section on early American literature, and the greater American authors have been discussed by other American writers—Emerson by President Schurman; Hawthorne and Holmes, Longfellow and Lowell, Whitman and Whittier, Thoreau, Poe, and others indicated in the list prefixed to the third volume, by the Rev. John White Chadwick; Parkman by Professor C. H. Hull; Prescott and Motley by Miss Ruth Putnam.

Some eminent men of our own time have assisted in choosing the passages by which they were content to be represented. Others have read a proof of our little lives of them, and given them an autobiographical sanction. The representatives of some great writers have both revised the articles and approved the selections made; Lord Tennyson and Mr Barrett Browning have laid us under this double obligation. Many of the articles show the accurate scholarship and incisive style of Mr Francis Hindes Groome, whose invaluable help was withdrawn by fatal illness while the first volume was in progress. The editor is especially responsible for the major part of the unsigned articles.

The fac-similes and portraits were executed expressly for this work by Messrs Walker & Boutall.

The portraits, nearly three hundred in number, have been reproduced from the most authentic available likenesses in the National Portrait Gallery, and other public and private collections. To the directors of the National Portrait Gallery and to the Palæographical Society especially our thanks are due for permission to reproduce portraits and fac-similes. And all who write or revise biographical articles must constantly and gratefully refer to the Dictionary of National Biography.

Our language and our literature are the only property of our large and scattered family in which all its members share equally. More than any other single influence, perhaps, our general acceptance as standard literature of a certain series of books in the common language has tended to make our very mixed race one in temper, sympathy, aspiration: Norman, Iberian, Celt, are we, but all of us Angles in speech, the instrument of thought, the vehicle of our feelings. Queen Elizabeth's statesmen and soldiers and sailors had given England a new place in the councils of Europe, the Elizabethan poets had lent a new glory to the Tudor court and capital, English literature had reached its zenith, ere Scotsmen, by increasingly general consent, gave up the old Anglian tongue of the northern lowlands—Anglian, and so even more strictly English than the southron speech—for the tongue of Bacon and Shakespeare, of Hooker and Raleigh, and accepted the English Bible at once as their literary standard and their rule of life. Scotsmen have since contributed their quota to the stream of English literature, only the more truly English from the reinclusion of the Anglian northerners. The Celtic tongue of the Highlands has steadily given way before book-English. And the use of this common tongue has educated Highlander and Lowlander into one people, has remoulded Scotsman and Englishman into brothers-german, as no warfare had done, as neither Church nor constitution had made possible, as no legislation could ever accomplish. At no time has English thought been more thoroughly English in spirit and temper than since the gathering in of the outlying sheep into the fold. Till towards the end of the seventeenth century, Scottish authors, as using a different idiom, are dealt with in separate sections—a separation not needed in the case of Welshmen and Irishmen (see page 831); and after the Revolution, authors of Scottish birth, save those writing in dialect, are fully naturalised in the British republic of letters.

The Irish have no monopoly of Celtic blood, and are not even mainly Celtic in origin: Gaelic reached Erin with the first Celtic invaders from Britannia; so that even their Celtic tongue is a bond with the greater British island. Much more the tongue that has, save in the remoter districts, superseded it. However much Irish scholars may cherish the Gaelic, it is only as a secondary language, a literary luxury, a patriotic heirloom; spiritually, Irishmen have learnt incomparably more from the great body of English writers than from the ancient Irish bards or story-tellers. Happily there is no risk of Irishmen becoming altogether, or even almost, as Englishmen are; but in their common literary inheritance, in a literature to which they contribute their fair proportion, there is security for a modus vivendi not yet fully realised, there is a power working on both sides towards mutual understanding and sympathy. Even now Irishmen glory in the triumphs of their countrymen whether by race or birth, and hardly even an irreconcilable would seriously demand a home-rule in literature that should make Ussher and Berkeley, Burke and Goldsmith, Swift and Sheridan, aliens on Irish soil.

Neither Virginian colonists nor Pilgrim Fathers were keenly interested in literature as such. It was the English temper that led them into the wilderness; and it was the same spirit as had again and again moved their forefathers in the past of English history that led them finally to repudiate the English king and government. But they had no thought of renouncing any essential of their English birthright; Puritan or Cavalier, they clung to the tradition which, over seas as in the mother-land, in literature as in life, makes for freedom, fair play, sanity, reserve, common-sense, steadiness, breadth, depth, strength, and individuality. However far we may fall short of our ideals, we have essentially the same standards of uprightness, honour, dignity, the same delight in 'calm, open-eyed rashness.' With them as with us, the absence of universally binding standards and models makes the attainment of artistic style more difficult; independence tends to lawlessness; what is wanting in grace and polish has to be atoned for by vigour, simplicity, originality, and the free-play of imagination; and substance must supply the lack of academic or classical form. They too, like us, have their burden of uninspired pseudo-philosophy, feeble fiction, lamentable comicalities. Blood is thicker than water, common lineage is more than geographical collocation or political constitution; of still more account for the true federation of peoples are intellectual and spiritual sympathies, common aspirations, like principles. Erelong American writers attained a distinctive note, ever most welcome in literature. But this is a development from within, not an approximation to foreign models. American humour is different from English humour, but it is vastly more akin to English humour than to any French or Spanish or German type. Chaucer and Spenser, Shakespeare and Bacon, Raleigh and Ben Jonson, are theirs by inheritance as much as they are ours; the migration across seas did not make Dryden or Pope, Addison or Steele, Johnson or Gibbon, alien to them; and the change of government at the close of the eighteenth century and the beginnings of their own national literature did nothing to hinder the full appreciation and loving study of Wordsworth and Coleridge, Shelley and Scott. Sartor Resartus first attained to book form in Massachusetts; and even yet some British authors find in America their most appreciative audience. As the English tradition has remained dominant in the constitution of the nation and the life of the people, our kindred both by lineage and language, so American literature has remained an offshoot, a true branch of English literature. In this work it has from the beginning been treated as an integral and important part of the literature of Greater Britain. We do not look on Longfellow or Poe as foreigners, or read the histories of Prescott, Motley, and Parkman as if written by strangers.

What holds of the United States is still more obviously true of the British dominions beyond seas; in Canada, South Africa, Australasia, our kith and kin have remained true to us and to themselves, and their literature is but a part of ours. Amongst them as in the United States we gladly recognise a growing individuality, a flavour racy of the soil; but the newest growths are but vigorous shoots from the English stem. Many of our most typically English writers, though they have chosen to remain Englishmen in the stricter sense, were not born within our four seas, but in farther Britain or the remoter dependencies. Thus Thackeray was born in Calcutta, and so was Charles Buller, the philosophical Radical; Bombay was the birth-place not merely of Rudyard Kipling, most imperialist of writers, but of such a representative Anglican dignitary as the Dean of Canterbury. Laurence Oliphant, a cosmopolitan rolling-stone, yet British to the backbone, saw the light at Capetown. There is inevitably in our home literature much that marks the world-colonising nation, the empire-building race.

Mankind may not be growing much holier or happier, but the stream of tendency makes for greater kindliness and the breaking down of boundaries; kindliness which begins at home inevitably extends by degrees to all the outlying kin in their several places and relations; and at the close of the nineteenth century, in the last years of Victoria's reign, the bands of kindness have been drawn sensibly closer between the island people and their colonies, between the United Kingdom and the United States. To the youth of the English kin this work is once more and in a new shape offered as a help in seeking out and laying to heart the wisdom and the wit of our famous men of old and the fathers that begat us, in the confidence that allegiance to the highest traditions of our literature will increasingly obliterate local and temporary jealousies; and in the hope that many a saying herein recorded may make generations to come proud to be of the English name, and stir in them the thrill that tightens even the grasp of blood-brotherhood.

D. P.

SINCE the late Dr Patrick penned the above preface at the outset of the twentieth century the English-speaking world has greatly increased. New writers of note have arisen on both sides of the Atlantic, and the British Dominions rear not only more and more readers of English literature but a growing band of contributors to its bulk. Accordingly it has been found necessary to expand the concluding sections of Volume III. of the Cyclopædia, a number of additional pages being devoted to present-day poets and prose-writers in the British Isles, in the Overseas Empire, and in the United States.

Besides, the present century has brought to light certain literary treasures long buried or overlooked. For these room has been made in their proper place in this thesaurus. Thus, in Volume I., Henry Medwall's fifteenth-century interlude, Fulgens and Lucres, a long-lost and valuable play—so valuable that an American purchaser paid £3400 for the unique copy in 1919—is now dealt with in the early history of English drama; Thomas Traherne, contemporary and compeer of Henry Vaughan, a bright particular star, first 'discovered' by Bertram Dobell about 1906, has been included among seventeenth-century writers, with illustrations of his remarkable work in prose and verse alike; while in Volume III. has been inserted a brief notice of that latter-day Pepys, Joseph Farington (1747–1821), the zealot of the Royal Academy, whose fascinating diary was found in a garret a century after his death.

Throughout the work biographical details and critical estimates have been corrected or amplified where twentieth-century research has proved them inaccurate or inadequate; and the bibliographical notes have likewise been brought up to date.

In addition to contributing the articles enumerated in the Preface, Sir Edmund Gosse revised those on BEN JONSON, DONNE, WITHER, CAREW, HERRICK, LOVELACE, CRASHAW, and VAUGHAN. Mr Bullen revised BEAUMONT AND FLETCHER, MIDDLETON, MARSTON, and MASSINGER. The articles on the SCOTS WYCLIFITE TESTAMENT and ARCHBISHOP HAMILTON'S CATECHISM are by Dr T. Graves Law; that on HUCHOWN is by George Neilson.

FROM THE BEGINNINGS TILL AFTER THE NORMAN CONQUEST.

THE first indwellers of the islands we call Great Britain and Ireland were a wild folk, coming we know not whence, who made rude stone weapons of flint, lived by hunting, could make fires and garments of skin, and dwelt in caves. These Palæolithic people were succeeded by, or developed into, a Neolithic race whose weapons, still of stone, were now highly polished and skilfully wrought. They began pastoral life in our island, and settled finally into communities; and the large-chamber tombs under earth, or their denuded remains, extending from Caithness to Dorset, showed that they occupied all the habitable parts of the country. They were a dark-haired, dark-eyed, short, brave, and constant people; and when they mingled afterwards with the Celtic race, they left some traces of their legends, religion, and law in the stories, the manners, and the language of the Celts. We may, with great probability, identify them with the earliest Picts of history, and the Silures of South Wales were their descendants.

It is only in folklore that we can hope to recover something of the way they thought and felt, but in the west of Ireland and Scotland, in Wales, and in the Midland Counties of England we still meet short, dark-haired, long-skulled people who retain the characteristics of this steady and valiant race. It is not impossible that some of the elements of their character and thought have entered into and still influence English poetry.

How long they lived undisturbed does not appear, but at last an Aryan folk, part of the first Celtic migration, invaded our island, drove back these Neolithic people to the west and north, but mingled with them; and the farther west and north they pushed the greater was the admixture. This first Celtic race are named the Goidels or the Gaels, and they colonised not only Great Britain, but also the Isle of Man, the Western Isles, and Ireland. They have lasted down to our own day, and the imaginative and enkindling spirit of their thought, literature, and art, infused into the English nature by intercourse and amalgamation, have had an intermittent and spiritual influence on the poetry and prose of England. That influence was sometimes great, as at the beginning of our literature. Sometimes it was but little, but it always inspired when it came. After King Ælfred's days, and for a very long time, it ceased to do more than now and again to touch England; but it began to act on us again at the end of the eighteenth century, and at the end of the nineteenth and beginning of the twentieth the Gaelic spirit was doing much the same kind of work it did in England during the seventh and eighth centuries.

It entered northern England from Iona, where Columba, bringing with him, and handing down to his successors, the poetry and learning of Ireland, had set up his church and dwelling. Oswald, King of Northumbria, who had been educated at Iona, summoned the Celtic monks to convert his country in 634; and Oswiu, also trained at Iona, extended the Irish influence until the whole of Northumbria received the faith from Irish missionaries, and set up a number of civilising monasteries on the Irish pattern. All the awakening and inspiring emotions of religion, out of which so much of literature is born, were kindled in the north of England at the Irish fire. This lasted untouched for thirty years; and then, alongside with the Celtic, the Latin forms of learning and religion began to make their way from Ripon, from Wearmouth, from Hexham and Jarrow. The Celtic and the Latin influences mingled. Meanwhile the Irish impulse penetrated into Mercia and East Anglia from the north; and the communication between Ireland itself and England was constant, each interchanging the results of their work and knowledge. Even the south was not exempt from the pressure of Irish wisdom. The school at Canterbury in Theodore's days was full of Irish scholars. 'Whole fleets' of students passed to and fro between Wessex and Ireland. Men like Ealdhelm were trained by Irish hermits who set up schools; and Glastonbury became a special centre of Irish learning, legend, and song; so that we may even say that Dunstan, long years afterwards, derived from the nest of Irish scholars who were settled there part of the spirit which made his character, and began that Renaissance of English learning which Ælfred had failed, but so nobly failed, to establish. This was the Goidelic invasion of England, and its imaginative and formative powers ran through all the poetry of Northumbria, and stimulated the desires of Wessex and Mercia to know, and to feel after, the unknown.

A second Wandering of the Celtic race followed on the first, and some of its warriors, settling in Gaul, were allured by the white cliffs of England, and by the tales of sailors, to cross the Channel. The first of these invaders landed on the south-eastern coasts, perhaps as early as 300 B.C., and drove back the Goidels, as these had driven back the Neolithic people, to the west and north. The last of these Gaulish tribes who came to our land were the Belgæ. To all these men of the second Celtic Wandering the name of 'Brythons' has been given. When they had banished the Goidels from about a third part of Britain, the Romans checked their development for a year or two in 55 B.C., but did not come again for ninety years. During these ninety years the Brythons pushed on till they mastered the most of Britain, and even those lands where the Goidels remained (Devon, Cornwall, portions of Wales, Cumberland and Westmorland, and part of Lancashire) became Brythonic in language, manners, and poetry. North of the Solway and the Tweed the Brythons also drove their way, but with less force than in our England. They found themselves among a mixed people of Goidels and Neolithic folk in the Lowlands; and this country, sometimes Brythonic, sometimes Goidelic, ended by having in it an exceedingly mixed race, made up of these two Celtic strains dissolved in a Neolithic infusion; but the Brythonic element was master. Into the north of Scotland the Brythons scarcely penetrated. But wherever they were, their language prevailed. Later on they took the name of Cymry, and the English called them the Welsh. The fate they had given to the Goidels they met with at the hands of the English; until, after a hundred and fifty years of war, the Brythons only existed as a separate people in Devonshire, Cornwall, Wales, and in Strathclyde; that is, in the country which extended from the Ribble through Cumberland and Westmorland to the Clyde.

The Cymry had a literature of their own, and they sang in verse the fortunes of their strife with the English, their own wars with one another, the war-deeds of their chieftains, and the tales of their families. Moreover, they made a host of stories in prose in which they embodied their myths and the legends of their ancestral heroes. Four great bards are said to have flourished among them in the later half of the sixth and the beginning of the seventh century. These were Aneurin, Taliessin, Llywarch Hen, and Merddin; and we possess in manuscripts which date from the twelfth to the fourteenth century some of their poems, added to and modernised. They sing the wars of the northern Cymry with the Angles, and of the Cymry of Wales with the West Saxons, in poems by Taliessin and Llywarch Hen. These poems are of the sixth century. In the seventh the poets celebrated the great struggle between the Northumbrians and Cadwallon and his son. This is the first period of Cymric poetry. When the northern kingdom of the Cymry decayed, and they emigrated to South Wales, the old poetry was applied in the tenth century to the new dwelling-place and the new fortunes of the Cymry. This is the second period. Later on a third school of literature arose, poetic in North Wales, and of mythical and romantic tales in South Wales; and these tales are at the root of a great deal of English romance and song up to the present day. A fourth school of poetry, imitative of the old poetry of the north, continued under the Norman-Welsh rule till the days of Henry the Second, when the Black Book of Carmarthen was made up of some of the ancient poetry. In the following centuries the Book of Aneurin, the Book of Taliessin, and the Red Book of Hergest contained some also of the old poetry and of its later imitations. These were mingled with original work of a still later period.

There existed then, close to the border-land between the English and the Cymry, a great body of living and growing poetry, and of imaginative story-telling, which could hardly help influencing the Border-English when, after the first fierce years of the Conquest, the Welsh of West Wales, of Wales, and of Cumbria were so often either in alliance with the English or amalgamated with them. The Celtic genius of the Brythons stole in, year by year, into the English of the Border, from Berwick to Carlisle, from Carlisle to Chester, from Chester to Bristol, and from Bristol to Glastonbury and Exeter. When, after the Norman Conquest, the Normans seized a good part of South Wales, the Welsh imagination was interwoven with the Norman passion; and in days still later, after the twelfth century, the fifth period of Welsh poetry, developing itself in lyrics of love and of nature, full of lonely and graceful sentiment, had, as I believe, a well-marked influence on the birth and growth of the earliest English lyrics. As far as we can conjecture, the best of these lyrics were born on the lands of the Severn valley, and the first English poem of imaginative importance after the Conquest—the Brut of Layamon—arose in the heart of one who dwelt at Areley, on the banks of the Severn.

There was no such amalgamation in the first hundred and fifty years of the conquest of Britain by the English; the British were ruthlessly slain or driven away. Among those who fled over-sea was the only literary man among the Britons whose name has attained reputation. This was Gildas, whose Latin book, De Excidio, describes the horrors of the first years of the English invasion, and whose Epistola, addressed to the kings and priests of the Britons, is a fierce and probably an exaggerated indictment of their rule and their immoralities. Nevertheless, so far as his slight history goes, he is a sound authority. When, weary of trouble, he fled to Gaul, founded the Abbaye de Ruis, and died, British culture also died with him. He was not alone in his emigration. Hundreds of Britons took flight from the English sword, and out of this furious expulsion a Brythonic colony arose in France which played its own part in English literature. After the battles of Aylesford and Crayford in 455-57, and for fully a century and a half, the Britons of the southern counties and of South Wales emigrated to Armorica and made Brittany. In that little corner of France the Brythonic traditions, legends, and myths, the imaginative ballads and story-telling of this Celtic race, lived on, and developed in freedom. When the Arthurian legend, which probably began among the northern Cymry (and the first records of which are to be found embedded in the compilation which goes under the name of Nennius—the Historia Britonum), came to South Wales, it got from thence into Brittany, was taken up by Breton bards, freshly worked and added to, and then fell into the hands of the Normans. The Normans, having brought to bear upon it their formative genius, carried it back to South Wales, and then to England; and it was first thrown into clear shape by a dweller in Wales, by Geoffrey of Monmouth, who composed into twelve Latin books his History of the Britons, which, begun in 1132, took its final form in 1147. From that day to this, for roughly eight hundred years, the Brythonic story of Arthur has been one of the master-subjects of imaginative literature in England. This—the full tale of which belongs to the next section of this book—is the last thing to be said of the influence on English literature of the Brythons, the children of the second Celtic migration.

These two Celtic invasions, the Goidelic and the Brythonic, were followed by another invasion. When the Brythons had been about four hundred years in Britain, the Romans, under Claudius, came to stay, ninety years after the invasion of Julius Cæsar in 55 B.C. Their occupation, which lasted till A.D. 410, has had no power over English literature. To some extent it had Christianised and Romanised the Brythons; but the Roman influence did not really touch English literature till it came back with Christianity in the seventh century to England, and linked a converted people to the long traditions, literature, law, and glory of pagan and Christian Rome. But almost all the traces of this early occupation of Britain by the Romans were swept away by the hurricane of fire and sword which the English, coming in the middle of the fifth century to conquer and to settle the land, let loose on the provincial civilisation of Britain.

English Literature

Before the English Invasion of Britain.

The first Engle-land extended from South Sweden through Denmark and its islands to the lands about the mouth of the Elbe. Its indwellers were men of three tribes—the Jutes, the Angles, and the Saxons—and their common name and tongue was English. They lived along the coast, and in their marshy settlements fought on their western shores a fierce battle with the encroaching sea; but nature was not so rough with them on the eastern coasts of Denmark. They had the expansive spirit which the sea encourages, and in their rude but seaworthy ships sailed in all weathers to ravage the neighbouring coasts, terrible for courage and activity, for cruelty and greed, fearless of death and rejoicing in danger. From the Humber to Southampton they kept the British coast in terror during the later years of the Roman occupation.

Like other nations, they sang their battles at the feast and celebrated their gods. They built up sagas of their ancestral heroes, and most of their chiefs were also bards. The older men who did not go on piracy farmed the lands of their settlements, and agriculture as well as war had its own songs. In these lays of religion, of war and agriculture, English poetry began in the ancient Engle-land while Britain was still a Roman province.

Of this heathen poetry on the Continent we have still some fragments left. Portions of the mythical sagas, founded on the doings of nature and of the ancestral heroes, lie embedded in Beowulf. The Battle of Finnsburg is the sole remnant of a series of sagas which were made before the time when the Folk-Wanderings began in 375. Waldthere, the fragment of a saga on the story of Walther of Aquitaine, carries us back to the days of the Theodoric cycle of tales. A poem entitled Widsith retains verses which date from the time when the English were still fighting in their lands about the Eyder and the Elbe. The Complaint of Deor belongs to another world than that of our island, and we possess in the scattered verses of the Charms which the farmer sang as he ploughed and swarmed his bees, and went on a journey and exorcised the demons of cramp and fever, perhaps the oldest remains of heathen song.

The Charm for Bewitched Land contains pure heathen lines such as :

Hail be thou, Earth, mother of men.
Fruitful be thou in the arms of the God.
Be filled with thy fruit for the fare-need of men.

And the rites of the ploughing which are there described are the old heathen rites of the farmer when he first drove his plough through the acre. As we have them, they are Christianised, but their pagan origin appears through the Christian recension. In the Charm for the Swarming of Bees, gravel is thrown over the bees, and the spell-master sings, 'Let this earth be strong against all wights whatever;' and to the bees, 'Sit ye, Victory-women, sink ye to the earth.' But the Charm against a Sudden Stitch is even closer to heathendom. The Charm-doctor stands over the sick man with his shield, guarding him from the darts of the Witch Maidens, and describes their ride over the hill and their flinging of spears, while he charms out the javelin which has caused the cramp. These are remnants as old as the hills, fragments from the ancient Teutonic lands before the English left them for Britain.

The earliest of the longer poems is Widsith, the Far-voyager. Its personal part, in which the bard tells of himself and his wanderings, may belong in its original form to the fifth century, but many additions were afterwards made to these ancient verses. Names of men much earlier and later than the fifth century were foisted in by later editors of the poem. The real interest of the verses is not in these questionable matters, but in the proud and pleasant account Widsith gives of himself as a wandering minstrel, and of the honour and gifts lavished on poets. We see him at the court of Eormanric, singing his mistress Ealdhild's praises over all lands. We hear him and his mate Scilling singing in the hall while all the lords are listening. He tells of the fighting with the Huns in the Wistla woods, and he ends by an outburst of pleasure in his art and in the honour it receives from all who care for a noble fame.

The Scôp (that is, the Shaper, the Poet), in the Complaint of Deor, is not so happy as Widsith. He is no rover, but lives with his lord, and has from him lands and wealth. But his rival, Heorrenda, supplants him, and this song is written to console his heart. Others, Weland, Hild, Gëat, Theodoric, suffered dreadful pain. 'This he overwent, so also will I,' is the refrain of each verse. The allusions to the sagas of Theodoric and Gudrun and Eormanric prove that the English knew, as Waldhere also proves, the Germanic cycle of stories. None of the examples are Christian, but the poem suffers from a Christian interpolation. It is a true lyric, with a 'refrain' at the end of each verse, and this is unique in Old English poetry.

The two fragments of the poem of Waldhere, found by Werlauff at Copenhagen, are made from the original German seventh-century form of the poem. The Christian and chivalric elements of the later forms are entirely absent in the verses we possess. Waldhere flies with his love Hildeguthe from the Huns, and is pursued by Guthere and Hagen. She encourages him to fight against twelve warriors in our first fragment; the second is part of the dialogue between Guthere and Waldhere.

The few lines we have of the Fight at Finnsburg belong to an older cycle of saga than that of Theodoric. There is another portion of this Finn-saga in Beowulf, and the story there told either precedes or continues our fragment. It is sung by the Scôp at the feast in Heorot, Hrothgar's hall. Finn, king of the North Frisians, has married Hildeburh, sister of Hnæf. He invites Hnæf and his comrade Hengest, with sixty men, meaning to slay them.

The verses describe the attack and defence of the hall. It is a fierce, impassioned piece of war-poetry. The related passage in Beowulf describes the burning of Hildeburh's sons on the pyre, and her bitter mourning for them, and the vengeance taken on Finn.

These are our heathen fragments, all of them so infiltrated with Teutonic saga that we believe that the English, when they came to our land, possessed and sang the great stories of their Continental brethren. Of other stories, both mythical and heroic, we have remains scattered through Beowulf—the myth of Scyld; the story of Heremod; the story of Thrytho, which belongs to the ancient saga of Offa; the story of Ingeld and Froda and Freaware, which was the origin of a whole circle of tales; and, oldest of all, the story of Sigmund, which afterwards was developed into the great Volsunga-Saga in the north, and in Germany into the Nibelungen Lied.

Beowulf.

We have one great saga of our own—the Saga of Beowulf. The poem of Beowulf, as we possess it, was probably composed into its present form in the eighth century in England, we do not know by whom; and received, either then or afterwards when it was put into the West Saxon dialect, the addition, but in moderation, of certain Christian elements. The story is, however, honestly heathen, and its original lays arose on the Continent among the English. They came to our England with the Angles, were developed in Northumbria and Mercia, and may have reached full saga proportions in the seventh century. In the eighth (though some make it later) one poet took up the scattered forms of it and wrought them into a whole.

Beowulf seems to have been an historical personage, nephew of Hygelac, the Chochilaicus whom Gregory of Tours mentions as raiding the Frisian shore, and slain by its defenders. Beowulf was present at the battle, and avenged his lord's death. Hygelac died in 520. Beowulf placed Hygelac's son on the throne, and after his death reigned fifty years. This brings the historic Beowulf up to about 570. But this historic personage has not much to do with the poem. Its main story (with folk-lore admixtures from earlier and savage times) is the transference to the hero of the mythical deeds of Beowa,¹ who is one of the presentations of the Sun and the Summer, and whose fight with the Winter and the Darkness, with the frost-giants, the destroying sea and the poisonous mist of the moorland, imaged in the poem by the monster

Grendel and the Dragon, was sung in the ancient England over the sea. The destruction of Grendel and his dam by Beowulf is said to be the destruction of the winter powers of the sea-coast as they attack one of the Danish settlements which felt alike the charging of the icy sea and the deadly cold and venom of the fenland. The story of Beowulf overcoming in his last fight the Dragon is probably the story of the aging Summer contending with the powers of incoming Winter, who attempts to grasp the treasures of the harvest. The Summer God saves the golden hoard, but dies in the struggle. These myths are embodied in the story of Beowulf, and through them his personality is built up by the poet. He becomes the English and North-Germanic ideal of a king, and the ideal is historic. The manners and customs both in war and peace, the picture of the young men sailing on adventure, the town with its hall and meadows and garths, the etiquette and feast of the hall, the daily doings of the settlement from morn to night, the position of women, the home-life, the temper of mind, the thoughts and feelings of our forefathers, are all portrayed in this poem, and there are few historical records so vivid and so interesting. It is the book of our beginnings. It is also a great sea-tale, fit for the origin of the poetry of the mistress of the seas.

Beowulf hears that Hrothgar is harried by a monster, Grendel, who haunts Heorot, the hall of the folk, and devours Hrothgar's thanes. The distressful tale thrills the hero with pity, and he sets sail to help the Danish chief. Arriving, he is told of Grendel, the man-beast of some folk-tale, the creature of the mist and the stormy sea, strong as thirty men, lonely and dreadful, greedy of blood, hating all joy, who tears and eats his

Then the good (warrior), Beowulf the Geat,
Spake boasting words ere he went to his bed ;
' Not myself do I reckon, in mightiness of warfare,
in deeds of the war, any worse than Grendel.
So him, with the sword, I will not put to sleep, deprive him (thus) of life, though I well can do it.
Knows he not the good (war-) way—that he may strike me back, victims. Beowulf and his men sleep in the hall, and Grendel, stalking over the misty moors, strikes in the doors, and rends one of Beowulf's men, but meets at last the grip of the hero. In the fierce wrestle Grendel's arm is torn away, and the monster flies through the night to die. Next morning all is happiness at Heorot; the feast is held and gifts are given; but at night Grendel's dam comes to avenge her son, and Hrothgar's best battle-man is torn in pieces by the wolf-woman of the sea.

This is the re-creation in a later form of the original myth—a separate and later lay. It is now woven into the poem by the single writer of the whole. Grendel's dam is a sea-monster, and lives in a sea-cave; her hands are armed with claws; her blood eats like fire; she is even more savage than her son. The place where she dwells among the cliffs, in a gorge where the black waters welter furiously, is as savage as her nature; and the description of it is the first of those natural descriptions of wild scenery of which our modern English poetry is so full. Beowulf plunges into the sea, rises with the monster who has seized him into her cave, slays her with a magic sword, and returns triumphant with Grendel's head to Hrothgar, who sends him home to Hygelac laden with gifts and honour. This closes the first part of the poem. The second part opens some fifty years after, when Beowulf is an old man. He has been long king of the country, and his people love him. A Dragon, angry that his hoard is robbed, flies forth to burn and ravage; and Beowulf arms to fight his last fight and to win the treasure for his folk. Only one of his thanes comes to help him, and in the battle he is wounded to the death. The Dragon is slain, the treasure is won, and the hero burned on a lofty pyre overlooking the sea.

The poem, many full accounts and translations of which have been set forth, runs to 3183 lines, and its manuscript is in the Cottonian Library in the British Museum. It has been said to be an epic, but it is more justly a narrative poem. It has neither the unity, the weight, the continuity, nor the mighty fates of an epic. Nevertheless it reaches a spiritual unity from the consistency of the hero's character developed from daring youth to wise and self-sacrificing age. It reaches even excellence in the clearness with which its portraits are drawn and its natural scenery represented. Our power of natural description in poetry begins with Beowulf. The verse has a fine ring in it; the tale, if we forget the bardic repetitions, is simple, direct, and rapid; and the spirit of it is as bold and dashing as the stormy sea near which all its actors live. Indeed, the presence and power of the sea is everywhere felt in the poem. Its close is the close of the heathen poetry of England; for, though its composition into a whole belongs to Christian England, the lays worked up in it go back to the seventh, and some of them, it may be, to the sixth, century.

The Embarking of Beowulf.

Then the well-gear'd heroes
Stepped upon the stem, while the stream of ocean Whirled the sea against the sand. There into the ship's breast
Bright and carved things of cost, carried then the heroes,
And their armour well-arrayed. And the men 'out pushed
Their tight ocean-wood on adventure long desired.
Swiftly went above the waves, with a wind well fitted Likest to a fowl, their Floater, with the foam around its throat,

Till at last the Seamen saw the land ahead,
Shining sea-cliffs, soaring headlands,
Broad sea-nesses. So this Sailer of the sea
Reached the sea-way's efd.

Beowulf and Breca at Sea.

When we swam on the Sound, our sword was laid bare,
Hard-edged in our hands; and against the Hron-fishes
We meant to defend us; nor might Breca from me
Far o'er the flood-waves at all float away,
Smarter on ocean; nor would I from him.—
There we two together were tossed on the sea,
Five nights in all, till the flood apart drove us:
Swoln were the surges, of storms 'twas the coldest,
Wan waned the night, and the wind from the north,
Battling-grim, blew on us; rough were the billows.
Then, eastward, came light,
Bright beacon of God; the billows grew still
And now I could see the sea-headlands shine,
The wind-swept rock-walls. Wyrd often delivers
An Earl yet undoomed if his daring avail.

Half-Heathen Poetry.

Elegies and Riddles.

When the lays of Beowulf were made into a poem Christianity had been long established in England. It had come with Augustine in 597. Its last conquest was the Isle of Wight in 686. It took, therefore, ninety years to Christianise England. During that interval, and indeed for a long time afterwards, a semi-heathenism prevailed.

Even in Cnut's reign we find the laws forbidding the worship of heathen gods by the farmers and labourers; and it is more than probable that the greater number of the warriors, bards, and chiefs of the seventh and eighth centuries were only Christian in name, and followed their heathen ways of thinking, feeling, and fighting. The poetry composed by the bards in a chief's following and by the wandering minstrels, outside of the monastic influence, was not likely to be influenced to any depth by Christianity. There are a few examples of such poetry in the Exeter Book, and five of them are of great interest—the Ruined Burg, the Wanderer, the Seafarer, the Wife's Complaint, and the Husband's Message. Along with these we may place a number of the Riddles, written, some suppose, by Cynewulf when he was a wild young poet at some noble's court. They treat of natural phenomena, of war and armour, of the feast and the hall of the folk, of daily life in the settlements, of hunting and cattle, of forest and fish and bird.

The first five poems mentioned above may fairly be called elegiac. They are full of regret for the glory of the past and the sadness of the present, and though we have no means of dating them, I should be inclined to place them in the first quarter of the eighth century. They are devoid of Christian sentiment and doctrine. The prologue and epilogue of the Wanderer, and the long tag added to the Seafarer, are Christian, but these are additions quite out of harmony with the body of the poems. Where they were written is also unknown. Some allot them to the south of England and to the ninth century, others to Mercia. I believe them to be Northumbrian, and to belong to the beginning of the eighth century. Their scenery is northern, their temper is northern; and even the Ruined Burg, which mourns in solemn verse the vanished glory of a desolate city, and is probably a description of the ruins of Bath, may have been written by a Mercian poet educated in the Northumbrian schools. Their most remarkable quality, independent of their heathen dwelling on Fate rather than on the will of God, is their love of Nature—and this too has a heathen tinge. They scarcely touch those softer aspects of the earth and sea and sky which poetry distinctly Christian loved to describe. They dwell on the tempest and the fury of the waves, on the hail lashing the broken fortress, on the thunder of the ice and the deathfulness of the snow, on the black caves in the forest and the cliffs white with the frost. There are half-a-dozen of the Riddles concerned with the terrible play of Nature in the northern seas, in the storm-wearied sky, and in the wild marsh and forest land. Our Nature-poetry of the nineteenth century is a reversion to this early English temper, and poetry of this kind in the eighth or the ninth century is unique in Teutonic literature of that time. Poetry of natural description is to be found also in Welsh and Irish song, and it is probable that the writing of it in England is to be traced to the influence on Northumbria and Mercia of the Celtic poets. But I also believe—and the fact that the form of the English Nature-poetry of this time is finer than any Celtic work of the kind may be due to this—that these northern poets were well acquainted with Virgil; moreover, neither in Irish nor Welsh poetry of this period are there poems, such as the three Riddles on the storms, which treat of Nature alone, of Nature for her own sake. One of these is placed among the extracts. The finest of them is a long poem upon the Hurricane, impersonated as a giant rising from his prison under the earth to work his terrors on land and sea and in the sky; and in each of these realms it is described with so much force, fire, and imagination that we know the poet had watched from point to point the actual thing.

Of the Elegies the Wanderer is the best, but the Seafarer is the most interesting. The Wanderer describes the mournful fates of men, the ruin of great towns and earls, friendships lost, departed glory, the winter night and snow settling on the world and on the heart of man. The Seafarer is perhaps a dramatic dialogue between an old and a young sailor, each telling of their terrible days at sea, yet each confessing the wild fascination of a sailor's life. The Husband's Message, or rather the Lover's Message, calls, in exile, on the sweet-heart of the writer to join him in the foreign land where he waits for her: 'Come in the spring, when the cuckoo calls from the cliff.' The Wife's Complaint tells of her banishment by false tongues from her lord, and mourns her fate from the cave in the wood where she dwells, but mourns the most because she knows he loves her still, and suffers from want of her tenderness. These two last poems are the only poems in Old English which touch upon the passion and subtlety of human love. There may have been many more, but all the poetry of which we have to speak in the next section was written under the shadow of the monasteries, and the subject of love is absent.

The Last Verses of the 'Wanderer.'

Whoso then these ruined Walls wisely has thought over,
And this darkened life of man deeply has considered,
Sage of mood within, oft remembers, far away,
Slaughters cruel and uncounted, and cries out this Word—

'Whither went the horse, whither went the man?
Whither went the Treasure-giver?

What befell the seats of feasting? Whither fled the joys in hall?

O, alas, the beaker bright! O, alas, the byrned warriors!
O, alas, the people's pride! Ah, how perished is that Time!

Veiled beneath Night's helm it lies, as if it ne'er had been!

Left behind them, to this hour, by that host of heroes loved,

Stands the Wall, so wondrous high, with Worm-images adorned !

Strength of ashen spears snatched away the Earls,
Swords that for the slaughter hungered, and the Wyrd sublime !

See, the storms are lashing on the stony ramparts ;
Sweeping down, the snow-drift shuts up fast the Earth—
Woe and winter-terror when it wan ariseth ;
Darkens then the dusk of Night, from the nor'rard driving

Heavy drift of hail for the harm of heroes.

All is full of trouble, all this realm of Earth !
Doom of weirds is changing all the world below the skies ;

Here our fee is fleeting, here the friend is fleeting,
Fleeting here is man, fleeting is the Kinsman !
All the Earth's foundation is become an idle thing.

The Plough—Riddle xxii.

Nitherward my neb is set, deep inclined I fare ;
And along the ground I grub, going as he guideth me
Who the hoary foe of holt is, and the Head of me.
Forward bent he walks, he, the warden at my tail ;
Through the meadows pushes me, moves me on and presses me,
Sows upon my spoor. I myself in haste am then.

Green upon one side is my ganging on ;
Swart upon the other surely is my path.

The Nightingale—Riddle ix.

Many varied voices voice I through my mouth.
Cunning are the notes I sing, and incessantly I change them.
Clear I cry and loud ; with the chant within my head ;
Holding to my tones, hiding not their sweetness.
I, the Evening-singer old, unto earls I bring Bliss within the burghs, when I burst along
With a cadenced song. Silent in their dwellings
They are sitting, bending forwards. Say what is my name.

The Iceberg—Riddle xxxiv.

Came a wondrous wight o'er the waves a-faring,
Comely from his keel called he to the land.
Loudly did he shout, and his laughter dreadful was,
Full of terror to the Earth ! Sharp the edges of his swords,
Grim was then his hate. He was greedy for the slaughter,
Bitter in the battle work ; broke into the shield-walls,
Rough and ravaging his way ; and a rune of hate he bound.
Then, all-skilled in craft, he said, about himself, his nature—
'Of the maiden kin is my mother known ;
Of them all the dearest, so that now my daughter is Waxed up to mightiness.'

Cædmon and the Christian Poetry.

The distinctive Christian poetry begins before the date of the Elegies and the Nature-Riddles—in the seventh century, with Cædmon of Whitby. He is the first English poet whose name we know, and it stands at the head of the long and glorious muster-roll of English singers. We have worn Apollo's laurel for nigh 1300 years. Cædmon began to make verse, we may fairly say, between 660 and 670. We know the date of his death—680 ; and we are told that he was somewhat advanced in years when the gift of song came upon him. We first find him as a secular attendant of the monastery of Hild, an abbess of royal blood, who had set up her house of God on the lofty cliff which rises above the little harbour where the Esk meets the gray waters of the German Ocean. Whitby is its Danish name ; in the days of Bæda it was called Streoneshalh. Cædmon was born a heathen if he was English ; but if, as some think from his name, he was a Celt, he was born a Christian. The monastery in which he afterwards became a monk was founded on the Celtic pattern—one of the children of Iona—and he was early imbued with the Celtic spirit. Existing Celtic hymns, such as Colman's, may have been placed before him by the Irish monks as models for his poetry. But, for all this, his tongue was English and his poems were made in English. Whatever the Irish spirit did for him, the ground of his work was English.

Bæda tells the story of Cædmon's birth as a poet. One night, having the care of the cattle, he fell asleep in the stable, and One came to him and said, 'Cædmon, sing me something.' 'I know not how to sing,' he replied, 'and for this cause left I the feast.' 'Yet,' said the divine visitant, 'you must sing to me.' 'What shall I sing?' said Cædmon. 'Sing,' the other replied, 'the beginning of created things.' And immediately Cædmon began a hymn in praise of the World's Upbuilder, and awakening, remembered what he had sung, and told the Town-Reeve of his gift, who brought him to Hild ; and, becoming a monk, he continued in the abbey till he died with joy and in peace, singing, day by day, all the Scripture history, and of the Judgment-day. 'Others after him,' said Bæda, 'tried to make religious poems, but none could compare with him.'

His poetry had then made a school which was doing similar work to his when Bæda, fifty years after Cædmon's death, was finishing his Ecclesiastical History. The poems attributed to Cædmon by Junius in the manuscript called the Junian Cædmon (facsimile edition by Gollancz, 1927 ; edition by Krapp, 1931) have been assigned by critics to different writers. Only one of them—Genesis A—is thought by a few to be possibly from his hand. If so, he wrote the thing in two distinct manners—partly in a mere paraphrase of the Biblical story, dull, unilluminated by any imagination ; and partly in imaginative episodes, in which the Fall of the rebel angels, the Flood, the battles of Abraham, and the story of Hagar and of Isaac are imaginatively treated as heroic tales, in the manner of a heathen saga, and with English feeling. It is to be hoped that some day we shall get evidence to prove that these fine, bold episodes are from Cædmon's hand. The only verses we know to be his are transferred into Latin by Bæda, and we have a Northumbrian version of them in an old MS. of the Historia Ecclesiastica. They are the short hymn which he is said to have sung on awakening from his dream. Their hymnic form suggests to critics that Cædmon's work was mainly a series of heroic hymn-like lays on the subjects of the Old and New Testament, tinged with the colours of the Nature and the hero myths. It may be that we have the remains of one of these in the poem, portions of which are carved in runic letters on the Ruthwell Cross in Dumfriesshire. The lines sing of 'Jesus, the young Hero, who was God Almighty, who girded Himself and stepped up, full of courage, on the gallows for the sake of man.' And as He lies there, the Sacred Rood speaks: 'Lifted on high, I bore the Lord of the heavenly realm, and trembled, all bestreamed with blood. Pierced with spears and sore pained with sorrows, I beheld it all. They laid Him, limb-wearied, in the grave.' If this fragment be really Cædmon's,² it fills us with deep regret that we have lost his other poems—lost a poetry so close to the heroic manner, so filled with the spirit of that heathen vigour and passion which his life had seen and known. At any rate, we owe him a great debt. He bridged the river between the pagan and the Christian poetry. He showed to his folk how the new material of Christianity could be used by the bards of England. He made a great school of poetry. He made Cynewulf possible. He is the first English poet in our England. The royal line of England goes back to Cerdic, the still more royal line of English poets goes back to Cædmon.

The poetry of the School of Cædmon belongs to the end of the seventh and the beginning of the eighth century. Some of these poems are in the Exeter Book. They are short hymnic songs of praise. There is the Song of the Three Children, adapted in the seventh century from the Apocrypha; and following it, the Prayer of Azarias. These were joined together, and furnished in later times with a conclusion, celebrating the deliverance of the three children. As the capacity for writing poetry grew, other forms were developed—poems of a half-epic character, and narrative poems with episodes like heathen lays inserted on a background of narrative. Of these two kinds of poetry, which ran together, the Exeter Book contains three—Genesis A, Exodus, and Daniel; and in the manuscript which contains Beowulf there is another—Judith. These probably belonged to Northumbria. Whether any long poems were written in the middle and south of England at this time we do not know; but we do know that the family lay and the war-song were made and sung everywhere, and we have a pleasant story which tells how Ealdhelm, Bishop of Sherborne, who died in 709, was accustomed on his preaching tours to stand like a gleeman on the bridge or the public way, and to sing songs, it may be his own, to the people flocking to the fairs, that he might draw them to him to hear the Word of God. This is the only thing we know of poetry in the south of England at this time.

Genesis A is in the Junian manuscript. This manuscript was found by Archbishop Ussher, and sent by him to Francis Du Jon (Junius), who printed it at Amsterdam some time after 1650, and published it as the work of Cædmon, because its contents and its beginning agreed with Bæda's account of Cædmon's work. It is now at the Bodleian, and is a small folio of 229 pages, in two handwritings, the first of the tenth century, and illustrated with rude pictures. The first contains the Genesis, the Exodus, and the Daniel; the second the poems and fragments of poems generally classed under the title of Christ and Satan. The Genesis is now divided into two parts, called A and B; and Genesis B and the Christ and Satan are now placed by the critics in the ninth and tenth centuries.

Genesis A is the first of the three poems belonging to the Cædmon School. It consists of the first 234 lines of the Genesis, and of the lines from 852 to the close. [The lines between 234 and 852 are Genesis B.] The early poem has many archaic elements, drawn from Teutonic ideas of the universe—ancient Nature-myths. Its account of Abraham's war is alive with heathen lust of battle and vengeance; and Abraham and his comrades speak like an English earl and his thanes in counsel. When the poet comes to gentler matters the spirit of the poem is changed. The Christian sentiment for soft landscape, its love of animals, and its tender domestic feeling touch the verse, in a pathetic mingling, with grace and delicacy.

The account of the Creation tells of the Hollow Chasm, black in everlasting night—the vast Abrupt that was before the earth and stars were made; then of the birth of ocean and of light, and of Day flying from the Dark, and of Morning striding over earth and repelling the Night; then of Man's creation, and of the winsome water washing the happy lands, and of earth made lovely with flowers—and the lines are full of the new kindness which, unlike the heathen poetry, loved the beauty and softness of the earth and sky. Mere paraphrase follows, and then the poetic work is again taken up in the episode of the Flood, which is told by one who had seen the rain of tempest and heard the sounding of the sea, and, it may be, from the height of the abbey cliff, watched the sailors drive their barks into the harbour. Another weary piece of paraphrase brings us to Abraham's story, his visit to Egypt, his war with the kings of the East, Hagar's deliverance, and the sacrifice of Isaac. The episode is well invented, and developed with great freedom from its original. The war is English war. Abraham acts and talks like an English earl; the raid of the Eastern kings is like a raid of the Picts into Northumbria; the tie of comradeship between Abraham and Aner, Mamre and Eshcol, is the same as that between Beowulf and his thanes, between Byrhtnoth and his followers; the joy in the vengeance taken is fiercely northern. 'No need,' cries Abraham, 'to fear any more the fighting rush of the Northmen. The carrion-birds, splashed with their blood and glutted with their corpses, are sitting now on the ledges of the hills.' Dialogue, which belongs to the whole of the episodes and gives them life and movement, is largely used in the story of Hagar, and almost suggests the drama. The sacrifice of Isaac is full of Teutonic touches—the bale-fire, the white-haired gold-giver girding his gray sword on him, the sun stepping upwards, the high wolds where the pyre is made, the vivid reality of a Northman's human sacrifice; and the poem ends with the cry of God: 'Pluck the boy away living from the pile of wood.'

The Exodus is a complete whole. It is not troubled by paraphrase. The writer uses the greatest freedom with his subject, inventing, expanding, elaborately exalting his descriptions; beginning with the death of the first-born, and ending with the triumph over Pharaoh. War and the array of battle give him great pleasure. He describes Pharaoh's host on their march with vigour and fire; and the marshalling of Israel before the passage of the sea is full of poetic pleasure. In both passages, what an English host was like at the beginning of the eighth century is exactly detailed. The great war, however, is the war of God against the Egyptians, His menace of their host on the march, His use against them of the blackness of tempest, the charging waves, the bloody flood. These were God's ancient swords.

Many times the poet describes the overwhelming. It is forcible—over forcible; but young poetic life is in it. And the poem closes with the Song of victory and the plunder of the dead Egyptians.

Judith, in the manuscript which contains Beowulf, is probably of the same cycle as the Exodus—a poem of the middle of the eighth century. Like the Exodus, the poem is conceived as a Saga, to be sung before the warriors in camp as well as the monks in the refectory. It seems to have been in twelve books, for our manuscript contains a few lines of Section ix., and the whole of Sections x., xi., and xii. Section x. begins with the feast of Holofernes and the leading of Judith to his tent. He reels into his bed, drunken and shouting. 'Avenge, O God!' she cries, 'this burning at my heart;' and the slaughter of the heathen chief is told with accurate delight. Book xi. brings us to Bethulia. Judith calls on all the burghers to arm for battle, and again English war is described. The warriors, bold as kings, run swiftly to the carnage, showers of spears fall on the foes, and the sword-play is fierce among the doomed. The gaunt wolf, the raven, and the dusky eagle rejoiced on that day. The twelfth book tells of the surprise of the Assyrian host, their flight, and the gathering of the spoil; and Judith ends it with the praise of God. She towers over the whole, a noble and heroic figure, fit to receive and wear her spoil—the sword and helm, war-shirt and gems, of Holofernes.

The Daniel closes this earliest cycle of Christian poetry. It has no literary quality—a mere monkish paraphrase of the book as far as the feast of Belshazzar. The school of Cædmon had reached its decay.

The poetry of that school took its materials from the Old Testament. Christ was celebrated in it as the Creator, the great warrior who overthrew the rebel angels, the Egyptians, the Assyrians. It was eminently English; it was eminently objective. The personality of the poet does not intrude into the poems.

The second school of Christian poetry is clearly divided from its predecessor. Cynewulf was its founder and its best artist. Its subjects are drawn from the New Testament and the martyr stories and legends of the Church of Rome. It is more Latin in feeling than English. Christ is celebrated, not as the God of the Jews who destroys His foes, but as the Saviour of the world of men for whom He dies, and the Judge who is to come. The note of it is a note of sorrow on the earth, but of joy to be in heaven. In the life to come is the rapture which fills the hymns of Cynewulf. And, finally, the poetry almost ceases to be objective. The poet's personal passion enters into every subject.

Thorpe edited the Cædmonian poems (1832); Kennedy translated them (prose: 1916). For Exodus and Daniel, see F. A. Blackburn (1907); for Judith, A. S. Cook (1904).

Abraham's Battle with the Elamites.

So they rushed together. Loud were then the lances, Savage then the slaughter-hosts. Sadly sang the wan fowl,

All her feathers dank with dew, 'midst the darting of the shafts,

Hoping for the corpses. Then the heroes hastened
In their mighty masses, and their mood was full of thought.

Hard the play was there,
Interchanging of death-darts, mickle cry of war!
Loud the clang of battle! With their hands the heroes
Drew from sheath their swords ring-hilted,
Doughty of the edges.

In the camps was clashing
Of the shields and shafts, of the shooters falling; Brattling of the bolts of war! Underneath the breast of men

Grisly gripped the sharp-ground spears
On the foemen's life. Thickly fell they there
Where, before, with laughter, they had lifted booty.

(Genesis, ll. 1982-2060.)

The Approach of Pharaoh.

Then they saw

Forth and forward faring, Pharaoh's war array,
Gliding on, a grove of spears; glittering the hosts!
Fluttered there the banners, there the folk the march trod.

Onwards surged the war, strode the spears along,
Blickered the broad shields; blew aloud the trumpets.
Wheeling round in gyres, yelled the fowls of war,
Of the battle greedy; hoarsely barked the raven,
Dew upon his feathers, o'er the fallen corpses;
Swart that chooser of the slain! Sang aloud the wolves
At the eve their horrid song, hoping for the carrion.
Kindless were the beasts, cruelly they threaten;
Death did these march-warders, all the midnight through,
Howl along the hostile trail—hideous slaughter of the host.

Cynewulf.

Cynewulf, with whom the second period of Old English poetry begins, was, in the opinion of a large number of critics, a Northumbrian, but some think him to have been Mercian. It is difficult to conceive how a poet so well acquainted with the sea and the coasts of the sea should have written in Mercia. A Mercian might have been acquainted with the sea, but not impassioned by it, as Cynewulf proves he is. Moreover, the sadness of his poetry, the constant regret for vanished glory, does not suit the life in Mercia at this time, when, from 718 to 796, Æthelbald and Offa had made Mercia the greatest kingdom in England; but does suit the life in Northumbria, from 750 to 790, a kingdom fallen into anarchy and decay.

We know the name of the poet,¹ and something of his life and character. He has signed his name in runic letters to four of his poems. His riddling commentary on these runes gives personal details of parts of his life. His youth, he says, 'was radiant.' He was sometimes attached as a Scôp to a chieftain; sometimes he played the part of a wandering singer. He had received many gifts for his singing, then fallen into need; had known the griefs of love, and lived the wild life of a young poet; so that, when looking back on his youth, he thinks of himself as stained with many sins. Then the scenery of his life changed. Some heavy misfortune fell on him, and he tells us then that his repentance was deep. In his sorrow for sin he had a vision of the Cross, and felt the blessing of forgiveness. His 'gift of song' that he had lost in his remorse and fear returned to him, and then he began to write his Christian poetry. In that poetry we read his sensitive, impassioned, self-contemplative character. He is as personal as Milton or Cowper; but, unlike Cowper, he passes from religious sorrow into religious peace, and the poems written in his old age are full of contented aspiration for the better kingdom.

The Riddles,¹ if they are his, tell us that he knew some Latin and had lived in monasteries, probably as a scholar; was a lover of natural scenery, of animals and birds; was eager in the works of war, and had sung the sword, the spear, the war-shirt, and the bow; had watched with an observant eye the village and the town on the edge of the woods, the river, the mill, the loom, the gardens, the domestic animals. Moreover, he had seen and described, with a young man's joy in the tempest, the cliffs and shore white with the leaping waves, the ships labouring in the mountainous sea, the folk-halls burning in the gale, the woods ravaged by the lightning and the black rain. All this and much more is celebrated in the Riddles. With his love of impersonation, he personified far more than his riddle-making predecessors, Ealdhelm, Symphosius, and Tatwine, the subjects of his enigmas. When he makes the Iceberg ride like a Viking over the waves, and charge, breaking his enemies' ships, with fierce singing and laughing, to the shore, we feel that he could scarce carry further imaginative personation of natural phenomena. Yet he is so particular in observation of Nature that he devotes three separate Riddles to the description of three several kinds of tempest, and they are done with imaginative intensity, nor is the phrase exaggerated.

The Riddles are in the Exeter Book, in three divisions. There are ninety-five of them, but these are combined into eighty-nine. There were probably a hundred. Those written by Ealdhelm and others before Cynewulf's time were in Latin; these are in English verse, with the exception of the eighty-sixth, which is in Latin. As the name Lupus is in it, it is supposed that Cynewulf thus recorded his name.

When we meet Cynewulf again he is all changed. He has suffered sore trouble, and is overwhelmed with sorrow for sin; and we possess, mingled up with the runes of his name, his record of misery in the Juliana, the first, probably, of his signed poems. Here, as an example both of the fashion of his signature and of his penitence, is the passage:

Sorrowful are wandering

C and Y and N; for the King is wrathful,
God of conquests giver. Then, bespeckled with sins,
E and V and U must await in fear

What, their deeds according, God will doom to them
For their life's reward. L and F are trembling, Waiting, sad with care.

The Juliana is in the Exeter Book, and Cynewulf has worked up the legend of this virgin and martyr in a series of episodes so abrupt, so full of repetition, with so awkward a hand, that it plainly suggests a beginner's work in a new method. From a wild young poet to a sad penitent, from versing of war and love and nature to versing a pious legend, are not transitions which are easily made, nor is the work done in such a transition imaginative. We may say the same of the first part of the St Guthlac, which he has not signed, but which we think was written in this transition period. It rests on traditions of the saint, and is a lifeless piece of writing.

In the Crist, which is the next signed poem, Cynewulf has passed through this transition time, and attained ease, life, and eagerness in his art; recovered his imaginative power, his passion, and his descriptive force. Here, for the first time in his Christian work, he reaches originality, his true method and fit material. The Crist is not the translation of a legend; it is freshly invented; and Cynewulf is always at his best when he is inventing, not imitating. The sorrow for his sinful life continues, but it is now mingled with the peace which comes of realised forgiveness. 'I have sailed on wind-swept seas,' he cries, 'over fearful surges, but now my ship is anchored in the haven to which the Spirit-Son of God has brought me home.'

The Crist is in the Exeter Book. It was scattered in fragmentary pieces through this book, but has now been brought together. It consists of three parts. The first celebrates the Nativity, the second the Ascension, the third the Day of Judgment, and the poem closes at line 1663. The series of cantatas into which the first part is set are remarkable not only for the rushing praise with which each of them ends, but also for a dramatic dialogue, almost like the dialogue in the Miracle-Plays, between a choir of men and women from Jerusalem and Mary and Joseph. It reads like a prediction of the medieval mysteries. In the second part there is a finely conceived scene, set in the vast of space, of Christ returning to His Father's home, leading all the Old Testament saints up out of Hades, and of the meeting with Him and them of the host of heaven who have poured from the gates to welcome the new-comers. The third part of the poem begins with the gathering of the angels and the saints on Mount Zion. A noble description follows of the Angels of the four trumpets summoning the dead. Christ appears in a blazing light, and the universe melts in conflagration. Only Mount Zion remains, and the throne, and the dead, small and great, before it. Then, with its root on the mount and its top in heaven, a mighty Cross is upraised, wet with the blood of the King, but so brilliant that all shade is drowned in its crimson light. This fine conception is Cynewulf's own, and in its description, and in that of the great conflagration, the power he showed in the Riddles reaches its highest point. The poem ends with a picture of the saints in the perfect land.

The Crist was followed by the Phœnix and the second part of the Guthlac. Neither of these is signed by Cynewulf, but nevertheless many scholars allot them to him. The Phœnix is in the Exeter Book, and its source is a Latin poem by Lactantius. This original is left at line 380; the rest is an allegory of the Resurrection, in which not only Christ but all the souls of the just are symbolised by the rebirth of the Phœnix. The first part describes the paradisiacal land—the equivalent of the Celtic land of eternal youth—in which the Phœnix dwells, and the description is famous in Old English work. Then the enchanted life of the bird is told with all Cynewulf's love of animals, of lovely woodland places, of the glory of the sunrising and the sunset, and of sweet singing; and then the flight of the bird to the Syrian land, its burning, its resurrection, and the return to its Paradise for another thousand years. The allegory follows. It is plain from the joyousness, the exultation of this poem, and its rapturous praise, that Cynewulf had fully recovered from his spiritual misery, and was happy in faith and hope.

The second part of Guthlac, which Cynewulf now added, as I think, to the first part, has for its subject the death of Guthlac, and is told in the manner of the saga stories. I have conjectured that Cynewulf, who in the previous poems had avoided the heroic and mythical terms of the heathen poetry, as he would be likely to do after his conversion from a life he held in horror, now felt his religious being so firmly set that he allowed himself to recur to the poetic fashions of his youth. At any rate, in this poem and in the later poems he sings the Christian battle with death, the victory of Jesus over evil, the legends of the Church, with a full use of the old heroic strain, of the Nature-myths, and of the terms of heathen war. Guthlac stands on his hill, like a Viking, as if on Holmgang, to meet the assaults of Satan and his 'smiths of sin;' to stand against Death, that greedy warrior; and dies in triumph. A pillar of light rises from his corpse, and the heavenly host bursts into rapturous singing to welcome him. All England trembles with joy. It is an unfinished poem, but there is no better work in Old English poetry.

A fragment of a Descent into Hell also belongs to this poet, and is written with the same trick of dialogue and the same enthusiasm as the Crist, and in the same heroic manner as the Guthlac. This poem also is not signed.

There are two signed poems yet to be spoken of, and two unsigned, which many critics have allotted to Cynewulf. The two signed poems are the Fates of the Apostles and the Elene. The two unsigned are the Andreas and the Dream of the Rood. No discussion has gathered round the Elene. It is plainly Cynewulf's. A great deal of discussion has gathered round the Dream of the Rood. Again and again it has been claimed for Cynewulf; again and again the claim has been denied. The same may be said with regard to the Andreas. As to the Fates of the Apostles, most people think the signature makes it plainly his; but the date of its production and whether it stands alone or is an epilogue to the Andreas are matters still in discussion. The best thing this short treatise can do is to leave these critical matters, and to speak of the poems themselves. If the Fates of the Apostles be bound up with the Andreas, and if Cynewulf wrote the Andreas, it is here, after the second part of Guthlac, that we may best place these poems.

The Fates of the Apostles is in the Vercelli Book, and the personal passage (if it really belong to that poem) contains Cynewulf's name. The work of the apostles is told as if it were the expedition of English Æthelings against their foes. 'Thomas bore the rush of swords; Simon and Thaddeus were quick in the sword-play.' This heroic cry is equally strong in the Andreas; but the manner of the whole poem does not resemble the other work of Cynewulf. It has many lines which recall Beowulf, and the writer seems to have read that poem. If it is by an imitator of Cynewulf, the imitator was capable of as good work as Cynewulf; and he loves the grim sea-coasts and the stormy sea as much as Cynewulf. It would be pleasant to think that there were two such men writing at this time. (Krapp edited the Vercelli Book, 1932.)

The Andreas is in the Vercelli Book, and tells from the Acts of St Andrew and St Matthew, of which there is a Greek manuscript at Paris, the adventures of the two apostles among the Mermedonians, a cannibal Ethiopian tribe. The apostles, the angels, even Christ Himself, are all English in speech, and the scenery is English. There is, of course, nothing English in the original. The change is a deliberate addition made by the writer. As literature, the important part of the poem is the voyage of St Andrew and his thanes with Christ and two angels, their conversation, the description of the storm, their landing on the coast. All this is done in heroic fashion; the breath of the sea fills it; the natural description is terse and observant, and the talk is imaginatively treated. We feel as if we were sailing in a merchant-boat of the eighth century between Whitby and the Tyne. Landing, Andrew delivers

Matthew, suffers three days' martyrdom, and then, after a mighty flood and tempest of fire has destroyed his foes, converts the rest, founds a church, and sails away.

There is no doubt of the authorship of the Elene, which Cynewulf wrote when he was 'old and ready for death in my frail tabernacle.' It is the last of the signed poems. He was now a careful artist. 'I've woven craft of words,' he says, 'culled them out, sifted night by night my thoughts.' He then recalls the story of his life while he signs his name in runes. It is the chief biographical passage in his work, and it ends with a fine description of the storm-wind hunting in the sky. The poem is in the Vercelli Book—1320 lines. The subject is the Finding of the True Cross by the Empress Helena. The battle of Constantine with the Huns and the voyage of Helena are the best parts of the poem. They are insertions by Cynewulf into the Latin life of Cyriacus, Bishop of Jerusalem, which (in the Acta Sanctorum, May 4) is the source of the poem. The battle is done with the full heroic spirit. The sea-voyage breathes of his delight in the doings of ships and of the ocean. The ancient saga-terms strengthen and animate his verse, and the poet seems to write like a young man. His metrical movement is steadier here than in the other poems. He uses almost invariably the short epic line into the usage of which English poetry had now drifted. Rhyme, also, and assonance are not infrequent. The poets, it is plain, had now formulated rules for their art. Had Northumbrian poetry lasted, it might have become as scientific as the Icelandic.

The last poem belonging to Cynewulf or his school is the Dream of the Rood, which is found in the Vercelli Book. Its authorship is unknown, but many scholars give it to Cynewulf. I believe it to be his last poem, his farewell; and that he worked it up from that early 'Lay of the Rood' ascribed to Cædmon (see p. 10), a portion of which is quoted on the Ruthwell Cross. Cynewulf wished to record before he died the vision of the Cross which converted him. He found this poem of Cædmon's, and wrought it up into a description of his vision, inserting the 'long epic lines' in which it was written. Then he wrote a beginning and end of his own in his 'short epic' line. This theory—it is no more—accounts for the difficulties of the poem (ed. by Bruce Dickinson and Ross, 1935).

It begins by describing how he saw at the dead of night a wondrous Tree, adorned with gems, moist with blood; and how, as he looked on it, heavy-hearted with sin, it began to tell its story.

I was hewed down in the holt, and wrought into shape, and set on a hill, and the Lord of all folk hastened to mount on me, the Hero who would save the world. Nails pierced me; I was drenched with the Hero's blood, and all Creation wept around me. Then His foes and mine took Almighty God from me, and men made His grave, and sang over Him a sorrowful lay.

The old poem, thus worked up into Cynewulf's new matter, may be distinguished by its long epic lines from the newer matter, which is written in the short epic line. When the dream is finished, Cynewulf ends with a long passage so like the rest of his personal statements, so steeped in his individuality as we know it from his signed poems, so pathetic and so joyous, that it is hard to understand how the poem can be attributed to any one but Cynewulf. 'Few friends are left me now,' he says; 'they have fared away to their High Father. And I bide here, waiting till He on whose Rood I looked of old shall bring me to the happy place where the High God's folk are set at the evening meal.' And with that the poetry and the life of Cynewulf close.

The time is coming when his name will be more highly honoured among us, and his poetry better known. He had imagination; he anticipated, at a great distance, the Nature-poetry of the nineteenth century, especially the poetry of the sea; his personal poetry, full of religious passion both of penitence and joy, makes him a brother of the many poets who in England have written well of their own heart and of God in touch with it. His hymnic passages of exultant praise ought to be translated and loved by all who cherish the Divine praise which from generation to generation has been so nobly sung by English poets. The heroic passages in his poems link us to our bold heathen forefathers, and yet are written by a Christian. Their spirit is still the spirit of England. But his greatest hero was Jesus Christ. Cynewulf was, more than any other Old English poet, the man who celebrated Christ as the Healer of men.

The other remains of English poetry which we possess in the Exeter and Vercelli Books, and which were written before the revival of literature under Ælfred, belong more to the history of criticism than literature. They were written at various dates during the eighth and ninth centuries. For our purpose it will almost suffice to name the best of them. One of them is a short Physiologus, a description of three animals—the Panther, the Whale, and the Partridge—followed by a religious allegory based on the description. The Panther symbolises Christ, the Whale the devil. There are two didactic poems, the Address of a Father to a Son, and of the Lost Soul to its Body. There are two other poems on the Gifts of Men and the Fates of Men, the latter of which treats its subject with so much originality that it has been given to Cynewulf. Both contain passages which tell us a good deal about the arts and crafts of the English, and about various aspects of English scenery. The Gnomic Verses—folk proverbs and maxims, short descriptions of human life and of natural events—are in four collections, three in the Exeter Book and one in the Cotton MS. at Cambridge. Many of these are interesting.

Some have come down from heathen times ; some are quotations from the poets ; others tell of war, of courts, of women, of games, of domestic life. They would have interested Ælfred ; and it is probable that, collected at York, they were edited in Wessex in Ælfred's time. The Rune Song is an alphabet of the Runes, with attached verses, such as we still make at the present day on the letters of the alphabet. There are two dialogues between Solomon and Saturnus, in which Christian wisdom in Solomon and the heathen wisdom of the East in Saturnus contend together in question and answer. Such dialogues became frequent in medieval literature, but changed their form. Marculf takes the place of Saturn, and represents the uneducated peasant or mechanic, whose rustic wit often gets the better of the king and the scholar. But there is no trace of this rebellion against Church and State in the English dialogues. With them we may close the poetry of the ninth century. A few years after the death of Cynewulf the Danish terror began. Literature decayed ; men had not the heart to write poetry ; and when, shortly after 867, the 'army' (which had already ravaged East Anglia and the greater part of Mercia) stormed York and destroyed every abbey and seat of learning from the Humber to the Forth, the poetry of Northumbria passed away. We may say that the farewell of Cynewulf in the Dream of the Rood was the dirge of Northumbrian song.

At the Judgment-Day.

Deep creation thunders, and before the Lord shall go
Hugest of upheaving fires o'er the far-spread earth !
Hurtles the hot flame, and the heavens burst asunder,
All the firm-set flashing planets fall out of their places.
Then the sun that erst o'er the elder world
With such brightness shone for the sons of men
Black-dark now becomes, changed to bloody hue.
And the moon alike, who to man of old
Nightly gave her light, nither tumbles down :
And the stars also shower down from heaven, Headlong through the roaring lift, lashed by all the winds.

(From the Crist.)

The Bliss of Heaven.

There, is angels' song ; there, enjoyment of the blest ;
There, beloved Presence of the Lord Eternal,
To the blessed brighter than the beaming of the Sun !
There is love of the beloved, life without the end of death ;
Merry there man's multitude ; there unmarred is youth
by eld ;
Glory of the hosts of Heaven, health that knows not pain ;
Rest for righteous doers, rest withouten strife,
For the good and blessed ! Without gloom the day,
Bright and full of blossoming ; bliss that's sorrowless ;
Peace all friends between, ever without enmity ;
Love that envieth not, in the union of the saints,
For the happy ones of Heaven ! Hunger is not there nor thirst,
Sleep nor heavy sickness, nor the scorching of the Sun ;

Neither cold nor care ; but the happy company,
Sheenest of all hosts, shall enjoy for aye
Grace of God their King, glory with their Lord.

(From the Crist.)

St Guthlac dies and is received into Heaven.

Then out-streamed a Light
Brightest that of beaming pillars ! All that Beacon fair,
All that heavenly glow round the holy home,
Was up-reared on high, even to the roof of Heaven,
From the field of earth, like a fiery tower,
Seen beneath the sky's expanse, sheenier than the sun,
Glory of the glorious stars ! Hosts of angels sang Loud the lay of Victory ! In the lift the ringing sound
Now was heard the heaven under, raptures of the Holy Ones !

So the blessed Burgstead was with blisses filled,
With the sweetest scents, and with skiey wonders,
With the angels' singing, to its innermost recesses ;
Heirship of the Holy One !

More onelike it was,
And more winsome there, than in world of ours
Any speech may say ; how the sound and odour,
How the clang celestial, and the saintly song
Heard in Heaven were—high-triumphant praise of God,
Rapture following rapture.

All our island trembled,
All its Field-floor shook.

(From the Guthlac.)

Latin Writers before Ælfred.

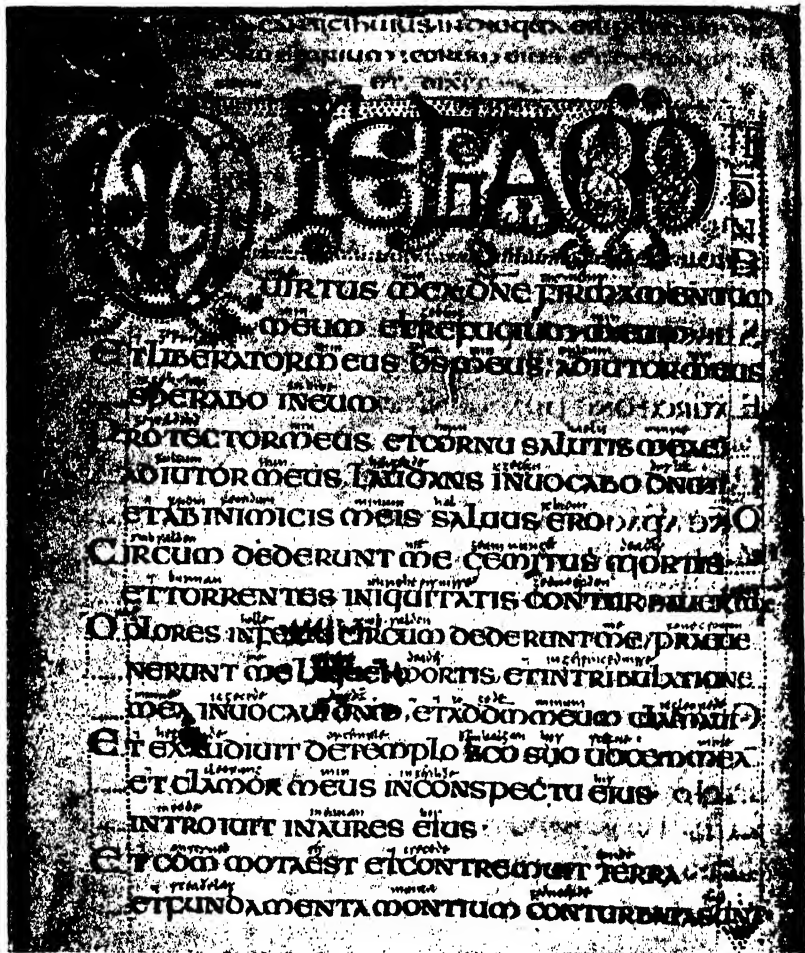

When Augustine landed in Thanet in 597 and made Canterbury the first Christian town, he brought with him, to add to the development of English literature, the power, the wisdom, the amalgamating force, and the long traditions of Rome. But at first, though the Roman missionaries influenced the English thought, they did not use the English language. All that they wrote they wrote in Latin. The Celtic Church encouraged the English to shape their thought and feeling in their own tongue ; the Roman Church discouraged this ; and the south of England, where Rome was supreme as a teacher, did not till the days of Ælfred produce any important literature in English.

The Latin literature of the south began with Theodore of Tarsus, who was made Archbishop of Canterbury in 669. Benedict Biscop, a Northumbrian scholar, came with him from Rome ; and Benedict, going to his home, was the proper founder of Latin literature in Northumbria. Hadrian, Theodore's deacon, joined in 671, and with his help Theodore set on foot the school of Canterbury, which soon became the centre of southern learning. Wessex and Kent now produced their own scholars, and their bishops were men who loved and nourished education. Daniel of Winchester was a wise assistant of Bæda ; but the man who best represents the knowledge and literature of the south was Ealdhelm, who, educated by Mailduf, an Irishman, and also at Canterbury, became Abbot of Malmesbury and Bishop of Sherborne. He may have helped to compile the Laws of Ine.

King of Wessex, and he made some English songs; but his chief work was in Latin, and it was the Latin of a scholar who knew the Roman classics. He wrote Latin verse with ease, and translated into hexameters the stories of his prose treatise De laudibus Virginitatis. His Latin Riddles sent to Aldfrith of Northumbria were used by Cynewulf. His correspondence was extensive, and the letters to English and Welsh kings, to monasteries abroad, are as honourable to him as his letters to the abbesses and nuns, who in those days had learnt Latin, are charming, gay, and tender. His style is swollen, fantastic, and self-pleased, but the goodness and grace of the man shine through it. He was the last of the Wessex scholars who at this time did any literary work.

Ability and intelligence in Wessex were more employed in organisation of the Church and in missionary enterprise than in writing. Theodore brought the whole Christianity of England into unity. Winifried or Boniface, who brought Central Germany into obedience to the Roman See; Willibald, one of our first pilgrims to Palestine; Lullus, Archbishop of Mainz, who has left us a correspondence which proves his influence over the growth of Christianity and learning in England and Europe, were all West Saxons. But after the middle of the eighth century active literary life died in Wessex, and when Ælfred came to the throne in 871, there was not a single priest left who could understand their service books or put them into English.

The history of Latin literature in the Mid-England kingdom of Mercia is even of less importance than it is in Wessex. Under Æthelbald the country seems to have won a reputation for learning; and Ecgwin, Bishop of Worcester, is said to be our first autobiographer. The Life of St Guthlac, written by Felix of Crowland for an East Anglian king, in outpuffing Latin, is the only work we know of. But Æthelbald and his successor Offa were munificent to monasteries; and the school at Worcester was the last refuge of learning, when its cause was lost all over England in the ninth century.

The career of Latin literature in Northumbria was more continuous and more important than it was in Wessex or Mercia. The names of many of its scholars were known over the world, and are famous to this day. Northumbrian scholarship founded a great school, almost a university, at York, from which flowed the learning which, received and cherished by Charles the Great, produced an early Renaissance in Europe. The story of its rise and its fall belongs to York. The story of its growth and development belongs to Wearmouth and Jarrow.

Christianity reached York in the year 627, when Paullinus baptised Eadwine. But after Eadwine's death Northumbria relapsed into heathenism, Paullinus fled, and Latin literature was stifled in its birth. Literature and religion again took fresh life under Oswald in 634, but they were now in Celtic, not in Roman hands. The monasteries set up were ruled by Celtic monks from Iona; the bishops came from the same place; the kings and princes of the Northumbrian house were, for the most part, educated at Iona, spoke Irish, and knew the poetry and learning of Ireland. And the Irish, accustomed to praise God and their heroes and saints in their own tongue, encouraged the Northumbrians to write in their own tongue. The first literature of Northumbria was in English.

Rome was naturally unsatisfied with this predominance of the Celtic Church; Northumbria must be drawn into the Latin fold; and Theodore, Wilfrid, and others, with Prince Alchfrith, fought their battle so well that in 664, at the Synod of Whitby, Northumbria joined the Latin Church. And now, though the Celtic influence lasted for many years, Latin learning, which had begun in Ripon and Hexham, took deep root in the north. Benedict Biscop, who had been at Rome with Theodore, built in 674 the monastery of St Peter at Wearmouth, and in 682 the sister house at Jarrow. He and the large libraries he collected for these abbeys were the real foundation of the Latin literature and learning of the north. Scholars and writers soon began to multiply.

Wilfrid's biography—the first written in England—was done by his friend Eddius Stephanus about 709. The Life of St Cuthbert was written at Lindisfarne. Wilfrid's closest friend, Acca, Bishop of Hexham, increased the library which John of Beverley had ministered to. These are the chief names of the early Latin writers of the north.

But the learning was scattered. It was gathered together and generalised by Bæda of Jarrow. He is the master of the time, and his books became not only the sources of English, but of European learning. To this day his name is revered; he is still called the 'Venerable Bede'; all the science, rhetoric, grammar, theology, and historical knowledge of the past which he could attain he absorbed, edited, and published. He increased in his Homilies and Commentaries the religious literature of the world; he made delightful biographies, and he wrote the Ecclesiastical History of the English Nation with skill and charm. It is our best authority. His first books, on the scientific studies of the time, were written between 700 and 703. They were followed by a primer of the history of the world—De sex ætatibus Sæculi, 707; by the Commentaries on almost all the books of the Old and New Testaments, and these range over many years after 709; by the Lives of Cuthbert and the Abbots of Wearmouth and Jarrow, 716–20; and by the De Temporum ratione in 726. The Ecclesiastical History was finished in 731, and his last work, the Letter to Egbert, was done in the year of his death, 735. These thirty-five years were thus filled with that learning and teaching and writing in which he had always great delight; and the little cell at Jarrow, whence he rarely stirred, was continually visited by men of many businesses and of all ranks in life. He kept in touch with all the monasteries of England, and with many in Europe. Even so far away as Rome he had scholars who worked for him among the archives. His greatest book is the Ecclesiastical History. He took so much pains to make it accurate, and to write nothing without consulting original and contemporary authorities, that the modern historical school claim him as their own. He shows in the book that power of choice and rejection of material so necessary for a historian; and, what chiefly concerns us here, he filled it with a literary charm and beauty of statement when the subject permitted this self-indulgence. It is here that his personality most appears; that we feel his happy, gentle, loving, and simple nature. His character adorns his style. The stories which embellish the book have a unique clearness and grace, a vivid grasp of character, a human tenderness, which make us feel at times as if we were present with him in his room at Jarrow and listening to his charitable voice. Cuthbert, one of his pupils, gives an account of his fair death in his cell among his books; and it is pleasant to think that the last work on which he was engaged on the day of his departure was a translation into English of the Gospel of St John, and that almost his last speech was the making of a few English verses, for, indeed, he was learned in English songs. (There is a translation from Bæda's History at page 169.)

The seat of learning at Bæda's death was transferred from Jarrow to York, where Ecgberht, Bæda's pupil, became an archbishop. The school he established at York may almost be termed a university. The education given was in all the branches of learning then known, in Ethica, Physica, and Logica. The library was the largest and the best outside of Rome, and was more useful than that at Rome. The arts were not neglected. The Latin Fathers; the Roman poets, grammarians, orators; the Natural History of Pliny, some of the Greek Fathers, and the Scriptures, were studied by a host of scholars from Ireland, Italy, Gaul, Germany, and England. When Ecgberht died Ælberht succeeded him, and with Alcuin's help increased the library and developed the education given in the schools. In 770 York and its library and schools was the centre of European learning. Ælberht's greatest friend was Alcuin (Eng. Ealhwine), the finest scholar York produced, and the last. His classical was as good as his patristic learning. His style has earned him the name of the Erasmus of his century. He loved Virgil so well that pious persons reproached him for it. His reputation came to the ears of Charles the Great, who was then starting the education of his kingdoms; and Alcuin, who had met Charles at Pavia about 780, and again at Parma in 781, left England—though he revisited it in 790–92—to remain on the Continent till his death in the abbey of St Martin of Tours in 804. He left many books behind him—learned, theological, and virtuous. Of his Latin poems, that dedicated to the history of the great men of the school of York is the best. The Letters—more than three hundred—which he wrote to Charles and to most of the important personages in England and Europe, have the best right to the name of literature, and prove how wide was his influence, and how useful his work to the centuries that followed. He brought all the scholarship of England to the empire of the greatest man in Europe, whose power sent it far and wide. And he did this at the very time when its doom had begun to fall upon it in England. Alcuin himself heard of the ravaging of Lindisfarne by the Vikings in 793, and of the attack in the following year on Wearmouth, and cried out with pity and sorrow. The years that followed were years of decay. Northumbria was the prey of anarchy from 780 to 798. The six years of quiet that followed were years in which the school of York, weakened by Alcuin's absence, sickened and failed. In 827 Ecgberht of Wessex put an end to the separate kingdom of Northumbria. In 867 the Danish 'army' invaded the north, conquered York, settled there, and destroyed every abbey, both in Deira and Bernicia. Bishoprics, libraries, schools were all swept away. One poor school of learning remained in that part of Mercia which was finally saved by Ælfred from the Danes. Worcester was the last refuge of the faded learning of Northumbria; and when Ælfred began the revival of education in England, and originated English prose by the translation of Latin books, it was from Worcester that he fetched the only Englishmen who could help him in his work.

Ælfred.

Ælfred, whose character was even greater than his renown as warrior, ruler, and lawgiver, was also a king in English literature. With him, at Winchester, began the prose-writing of England. His books were chiefly translations, but they were interspersed with original work which reveals to us his way of thinking, the temper of his soul, the interests of his searching intelligence, and his passion for teaching his people all that could then be known of England, of the history of the world, of religion, and of the Divine Nature. They appealed to the clergy, to the people, to scholars, to the warriors and sailors of England. Their aim was the education of his countrymen.

Born at Wantage in 849, he was the youngest son of Æthelwulf, and the grandson of the great Ecgberht. Rome, whither he went at the age of four years, and then again when he was six years old, made its deep impression on him. He stayed on his return at the court of Charles the Bald, and heard, no doubt, of the education which Charles the Great had given to the empire, for when he undertook a similar task in England he followed the methods and the practice of the emperor. When he arrived in England he sought for teachers, but found none. When he was twenty years old he heard with indignant sorrow of the destruction of all learning in England by the Danes; and the lover of learning as well as the patriot was whetted into wrath when, on the height of Ashdown, he and his brother Æthelred drove the Danes down the hill with a pitiless slaughter. Not long after this battle he became King of Wessex in 871. The work by which he made his kingdom belongs to history. It was only in 887 that he began his literary labour in a parenthesis of quiet. But he had made preparations for it beforehand. He had collected round him whatever scholars were left in England. They were few—Werfrith, Bishop of Worcester; Denewulf, of the same town; Plegmund, Æthelstan, and Werwulf, all three from Mercia. With these he exhausted England. Then he sent to Flanders for Grimbold, whom he made Abbot of Winchester; and to Corvèi in Westphalia for John the Old Saxon, whom he placed over his monastic house at Athelney. But his closest comrade in this work was Asser of St David's, whom he induced to stay with him for six months in the year, who taught him Latin, and whose Latin Life of the king is, with all its interpolations and errors, our best authority. The first thing they did together was Ælfred's Hand-book. When Asser quoted or Ælfred read out of the Bible or the Fathers any passage which interested the king, it was written down and translated into English in the note-book which the king kept in his breast. It was a book, then, of religious extracts, with here and there an illustration or a remark of Ælfred's added in his own words. This Hand-book, begun in November 887, was set forth for the use of the people in English in 888. The loss of it is a great misfortune.

The collection of the laws of Æthelberht, Ine, and Offa, with laws of his own, into a Law-book was the next work Ælfred undertook, and it was probably completed in 888. But the work of collection had most likely been begun in 885 or 886, for William of Malmesbury says that it was composed amid the noise of arms and the braying of the trumpets—that is, during the short struggle with the Danes in 885–86, when Ælfred secured London for his kingdom. The book was then in hand for more than two years. By this time he was acquainted with Latin, and as the clergy were the teachers of the people, the first book he translated was for their benefit. It was the Cura Pastoralis, the Herdsman's Book, of Gregory the Great, a manual of the duties of the clergy, the description of the ideal of a Christian priest; and a copy was sent 'to every bishop's seat in my kingdom,' probably in the year 890. The book is the book of a beginner in translation. It is more close to its author than the other translations. Several paragraphs in the Preface seem to speak of the work as the first translation he issued. No long original matter is inserted; but the well-known Preface is from Ælfred's own hand, and it is the beginning of English prose literature. It breathes throughout of the king's character. It sketches the state of learning in England when he came to the throne, and we realise from it how much he did for literature, and the difficulties with which he had to contend. Its style is curiously simple and fresh, and it succeeds in its patriotic effort to be clear. It is plain here, as in his other writings, that Ælfred said to himself, 'I will try to make the most ignorant understand me.'

So many translations of this Preface have been published that it does not seem necessary to insert any quotation from it, but at the end Ælfred has added some verses of his own, and their simplicity, their faint imaginative note, their personal and tender religious feeling, their being perhaps the first verses that he wrote, induce me to paraphrase them:

These are the waters which the God of hosts promised for our comfort to us dwellers on the earth, and His will is that these ever-living waters should flow into all the world from all who truly believe in Him; and their well-spring is the Holy Ghost. Some shut up this stream of wisdom in their mind so that it flows not everywhere in vain, but the well abides in the breast of the man, deep and still. Some let it run away in rills over the land, and it is not wise that such bright waters should, noisy and shallow, flow over the land till it becomes a fen. But now draw near to drink it, for Gregory has brought to your doors the well of the Lord. Whoever have brought a water-tight pitcher, let him fill it now, and let him come soon again. Whoever have a leaky pitcher, let him mend it, lest he spill the sheenest of waters and lose the drink of life.

The second book Ælfred translated was Bæda's Ecclesiastical History of the English, 890–91. It was done not only to instruct the clergy in the history of their Church, but also the people in the history of their own land. It omits several chapters of the original, and the king adds nothing of his own. We may wonder why he gave no particular account in it of the history of Church and State in Wessex, but this curious omission may be explained by the fact that in 891 he had begun to work up the English Chronicle into a national history, and did not care to write two accounts of the same matter.

A certain portion of the Chronicle already existed. This was probably made by Bishop Swithun of Winchester shortly after the death of Æthelwulf, and runs up to the year 855. It took the meagre annals made at Winchester as its basis, filled them from tradition back to Hengest, and then told at some length the wars and death of Æthelwulf. Ælfred, finding this account, caused it to be carefully investigated and written up to date, with a full history of his wars with the Danes. The style of this history is of the same kind throughout, and it is more than probable that it was the work of his own hand. Condensed, bold, rough, and accurate, it is a fine beginning of the historical prose of England. This is the manuscript of the Annals of Winchester, presented by Archbishop Parker to the library of Corpus Christi at Cambridge, and the copy is in one handwriting.

The next book the king translated, about 891–93, was the History of the World by Orosius. That history was written in 418 at the suggestion of St Augustine. It was the standard historical authority during the Middle Ages, and Ælfred edited it to teach his people all that was known of the world beyond England. He left out what he thought needless for them to know, and he filled it up from his own knowledge with matters of interest to Englishmen and with comments of his own. Among these was a full account of the geography of Germany, and of the countries where the English tongue had been spoken of old. To this he added the personal tales of two voyagers, Ohthere and Wulfstan, who had sailed along the coasts of Norway and the German shores of the Baltic. Ohthere had made two voyages, one northward as far as the mouth of the Dwina where it poured into the White Sea, the other down the eastern coast of Denmark till he saw the Baltic running upwards into the land; and the king adds, 'He had gone by the lands where the Engle dwelt before they came hither.' Wulfstan, starting from Haithaby, the capital of the old Engle-land, went for seven days and nights along the German coast till he reached the Vistula. These journeys the king, sitting in his chamber in the royal house, wrote down, probably from the dictation of the mariners. It is a pleasant scene to look upon. The style of this writing is, as usual, concise, simple, and straightforward, with a touch of personal pleasure in it.

These translations were the work of about five years, from 888 to 893. In the latter year he was interrupted by the invasion of the Viking Hasting and the rising of the Danelaw. This was the last effort of the Danes against him, and in 897 he had completely crushed it by the capture of the Danish fleet. From that date till his death in 901 he had the stillness he loved, and he returned to his literary work. The book he now undertook to translate (897-98) was the De Consolatione Philosophie, which Boethius had written in prison to comfort his heart. It is a dialogue between him and Philosophy, who consoles him for trouble by proving that the only lasting happiness is in the soul. The wise and virtuous man is master of all things. The book is the final utterance of heathen Stoicism, but was so near to the conclusions of Christianity that the Middle Ages believed the writer to be a Christian; and his book was translated into the leading languages of Europe. Its serious, sorrowful, but noble argument suited well with the circumstances of Ælfred's life and with his spiritual character. He added to Boethius long passages of his own; and the fifth book is nearly altogether rewritten by the king. He filled the Stoic's thought with his own profound Christianity, with solemn passages on the Divine Nature and its relation to man's will and fate, with aspiring hopes and prayers. Many inserted paragraphs have to do with his own life, with the government of his kingdom, with his thoughts and feelings as a king, with his scorn of wealth and fame and power in comparison with goodness. He stands in its pages before us, a noble figure, troubled, but conqueror of his trouble; master of himself; a lover of God and his people, dying, but with a certain hope of immortal peace.

Whether he or another translated into English verse the Metra with which Boethius interspersed his prose is not as yet settled by the critics. If we believe the short poetical prologue to the oldest of the manuscripts, the English version of the Metra in poetry is the work of the king, and it would illustrate his intellectual activity if we could be sure he translated them into verse. But we do not know. Nor do we know for certain what else he did before his death. It is more or less agreed that he made a translation which we possess of the Soliloquia of St Augustine, and the Preface to this book by the writer is a pathetic farewell to his work as a translator, and a call to others to follow his example for the sake of England. Its parabolic form makes it especially interesting. A letter of St Augustine's, De Videndo Deo, is added to the Dialogue between St Augustine and his Reason. The English translation of the whole is divided into three dialogues, and the first two are called a 'Collection of Flowers.' The third dialogue closes with 'Here end the sayings of King Ælfred,' and the date is probably 900.

His last work—and it fits his dying hand—was a translation of the Psalms of David. It is supposed, but very doubtfully, that we have in the first fifty psalms of the Paris Psalter this work of Ælfred's. He did not live to finish it. In 901 this noble king, the 'Truth-teller,' 'England's Darling,' 'the unshakable pillar of the West Saxons, full of justice, bold in arms, and filled with the knowledge that flows from God,' passed away, and was laid to rest at Winchester.

Only two books not done by himself were, as far as we know, set forth in his reign. One was the Dialogues of Gregory, translated, by Ælfred's request, by Werfrith, Bishop of Worcester. Ælfred wrote the Preface, and it breathes throughout of his kingly character. The other was the Book of Martyrs, a year's calendar of those who had witnessed to the Faith. It does not follow that no other books but these were written during his reign in English, but it is probable that Ælfred stood almost alone as an English writer. Asser's Life of the king was in Latin. On the whole Ælfred's efforts to make a literary class were a failure. Not for nearly a hundred years did his work for English bear fruit.

Ælfred¹ was not a literary artist, but he had the spirit of a scholar. His desire for knowledge was insatiable. His love of the best was impassioned. It is a pity Asser did not bring him into contact with Virgil and the rest of the great Romans. But England had the first claim on him, and he collected with eagerness the English poems and songs. He translated from Bæda his country's history; he himself shaped a national history; he collected and arranged the English laws of his predecessors, and he added new laws of his own and his Witan's. He taught his people the history of other lands. He had as great an eagerness to teach as to learn. He was not only the warrior, the law-giver, the ruler, but the minister of education. And the style in which he did his work reveals the simple, gracious, humble, loving character of the man. It is steeped in his natural personality, and it charms through that more than through any literary ability. It is always clear; its aim is to be useful to his people; and it gains a certain weight and dignity from his long experience in public affairs, in war and policy. The impression he has made on England is indelible, and his spirit has not ceased to move among us.

Ælfred and the Work of a King.

Reason! indeed thou knowest that neither greed nor the power of this earthly kingdom was ever very pleasing to me, neither yearned I at all exceedingly after this earthly kingdom. But yet indeed I wished for material for the work which it was bidden me to do, so that I might guide and order with honour and fitness the power with which I was trusted. Indeed thou knowest that no man can show forth any craft; can order, or guide any power, without tools or material—material, that is, for each craft, without which a man cannot work at that craft. This is then the material of a king and his tools, wherewith to rule—That he have his land fully manned, that he have prayer-men, and army-men, and workmen. Indeed thou knowest that without these tools no king can show forth his craft. This also is his material—That he have, with the tools, means of living for the three classes—land to dwell upon, and gifts, and weapons, and meat, and ale, and clothes, and what else the three classes need. . . .

And this is the reason I wished for material wherewith to order (my) power, in order that my skill and power should not be forgotten and hidden away, for every work and every power shall soon grow very old and be passed over silently, if it be without wisdom; because whatsoever is done through foolishness no one can ever call work. Now would I say briefly that I have wished to live worthily while I lived, and after my life to leave to men who should come after me my memory in good deeds.

(From the De Consolatione Philosophiæ.)

Ælfred's Preface to the 'De Consolatione.'

King Ælfred was the translator of this book, and turned it from Latin into English as it is now done. Sometimes he set down word for word, sometimes meaning for meaning, as he could translate most plainly and clearly in spite of the various and manifold worldly cares which often occupied him in mind and body. These cares, which in his days came on the kingship he had undertaken, are very hard for us to number. And yet, when he had learned this book and turned it from Latin into the English tongue, he then wrought it afterwards into verse, as it is now done. And now he begs, and for God's sake prays every one whom it may please to read the book, that he pray for him, and that he blame him not if he understood it more rightly than he (the king) could. For every one, according to the measure of his understanding and leisure, must speak what he speaketh and do what he doeth.

Ælfred's Prayer.

Lord God Almighty, shaper and ruler of all creatures, I pray Thee for Thy great mercy, and for the token of the holy rood, and for the maidenhood of St Mary, and for the obedience of St Michael, and for all the love of Thy holy saints and their worthiness, that Thou guide me better than I have done towards Thee. And guide me to Thy will to the need of my soul better than I can myself. And stedfast my mind towards Thy will and to my soul's need. And strengthen me against the temptations of the devil, and put far from me foul lust and every unrighteousness. And shield me against my foes, seen and unseen. And teach me to do Thy will, that I may inwardly love Thee before all things with a clean mind and clean body. For Thou art my maker and my redeemer, my help, my comfort, my trust, and my hope. Praise and glory be to Thee now, ever and ever, world without end. Amen.

Poetry from Ælfred to the Conquest.

During the reign of Ælfred poetry was not altogether neglected in Wessex. It is more than probable that it was at the king's instance that the poetry of Northumbria was collected and translated into the dialect of Wessex, in which dialect we now possess it. Among the rest we may surely count the lost poems of Cædmon of which Ælfred had read when he translated the Ecclesiastical History. Then also, Genesis A, whether by Cædmon or not, now appeared in West Saxon. Now, there was a great gap in the manuscript after the line 234, and some copyist of the poem inserted, in order to fill up the space, lines 235–851, out of an Old Saxon poem (it is supposed) which had been translated into West Saxon. It is thought from certain similarities in diction, manner, and rhythm that this Old Saxon poem (some lines of which, identical with corresponding lines in the West Saxon insertion, were discovered last century) was written by the writer of the Heliand or by some imitator of his in Old Saxony. At any rate this poem was brought to England, translated, and a portion of it, relating to the Fall of Man, was used to fill up the gap in Genesis A. We call this portion Genesis B, and it differs from the earlier Genesis not only in manner, metre, and language, but in sentiment and thought.

It opens with the fall of the rebel angels already told in Genesis A. Lucifer, 'beauteous in body, mighty of mind,' seems to himself to be equal with God, and his pride is injured by the creation of man. And the fierce soliloquy into which his insolent Teutonic individuality outbreaks is one of the finest passages in Anglo-Saxon poetry. He is flung into hell, and hafted down by bars across his neck and breast in the centre of that abyss of pain—swart, deep-valleyed, swept at morn by north-east wind and frost, and then by leaping flame and bitter smoke. 'Oh, how unlike,' he cries, 'this narrow stead to that home in heaven's high kingdom which of old I knew! Adam holds my seat; this is my greatest sorrow! But could I break forth for one short winter hour with all my host—but God knew my heart, and forged these gratings of hard steel, else an evil work would be between man and me. Oh, shall we not have vengeance! Help me, my thanes; fly to earth; make Adam and Eve break God's bidding; bring them down to hell; then I shall softly rest in my chains.' One of his thanes springs up, and beating the fire aside, finds Adam at last and Eve standing beside the two trees in Eden. The temptation follows, and it is subtly borne. Adam rejects it; Eve yields, and after a whole day persuades Adam to eat the fruit. Then the scornful fiend breaks into a wild cry of satisfied vengeance. 'My heart is enlarged. I have never bowed the knee to God. O Thou, my Lord, who liest in sorrow, rejoice now, laugh, and be blithe; our harms are well avenged.'

Adam and Eve are left conscious of their fall. Their love is not shattered; there is no mutual reproach. Eve's tenderness is as deep as Adam's repentance, and they fall to prayer. This is the close of Genesis B. It is full of Teutonic feeling. The fierce individuality; the indignant pride; the fury for vengeance, the joy of its accomplishment; the close comradeship between the lord and his thanes; the tenderness and devotion of the woman; the reverence of the man for the woman; the intensity of the repentance—may all be matched from the Icelandic sagas, and they prove that the spirit which afterwards made those sagas was alive in England in the ninth and tenth centuries.

The second part of the poems which pass under the name of Cædmon, and which had the name of Christ and Satan, are now allotted by the majority of critics to the tenth century, and, presumably, to Wessex. Their simple, direct, and passionate elements, their imaginative grasp of their subjects, seem more Northumbrian than West Saxon, and this is not an impossible opinion. They are now divided into three poems or fragments of poems, the first of which is called the Fallen Angels, the second the Harrowing of Hell, and the third the Temptation. The character of Satan in them differs greatly from that in Genesis A or B, and so does the description of hell. The bond of comradeship between his thanes and Satan has perished, but not that between Christ and His thanes. Satan, in an agony of longing for heaven, repents, but no mercy is given to him. Dialogue enlivens the poems, and their exultant bursts of religious praise recall the spirit of Cynewulf. The personages are drawn with much humanity. The descriptions are vivid and imaginative. We see Satan wandering and wailing in his misty hall, the weltering sea of fire outside, the cliffs and burning marl of hell, the fiends flying before Christ when He comes to break down the gates. We watch the good spirits in Hades lifting themselves, leaning on their hands when He came; their ascent with Him to the feast in the heavenly burg, and the fall of Satan from the Mount of Temptation through a hundred thousand miles to the abyss of hell.

These are the last religious poems before the Conquest which show any traces of imaginative or original power. The rest of which we know seem to be the dry and lifeless productions of monks in the cloisters, and are nothing better than alliterative prose. There are a crowd of versions of the Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and the Canticles. The Last Judgment, a poem from which Wulfstan quotes in a homily of 1010; a saints' calendar entitled the Menologium, a metrical translation of fifty psalms, scattered through a service book; the translation of the Metra of Boethius, if Ælfred did not do it; a poem advising a gray-haired warrior to a Christian life, and another urging its readers to prayer, almost exhaust the religious poetry of the tenth and eleventh centuries before the Conquest. With the exception of a few lines describing in the Menologium the coming of summer, they are totally devoid of any literary value. Religious poetry had died.

But this was not the case with secular poetry. Ballads and war-songs on any striking story of the lives of kings or chiefs, dirges at their deaths, were made all over England. The old sagas were put into new forms; the country families and the villages had their traditional songs. None of these are left save the Battle of Brunanburh and the Battle of Maldon, and a few fragments inserted in the Chronicle (all edited by Sedgefield in the 'Belles-Lettres' series, 1904). A few prose records, also, in the Chronicle are supposed to be taken from songs current at the time. Henry of Huntingdon and William of Malmesbury, we know, used ballads of this time in their histories. Moreover, the old sagas were sung by wandering minstrels at every village fair, in the halls of the burghs, in the tents and round the bivouacs of the soldiers; and the chieftain's bard, after every deed of war, sang the doings and the deaths of the warriors when the feast was set at night. There may have been other poems of a more thoughtful character, like the Rhyme-Poem in the Exeter Book, which belongs to the tenth century. It is the only poem in the English tongue which is written in the Scandinavian form called Runhenda, in which the last word of the first half of the verse is rhymed, in addition to the usual alliteration, with the last word of the second half. This form was used by Egill Skallagrímsson, the Icelandic skald, in the poem by which he saved his life from Erik Blood-Axe in 938. Egill was twice in England, and was a favourite of King Æthelstan. It is supposed that he made known this form of poetry to the writer of the Rhyme-Song, and this supposition is the origin of the date assigned to it—940–50. It is worth little in itself, and its subject is one common to English song—the contrast between a rich and joyous past and a wretched present.

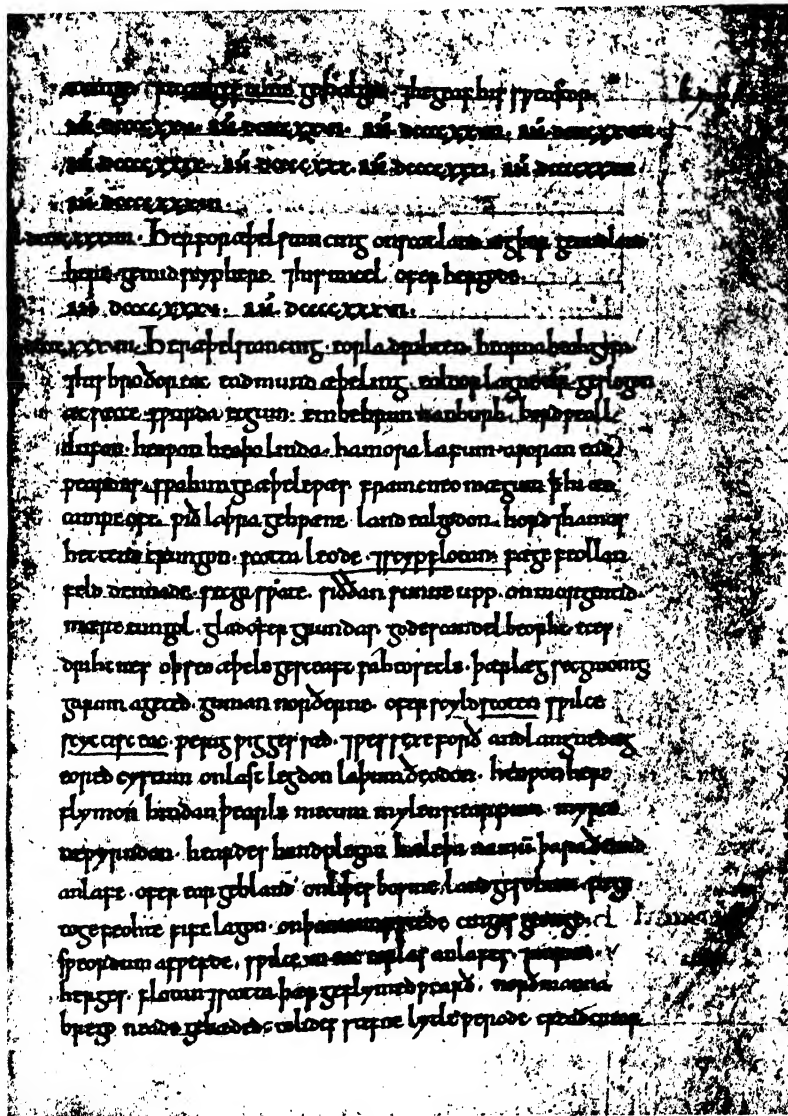

It is pleasant to turn from it to the noble songs of Brunanburh and Maldon. At Brunanburh, in the year 937, England, under Æthelstan, Ælfred's grandson, vindicated her short-lived unity against the Danes, the Welsh, and the Scots, under Anlaf the Dane and Constantinus the king of the Scots. The song, recast by Tennyson, is no unworthy beginning of the war-poetry of England. Its patriotism is as haughty as that of the 'Fight at Agincourt,' the 'Battle of the Baltic,' and the 'Charge of the Light Brigade.' It resembles them, also, in its rough and clanging lines, in its singing and abrupt stanzas. Its English style is excellent, and it has the old heathen ring. It gives us a high idea of the value of the lost battle-songs of Old England.

The Fight at Maldon is of a different character. It is not so much of a composition. It reads as if it were written by an eye-witness. It uses the heroic terms; the warriors challenge one another as they do in the sagas, as they have done since the days of Homer. The tie that knitted chief tothane andthane to chief is as keenly dwelt on as it is in Genesis and in Beowulf. The rude cries of defiance are like those in the Fight at Finnsburg. The charge of cowardice, of faithlessness to their oath of service, which is made against those who flee the fight might have been written by one who had read the similar passage in Beowulf. The boasting and praise of those who died defending their lord might also be drawn from Beowulf. It is clear that this poem, written at the end of the tenth century—in 991—is as frankly heroic as any heathen poem. The old spirit lived on in the songs of war.

The battle is fought on the east of England, in the estuary of an Essex river. A roving Viking band, sailing up the river Panta, land on the spit of ground that divides the stream into two branches. On the northern shore lay Maldon, and Earl Byrhtnoth comes to do battle with the pirates. The tide is full, and for a long time the ford is impassable. The two bands shoot at one another with arrows. At last the ebb allowed them to meet at the ford and on the bank, where Byrhtnoth, in his chivalry, permitted them to land. But the Danes were too many for the English, and the great Earl died on the field. And his thanes, save a few cowards, died round him, fighting to the last.

His death-song is not like that of Beowulf. For the first time in English battle-poetry the chieftain dies with a Christian cry upon his lips. It is the beginning of a new element in the poetry of war. He dies as the knights die in the Chansons de Geste. Their last words are a prayer to Christ. We seem to feel in this change the breath of a new life, of a new world—of the life and world of romance. After this poem silence follows. The Fight at Maldon is the last song of the war-poetry of England before the Conquest. Not till long after the Conquest did it rise again, and then it rose almost a stranger to the ancient English ways. The Celtic and the Norman spirit had transformed it; but deep below, and lasting through centuries of English song, the strong, constant, deep-rooted elements of the Teutonic race lay at the foundation of the English poetry of physical and moral battle.

Eve, after she has eaten of the Tree of Knowledge.

Sheener to her seemed all the sky and earth;
All this world was lovelier; and the work of God, Mickle was and mighty then, though 'twas not by man's device,
That she saw (the sight)—but the Scather eagerly Moved about her mind.
'Now thyself thou mayest see, and I need not speak it—

O thou, Eve the good, how unlike to thy old self Is thy beauty and thy breast since thou hast believed my words.

Light is beaming 'fore thee now,
Glittering against thee, which from God I brought,
White from out the Heavens. See thy hands may touch it!

Say to Adam then, what a sight thou hast,
And what powers—through n y coming!

Then to Adam wended Eve, sheenest of all women,
Winsomest of wives, e'er should wend into the world,
For she was the handiwork of the heavenly King.

Of the fruit unblest
Part was hid upon her heart, part in hand she bore.
'Adam, O my Lord, this apple is so sweet,
Blithe within the breast; bright this messenger;
'Tis an Angel good from God! By his gear I see That he is the errand-bringer of our heavenly King!

I can see Him now from hence
Where Himself He sitteth, in the south-east throned,
All enwreathed with weal; He who wrought the world.
And with Him I watch His angels, wheeling round about Him,

In their feathered vesture, of all folks the mightiest, Winsomest of war-hosts! Who could wit like this Give me, did not God Himself surely grant it me?

. Far away I hear—
And as widely see—over all the world,
O'er the universe widespread!—All the music mirth
In the Heavens I can hear!—In my heart I am so clear,
Inwardly and outwardly, since the apple I have tasted.
See! I have it here, in my hands; O my good Lord!
Gladly do I give it thee; I believe from God it comes!

Repentance of Adam and Eve.

'Thou mayst it reproach me, Adam, my beloved,
In these words of thine; yet it may not worse repent thee,
Rue thee in thy mind, than it rueth me in heart.'
Then to her for answer Adam spoke again—
'O if I could know the All-Wielder's will,
What I for my chastisement must receive from Him,

The first entry in the page of the Chronicle facsimiled begins with the consecration of King Æthelstan, and ends with an unfinished sentence. Then follow the figures merely for the years 900-933, this particular MS. (of the Abingdon Chronicle) recording no facts under those years; and after one entry for 934, and the figures for 935 and 936, it goes on, under 937, to give the famous entry on the battle of Brunanburh in alliterative verse, written straight on, like the specimens above from Beowulf and Cædmon, without regard to the division into alliterating lines.

oft from all foemen, warded their land, their hoard and their homes. Bowed down (was) the foe
the folk of the Scots; and the ship-sailers, fated fell (dead). Sudden the field was with blood-sweat of men, when the sun upward, in morningtide, that far-famed star,
glode over the meadows, bright candle of God,
the Lord everlasting, till that great creature sank to its seat. There many a hero lay pierced with the spear, many a Northman shot over shield, so also the Scotsman, weary, war-sated. Forth the West Saxons all the long day, with well-proven warriors, lay on the track of the hateful folk,
direfully hewed at the flank of the fliers, with mill-sharpened swords. Withheld not the Mercians the hard hand-playing from any of men, of those who with Anlaf, over the ocean,
in the ship's bosom, had looked for the land, fated for war. Five young kings on the war-field lay dead, put to sleep with the sword. So also seven earls of Anlaf. Unnumbered the horde of sailors and Scotsmen. There forced to flight was the prince of the Northmen, driven of need to the stem of the ship, he, with small band, thrust his craft on the sea.

Thou should'st never see, then, anything more swift,— though the sea within Bade me wade the God of Heaven, bade me wend me hence
 In the flood to fare—Nor so fearfully profound Nor so mighty were the Ocean, that my mind should ever waver—
 Into the abyss I'd plunge, if I only might Work the will of God !'

(From Genesis B.)

Prose from Ælfred to the Conquest.

Ælfred, though he began the prose of England, failed in establishing it. No results, save one, followed his work till ninety years had passed away. The one exception was the narrative in the Chronicle of the wars and government of Eadward, Ælfred's son, 910–924. Ælfred's own work on the Chronicle ceased in 891. Another writer of vigour, earnestness, and conciseness told the story of the years from 894 to 897. From 897 to 910 the record is meagre, but a new life was given to the Chronicle by the narrative which began with 910. It may have been written by the same man who wrote of the years 894–97. His work ceases with the death of Eadward, and it is the sole piece of secular prose which we possess at this date. From 925 to 940, during the reign of Æthelstan, the shallow records of the Chronicle are only once filled by the Song of Brunanburh (see page 24). From 940 to 975, during the reigns of Eadmund, Eadred, and Eadgar, the Chronicle contains nothing but short annual statements of leading events. Three small poems are inserted in it.

Secular prose then had died at Winchester. But religious prose now began to rise again with the revival of monasticism, begun by Dunstan and nursed into life by King Eadgar. Dunstan, in whom Celtic and English elements mingle, set up a school at Glastonbury, and made his pupils love the arts of music, of poetry, of design and embroidery, of gold-working, painting, and engraving, in all of which he was himself a master. He sang the Psalms with his boys, developed church ritual and music, drew the Irish scholars to his help, made a fine library and treasury, and, having trained his monks in all the known branches of learning, sent them forth as missionaries of education to various parts of England. His best scholar, Æthelwold, was made head of the Abbey of Abingdon, re-founded by King Eadred; and Æthelwold, who died in 904, soon made Abingdon as good a school as Glastonbury. It was his favourite pupil, Ælfric, who created the new prose of England.

This revival of English prose kept step with the revival of monasticism. Monasticism had fallen into complete decay when Eadgar came to the throne in 959. Dunstan's effort, assisted as he was by Oswald of Ramsey and Odo of Canterbury, had not pushed it far. Even the Rule itself of Benedict had slipped out of memory, and Oswald and Æthelwold had to go or send to Fleury to recover it. But Eadgar threw himself eagerly into the movement, and Æthelwold, now Bishop of Winchester in 963, gave his full energy to the work. He cleared Winchester of the lazy secular clergy; he re-founded Ely, Peterborough, and Thorney. No better work could be done for literature than this re-creation of the monasteries. Art, the science of medicine, the study of the Scriptures, of philosophy, of astronomy, and of literature, revived with their revival. The preaching and homilies of the monks brought religion as well as a kind of education to the people. And the new teaching was now given in the language of the people. At last the work of Ælfred began to produce its fruit.

Æthelwold loved his native tongue; King Ælfred's books were studied at Abingdon, and his principle—Teach Englishmen in English—was followed and established. The Blickling Homilies, nineteen of which exist, and probably the Homilies in the Vercelli Book belong to the early time of the monastic revival—from 960 to 990. They represent, with certain books mentioned by Ælfric and now lost, the transition between the prose of Ælfred and that of Ælfric.

A new and more literary English prose now began with Ælfric. He was born about 955, and educated at Winchester. Ælfhead, Æthelwold's successor, sent him in 987 to teach and govern the new monastery of Cerne Abbas in Dorsetshire, and here he first followed King Ælfred's plan, and translated Latin books into English for the use of the people. He returned to Winchester in 989, where he continued his work till the Thane Æthelmær, who had founded a Benedictine monastery at Eynsham, near Oxford, made him its abbot. There, in that quiet place, he lived, learning and teaching, until he died about 1022.

His first book, Homilia Catholica, 990–94, is dedicated to Archbishop Sigeric, and consists of two collections of homilies, forty in each collection, on the Sundays and feast-days of the year. A small number of them are in alliterative verse. Then he composed the Grammar and the Glossary, which were probably followed by the Colloquium. As the Homilies addressed the people, these books addressed the pupils at the school of Winchester. The Colloquium is a discourse on the occupations of the monks and on various states of life; and as one of the manuscripts has an English translation over its lines, it becomes a kind of vocabulary. It was re-done by another Ælfric, one of his scholars, Ælfric Bata, with appendices. The lives of the saints, Passiones Sanctorum, another set of homilies, followed in 996. Other works of less importance were now taken up; but, urged thereto by Thane Æthelweard, he began to translate the Bible, part of which, from Genesis xxiv. to the end of Leviticus, Æthelweard had given to another hand. The beginning, then, of Genesis was done by Ælfric, with Numbers, Deuteronomy, Joshua, Judges, Esther, Job, and Judith. The books are not literally translated; parts are omitted, and parts are thrown into homiletic form. Ælfric used the same liberties with the Bible which Ælfred had used with Boethius and Orosius; and he gave this work the same patriotic tinge as Ælfred had given to his translation of Orosius. The heroic sketches he made out of the Bible of the warriors of Israel not only taught the people the sacred history, but were also applied by him to encourage Englishmen against their foes. 'I have set forth Judith,' he says, 'in English for an example to you men that ye may guard your country against her foes;' and he closes the Homilies with a hymn of praise to God for the great men in all history who had borne witness to the faith, and among them to Ælfred, Æthelstan, and Eadgar, the noble champions of England.

The Canones Ælfrici, which followed his translations of the Bible, were written about the year 1000. They were in Latin and addressed to the clergy. In 1006 or 1007, when he was Abbot of Eynsham, he made a book of extracts from the writings of his master, Æthelwold—De Consuetudine Monachorum; addressed a homily on forgiveness to his friend Wulfgeat, a royal thane at Ilmington; another on chastity to Thane Sigferth; and about the same time, 1008, composed a treatise Concerning the Old and New Testament, which was a practical introduction to the study of the Scriptures. Then, turning from English to Latin prose, he wrote a sympathetic life of his master, Vita Æthelwoldi, and a Sermo ad Sacerdotes for Wulfstan, Bishop of Worcester, about 1014-16; and Wulfstan made him turn it into English.

Ælfric¹ was the Bæda of his time. He was the assimilator, collector, and distributor of learning, not its creator. He had no originality, but he loved his work and his country. The principles of education which Ælfred had established he carried out steadily. He trained the people as well as the clergy in their duties, in the history of the Church abroad and at home; and his charming character, full of moral dignity, tact, gentle charity, and wisdom in affairs, recommended and enhanced his books and letters. In one thing he was original—in his style. He made a new, a lighter, more musical, more lissome prose. He fitted English to take up the number of new subjects which were soon to engage the interests of the country. We cannot tell what English prose might have become had this modern style been developed. But the Danish invasion checked and the Norman Conquest paralysed it for a long time. Ælfric's English prose had, however, one great fault. It became more and more alliterative—that is, it was prose written in poetic form. This manner, chiefly practised in his Homilies, may have been used to please the people and for their sake, but it injures the life of prose, and, when continued, kills it.

The creation of this new, popular, and flexible prose was one result of Ælfric's work. Another result was the increase of learning and of a higher life among the clergy. The Archbishops Sigeric and Wulfstan, the Bishops Wulfsgie and Kenulf, were inspired by him, and they begged him to write such books in English as would enable them to teach their clergy the rudiments of learning and the practice of a holy life. And the effort was not in vain. The clergy began to have a higher ideal of their profession, and to follow it; and so many small books on various ecclesiastical and theological matters were put forward in the eleventh century that it is plain the English clergy at the Conquest were not so ignorant as the Normans declared them to be.

A third result of Ælfric's work was the creation of a small literary class among the nobles, some of whom now became learners and patrons of literature. Æthelweard, probably the writer of the Chronicle which bears his name, a royal thane, urged Ælfric to write and began his translation of the Bible. Æthelmær, his son, was Ælfric's close friend and patron, and brought him into friendship with Wulfgeat, Sigweard, and Sigferth, also nobles, for whom he wrote books. It is clear that the class Ælfred was unable to touch had now begun to be a cultivated class.

The mass of the people were also educated by the great body of homilies which Ælfric had written for them; and the legends of the saints and the tales of the martyrs, going hand-in-hand with the saga stories over England, awakened the imagination of the farmer and the peasant.

Then, too, the monasteries, under his influence, now became the home of learned men who wrote on science as well as on theology. Byrhtferth, of the monastery at Ramsey, was a well-known mathematician; and his commentaries on the scientific works of Bæda, and his Life of Dunstan, prove his literary activity. The varied knowledge shown in these books, which date before 1016, makes it almost certain that he was the writer of a Hand-book in English which discusses the alphabets and subjects belonging to natural philosophy. Then a number of medical books were published in this eleventh century. The Lace-Boc of the tenth century was re-edited, with many interesting additions; the Herbarium Apuleii, the Medicina de Quadrupedibus, and others of the same kind show how active were the dispensaries of the monasteries. Many religious books—translations of the Psalms, the Gospels, and the Pseudo-gospels, Biographies of the Fathers, of the martyrs, of saints, and a number of sermons—belong also to the first half of the eleventh century. Certain books of a proverbial and ethical tendency—a Dialogue between Salomo and Saturnus, another between the Emperor Adrianus and Ritheus, a selection from the Disticha of Cato—illustrate that English love for sententious literature which had arisen

by English words, show how much Ælfric had brought Latin into English learning. The Ritual of Durham now added to itself a Northumbrian gloss. The splendid Evan-gelium of Lindisfarne was now interlineated, and so were the Rushworth Gospels.

There was, then, no little literary activity in the first half of this century. But it would have been much greater had not England again been fighting for her life with the Danes. In 1010 Thurkill began those dreadful raids in which East Anglia, Oxfordshire, Buckingham, Bedford, Northampton, Wiltshire, and other parts of Wessex were ravaged and plundered, and Ælfhead, Archbishop of Canterbury, was murdered in his burning town. Wulfstan, Archbishop of York 1002-23, heard of these horrors, and his Sermo Lupi (he called himself Lupus) ad Anglos quando Dani maxime persecuti sunt eos, in which he tells the tale of the invasion, and blames the sins and cowardice of the English, places him among the prose-writers of England. Some other homilies he wrote, but the passion and indignation with which he filled this sermon, and its weighty and vigorous English, isolate it from the rest. He sits closest to Ælfric, who saw along with him the outbreak of the Danish storm.

During the Danish rule over England no fresh literature was produced, but the coming of the Normans with Edward the Confessor not only strengthened the tendency, which had begun under Ælfric, to write in Latin rather than in English, but also introduced, and for the first time into English, tales from the East already tinged with the thoughts, feelings, colour, and life which were to grow into the full body of medieval Romance. The history of Apollonius of Tyre, used by Shakespeare in the play of Pericles, was now rendered

The text in this page, an almost literal translation of Genesis, xii. 12-16, on the adventures of Sara in Egypt when Abraham bade her say she was his sister, runs thus (þ standing for þæt and 7 for and):

long before Ælfred, and which was afterwards, in the Proverbs of Ælfred, connected with his name. The Glossaries, in which the Latin is explained into English prose out of the Latin translation of the late Greek story. Two other translations out of the Latin reproductions of the Greek legends of the life of Alexander—the Letters of Alexander to Aristotle from India and the Wonders of the East—were also made, and brought with them the air and the scenery of a new-world. They are put into excellent English—the last fine English of the times before the Conquest, the last fruit, with the exception of the Chronicle, of the tree which Ælfred had planted; and which, when it grew again above the soil, bore so changed an aspect that its original planters would not have recognised it. Its roots were the same; its branches and foliage were different. Ælfred would have been puzzled to read the English in which the Ancren Riwle (the Rule of Anchoresses) was written in the reign of Henry III. It was the first Middle English Prose.

The English of the Chronicle illustrates this transition. The Chronicle is the continuous record of English history in English prose, and it passes undisturbed through the Norman Conquest up to the death of Stephen. Its Winchester Annals practically cease in 1005, or even earlier. They were preserved in Canterbury from 1005 to 1070, but there are only eleven entries during these sixty-five years, and these were made after the Conquest, at the election of Lanfranc as archbishop. The rest of these Annals is written in Latin, and they end with the consecration of Anselm. What Winchester dropped Worcester continued. The Worcester Annals were carefully kept to the year 1079. If they were continued to 1107, that continuation was merged in the Annals of Peterborough. The Worcester Annals of the Chronicle are written in the English of Ælfric, and were probably done by Bishop Wulfstan, who held the see from 1062 to 1095, and by Colman, his chaplain, who wrote the bishop's life in English.

The Peterborough Annals were only fully edited after the rebuilding of the monastery in 1121. This fine and full edition of the Chronicle was made up out of the Annals of Winchester, Worcester, and Abingdon, and was then continued probably by one hand to the year 1131. Another hand, using a more modern English, carried it on from 1132 to 1154, when it closed with the accession of Henry II. The records at Worcester and Peterborough are not unworthy of the first records at Winchester. The Wars of Harold and the Fight at Stamford Bridge are boldly and picturesquely written. Even more picturesque is the account another writer gives of Senlac, and of William's stark, cruel, and just rule. This writer had lived at William's court, and we trace in his finer historical form that he had studied the Norman historians. The Peterborough scribe who followed him is rather a romantic than a national historian, and loves his monastery more than his nation. The second scribe of Peterborough, who probably composed his work in 1150–54, is well known for his pitiful and patriotic account of the miseries of England under the oppression of the Norman nobles. When in 1154 the Chronicle was closed, the Norman chroniclers took up the history of England and wrote it in Latin; but the English Chronicle remains the most ancient and venerable monument of English prose.

[Six-text edition by Thorpe with translation (1861); Two Saxon Chronicles Parallel ed. by Earle (1863), by Plummer (1899).]

After the Conquest.

The Norman Conquest put an end to Old English literature. When that literature arose again its language and its spirit were transformed. Old English had become Middle English. Its prose, which was religious, had been profoundly changed by the Norman theology and the Norman enthusiasm for a religious life. Its poetry, equally touched by the Anglo-Norman religion and love of romance, adopted as its own the romantic tales, melodies, manners, and ways of thinking which came to it from France, both in religious and in story-telling poetry. But this change took nearly a century and a half before it began to bear fruit. During those long years of transition little English work was done, and none of it could be called literature. Old English writings, such as the Homilies of Ælfric and the Translations of the Gospels made in the eleventh century, and now called the Hatton Gospels, were copied and modernised. Monasteries, remote from Norman interests, still clung to, and made their little manuals and service books in, the English tongue. English prose was just kept alive, but only like a man in catalepsy.

English poetry had a livelier existence; but we have no remains of the songs which were sung throughout the country, and which kept alive in the soul of franklin, peasant, and outlaw the glories and heroes of the past. We know that these were made and sung from the Norman chroniclers who used them, and from suggestions of them in the Brut of Layamon. Lays were made after the Conquest of the great deeds of Hereward, and are used in the Latin life of that partisan. Even in the twelfth century, songs were built on the old sagas, such as those which celebrated Weland and Wade, his father; and sagas like Horn, Havelok, Bevis of Hampton, Guy of Warwick, and Waltheof, which took original form in English in the thirteenth century, existed as popular lays in the eleventh and twelfth. The noble figure of Ælfred appears again in the poem entitled the Proverbs of Ælfred, an ethical poem of sententious sayings, varying forms of which arose in the twelfth century.

Old English poetry, having neither rhyme nor a fixed number of syllables, depended on accent and alliteration. Every verse was divided into two half-verses by a pause, and had four accented syllables, the number of unaccented syllables being indifferent; and the two half-verses were linked together by alliteration. The two accented syllables of the first half and one of the accented syllables of the second half began with the same consonant, or with vowels which were generally different from one another. But often there was only one alliterative letter in the first half-verse; and the metre was further varied by the addition of unaccented syllables. The lays made after the Conquest illustrate the transition from the old alliterative metre to the short line and rhyme which were soon established by the Anglo-Normans when they began to write in English. The Poema Morale (of which an account will be found below, with specimens, at page 40) is thought by some to have first taken shape early in the twelfth century. In that case, it and other twelfth-century poems of little account bring us still nearer to Middle English poetry, if they do not form part of it; but it is best, when we speak of literature, to make Middle English poetry properly begin with the first noble piece of poetic literature, with the Brut of Layamon, at the beginning of the thirteenth century.

BIBLIOGRAPHY.—The MS. of Beowulf is in the Cottonian Library in the British Museum, and Judith is in the same MS. The Exeter Book is in the library of Exeter Cathedral, and was placed there by Bishop Leofric in 1071. It contains the Riddles, the Elegies, the Crist, the St Guthlac, the Phoenix, the Juliana, the Widsith, the Complaint of Deor, and other poems. It is a kind of anthology. The Vercelli Book, found at Vercelli in 1822, contains, interspersed among homilies, the Andreas, the Fates of the Apostles, the Dream of the Rood, the Elene, and two unimportant poems. The Junian MS. of the so-called Cædmonian poems is in the Bodleian. The Fight at Finnsburg was found on the cover of a MS. of Homilies at Lambeth, Waldhere on two vellum leaves at Copenhagen; the Battle of Brunanburh is in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, and the Battle of Maldon in a copy of the original MS. made by Hearne.

Of Ælfred's translations we have many MSS.—three of the Cura Pastoralis, five of Bæda's History, two of the Orosius, two of the De Consolatione, four of the Laws. The Soliloquia are in the MS. containing Beowulf. Of Ælfric's works there are many MSS. Seven MSS. of the English Chronicle exist. MS. A, the Parker MS. written at Winchester, is at Cambridge; MS. B is at the British Museum, and was made at Canterbury; MS. C is at the British Museum, and is an Abingdon MS.; MS. D, also at the Museum, is the Worcester Chronicle; MS. E, now at the Bodleian (the Laud MS.), was done at Peterborough; MS. F, at the British Museum, was probably kept at Canterbury; MS. G, also probably kept at Canterbury, is at the British Museum, and is likely to be a copy of MS. A.

[When Modern English was beginning to show its full powers in the hands of the early Elizabethan writers, the oldest stage of the tongue was almost forgotten, save for the little knowledge required by those whose business it was to spell out and interpret Anglo-Saxon charters and the like. At the Reformation Anglo-Saxon religious literature was looked up for controversial purposes; Archbishop Parker gathered and edited MSS., and greatly promoted 'Saxon' studies. Verstegen shows he knew some Anglo-Saxon in his Restitution of Decayed Intelligence in Antiquities (1606); and Spelman was driven to make his Glossarium (Part I. 1626) by the difficulties he met in studying our oldest laws. Francis Junius, or Du Jon, a Continental Protestant who settled in England in 1621, devoted himself to the study of Anglo-Saxon and the cognate Teutonic tongues, edited the so-called Cædmon and other Old English books, and gave his name to the Junian MS. Hickes, the nonjuring bishop, published the first edition of his Anglo-Saxon and Mæso-Gothic Grammar in 1689; and all students of early English history owe a debt of gratitude to Thomas Hearne, 'who studied and preserved antiquities.' Percy in his Reliques takes no cognisance of the oldest poetry. Warton's History of English Poetry (vol. i. 1774) professedly begins with the close of the tenth century; but what he says by way of introduction on the three successive 'dialects of Saxon'—British Saxon (till the Danish occupation), Danish Saxon ('British Saxon corrupted by the Danes'), and Norman Saxon ('Danish Saxon adulterated with French')—shows how far he was to seek in this field; 'the spurious Cædmon's beautiful poetical paraphrase of the Book of Genesis' he names as written in Danish Saxon. Gray's knowledge of Icelandic and his interest in Welsh poetry and in 'Ossian' make it certain that, had he carried out his projected History of Poetry, the section on what he called 'the introduction of the poetry of the Goths into these islands by the Saxons and Danes' would have received fuller attention than heretofore. Vicesimus Knox's Elegant Extracts (first of many editions, 1783) does not include this period within its scope. The first edition of Ellis's Specimens of the Early English Poets (1790) has nothing earlier than Surrey and Wyatt; but the 1801 edition gives not only Middle English poems, but the old song of Brunanburh, with a literal translation, and the ingenious rendering made by Hookham Frere, when an Eton schoolboy, into Rowley-like fourteenth-century English. In the notes Ellis accepts for Anglo-Saxon words derivations from 'Chaldaic' and Latin as unhesitatingly as from 'Gothic.' Rask the Dane put the study on a sounder philological footing by his Grammar (1817), which Thorpe translated; and the works of Thorpe, Bosworth, and Kemble in the first half of the century revived in the English people interest in their old language and literature. Conybeare's Specimens of Anglo-Saxon Poetry appeared in 1826. Campbell begins his Specimens of the British Poets (7 vols. 1819) with Chaucer and the King's Quair; and in the earlier issues and reprints of this Cyclopædia (1844-74) Anglo-Saxon literature was dismissed in less than three pages.

Our earliest literature has been gradually appearing in modern editions; G. P. Krapp's Anglo-Saxon Poetic Records (1931 et seq.) include the Junian MS., the Paris Psalter, the Vercelli Book, the Exeter Book, and other early poems; the Vercelli Homilies were edited by Max Förster (1932 et seq.); a facsimile of the Exeter Book with introductory essays appeared in 1933. For further study the reader may be referred to English Literature from the Beginning to the Norman Conquest (1898), by the writer of the preceding section of this work, Dr Stopford A. Brooke, or to his History of Early English Literature (2 vols. 1892), which describes and appreciates still more fully the whole of the Anglo-Saxon literature down to the accession of Ælfred; the Cambridge History of English Literature, vol. i. Wyatt (1919); to Sedgefield's Anglo-Saxon Verse Book (1922); to the publications of the Early English Text Society, the Belles-Lettres Series of Early English Literature, and the American Library of Anglo-Saxon Poetry; to the Grammar by Sievers (1898) and that by Wright (1907); to Bosworth's Dictionary as edited by Toller; and to J. C. Hall's Anglo-Saxon Dictionary (3rd ed. 1931). Among general works on the English language may be mentioned those of Wyld (2d ed. 1921, with bibliographies), Skeat, Sweet, Morris, Bradley, Emerson, Jespersen, Kluge, Luick, and Huchon.—ED.]

MIDDLE ENGLISH LITERATURE

AND THE

EARLY RENAISSANCE PERIOD.

FROM THE ELEVENTH CENTURY TO THE SECOND HALF OF THE SIXTEENTH.¹

ALTHOUGH her own literary production was as yet but small, in the eleventh century France was intellectually as well as politically the most vigorous country of Europe.

Throughout the reign of Edward the Confessor, Norman-French cultivation had been making its way into England. After the Conquest its hold was intensified in every direction, and England was thus brought, definitely and irrevocably, into the full current of the intellectual life of Europe. Despite the preparations of the previous reign, the change came with the abruptness and violence of a revolution, and, like all revolutions, it was dearly paid for. The undercurrent of vernacular song and vernacular preaching did not cease to flow; but for four generations literary English became a memory treasured only by a few monks, and dwindled year by year, till it seemed altogether to lose creative power. When literary composition in English begins again, early in the thirteenth century, we find that both in form and matter it retains traces of its hereditary origin. But its face is no longer turned in the old direction. The first English imaginative poem after the Conquest starts with the attempt to link the fortunes of our island with those of Troy, and this grafting upon English history of the classical traditions which form part of the heritage of the Latin nations is all the more noteworthy because entirely fanciful and wilful. Still more noteworthy is the fact that the one hero of præ-Conquest days who has become a vivid figure in our literature is no English king, such as the great Alfred, but the British—that is, the Celtic—Arthur. The Normans brought with them a veritable Pax Romana, or Pax Britannica, as we now call it. Conquerors and conquered, Britons, English, and Danes, lost their old relative positions, and became the equal inhabitants of a common land. Bitter as, while it lasted, was the Norman supremacy over them all, the new theory of government thus offered a remedy for many rancours. Under the feudal system the monarch was recognised not as Rex Normannorum or Rex Anglorum, but as Rex Angliæ, king of the English land, and the peace and equality between race and race which this title symbolised became retrospective. In the beginning of the Arthurian cycle Arthur retained his semi-historical character as the bulwark of Britons against Saxons; but the fighting with the Saxons was quickly pushed into the background, and Arthur became king of a purely romantic, non-historical Britain.

This adoption of the common land as the rallying-point of the different races might easily, more especially after the loss of the French possessions of the English kings and the growth of feeling hostile to France, have proved not merely a unifying but a quickening influence. The note of our island patriotism is struck by Robert of Gloucester in the opening lines of his Metrical Chronicle :

England is a well good land, I ween of lands the best,
Set at the one end of the world, all in the west.
The sea goeth it all about, it stands as in an yle ;
Of foes they need the less them doubt, but it be through guile.¹

The purely dynastic and predatory objects of the Hundred Years' War with France did not foster this spirit, and it is not until after the Armada—or perhaps, if we are to look carefully for its first notes, after the great rupture with Rome earlier in the sixteenth century—that patriotism becomes a force in English poetry. But the negative influence of the new conception was potent. Old English history and traditions soon ceased to interest our poets, the use of the forms of Old English poetry gradually died out, and English writers took their inspiration more and more from foreign sources. Welsh legends, French romances and miracle-plays ; French allegory and love poetry ; the stories of Troy and Thebes, of Theseus and Alexander, as filtered through Latin and Romance versions ; the masterpieces of Virgil and Ovid ; Eastern tales brought home by the Crusaders ; lastly, the splendid new literature of Italy—these were the quickening influences in English literature from the days of Layamon till a new tide of foreign-born ideas began a fresh epoch in the sixteenth century. The blood which ran in the veins of the singers was, in the main, English, and to this we owe that continuity—perhaps, rather, that continual recurrence—of the Old English temper and way of thinking which constitutes a real unity amid the striking differences of our literature at different periods. But just as the English race assimilated Briton, Dane, and Norman, modified itself thereby, and yet remained English, so our English literature now, in all appearance, breaks wholly with its own past, in order to take to itself these foreign traditions, forms, and ideals, and yet never ceases to maintain its own individuality.

For us now it is easy to see that the gain which the Norman Conquest brought to English literature more than counterbalanced the loss. But for generations not merely our old literature, but the English speech itself, seemed in danger of extinction, and the loss of this would have been irreparable. To the reality of this danger the evidence of contemporaries is strikingly explicit. Himself the author of a long rhyming chronicle in English, and writing about a century after English imaginative literature had made its new start in Layamon's Brut, Robert of Gloucester gives this account of the relative positions of the French and English languages at the end of the thirteenth century. He has been describing the submission of the Londoners to William the Conqueror, and proceeds :

And thus came England into the Normans hand,
And the Normans could speak then but their own speech,
And spake French as they did at home, and their children so did teach.
So that high men of this land, that of their blood come,
Hold all to that same speech that they of them nome. took
For but a man know French men count of him lute ; little But low men hold to English and to their own speech yute. yet

I ween that there be in all the world countries none
That hold not to their own speech save England alone.
But well men wot that to know both well it is,
For the more that a man knows the more worth he is.²

Robert of Gloucester wrote his Chronicle, probably, soon after 1297, and if we rely implicitly on written testimony, the popularity of French must have gone on increasing during the next fifty years. Writing in Cheshire about 1350, Ranulph Higden tells us that the English, who had always had three forms of speech, Northern, Midland, and Southern, owing to the different German races from which they had sprung, had had their native language further corrupted by contact with Danes and Normans. This corruption, he goes on, 'has made great progress in our own times from two causes, because boys at school, contrary to the usage of all other nations, from the first coming of the Normans are obliged, leaving their own vulgar tongue, to translate [their Latin] into French ; also because the children of the nobles from their first baby talk are trained to the French idiom. Desiring to resemble the nobles, that they may thus seem of greater consequence, the country people use every endeavour to talk French. In this way, to a surprising degree, the natural and proper speech of Englishmen, though confined in a single island, has become diverse in its very pronunciation, while the Norman speech, coming from abroad, remains very much the same with every one. As to this aforesaid threefold Saxon speech, which has with difficulty still survived among a few rustic folk, the east-countrymen agree more closely with the west (as living in the same latitude) than do northerners with southerners.¹

John Trevisa, who translated the Polychronicon, when he came to this passage in 1385, interpolated the comment that after the Black Death of 1348 John Cornwall (whose name deserves to be honoured) caused his pupils to translate their Latin into English instead of French, and that the change had become general, 'also gentilmen haveth now moche i-left for to teche here children frensche.' It is quite plain, however, that the whole passage in the Polychronicon is both carelessly written and exaggerated. Higden, who seems to have been a very aristocratic monk, is clearly speaking all the time of well-to-do people, ignoring the great bulk of the population beneath them. But even if we stretch a point and make his 'rurales homines' and 'pauci agrestes' refer to people of the franklin class, it is plain that he was a bad observer. In 1362, within a dozen years or so of his writing the Polychronicon, the citizens of London prevailed on Edward III. to allow their suits in the law-courts to be pleaded in English instead of French; in the same year Langland was writing his first draft of his famous Vision; seven years later Chaucer was at work on his first original poem, the Dethe of Blaunche the Duchesse. By 1370 English had definitely triumphed over French, and the stream of English literature, original as well as translated, which flows steadily from

Robert of Gloucester onwards shows that English cannot have been in any serious danger at any time after the reign of Henry III. Nevertheless, we must not forget that as late as 1320 or 1330 a preaching friar like Nicholas Bozon thought it well to write popular sermons for English audiences in French, and that as late as the reign of Richard II. the excellent Gower sought immortality as a poet in French and Latin as well as in the language with which Chaucer was content. Clearly French continued to be much spoken as a fashionable and polite language till nearly the end of the fourteenth century, and we may remember that in the miracle-plays great persons, like Herod and Pilate, often begin their speeches in it.

During the period when the English language was still little used by cultivated people there was no lack of literary production in England. The bulk of this was written in Latin, and alike for its quantity, its variety, and the talent displayed in it, the Latin literature of England during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries is very remarkable. In history within less than fifty years we have the Chronicon ex Chronicis of Florence of Worcester (d. 1118); the Historia Novorum and Vita Anselmi of Eadmer of Canterbury (d. 1124); the Historia de Gestis Anglorum of Simeon of Durham (d. 1130); the De Gestis Regum Anglorum (449-1120), Historia Novella (a continuation to the year 1143), the De Gestis Pontificum Anglorum, Life of Aldhelm, and treatise on the antiquities of Glastonbury, all by William of Malmesbury; the Historia Ecclesiastica of Ordericus Vitalis (c. 1142); and the Historia Anglorum of Henry of Huntingdon, which is brought down to the year 1154. Geoffrey of Monmouth's imaginative history of the kings of Britain (Historia Regum Britanniae), to which we shall refer again, seems to have acted as a discouragement to sober chroniclers; but towards the end of the century we have the works of the Welshman Gerald de Bary (Giraldus Cambrensis) on Ireland and Wales, and the Historia Rerum Anglicarum of William of Newbury (1198). The Annals of Roger de Hoveden end with the year 1201, the Chronicle of Roger of Wendover in 1235; while in his Historia Major, Historia Minor, and Lives of the Abbots of St Albans, Matthew Paris (d. 1259) glorified the office of history-writer to St Albans Abbey, which had been created before 1183, and which produced a series of chronicles extending over more than two centuries, only ending in 1388. Turning to other learned subjects, we have in the twelfth century the treatise of Athelard of Bath on natural history and philosophy, and his translation of Euclid; the De Naturis Rerum of Alexander Neckham; the famous Dialogus de Scaccario, or treatise on the Exchequer, written in 1176-78 by Richard Fitz-Neal; and the work on the Laws of England attributed to the Chief Justiciary Ranulph de Glanvil. Nearly a century later another work with the same title, De Legibus Angliæ, and founded on Glanvil's, was written by Henry de Bracton; and in 1268 Roger Bacon, the Franciscan friar, was writing the Opus Majus, in which and its successors, the Opus Minus and Opus Tertium, he embodied so much of the learning of his time and of his own genius, which so greatly transcended it.

Nor was this Latin literature confined to learned subjects only. Perhaps the Polycraticus, de Nugis Curialium et Vestigiis Philosophorum, which John of Salisbury finished in 1156, ought to come under this head, for the triflings of courtiers and footsteps of the philosophers are surveyed in a purely moral and didactic spirit. But the work for which, a generation later, Walter Map took part of the same title (De Nugis Curialium) is entirely literary, running over the whole range of courtiers' small-talk, with an abundance of anecdotes, cleverly told. With Map's name also are connected the satires on the corruption and evil-living of the clergy in the person of the bibulous Bishop Golias. The Brunellus of Nigel Wireker is another lively satire, this time on medieval philosophy. The attempt of Joseph of Exeter to write a Latin poem on the Trojan War is perhaps worth noting, as is also the composition (c. 1195) by Geoffrey of Vinsauf of a treatise on poetry. In the following century at least a considerable part of the great medieval story-book, the Gesta Romanorum, had its origin in England. Quite at the close of the period of literary Latin (c. 1344) comes the Philobiblon of Richard de Bury, the book-loving bishop, a work which those who share his hobby still treasure, and which may remind us that from the twelfth to the fourteenth century the art of book-production in England, alike in beauty of writing and in splendour of illustration, attained the very highest excellence, equalling that of France itself.

The fact that the liturgies of the Church were all in Latin accounts for the last point we have to notice—the beginning, that is, of the drama in England in the form of Latin miracle-plays, which were acted in church on various high festivals as part of the service of the day. The earliest mention we have of a play of this kind is of one in honour of St Catherine, performed at Dunstable by a certain Geoffrey, who by 1119 had become Abbot of St Albans; but in the Life of St Thomas à Becket written, about 1182, by William Fitzstephen we are told that plays representing the miracles and sufferings of the martyrs of the Church were at that time frequently performed in London. The plays of Hilarius, an Englishman, which have come down to us, already show touches of humour; but the early dramas on such subjects as the Resurrection are thoroughly religious in feeling, following closely the Bible narrative and introducing appropriate hymns.

Besides this literature in Latin there existed a second, more popular, quite as prolific, and nearly as varied in its contents—the literature of books written in English, or by subjects of the English king, in the French or Anglo-Norman language. Probably the largest section of this French literature was that of the various kinds of books written with a religious aim—devotional treatises, translations or explanations of the Psalms, the Gospels, and the Apocalypse, sermons, lives of the saints, moralisations on the properties of beasts and things (Bestiaires, Lapidaires), &c. In addition to these there were what may be called educational works of all sorts, abridgments of history, treatises on geography and natural history, law-books, &c. Many of these have perished utterly; many others have never been edited in modern times or printed in any form. Besides the mere abridgments of Latin works, there were original metrical chronicles of much higher value, such as the Roman de Rou of the Jersey poet Wace (c. 1100-1170), an account of the Norman Conquest which gives the best description of the battle of Hastings; or, again, the Song of Dermot and the Earl (edited by Mr C. H. Orpen in 1892), which is of considerable value for the history of Ireland about 1170.

In the thirteenth century we may mention two religious poems written in French, Robert Grosseteste's Chateau d'Amour, in honour of the Blessed Virgin, and William Waddington's Manuel des Pechez, speedily Englished by Robert Mannyng of Brunne as the Handlyng Synne (see page 41). Again, as late as the last quarter of the fourteenth century we find John Gower writing long poems in Latin and French (see page 74) before he turned to English in his Latin-named Confessio Amantis. Gower also wrote French balades which have real literary merit, but he is the last English poet who seriously used a foreign language as the medium of poetry; and though later writers, such as Sir Thomas More and Bacon, used Latin for works in prose, this was with a view to appealing to a European audience rather than from any distrust of the capabilities of their native tongue. Coincident with this final disuse of Latin and French in literature intended for Englishmen, we find, a little before 1380, the beginning of a long series of translations of foreign works into English—not merely works of devotion and religious instruction as in the previous period, but works on every variety of subject. About 1380 also we have the beginning of a new influence in English poetry, for it was then that Chaucer turned from his French and Latin sources and enriched our literature from his study of the great Italian writers, Dante and Boccaccio. Thenceforth what we may call the literary or Court poetry of England takes an entirely new turn; for, though Chaucer's successors could but very imperfectly follow in his footsteps, it was yet in his footsteps that they tried to walk. Thus the period of some three hundred and fifty years from the first revival of the literary use of English after the Norman Conquest in Layamon's Brut (c. 1205) to the accession of Elizabeth, with the nearly coincident literary landmark, the publication of Tottel's Miscellany in 1557, divides itself almost exactly at the half, about the year 1380. Before this date English is only one of three rival literary languages; after it English reigns supreme, and in prose advances unfalteringly. In poetry, as we shall see, there was no such steady progress, for until Surrey and Wyatt sought inspiration from the Italian models where Chaucer had found it, there was no English writer who could understand his secrets so as to prove in any way a worthy successor to him.

The Arthurian Legend.

The trilingual character of the literature written for Englishmen in the early part of our period is well illustrated by the fact that the legendary history of Britain with which English literature takes its new beginning appeared first in Latin, then in French, and only finally in English. It was the Historia Regum Britannia of Geoffrey of Monmouth which started the legends on their literary career. This famous book, which differs widely from the ordinary Latin chronicles among which it has already been named, was extant, in a form now lost, before January 1139, and as we now have it dates from some eight or ten years later. Its author called himself Gaufridus Arturus (Geoffrey Arthur)—that is, the son of Arthur; his signature is found as witness to a charter of Oseney, near Oxford, in 1129; probably in 1140 he became Archdeacon of Monmouth; in 1152 he was consecrated Bishop of St Asaph; and in 1154 he died at Llandaff. Welsh tradition has it that he was born at Monmouth. [Prof. J. D. Bruce regards him as a Breton in his Evolution of Arthurian Romance (vol. i. 1923)]. Geoffrey tells us that what was new in his book he learnt from a certain very ancient work in the British language which Walter, Archdeacon of Oxford, brought out of Brittany and gave him, and in which he found the acts of all the British kings, from Brut to Cadwalader, set forth in their order. This Archdeacon Walter was one of the co-signatories of the Oseney charter of 1129, and the attempts made to get rid of both him and his Breton book are rather unnecessary. Brutus, the great-grandson of Æneas, the supposed founder of the royal line of Britain, is mentioned by the præ-Conquest historian Nennius, and Nennius and Bede speak of Lucius, the first Christian king; of Vortigern and Ambrosius Aurelius; while Arthur appears in Nennius as a warrior, not a king, who won twelve battles against the Saxons. The insertion of intermediate British kings—among them Leir, whose story, as Shakespeare knew it, here first appears—and the great development, though only in part, of the Arthur legend, were Geoffrey's innovations on the received version of British history, and they sufficed to set the literary world of France and England on fire. Writing almost certainly in 1149 or the following year, Alfred of Beverley remarks that he found it was thought a proof of clownishness to know nothing of the stories of the Britons, about which every one was talking, and he therefore made an abridgment of Geoffrey's History. Three versions or abridgments were made at early dates in Welsh. It is hardly possible to doubt that the book was used by Geoffrey Gaimar in the lost first part of his Estorie des Engles; and another French poet, Wace, the author of the Roman de Rou, with the help of some additions, turned it into a metrical chronicle of over fourteen thousand lines, to which he gave the title Geste des Bretons, or Brut d'Angleterre. This was in 1155; and about the end of the century Wace's romance and two other works, identified as the Latin original of Bede's Historia Ecclesiastica and the Anglo-Saxon version of it, fell into the hands of Layamon (Lazamon), a priest at Areley Regis, on the Severn, in north Worcestershire, and spurred him to write on the same subject a poem of some thirty-two thousand lines (or half-lines) in alliterative verse of the Old English kind, but mixed with rhyming couplets. With this poem, the Historia Britonum, or Brut, English literature takes its new start.

Whether out of his own head, or from legends of the Welsh border, or (as is most probable) from amplifications already in progress or made elsewhere, Layamon made some notable additions to the story as Geoffrey of Monmouth and Wace had left it. He tells us of the 'elves' who came at Arthur's birth, and who wafted him at his death in the magic boat to Avalon. Merlin is more important; so is the Round Table (first mentioned by Wace); so is Guinevere; while Sir Gawain and Sir Bedivere make their appearance. He made additions also in the earlier part of the story, such as of a legend to account for the name Gloucester; but these are of less importance. But it is fair to note that, though as a rule he follows Wace closely, he is not a slavish translator. We may take as a specimen of his style, where it needs little explanation, the lament of Lear when the ingratitude of his elder daughters has been revealed to him. The text is that of Cotton MS. Caligula, A ix. (ll. 3454-3497), as edited by Sir F. Madden:

 And ba twa hire susteren :

 That ich ham was swa leof :
 levere thenne hire agðe lif.
 And Cordoille mi dohter :
 seohthe me seide
 That heo me leovede swa feire :
 swa mon his fader scolde.
 Wet wold ich bidde mare :
 of mire dohter dure.
 Nu ich wullen faren feorth :
 and ouer sæ fusen.
 I-hiren of Cordoille :

Then said the old king—
 rueful was he at heart—
 Welaway, death, death !
 That thou wilt not me doom !
 Sooth said Cordoille, known it is to me now.
 My youngest daughter,
 she to me was right dear,
 but thereafter most loathsome,
 for she said me the very truth,
 that little worth is he and low,
 the man who little owns,
 and that I was no worthier than my wealth made me.
 Over sooth said that youthful woman,
 there follows her much wisdom.
 What time I had my kingdom,
 my people loved me ;
 for my land and my fee
 my earls fell at my knee.
 Now I am a wretched man,
 no man loves me therefore.
 Ah, my daughter said me sooth,
 now I believe her well enough :
 and both her two sisters,
 lies they said me,
 that I to them was so lief, liefer than their own life.
 And Cordoille my daughter, soothly to me she said that she loved me so fairly as a father should be loved.
 What would I ask more of my daughter dear ?
 Now I will fare forth,
 and haste over sea,
 to hear of Cordoille
 what is her will.
 Her sooth word I took in ill part,
 therefore I have now mickle smart.
 For now I must beseech that which erst I despised.
 She will do me no worse than warn me from her land.

Not a great speech this certainly, but yet with more simplicity and pathos in it than is to be found in either Geoffrey or Wace. Nor in the rest of the incident, where, according to Geoffrey's generous imagination, Cordelia arranges that Lear shall visit her and her husband not as a forlorn beggar but in royal state, does Layamon fall below his theme. Altogether his poem is worth more study than has been given it since it was edited by Sir F. Madden for the Society of Antiquaries in 1847. In that handsome edition two texts are printed, the first, from which we have quoted, written about 1200, in which the author calls himself 'Layamon the son of Leovenath ;' while in the second, which is shorter by nearly a fourth, the names appear as 'Laweman the son of Leuca,' and the language is considerably later. Sir F. Madden asserted that in the first text there were only fifty words of French origin, and in the second only eighty. Even if, as is probable, this is an underestimate, it is clear that the author, writing with a French text before him, studiously endeavoured to keep his vocabulary wholly English. On the other hand, even the short extract here given will have shown that he had lost the secret of Old English verse—the four beats and triple alliteration in each pair of short lines—and was pleased to fall in with the French fashion of rhyme, when, as in lah and ah, feo and cneo, grame and scame, the rhymes came readily to his hand. Thus in form as well as in matter Layamon's Brut marks the beginning of new influences in English poetry.

The poem of Wace which Layamon took as his main original had followed Geoffrey of Monmouth's with only a few additions. But the enthusiasm with which the History was received led in an extraordinarily short time to developments of far greater importance. In the Arthurian legend as we now know it the king's military exploits against Saxons, Romans, and the people of other countries are a mere incident or excrescence; the interest of the story moves within the two interlacing circles of the Quest of the Holy Graal and the love of Lancelot, the peerless knight, for Guinevere, Arthur's queen, both of them unmentioned in Geoffrey's History. The Graal (the word is possibly derived from the Low Latin gradalis, a shallow vessel) is the cup used by Christ in the institution of the Eucharist, and afterwards—so the legend ran—by Joseph of Arimathæa, to catch the blood shed upon the Cross. Brought to Britain by Joseph's son (or brother-in-law), it forms part of the treasury of a mysterious king, and can only be seen by the pure in heart. This Christian legend may, as is strenuously maintained, have been grafted upon earlier tales, purely Celtic, of a miraculous food-producing vessel, but it is only in its Christian form that it here concerns us. According to the testimony of the romances themselves the story of the Graal was first written in Latin, and translated thence into French. These earliest French versions are ascribed to Chrestien de Troyes, and to Robert de Borron, a knight of northern France, about the end of the twelfth century. The French prose romances of Lancelot and of the Queste del Saint Graal are connected with the name of Walter Map (the author of the De Nugis Curialium already mentioned), and he is also credited by some scholars with the authorship of the lost History of the Graal in Latin from which Robert de Borron translated. The whole question of the authorship and order of composition is immensely complicated, and all the study bestowed on the subject has only made it clear that materials do not exist from which any really convincing theory can be evolved. What is certain is, that by the beginning of the thirteenth century the main outlines of the Arthurian legend, with its wonderful combination of religious mysticism, chivalry, and passion, had come into existence, and that throughout that century they were being added to, either by the invention of new exploits for individual knights, or by the incorporation of other legends, such as the wonderful Tristram romance, the Celtic origin of which is generally admitted.

In France, nearly a century before the Arthurian romance had taken root, there had sprung up a great literature round the personality of Charlemagne. These chansons de gestes, as they are called, differed from the later romances by their greater simplicity and directness, and their greater national feeling. They were being written in France in great numbers and at amazing length during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, and translations of a few of them appeared at a later date in England, together with echoes of two other much smaller and less important French cycles, those connected with the stories of Alexander the Great and of the siege of Troy. As will be seen, moreover, England received back from France more than one story on an old English subject, which had passed to France (possibly in an epic form of the same kind as Beowulf, possibly merely as a legend told from mouth to mouth), had been rendered into French in the prevalent romance form, and reappeared in English verse as a translation from the French.

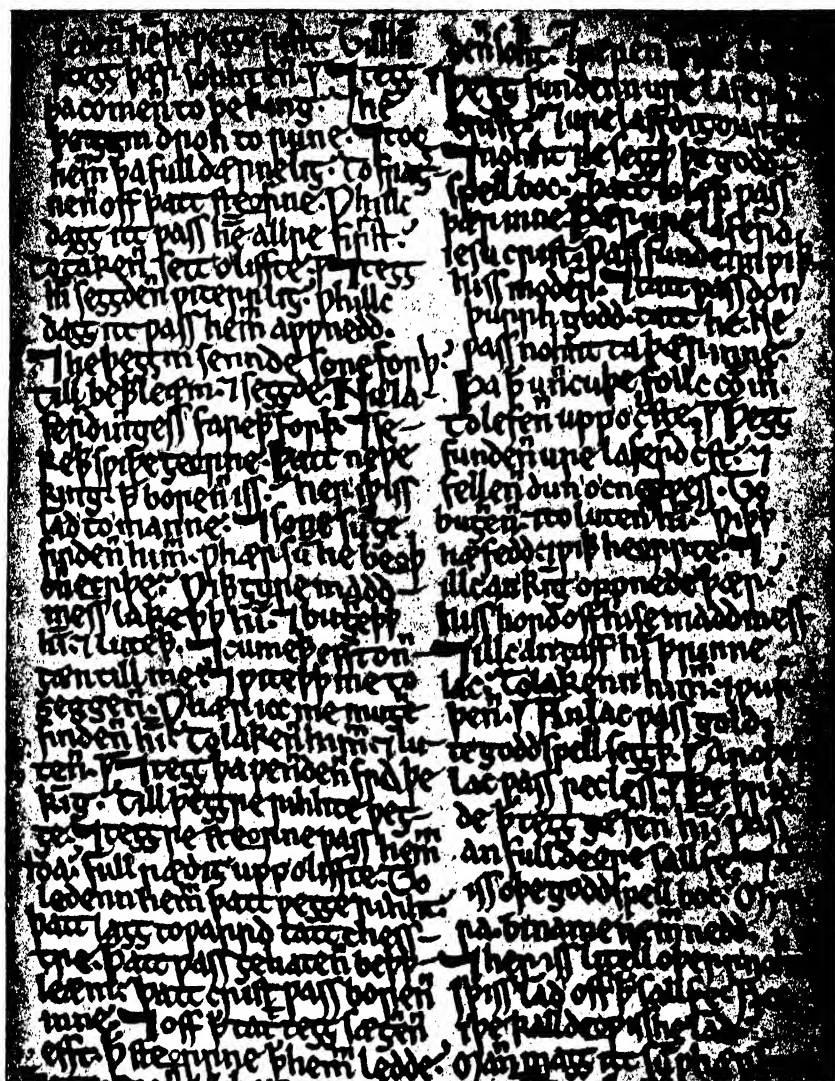

These various French cycles of romance and the popular French books on other subjects to which we have alluded, whether written in France or in England, formed for a long time one-half of the literature sought after by the ruling class in England, while the Latin books already mentioned formed the other; for in those days people who could read at all, and were not merely dependent on the recitations of the wandering minstrels or the instruction of their priests, could mostly read Latin in addition to French. Books written in English had thus to fight their way into a field already occupied, and it is clear that until the fourteenth century they failed to obtain any real popularity among well-to-do people. Of Geoffrey of Monmouth's Historia Regum Britannie there are thirty-five manuscripts in the British Museum alone, and nearly a third of these date from the twelfth century. Of English works, on the other hand, written before 1360, perhaps the majority survive only in a single copy, which in no single case bears any trace of the fine writing or illumination found in manuscripts written for wealthy book-buyers. At a later date there is no lack of manuscripts of Langland, the Wyclifite Bible, and Chaucer, some of them most beautifully written and decorated. The inference is obvious that in the earlier period English books appealed to a very small and by no means wealthy class of readers, and the development of our literature was retarded for lack of encouragement; while of the books written some at least, which we would gladly have inherited, perished utterly, partly, no doubt, because so few copies were made in the first instance.

Religious Literature.

About the same time as Layamon's Brut another long English poem was being written. This was the Ormulum, a fragment, as we have it, of about ten thousand lines of a poem, originally perhaps seven or eight times as long, in which the gospel of each day is first paraphrased, and then elaborately expounded out of the writings of Ælfric, Bede, and Augustine. Its author was an Augustinian monk named Orm or Ormin, possibly of Danish descent, who may have lived somewhere near the borders of Lincolnshire, and who dedicated his long work to his brother and fellow-monk, Walter. The book, we are told, was called Ormulum 'because that Orm it wrote;' and Orm must have been interested in matters of language, for he took the trouble to double the consonant after every short vowel, while his vocabulary is kept so free from French words that it is said not to contain five. On the other hand, in his metre he breaks away from Old English traditions, writing without alliteration in long lines of fifteen syllables, which divide quite regularly into short ones

Robert Holt in 1878, the peculiarities of spelling are omitted, and the letters þ and ȝ represented by th and g, gh, or y, in order that no needless difficulties may repel modern readers. The extract is from Orm's dedication :

Now, brother Walter, brother mine
 After the flesh's kind,
 And brother mine in Christendom
 Through baptism and through truth,
 And brother mine eke in God's house, 5
 Once more, in a third way,
 Since that we two have taken both
 One book of rules to follow,
 Under the canons' rank and life
 So as Saint Austin set ; 10
 I now have done even as thou bad'st,
 Forwarding to thy will,
 I now have turned into English
 The Gospel's holy lore,
 After that little wit that me 15
 My Lord and God has lent.
 Thou thoughtest how that it might well
 To mickle profit turn,
 If English folk, for love of Christ,
 It readily would learn 20
 And follow it, fulfilling it
 With thought, with word, with deed,
 And therefore yearnedst thou that I
 This work for thee should work ;
 And I have forwarded it for thee, 25
 And all through help of Christ.

In the body of his work Orm weakens his verse by repetition and diffuseness, but this prologue is direct enough, and the accidental rhyming of lines 18 and 20 immediately gives the quatrain a curiously modern lilt well sustained in the next four lines, till we are pulled up by the absence of the expected jingle at the end of the fourth. Another specimen of Orm's poetry may be spelt out from our facsimile of a page from the only extant manuscript of his work (Junius MS. I., in the Bodleian Library), and from the transcript, as printed by the Palæographical Society, in which all the author's peculiarities of spelling are faithfully preserved. The illustration, it need hardly be said, has not been chosen for its beauty, but rather to show, in its absence of grace of writing or illumination, how entirely shut off from the patronage of wealthy book-lovers were the English authors of this period who had the courage to use their native tongue.

Another religious work is the *Ancren Riwe*¹ ('Anchoresses' Rule'), a prose treatise written for the guidance of three girls who forsook the world, possibly three of Queen Maud's maids of honour to whom was granted about 1130 the hermitage of Kilburn; the author may have been its master, Godwin. (Or it may be later, c. 1200). About 1300 it was translated into Latin by the Bishop of Salisbury for his sisters, nuns at Tarrent in Dorset; on this Tarrent connection was based the ascription of the book to Richard Poor, who may have been born there, and certainly died there, Bishop of Durham, in 1237. This work combines in a remarkable degree devotional feeling, wisdom, and a sense of humour. There are several beautiful passages in the eight books of which the 'Rule' is composed, notably the parable of the Love of Christ in the seventh. Of its wisdom we have proofs in the writer's refusal to let the nuns bind themselves with strict vows or to practise needless austerities. For the humour, perhaps this passage, which enforces the value of silence, may be chosen as an example. It is taken from page 66 (Part ii. § 2) of the edition of the Ancren Riwe, edited by the Rev. James Morton for the Camden Society in 1853, and in the modernised version, Morton's translation is used.

Eve held, in Paradise, long talk with the adder, and told him all the lesson that God had taught her and Adam concerning the apple; and so the fiend, through her word, understood at once her weakness and found the way to her for her destruction. Our lady, Saint Mary, did all another wise; nor told she the angel any tale, but asked him shortly the thing she did not know. Do you, my dear sisters, follow our lady, and not the cackling Eve. Wherefore let an anchoress, whatso she be, as much as ever she can and may, hold herself still. Let her not have the hen's nature. The hen, when she has laid, cannot but cackle. And what buys she thereof? Comes the chough at once and hereaves her of her eggs, and eats all that of which she should bring forth her living birds. And right so the wicked chough, the devil, beareth away from the cackling anchoresses, and swalloweth up all the good they have brought forth, and which ought, as birds, to bear them up toward heaven, if it were not cackled. The poor peddler makes more noise to cry his soap than a rich mercer all his precious wares.

It is best to assign to this period, at any rate in the earliest versions in which it has come down to us, the so-called Moral Ode (Poema Morale), written in rhyming couplets, with, as a rule, fourteen syllables, or seven accents, to the line. It has been claimed for this poem that it represents a later version of an original much older than the second half of the twelfth century, or the beginning of the thirteenth, to which we should assign it. Such an hypothesis, however, appears to be quite superfluous. Words of French origin appear as rhymes—that is, in a position where they could not easily have been foisted in by a later scribe—and the literary and metrical features of the poem make for as late a date as philology will allow to be assigned to it. The poem is of man's life, of the joys of heaven, and, still more, of the pains of hell. It is full of striking lines, mostly dictated by the vivid sense of punishment to come. For example:

Beter is worie wateres drunc thane atter meynd myd wyne.
Swynes brede is swete, so is of the wilde deore.
Al to deore he hit buth, that yeveth thar-vore his sweore.
Ful wombe may lihtliche speken of hunger and of festen;
So may of pyne that not hwat it is that evermo schal lesten.

Worie, turbid; drunc, drink; atter . . . wyne, poison mixed with wine; al to . . . sweore, all too dearly he it buys who gives for it his neck; wombe, belly; festen, fast; pyne, punishment; not, knows not.

But the opening passage (here quoted from Morris's Specimens of Early English) is perhaps the finest of the poem:

Ich am eldre than ich wes a winter and ek on lore.
Ich welde more than ich dude, my wyt auhte beo more.
Wel longe ich hadde child ibeo a werke and eke on dede.
Thah ich beo of wynter old to yong ich am on rede.

Unneth lif ich hadde ilad and yet me thinkth ich lede,
Hwenne ich me bithenche ful sore ich me adrede.
Mest al that ich hadde idon is idelnesse and chilce.
Wel late iche hadde me bi-thouht, bute god do me mylce.
Veole idel word ich hadde ispeke seotthe ich speke cuthe,
And feole yonge deden ido that me of-thincheth nuthe.
Al to lome ich hadde agult on werke and on worde.
Al to muchel ich hadde i-spend, to lutel i-leyd an horde.
Best al that me likede er nu bit me myslyketh.
The muchel foleweth his wil him seolve he biswiketh.

A winter . . . lore, in winters and also in learning; welde, own; auhte, ought; hadde, have; ibeo, been; Thah, though; on rede, in counsel; Unneth, useless; Hwenne . . . adrede, when I bethink me of it full sorely I dread; Mest, most; chilce, childishness; do me mylce, show me mercy; Veole, many; seotthe, since; cuthe, could; feole, many; of-thincheth, repents; nuthe, now; lome, frequently; agult, trespassed; The, he who; biswiketh, deceives.

Judging from the number of manuscripts which have come down to us, the Ancren Riwe and the Moral Ode both enjoyed exceptional popularity. With the Ancren Riwe we may group, though without claiming for them common authorship, the legends of St Katherine, St Margaret, and St Juliana, and the vehemently anti-matrimonial homily on Holy Maidenhead (Hali Meidenhad), all written in an alliterative unrhymed metre with four accents; also the high-flown prose of the Wooing of our Lord (Wohunge of Ure Lauerd), Ureisun (Orison) of God Almichti, and some smaller pieces, printed among the Old English Homilies published by the Early English Text Society. Of more literary value than any of these are the poetical paraphrases of Genesis and Exodus, written probably in Suffolk about the middle of the century, from which we may take, as the shortest possible extract, eighteen lines from the scene between Isaac and Esau, when Jacob has stolen his brother's blessing. The text followed is that of the Story of Genesis and Exodus, edited by Richard Morris, E.E.T.S., 1865 (ll. 1553-1570):

To about the same date belongs a Northumbrian translation of the Psalter, which we may refer to again when we come to speak of translations of the Bible. All through the thirteenth century, under the influence of the friars who had come to England in 1221, the production of religious literature went on; and towards its close or in the early years of its successor we have cycles of legend written both in the south and the north of England. In 1303 Robert Mannyng, who became a canon of the Gilbertine order at Sempringham, six miles from his native place, Brunne (or Bourne), in Lincolnshire, translated, under the title Handlyng synne, the Manuel des Pechiez, written in French by William of Waddington some thirty years earlier. Mannyng added freely to his original, and his poem, with its mixture of exhortation, satire, and anecdote, is by no means dull reading. Here, for instance, are a few lines from an attack on the trailing gowns of women and their saffron-colour wimples:

What sey ye men of ladyys pryde,
That gone traylyng over syde? go trailing too widely
Gif a lady were ryghtely shreve, shriven
Better hyt were yn almes geve; it
To soule helpe hyt myght do bote profit

(Robert of Brunne's Handlyng Synne; ed. F. J. Furnivall, Roxburghe Club, 1862, ll. 3442-3451.)

And here is an account of the evil fate which befell a workman who broke the Saturday half-holiday instituted in honour of the Blessed Virgin:

Fel hyt on a Satyrday
A man hyrede folke to ful pay;
The halfe day ne halewde he noghte,

This book, so full of stories and illustrations of social life, was brought within the reach of a wider public when it was re-edited by Dr Furnivall for the Early English Text Society in two parts in 1901-03.

Lyrics.

Meanwhile lyric poetry, both secular and religious, was springing up. The famous 'Sumer is i-cumen in,' written about the middle of the thirteenth century, and reproduced on page 43 in reduced facsimile from a manuscript in the British Museum, owes some of its reputation to the fact that the music also has been preserved, and is said to be the earliest of English authorship in existence; but the words are pretty enough in themselves:

Sumer is i-cumen in, come
Lhude sing cuccu; Loudly
Groweth sede and bloweth mede
And springeth the wde nu. wood now
Sing cuccu, cuccu.
Awe bleteth after lomb, Ewe
Lhouth after calve cu; Loweth—cow
Bulluc sterteth, bucke verteth; r
Murie sing, cuccu.
Cuccu, cuccu!
Wel singes thu, cuccu,
Ne swik thu naver nu; cease—never
Sing cuccu nu.
Sing cuccu, cuccu.
Sing cuccu nu.

Equally pretty, if not quite so well known, is this spring song, written in the reign of Edward I.:

Lenten ys come with love to toune, Spring is
With blosmen and with briddes roun, birds' whispering
That al this blisse bryngeth;
Dayes-eyes in this dales, Daisies—these Notes suete of nyhtegales,
Uch foul song singeth. Each fowl
The threstelcock him threteth oo, ever
A-way is huere wynter wo, her
When woderove springeth; woodruff
This foules singeth ferly fele, wondrously much
And wlyteth on heure wynter wele, loathe
That al the wode ryngeth.

Here again is a charming love-song of the same date:

Blou, northerne wynd,
Send thou me my suetyng,
Blou, northerne wynd, blou, blou, blou.
Ichot a burde in boure bryht, I knew
That fully semly is on syht, Mensful maiden of myht, Noble
feir and fre to fonde;
In al this wurhliche won,
A burde of blod and of bon Never yete y nuste non he knew lussomore in londe. pleasanter
Blou, &c.

Prettiest of all, perhaps, is this love-song 'To Alison':

Bytuene Mershe and Averil
When spray biginneth to springe,
The lutel foul hath hire wyl
On hyre lud to synge; In her language

Forth they came up to the dais, and the sheriff fast
By the head they seized anon and to the ground him cast,
And hurled him forth vilely with many a stroke among.
In a foul puddle in the street they afterwards him slung,
And ran on him with horses and befouled him fast
And behind a squire next vilely they him cast,
And to the castle led him throughout all the town,
That ruth it was for to see, and cast him in prison.

When the tidings hereof came to the barony

They thought in time they should amend such villainy.

It must be allowed that even episodes like this are better as history than as poetry, and Robert of Gloucester's Chronicle is not easy to read for more than a few pages. The slightly later Chronicle of Robert Mannyng, the author of the Handlyng Synne, is even less valuable, being mainly founded on Wace's version of Geoffrey of Monmouth, and, save in the pleasant preface on the need of books in the English language, is of no originality, literary or historical. The Handlyng Synne by its abundance of anecdotes gives a real picture of the time, while the Chronicle, which professes to be history, is entirely fictitious, and dull as well.

To the thirteenth century belong, besides the works at which we have already looked, at least three important romances, Sir Tristrem, Havelok, and Horn, in all of which a tradition at one time British or English seems to have come back to its original home after being developed on foreign soil or in a foreign tongue. As is well known, the romance of Sir Tristrem was attributed by its first editor, Sir Walter Scott, to Thomas Rymour of Ercildoune or Earliston in Berwick (fl. 1280), and not without reason, since in the Chronicle of Robert Mannyng mention is made of it in connection with Ercildoune and a Thomas; and the reference, with its mention of the strange English in which the story is written, might well point, as has been supposed, to an earlier Scottish text of which the extant version is a southernised transcript. Unfortunately, a hundred years earlier, the German version by Gottfried of Strasburg had also ascribed the authorship of the plot to a Thomas, and this Thomas could not possibly be Thomas of Ercildoune. It is possible, of course, that the Thomas mentioned in the German version and Thomas of Ercildoune both handled the story; but it is possible also that the fame of the prophecies of the Scottish Thomas led to the work of his unknown namesake being ascribed to him, and in the absence of any other Scottish work of this kind until many years later, this second theory seems the more credible of the two. The story, whoever wrote it, is told not without some skill, though with its full share of the surplusage by which so many of the later romances are damaged. As a specimen of its style and metre we may take the lines which tell how the famous love-potion mixed by Yseult's mother, and entrusted to the maiden Brengwain to cement the love of Yseult and King Mark, was unwittingly shared by Yseult and Tristram, to their undoing:

Her moder about was blithe,	mother

Bédier discusses the problem of authorship in Le Roman de Tristan par Thomas (Société des Anciens Textes Français, 1902-05).

The Lay of Havelok the Dane recounts the story of a king's son of one country and a king's daughter of another, each of them kept out of their rights by wicked guardians; of the hap which brings them together, and the might with which the king's son wins back both his own kingdom and his wife's. The fisherman Grim who was bidden to kill Havelok of Denmark brings him to England, and himself becomes the founder of Grimsby. Havelok wanders to Lincoln, and serves in the kitchen of the Earl Godrich of Cornwall, who is anxious to be rid of his ward Goldburgh, whose kingdom he enjoys. But her father had bidden the Earl marry Goldburgh to the handsomest and strongest man he could find, and when the kitchen-lad Havelok performs wonderful feats of strength, he insists on Goldburgh marrying him in order to get her out of the way. Not unnaturally Goldburgh is very angry, and this is how she is reassured:

On the nith, als Goldeborw lay,	night—as

¹ Given (that is, in marriage) unnaturally. ² No wonder though she were afraid.

Havelok takes Goldburgh to Grimsby, and by the help of Grim's sons and another faithful friend, Ubbe, he recovers Denmark and puts the usurper to a cruel death. Then he wins England from Earl Godrich, and he and Goldburgh live there happily, leaving Denmark to Ubbe. The story is told rapidly and well, and is doubtless founded on old English legend, the memory of which is still preserved in the ancient seal of Grimsby, which shows 'Gryem,' with sword and shield, and little figures of 'Habloc' and 'Goldeburgh' on either side of him.

King Horn is also a good story, not unlike Havelok, and well told; but it is less simple and more conventional. It has come down to us in three manuscripts, and whereas in two of these Horn's father is called King Murry, in the third his name is Allof. The 'Saracens' slay Allof; and though they will not kill Horn because of his beauty, they set him adrift in a boat with twelve companions. The boat carries them to Westernesse, and there Horn wins the love of Rymenhild, the king's daughter. His secret is betrayed to her father by his false friend Fikenhild, and he sets off in search of adventures, receiving from Rymenhild a magic ring. He returns, disguised as a pilgrim, just as Rymenhild is about to be married to a King Modi. Here is the scene when Horn makes himself known to her as she is offering wine to the guests:

Horn sat upon the grunde,
In thughte he was i-bunde,	bound, wrapped

King Horn was published by the E.E.T.S. in 1866 and 1901. In 1901 also appeared a critical edition by Jos. Hall.

After Horn has won his bride he leaves her again to recover his kingdom, and in his absence Fikenhild plots against him, causing a repetition in the story which is rather a blot on it.

Miracle-Plays and the Cursor Mundi.

Reference has already been made (page 34) to the first miracle-plays acted in England. By the beginning of the fourteenth century a great change had come over these representations, but of the gradual stages by which it must have developed we know very little. The dramatic poem of the Harrowing of Hell, which is thought by some critics to be as early as the reign of Henry III., is the only extant remnant of this period when the plays had begun to be written in English, and were still of such a character that they might be acted in church. It contains some two hundred and forty lines, and begins with a prologue, whose opening—

Allé herkneth to me nou,
A strif wil I tellen you,
Of Jesu and of Satan—

makes it uncertain whether it should be regarded only as a poem intended for recitation or as really dramatic. But the speeches which follow, spoken by Christ and Satan, Hell's Porter, Adam, Eve, Abraham, David, John Baptist, and Moses, form a perfect little play; and their beauty and directness may be well illustrated by the opening colloquy, which is here given as printed in the appendix to English Miracle-Plays, Moralities, and Interludes, edited by A. W. Pollard (seventh ed. 1923):

Dialogue like this gives us the best idea we can attain of such a play of the Resurrection as, according to the Handlyng Synne (supra, page 41), might lawfully be acted by a priest in church to teach the unlearned. But in the same passage Mannyng mentions, though only to reprobate, the acting of plays 'in weyes or grenes,' and this removal from the church and its precincts speedily altered their character. In every important English town at this period there were guilds of the different trades or crafts, with objects partly religious, partly secular, and these guilds during the fourteenth century took the acting of the miracle-plays very largely into their own hands. In 1311 the Council of Vienne enjoined the strict observance of the festival of Corpus Christi, and in many towns this day, or in some instances its eve, was selected by the guilds for the annual performances of their plays, though in other towns these were given at Whitsuntide. Both Whitsuntide and Corpus Christi, which falls on the Thursday after Trinity Sunday, although movable feasts, always come within a few weeks of the longest day, and as the plays began between four and five in the morning, there was time enough before sunset for a series of performances of what seems to us enormous length. These Corpus Christi and Whitsuntide representations were thus restricted to no single subject, such as the Nativity or the Resurrection, but embraced 'matter from the beginning of the world' to the Day of Judgment. Their rise into importance during the fourteenth century is thus closely connected with the popularity of the great narrative poem on the same subject, the Cursor Mundi, so called by its unknown author because it 'runs over' the world's history. In some manuscripts this poem extends to nearly thirty thousand lines, and it groups its subject under 'seven ages,' the first ending with the Flood, the second with Babel, the third with the death of Saul, the fourth with the Captivity of Judah, the fifth with the preaching of John the Baptist. The sixth age begins with the Baptism of Christ, and extends to the Finding of the Cross by the Empress Helena ; the seventh and last is taken with a bound to the Day of Judgment. The main sources from which this long poem was compiled are the Bible, sometimes directly, sometimes as its story is retold in the Historia Scholastica of Petrus Comestor (written c. 1175), the apocryphal Gospels, the Chasteau d'Amour or Carmen de Creatione Mundi of Robert Grosseteste, Bishop of Lincoln, and the Golden Legend of Jacobus de Voragine. It is thus a storehouse of medieval legend as well as of biblical history, and its popularity was very great. The Cursor was edited for the Early English Text Society by Dr Richard Morris in four different versions, with the aid of six other manuscripts, and seems to have been the first English book which was copied and recopied again and again. Writing in Northumbria, probably about 1320, the author prefaces his poem with a prologue of two hundred and seventy lines, in which he notes how eager men were in his day to read 'rimes' and 'gestes,' the romances of Alexander and Julius Cæsar, of Greece and Troy, of Brut who conquered England, of King Arthur, Gawain and Kay, of Tristram and Isoude, and of the wars of Charlemagne and Roland with the Saracens. His own aim is to sing of the Blessed Virgin, and he will therefore 'run over' all the events which led to the Incarnation, 'and tell sum gestes principale.' Lastly, after summarising the contents of his book, he proceeds (ll. 232-248), like other writers of his day, to justify himself for writing in English :

This ilké boke is translate

One of the most interesting sections of the Cursor Mundi, and the one which hitherto has defied all attempts to trace it to its source, is the mythical history of the Cross on which Christ died. The quotation which must serve as our chief specimen of the poem relates to its finding ('invention') by the Empress Helena, and joins on in a curious way to Shakespeare's Merchant of Venice—the Jew who guides the Empress to the place where the three crosses are found being the prototype of Shylock, and giving up his secret to save himself from the punishment pronounced on him for having sought to enforce his bond for a pound of flesh from a Christian:

The Cursor Mundi rises to no great height of poetry, but throughout its enormous length it maintains a steady level which commands admiration, and its popularity, as has already been noted, was very great. Partly no doubt through its influence the cyclical miracle-plays came rapidly into favour during the fourteenth century, more especially in the north of England, where the Cursor was best known. The York cycle as we now have it is made up of no fewer than forty-eight different plays, of which one to six deal with the Creation and Fall; seven to eleven with the Murder of Abel, the Flood, the Sacrifice of Isaac, and the Exodus; twelve to nineteen with the Prophecies of Christ's Advent and the incidents of the Nativity; twenty to twenty-four with some of the chief events of His ministry; twenty-five to thirty-six with the Passion; thirty-seven to forty-four with the Harrowing of Hell, Resurrection, the appearance of Christ to His disciples, the Ascension and Gift of the Holy Spirit; forty-five to forty-seven with the death of the Blessed Virgin, her appearance to St Thomas, Assumption, and Coronation; and the forty-eighth with the Day of Judgment. In other cycles some incidents were added and others omitted, but the general sequence of the plays was much the same, and there can be no doubt that at the outset their intention was wholly didactic and religious, and that they must have contributed not a little to the instruction of the ignorant. Their final development in the fifteenth century will be touched on again; but it is clear from Chaucer's allusions that long before his day the dramatists had sought to relieve the strain on the spectators by the introduction of humorous incidents, the quarrel of Noah and his wife when the time came to go into the ark being already a stock scene, while the ranting of Pilate and Herod was also a well-established convention. We know, moreover, that at York before 1378 the management of the different plays was already divided out between the different crafts, and it is probable that the allusions to the method of representation which have been gleaned from later records apply equally well to these fourteenth-century performances. As early as Lent, we are told, the 'moste connyng discrete and able players' the city could furnish were selected, 'all other insufficient personnes, either in connyng, voice or personne,' being sternly 'discharged, ammoved and avoided.' A first rehearsal would be held in Easter week, a second in Whitsun week, and at both these the players would be refreshed with bread and ale—this and other expenses being defrayed by a levy, varying from a penny to fourpence, on every member of the guild. No player was allowed to take more than two parts, and he would receive for his services, according to his ability and the parts he played, sums varying from fourpence to four shillings, the latter amount being worth about £2, 10s. of modern money. The dresses in which these players were attired were more magnificent than appropriate. We hear of Herod wearing a blue satin gown with a helmet gilded and silvered, of Pilate in a green robe, of Judas in yellow; while the player who took the part of Christ wore a coat of white sheepskin and red sandals. The stages or 'pageants' on which the performances took place are described as high 'scaffolds, with two rooms, a higher and a lower, upon four wheels.' In the lower the players apparelled themselves; in the higher, which was open at the top, they played. On the morning of the performance each pageant would be rolled out of its shed and dragged in its turn to the first of the 'stations' at which the plays were acted. The first performance over, the pageant would be dragged through the streets to the second station, and then the play repeated. At York each play was performed twelve times, and occasionally oftener, the choice of the stopping-places or stations being determined by the liberality of the owners of the adjacent houses. These contributions were much needed, for the cost of the plays fell heavily on the guilds; five or six of them had sometimes to club together to produce a single pageant, while the sharing of the expenses led to frequent disputes. In a few cases the reason for the assignment of a play to a particular guild is obvious; thus the Shipwrights or Fishmongers commonly interested themselves in Noah and the Flood, while the Goldsmiths and Goldbeaters played the Magi. But as a rule the wealth of the guild and the cost of the necessary dresses and stage properties were the chief considerations.

Four cycles of miracle-plays have come down to us, three connected respectively with York, Wakefield, and Chester, and a fourth, probably written in the East-Midlands, but, by a tradition with very little claim to respect, passing under the name of Coventry. The York, Wakefield, and Chester cycles were probably all in existence by the middle of the fourteenth century, though not in the form in which we have them. Partly to suit the convenience of the crafts, partly to please the changing taste of audiences, plays were from time to time added or taken away, or recast in a new form, while the scribes of our manuscripts seem frequently to have depended on imperfect oral tradition. It is possible, however, sometimes to pick out the older work from its surroundings, and we may take the scene between Isaac and his sons (for the sake of comparison with the quotation already given on page 40 from the Genesis) as an example of the Wakefield plays in their earliest form:

Isaac. Com nere, son, and kys me,

The great themes of the miracle-plays, especially Christ's Passion, which is always treated in vivid detail, are handled with medieval familiarity, yet not without feeling. But there are no passages in which the unknown authors rise sufficiently to the dignity of their subject to make detached quotations helpful. Even the play on the sacrifice of Isaac, which more than one of the playwrights invests with real pathos, is a little spoilt by repetition and prolixity. The lighter side of the miracle-plays is more easily illustrated by the stock scene of 'the sorrow of Noah and his fellowship,' as Chaucer calls it, when Noah's wife refused to come into the ark. It is best given in the Chester cycle, from which, therefore, we here quote, though the text, as we have it, represents a version probably somewhat later than our period, and itself belongs to the end of the sixteenth century. As here printed it has been purged of some of the corruptions of the Elizabethan scribe:

Noah. Wif, com in: why standes thou there?
Thou art ever forward, I dar well swere;

Com in, oh Goddes halfe! time it were, for God's sake

Other Religious Literature.

Richard Rolle of Hampole.¹

We shall allude again to the later developments of the miracle-plays in the fifteenth century ; but even these two short quotations will have helped to explain the secret of their rapid popularity, illustrating at once the fidelity with which the dramatists followed the Bible narrative, and the freedom with which at times, when it seemed permissible, they supplied details of a kind to give relief to the strained attention of the spectators. Of religious literature of a more definite kind there was no lack in the first half of the fourteenth century. We must notice some religious poems and a translation of the Psalms and Canticles in prose by William of Shoreham (near Sevenoaks), who in 1320 was appointed vicar of Chart Sutton, near Leeds (Kent), where he had been a monk ; also the Ayenhyte of Inwyrt ('Remorse of Conscience') of Dan (Dominus = the Reverend) Michel of Northgate, a monk of St Augustine's Abbey, Canterbury, who in 1340 translated, under this title, a French treatise (La Somme des Vices et des Vertus) written by Frère Lorens in 1279, and wrote or adapted some sermons, which have also come down to us. More important than these Kentish treatises are the very curious and interesting metrical homilies in the Northumbrian dialect, written about 1330, in octosyllabic couplets, and as full of stories as the Handlyng Synne of Robert of Brunne ; also the numerous works in English and Latin, in prose and verse, of Richard Rolle. This remarkable man was born at Thornton, in Yorkshire, in or about 1290 ; and after being educated at Oxford at the expense of a patron, resolved when eighteen or nineteen to become a hermit. Borrowing two kirtles, a white and a gray, from his sister, he made himself a temporary habit, and began a solitary life. Though half-suspected of insanity, he was allowed to preach in a church, and his sermon deeply moved his hearers. One of them provided him with a hermit's cell and dress and the means of support, and henceforth his life was passed between the raptures of contemplation and devotional writing. For some time before his death, in 1349, he lived at Hampole, near Doncaster, and it is as Richard of Hampole that he is best known. Besides two prose versions, with commentaries, of the Psalms, differing considerably from each other, which have been attributed to him, Hampole translated the Psalter in prose and parts of Job in verse ; the Pricke of Conscience, a rather lifeless poem, in short couplets, dealing with the transitoriness of human things, and with death and judgment, is no longer thought to be his. His devotional writings in prose contain passages of real fervour and beauty ; and though an unquestioning believer in the Church as he found it, he shows that power of piercing through the form to the spirit which brings devout mystics of every religion so close to each other. The following legend of Divine forgiveness transcending all human forms is the complement to its predecessor, in which, though all forms had been punctiliously observed, forgiveness was withheld for lack of 'verray contricioun :

A scolere at Pares had done many full synnys, the whylke he hade schame to schryfe hym of. At the last gret sorowe of herte overcome his schame, and, whene he was redy to schryfe hym till the priore of the Abbay of Saynte Victor, swa mekill contricione was in his herte, syghynge in his breste, sobbinge in his throtte, that he moghte noghte brynge a worde furthe. Thane the prioure said till hym : 'Gaa and wrytte thy synnes.' He did swa and come agayne to the pryoure and gafe hym that he hadde wretyn, for yitt he myghte noghte schryfe hym with mouthe. The prioure saghe the synnys swa grette, that thurghe leve of the scolere he schewede theyme to the abbotte, to hafe conceyle. The abbotte tuke that byll that thay ware wretyn in, and lukede thareone. He fandte na thyng wretyn and said to the priour : 'What may here be redde, thare noghte es wretyne ?' That saghe the pryour and wondyrde gretly and saide : 'Wyte ye, that his synns here warre wretyn and I redde thaym, bot now I see, that God has sene hys contrycyone and forgyfes hym all his synnes.' This the abbot and the prioure tolde the scolere, and he with gret joye thanked God.

We should not fail to notice in this extract the simple and straightforward, but by no means colourless, prose in which it is written. It has all the merits which we can look for in plain narrative, and it would not be easy to find anything at once so rapid and so full of unaffected dignity till we come to Tyndale's version of the Gospels. A second quotation on 'How God comes to His lovers' shows that Hampole could rise quite naturally to real beauty of style:

How god comes to his lofars and how he some-tyme fra thaim partis. God, when he comes to his lufars, he gifs thaim to taste how swete he is: & are thai mai fulli fele he fra thaim wendis, & als an egle he spredis his wengis & above thaim risis, als if he said: 'Som dele mai ye fele how swete I am; bot if ye wil fele this swetenes to the full, flies up after me, & lift youre hertis up to me, thar I am sittand on mi fader right hand, & thare sal ye be fullillid in joie of me. Later Romances.

In secular literature the chief feature of the first half of the fourteenth century, as of the closing years of the thirteenth, is the great vogue of the metrical romance. We have already spoken of Sir Tristrem, Havelok, and Horn as written before 1300; and there are several others which may have been in existence as early as this, though the manuscripts in which they have come down to us are much later. Of those which appear to be earliest the majority are written in couplets; but various forms of twelve-line stanzas soon became popular, and the stanza of six lines was also used, both forms of stanzas appearing (as in the miracle-plays) in combination with couplets. The alliterative romances will be treated by themselves. Of those in rhyme written during the fourteenth century we possess more than a score, varying in length from a few hundred to upwards of ten thousand lines apiece. It is impossible to discuss them all at length; they defy epitome and are not easily represented by extracts, nor is a general criticism likely to be very profitable. It is perhaps unfair to say of them that they are the 'sensational novels' of the fourteenth century, but in their use of stock incidents, their lack of characterisation, and their low standard of style, on their weaker side they do not deserve to rank much higher. The great majority must have been translated from the French, though in many cases the originals are lost or have not been printed; and as the romance in France had long ere this lost its early freshness, these imitations share the weakness of their models. Three of these romances have English heroes, and might be expected, therefore, to be racier than the rest. This is certainly true of that which celebrates the exploits of Richard Cœur de Lion. Richard is depicted as a truculent person, who orders the slaying of sixty thousand Saracens in cold blood, and bursts into a great laugh when he finds that his cook, unable to comply with his demand for pork, has served him with pickled Saracen instead! But the story is told with life and vigour, and the fighting—witness this account of the assault on Jaffa—is very good:

'Az armes!' he cryede, 'make you yare!' 1, 2
To hem that wyth hym comen ware.
'We have,' he sayde, 'lyf but on: only one life
Selle we it, bothe flesch and bon,
For to cleyme our herytage,
Slee we the houndes full of rage!

('Richard Cœur de Lion,' ll. 6727-6764, Weber's Metrical Romances, 1810, vol. ii. p. 264.)

- 1 Aux armes! 2 Ready! 3 First of all (text, At the fyrst).
4 Wassail, I shall drink your healths.

An earlier account (lines 2503-2570) of a sea-fight in which we are told of the sailors,

They rowed hard, and sunge ther-to
With hevelow and rumbeloo, to overtake the enemy, is no less vivid; and though there are some dreary wastes in the seven thousand lines of which it consists, the romance must take high rank. Bevis of Hampton is the story of a child sold by his unnatural mother as a slave to the Saracens. He wins the affections first of his master, King Ermyn, and then of Ermyn's daughter, the fair Josyan. When Josyan becomes a Christian out of love for Bevis, her father turns against the knight, and there are numberless thrilling adventures, Bevis regaining his heritage, boiling the usurper in pitch, brimstone, and lead, and then setting off on new wars until his son, Sir Mili, is crowned King of England, and he himself, his wife Josyan, and his horse Arundel enjoy a happy death on the same day. Guy of Warwick is neither so simply conceived nor so well told, though its popularity in different forms seems to have been greater than that of any of its rivals. Guy loves Felice, the daughter of his lord, Rohand, Earl of Warwick; but the lady is haughty, and though, at the command of an angel, she promises him her love when he shall have proved himself worthy of it, she insists, even after he has shown his bravery, that he shall undertake further adventures; and these lead him far afield. Returning to England, Guy, after incidentally slaying a dragon, claims and obtains Felice's hand. But after forty days of marriage he bethinks him how he had—

Slain many a man with hand,
Burnt and destroyed many a land,
And all was for womanes love,
And not for Goddes sake above.

He journeys to the Holy Land as a palmer, fighting now and then when need arises, and on his return engaging in single combat with the Danish champion, Colbrand. As soon as he has killed this giant he resumes his palmer's dress, visits his castle without declaring himself to Felice, and only sends for her at last that she may receive his dying breath. Probably the fight with Colbrand was the germ of the story, and procured its popularity, which is hardly justified by the merit of the romance as a whole.

With the Richard Cœur de Lion three other romances have been connected on the ground of similarity of style, though there is no strong reason for believing in their common authorship. These are the Merlin and Arthur, King Alisaunder, and the Seven Sages, all written in rhyming couplets. The first-named gives a full and graphic account of the birth and early adventures of Merlin; but the bulk of the story, dealing with the wars of Arthur and the help Merlin lends him, is rather dull. The romance of King Alisaunder opens, like the Merlin, with a full account of its hero's origin, the remainder of the poem, a translation of the French Roman d'Alexandre, being slightly shortened. The Seven Sages is mainly interesting as an English version of tales of immemorial antiquity, those which the wicked Queen tells to persuade her husband of his son's guilt, and the counter-stories by which the friendly sages combat her on his behalf, being all of Eastern origin. Of the other metrical romances, mostly shorter than these, it is impossible to mention more than a few of the best. Among these are two on Arthurian subjects, Yvain and Gawain and Lybeaus Desconus (i.e. 'The Fair Unknown'), Ipomydon, Emaré (the plot of which resembles that of Chaucer's Man of Law's Tale), Amis and Amiloun, and Sir Isumbras. As tales these are superior to the lengthy mock-historical romances, and they are quite as well told. We have still left unnamed the romance of which in some respects ranks with the best of them, but it is such a compound of cleverness and absurdity that we may almost believe that it was written between jest and earnest.

A squyer of lowe degre
That loved the kings daughter of Hungarie,

The alliterative romances, including those which have both alliteration and rhyme, are not nearly so numerous as those which have rhyme only, but both in poetic interest and technical execution their standard is higher. Written in the north and north-west, some of them, on account of their dialect and as corresponding in title to works mentioned by Andrew Wyntoun (see below, page 181) as written by a mysterious 'Huchown of the Awle Reale,' have been claimed as Scottish (page 171); but until this Huchowne has been identified it is hardly safe to dogmatise as to whether they were composed north or south of the Tweed. The Pistyl of sweet Susane, a wonderfully well-told version of the story of Susanna and the Elders, is one of these, and in the height of tragic pathos to which it rises when Joachim comes to bid farewell to his condemned wife, strikes a note rare at all times in British poetry, and not previously met with. Another poem attributed to Huchowne is an alliterative Morte d'Arthur, of some four thousand lines, which has been identified with 'the great geste of Arthure' mentioned by Wyntoun. The romance of Joseph of Arimathea and the long tale of the Destruction of Troy can only be mentioned here; but the story of William of Palerne (Palermo) and Sir Gawane and the Grene Knight demand longer notice, because in both of them, in addition to the charm of wonderful adventures, there is real characterisation. William of Palermo (the romance is freely translated from a French original still extant) had the advantage of being brought up by a werewolf—that is, a prince whom enchantment had caused to assume a wolf's form. From the care of the werewolf William passed to that of a peasant, and from the peasant to that of the Emperor of Rome, whose daughter Melior gradually fell in love with him. Melior confides her love to her cousin Alexandrine, who, by the aid of a little white magic, brings William's wishes into harmony with Melior's, and all promises well till Melior's hand is claimed for the son of the Emperor of Greece. The lovers disguise themselves as two white bears (a strange device to escape observation in Italy), and, aided by the werewolf, make their escape, the romance ending happily after adventures as wonderful as any reasonable reader could desire. The plot is perhaps a little too romantic, but the telling of it is excellent; and the girlish charm of Melior and Alexandrine and the naïveté of William are very pleasing. Here, from Professor Skeat's edition (The Romance of William of Palerne; E.E.T.S., 1867, ll. 967–1001), is the passage in which the pretty magician Alexandrine, having bewitched William into loving Melior, gravely takes him under her protection and persuades the amorous Melior to have pity on him:

Alysaundrine a-non thanne answered and sayde
 'Now i-wisse, William, witou for sothe,
 Seththe thou sadli hast me said the sothe of thi cunsaile,
 And teltest me treuly thou trestes to my help,
 Gif I might in ani maner mende thi sorwe,
 But I were busi ther a-boute to blame I were.
 Ther-for certes, be thou sur, seth it may be no other,
 Holliche al min help thou schalt have sone.'
 Than William was gretliche glad & loveliche hire thonked.

Than Alisaundrine a-non as sche wel couthe,
 Clepud that mayde Meliors mekeliche hir tille,
 And seide, 'A mercy, madame, on this man here,
 That negh is drive to the deth al for youre sake !'
 'How so for my sake?' seide Melior thanne ;
 'I wrathed him never that I wot, in word ne in dede.'
 'No, serres, madame, that is soth,' saide that other.
 'Ac he has langured for your love a ful long while ;
 And but ye graunt him your grace him greithli to help,
 And late him be your lemman, lelly for ever,
 His liif nel nought, for langour, last til to-morwe.
 Therfor, comeliche creature, for Crist that the made,
 Les nought is liif yut for a litel wille.
 Seththe he so lelly the loves, to lemman him thou take.'

Than Meliors full mekliche to that mayde carped,
 And seide ful soburli, smylant a litel,
 'Nou, bi God that me gaf the gost and the soule,
 I kepe yut for no creature manquellere be clepud,
 Ac lever me were lelly a manes liif to save,
 Seththe he for me is so marred & has misfare long,
 Ful prestely for thi praire & for the perile als
 That I se him set inne and to save his live,
 Here I graunt him greithli on Godis holi name,

Lelliche mi love for ever, al mi lif time,
 And gif a gift here to God and to his gode moder,
 That other lud, while I live, schal I love never.'

I-wisse, certainly; witou, know thou; Seththe, since; sadli, earnestly; Holliche, wholly; Clepud, called; serres, certainly; greithli, quickly; lemman, love; lelly, lelliche, loyally; Les, lose; yut, yet; carped, spoke; mylanit, smiling; manquellere, man-killer; ac, but; prestely, readily; lud, man.

Unlike William of Palerne, the romance of Sir Gawane and the Grene Knight is, as far as we know, an original and not a translated work; and though it begins with the fantastic episode of the Green Knight allowing his head to be cut off, picking it up, and continuing to talk, it possesses a serious psychological interest which, with its metrical and poetical excellence, gives it a unique place among English romances. It is Gawain the courteous who strikes off the Green Knight's head at Arthur's court in pursuance of a challenge to an exchange of blows. When his uncanny challenger has disappeared with his head in his hand, Gawain knows that he must abide his blow a year hence at an unknown Green Chapel, and early in November he starts on his quest, only anxious lest he may fail to find the Green Chapel by New Year's Day, and so appear forsworn. At last, on Christmas Eve, he reaches a castle whose lord not only entertains him hospitably, but promises to lead him to the Green Chapel, which is hard by, on the appointed day. Meanwhile Gawain must stay at the castle to rest himself, and his host bargains that he will on three successive days give Gawain the proceeds of his hunting if Gawain will give him whatever he receives during his absence. Gawain lies late in bed, and when her lord and his men are afield the lady of the castle comes to his bedside and shows her love to him. On her challenge Gawain craves a kiss at parting, and when his host returns and spreads before him the game he has caught, he clasps his hands round the lord's neck and kisses him courteously, thus keeping his bond. The next morning the same thing happens:

He commes to the cortyn and at the knyght totes,
 And Wawen her welcumed worthy on fyrst,
 And ho hym yeldes agayn, ful yerne of hir wordes,
 Settes hir softly by his syde, and swythely ho laghes
 And wyth a luflych loke ho sayde hym these wordes :
 'Syr, gif ye be Wawen, wonder me thynkkes,
 Wyghe that is so wel wrast alway to god,
 And connes not of companye the costes under-take,
 And if mon kennes yow hom to knowe, ye kest hom of your mynde ;

Thou hats for-yeten yederly that yisterday I taghte
 Bi alder-truest token of talk that I cowthe.'
 'What is that,' quoth the wyghe, 'i-wysse I wot never,
 If hit be sothe that ye breve, the blame is myn awen.'
 'Yet I kende yow of kyssyng,' quoth the clere thenne,
 'Quere-so countenance is couthe, quikly to clayme,
 That bicumes uche a knyght, that cortaysy uses.'
 'Do way,' quoth that derf mon, 'my dere, that speche,
 For that durst I not do, lest I denyed were,
 If I were werned, I were wrang i-wysse, gif I profered.'

'Ma fay,' quoth the mere wyf, 'ye may not be werned, Ye are stif in-noghe to constrayne wyth strenkthe, gif
yow lykes,

Gif any were so vilanous that yow denaye wolde.'

'Ye, be God,' quoth Gawayn, 'good is your speche, Bot threte is unthryvande in thede ther I lende,
And uche gift that is geven not with goud wylle ;
I am at your comaundement, to kysse quen yow lykes,
Ye may lach quen yow lyst, and leve quen yow thynkkes,
In space.'

The lady loutes a-down,
And comly kysses his face,
Much speche thay ther expoun,
Of druryes greme and grace.

(Sir Gawayne and the Green Knight; ed. R. Morris, E.E.T.S., 1864, ll. 1476-1507.)

She came to the bedside and looked on the knight, and Gawain gave her fit greeting, and she greeted him again with ready words and sat her by his side and laughed, and with a sweet look she spoke to him: 'Sir, if ye be Gawain, I think it a wonder that ye be so stern and cold, and care not for the courtesies of friendship; but if one teach ye to know them ye cast the lesson out of your mind. Ye have soon forgotten what I taught ye yesterday, by all the truest tokens that I knew!' 'What is that?' quoth the knight. 'I trow I know not. If it be sooth that ye say, then is the blame mine own.' 'But I taught ye of kissing,' quoth the fair lady. 'Wherever a fair countenance is shown him, it behoves a courteous knight quickly to claim a kiss.' 'Nay, my dear,' said Sir Gawain, 'cease that speech; that durst I not do, lest I were denied, for if I were forbidden I wot I were wrong did I further entreat.' 'I' faith,' quoth the lady merrily, 'ye may not be forbid; ye are strong enough to constrain by strength an ye will, were any so discourteous as to give ye denial.' 'Yea, by Heaven,' said Gawain, 'ye speak well; but threats profit little in the land where I dwell, and so with a gift that is given not of good-will. I am at your commandment to kiss when ye like, to take or to leave as ye list.' Then the lady bent her down and kissed him courteously.

(Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, retold in modern prose, by Jessie L. Weston, 1898.)

The kiss is again passed on to her lord in return for the produce of his hunting. On the third morning the lady, when Gawain has refused her proffered gift of a ring, presses him to accept her green girdle:

'Now forsake ye this silke,' sayde the burde thenne,
'For hit is symple in hit-self, and so hit wel semes ?
Lo ! so hit is littel, and lasse hit is worthy ;
But who-so knew the costes that knit ar ther-inne,
He wolde hit prayse at more prys, paraventure ;
For quat gome is so gorde with this grene lace,
While he hit hade hemely halched aboute,
Ther is no hathel under heven to-hewe hym that myght ;
For he myght not be slayn, for slyght upon erthe.'
Then kest the knyght, and hit come to his hert,
Hit were a juel for the joparde, that hym jugged were,
When he acheved to the chapel, his chek for to fech ;
Myght he haf slypped to be unslynn, the sleght were noble.

Thenne he thulged with hir threpe, and tholed hir to speke,

And ho bere on hym the belt, and bede hit hym swythe,

And he granted, and ho hym gafe with a goud wylle,
And bisoght hym, for hir sake, discever hit never,
Bot to lelly layne for hir lorde ; the leude hym acordes,
That never wyghe schulde hit wyt, i-wysse, bot thay twayne,

For noghte ;

He thonkked hir oft ful swythe,

Ful thro with hert and thought

Bi that on thrynn sythe

Ho hats kyst the knyght so toght.

(Lines 1845-1869.)

'Now,' said the lady, 'ye refuse this silk, for it is simple in itself, and so it seems, indeed; lo, it is small to look upon and less in cost, but whoso knew the virtue that is knit therein he would, peradventure, value it more highly. For whatever knight is girded with this green lace, while he bears it knotted about him there is no man under heaven can overcome him, for he may not be slain for any magic on earth.' Then Gawain bethought him, and it came into his heart that this were a jewel for the jeopardy that awaited him when he came to the Green Chapel to seek the return blow—could he so order it that he should escape unslain, 'twere a craft worth trying. Then he bare with her chiding, and let her say her say, and she pressed the girdle on him and prayed him to take it, and he granted her prayer, and she gave it him with good-will, and besought him for her sake never to reveal it, but to hide it loyally from her lord; and the knight agreed that never should any man know it, save they two alone. He thanked her often and heartily, and she kissed him for the third time.

(Miss Weston's retelling.)

At night Gawain gives up the kiss to his host, but conceals the girdle. On New Year's Day a squire, who tries to frighten him, leads him to the Green Chapel. There the Green Knight makes two feints at him, and then strikes a blow which grazes his neck and no more. Gawain seizes his sword and declares the compact fulfilled. The Green Knight reveals himself as his Christmas host, and says that because he took the girdle he has been grazed, otherwise his constancy had held him scatheless. Gawain is abashed, and vows to wear the green girdle ever to remind him of his fall; but when he tells the story at Arthur's court all his brother-knights vow to wear a green girdle also! The Lancashire dialect and the needs of the alliteration make the language present more difficulties than most of the poetry of the date (about 1360). But it is always picturesque and full of variety, and the hunting scenes, the Christmas festivities, the temptation of Gawain by the fair lady, stand out as the work of a literary artist of some skill.

[Gollancz edited the romance (for the E.E.T.S.) in 1912, Tolkien and Gordon in 1925. See also a Study by Kittredge (1916).]

Alliterative Poems.

The same manuscript which contains this romance contains three other poems written in the same dialect and style, probably about the same time, and, so it is thought, by the same unknown author. Two of these, written in alliterative blank verse, are didactic exaltations of Cleanness (see page 174) and Patience. The former, which is much the longer, running to 1812 lines, to show the perils of impurity narrates at length the fate of the man without a wedding garment, the Fall of the Angels, the punishment of the world by the Flood, the destruction of Sodom, and the story of Nebuchadnezzar and Belshazzar, and exhorts the listener who would loyally love his Lord :

Then conform thee to Christ and thee clean make,
For ever is [He] polished as plain as the pearl itself.

The latter, which has 531 lines, enforces the duty of patience by the story, not of Job, but of Jonah. Both poems rise far above the mere stringing together of stories and denunciations which made the usual medieval exhortation. Cleanness especially is full of poetry and of passion, and yet preserves a sanity and proportion which on this subject are peculiarly rare in medieval literature. The third poem, Pearl, midway in length between the other two (it has 1211 lines), tells of the poet's dream in which the Pearl he has lost, his little two-year-old daughter, appears to him, standing on the other side of a river, in heavenly array. She is now, she tells him, a queen in heaven; and when the father cannot understand how so little a child can have so rich a reward, the parable of the Labourers in the Vineyard is told to enlighten him. Much of the poem is taken up with the glories of an apocalyptic vision; and at last, when the father tries to cross the stream to join his little maid, the dream ends and he wakes. The combination of elaborate alliteration and elaborate rhyme at times gives the poem a slight artificiality, but its human tenderness and love, and its sympathy with the joys of heaven, are so overflowing that they carry us over all obstacles. Here are three stanzas (21-23) from the talk of father and daughter in which the music must be evident even to those who are repelled by the number of now obsolete words :

'O Perle,' quoth I, 'in perles pyght,	set in, decked with
Art thou my perle that I haf playned,

¹ Since thou glided away from me into the grass. ² Hast lighted upon a life of delight. ³ Weird, fate. ⁴ Caused to come. ⁵ Since we were drawn apart and sundered. ⁶ Thou seemest set in a foolish intent, and concernest thyself with little reason. ⁷ As nature caused it. ⁸ Chest that did enclose it. ⁹ It is proved to be a pearl of price. ¹⁰ That hath bereft thee of no whit.

Rather slender arguments have been adduced for assigning the authorship of Pearl, with Cleanness and Patience, to Radulph Strode ('the philosophical Strode' Chaucer called him), of Merton College, Oxford, of whom there is a record: 'Nobilis poeta fuit et versificavit librum elegiacum vocatum Phantasma Radulphi.' It would be pleasant if we could find a name for one who, on the evidence only of these three poems, was a considerable poet, and who if Sir Gawayn and the Grene Knyght may be added to them, was a very considerable poet indeed

[There are editions of Pearl by Gollancz in 1891 (from which our text and some glosses were taken), 1918, 1921, 1923 (MS. facsimile, with the other three poems); of Patience by Gollancz (1913), Bateson (1912); of Cleanness by Gollancz (1922) and Menner (under the title Purity, 1920).]

Minot.

The advantage of a name and, we may add, of popular subjects is shown in the case of Laurence Minot, who may be mentioned here. His poems (edited by D. C. Stedman in 1917) on the wars of Edward III. have but small literary merit, and his patriotism, which is supposed to eke this out, is rather loyalty to the king's person than true national feeling. But his possession of a name—and it is only his name we know—and the names of the battles he sings have served to keep alive his verse, of which these stanzas on the taking of Calais are at least a fair specimen :

Lystens now, and ye may lere,	learn
Als men the suth may understand,	As—truth
The knights that in Calais were
Come to Sir Edward sare wepeand,	sorely weeping
In kirtell one and swerd in hand,
And cried, 'Sir Edward, thine we are ;
Do now, lord, bi law of land
Thi will with us for evermare.'

The comun puple war ful prest	forward
Rapes to bring about thaire swire :	Ropes—neck
Thai said all, 'Sir Philip oure syre,

And his sun, Sir John of France,
Has left us ligand in the mire
And brought us till this doleful dance.' lying

'Oure horses that war faire and fat
Er etin up ilkone bidene; All are eaten already Have we nowther conig ne cat coney, rabbit
That thai ne er etin and hundes kene.

William Langland.

Returning to the sequence interrupted by Minot, we pass to another alliterative poem or series of poems, originating in the west of England. These may be by several different hands; but on the theory unshaken till 1908, it was William Langland (or Longlond), who in 1362, or a little after, completed the first draft of the poem to which the manuscripts give the titles Liber de Petro Plowman and Visio Willelmi de Petro Plouhman, the 'Book of Piers Ploughman,' or 'William's Vision of Piers Ploughman.' Our knowledge of Langland himself is derived from doubtful traditions and from the information which can be gleaned from various passages in his poem, on the assumption that they are really autobiographical. Of the traditions, one—that preserved in Bishop Bale's Scriptorum illustrium Majoris Britannie Summarium (1548)—tells us that the poet's name was Robert Langelande; that he was born at Cleobury Mortimer, in Shropshire, near the Malvern Hills (not improbably a mistake for Ledbury).

Another tradition, a note in a fifteenth-century hand in a Dublin manuscript of the Vision, calls him William de Langlond, and makes him the son of a freeholder, Stacy de Rokayle, of gentle birth, holding lands at Shipton-under-Wychwood, in Oxfordshire, where research has found traces, not indeed of Langlands, but of both a family and a hamlet of Langley. The evidence of the poem itself is strongly against the poet's being of gentle birth, and Bale's tradition is the better to follow, though we may safely discard the name Robert in favour of that of William (although some passages in the poem might make us think that the poet only calls himself Will because he represents the human will in its search for truth), and Cleobury might be a mistake for Ledbury. From the Visions themselves it is easy to obtain much more information, subject to the risk attending any attempt to extract autobiography

¹ In all three of the versions the poem must have attained a wide circulation. In 1886 Professor Skeat was able to enumerate no fewer than forty-five extant manuscripts, of which ten contain the A text, thirteen the B, fifteen the C, the other seven showing a mixture of A and C, or B and C. Our illustration is taken from Cotton MS. Vespasian B. xvi. of the C text, attributed to the end of the fourteenth century, and therefore copied within a few years of the writing of this version. The lines shown are 118-137 of Passus xv., and a transcript is appended:

¶ And 3e faren þus wiþ þoure seke freres . wonder me þynkeþ .
But dowel endite þow in die iudicii .

from poetry. As will be explained later, the Visions exist in three clearly defined versions (referred to as A, B, and C), the earliest of which can be shown to have been written in or soon after 1362; the second, in or soon after 1377; and the third, perhaps in 1393, perhaps in 1398. In the second of these the dreamer is spoken of (Book xii. 3) as forty-five years old, which would give his birth-year as 1332, a date in itself very probable. A theory that he was the son of a bondman, and only became free by taking holy orders, rests on a doubtful interpretation of a line which may more easily refer to the freedom of God's kingdom conferred by baptism. But there is a clear statement, in a section of the poem added in the last revision and apparently purely biographical, that his father needed the help of friends to send him to school. The death of these friends seems to have cut short his career, and he describes himself as living in London, and on London, earning money by singing requiems for hire. 'Reason,' one of the characters in the poem, has been asking him what he does for a living, and he answers:

¶ I haue iseid seide þe doctor . i can seie no bettere

'Whanne ich yong was,' quath ich, 'meny yer hennes,
My fader & my frendes founden me to scole,
Tyl ich wiste wyterliche what holy writ menede,
And what is best for the body, as the bok telleth,
And sykerest for the soule, by so ich wol continue,
And yut fond ich nevere in faith sytthen my frendes

Ys pater-noster and my prymer, placebo and dirige,
And my sauter som-tyme, and my sevene psalmes.
Thus ich synge for hure soules, of suche as me helpen,
And tho that fynden me my fode vouchen-saf, ich trowe,

(The Vision of William concerning Piers the Plowman;
ed. W. W. Skeat, 1886; C text vi. 35-52.)

Wyterliche, certainly; sykerest, surest; lyfode, livelihood; lomes, tools; sauter, psalter; bote my wombe one, save my belly alone.

Born of a father too poor to educate him without the help of friends, the help of these friends cut off by death probably before his education was finished, Langland seems to have taken minor orders, and to have gained his living as a chanter of psalms for the souls of the dead, without ever rising to the priesthood. In the same section of the poem from which this extract is taken—a section inserted in Langland's old age as if for the purpose of telling his story—we find references to his living on Cornhill, 'Kytte and ich in a cote,' Kit being his wife. Elsewhere there is mention of a daughter, Kalote; and allusions to the wording of legal documents make it probable that he eked out his earnings as a chanter by copying for the lawyers. He must have been poor, and he has given us a picture of himself walking the London streets, eyeing the rich folk discontentedly, and refusing to make way for or salute them, until people looked on him as a fool. It is thought that in his old age he may have returned to Malvern, and if he was the author of the poem on 'Richard the Redeless,' he was certainly at Bristol when Henry IV. entered England to claim the throne. But wherever he went he must have taken the same restless spirit, and in the scantiness of our knowledge it is as living 'in London and on London both' that it is easiest for us to think of him.

When he was thirty or thereabouts Langland wrote his Vision concerning Piers Plowman. His was not the temper which could lead him to add yet another to the romances of chivalry, or to make a popular sermon in verse by stringing together stories and anecdotes. Preach he must, but not in this way, and so for the machinery of his poem he chose a Dream or Vision, a device which since the success of the Roman de la Rose had been increasingly popular in France, and was now, as in Pearl and several of the poems of Chaucer, to find favour in England also. Into a dream, with the help of the personifications of allegory, he could put whatever he wished; his form also gave him the right to shift his scenes as he chose, and so in a medley of satire, exhortation, and disquisition he pours out all his thoughts on human life. According to convention the dream was dreamed on a May morning:

In a somer sesun, whan softe was the sonne,
I shope me into a shroud, a sheep as I were; 1
In habite of an hermite, unholy of werkes, 2
Wende I wyde in this world, wondres to here.
But in a Mayes morwynge, on Malverne hilles,
Me bifel a ferly, a feyrie me thouhte; 3
I was wery of wandringe and wente me to reste
Under a brod banke, bi a bourne syde,
And as I lay and lened, and loked on the waters,
I slumberde on a slepyng; it sownede so murie.

(A. Prologue, 1-10.)

1 I put myself into a rough garment as if I were a shepherd.
2 That is, a hermit who did not stay in his cell. 3 There befell me a wonder, of fairyland, it seemed.

[In this and subsequent quotations from the text of the first version (A) the spelling is normalised to that of the better-spelt B text.]

So Langland began, with music enough to have charmed a fashionable audience, but there was little else in his 'swevene,' or dream, for which fashionable people can have cared. What he saw was a wilderness with a tower on a hill, and beneath the hill a deep dale with a dungeon. Betwixt hill and dale lay a fair field, full of folk—honest workers and honest devotees, merchants and minstrels, and rogues of every sort, especially the pilgrims, palmers, hermits, friars, pardoners, unworthy priests and worldly bishops, who professed religion merely to live an easy life at the expense of others.

As the dreamer gazes a lovely lady appears (Passus i.), who tells him that the tower is the abode of Truth—that Truth who made all things, and gave man clothing, meat, and drink, to use in due measure. The dungeon in the dale is the Castle of Care, wherein dwells the tempter of mankind. She herself is Holy Church, who received him at baptism and taught him his faith. Her message to him is that, 'when all treasure is tried, Truth is the best.' When he asks what Truth is, she answers :

'It is a kynde knowynge that kenneth the in herte, teaches
For to love thi lorde lever than thi-selve ;
No dedly synne to do, dey though thou sholdest.
This I trowe be treuthe ! who can teche the better,
Loke thou suffre him to seye, and sithen teche it forther ;
For thus techeth us his word, (worche thou ther-after !)
'That love is the levest thing that our lord asketh.'

(A. Passus i. 130-136.)

Truth, then, is Love :

For though ye be trewe of tonge and trewliche wyne,
And eke as chaste as a child that in chirche wepeth,
But ye liven trewely, and eke love the pore,
And such good as God sent treweliche parten, share
Ye ne have no more merit, in masse ne in houres,
Than Malkyn of hire maydenhod that no man desireth.
(Ibid. 153-158.)

That he may know Truth's opposite, Holy Church points out to him (Passus ii.) the company of Falsehood, where stands

A womman wonderliche clothed,
Purfled with pelure, the richest upon erthe, Embroidered—fur
Y-crounede with a corone—the kyng hath no better ;
Alle hir fyve fyngres were fretted with rynges, ornamented
Of the precioussest perre that prince wored evere ; jewellery
In red scarlet she rod, i-rybaunt with gold ;
Ther n'is no qweene qweynter that quik is alyve. daintier
(A. Passus ii. 8-14.)

This is Meed the maiden, who is to be married to-morrow to False ; and when the dreamer looks again he sees a pavilion and ten thousand tents, where the lawyers and flattering friars, who are to be witnesses of the marriage, are assembled. The dowry, 'the earldom of Envy,' 'the kingdom of Covetise,' the 'isle of Usury,' &c., is rehearsed ; but Theology appears and exclaims against the marriage, bidding that Meed should be led to London, 'where law is handled,' for the King's decision as to whether it shall proceed. Meed is set on a sheriff's back, her friends mount the summoners, provisors, &c., who work their favourite sins, and ride after her to the King's court. Warned by Conscience, the King would hang the whole crew :

Thanne Fals for fere fleih to the freeres,
And Gyle doth him to go agast for to dye ;
But marchaundes metten with him and maden him to abide,
Bisoughten him in here shoppes to sellen here ware,
Apparayleden him as a prentis, the peple for to serve.
Lightliche Lye lepe away thennes,
Lurkede thorw lanes, to-logged of manye ;
He was no-wher welcome for his many tales,
But over-al y-hunted and hote to trusse.
Pardoners hadden pite, and putten him to house,

Wosschen him and wrongen him and wounden him in cloutes,
And sente him on Sondayes with seales to churches,
And gaf pardoun for pens, poundmele aboute.

(A. Passus ii. 186-198.)

Fleih, flew ; doth, causes ; here, their ; thorw, among ; to-logged, lugged about ; hote to trusse, bidden to pack away ; pens, pence ;
poundmele, by pounds, plentifully.

Deserted by her friends, Meed trembles for fear, weeps, and wrings her hands ; but (Passus iii.) the King will assay her himself, and with all courtesy she is lodged at Westminster. She rewards her hosts bounteously, and when a friar shrives her of her sins and promises her heaven if she will glaze the gable of his convent and inscribe her name on the window, she assents gladly ; whereat the author allows himself a digression against such vain-glorious benefactions. The King offers to marry her to his knight, Conscience. Meed assents ; Conscience, however, receives the proposal with denunciations. 'But Reason rede me ther-to erst will I die' is his answer (Passus iv.) ; so Reason is sent for, and comes riding on 'Suffer-till-I-see-my-time' (a mild instance of Langland's anticipation of Puritan names), attended by Witty and Wisdom. He is given a place between the King and his son (i.e. the Black Prince), and while they are conversing Peace enters with a long complaint against Wrong. The King sentences Wrong to seven years in irons ; but Meed buys over Peace with a purse of gold, so that he beseeches the King that Wrong may be forgiven. Reason is appealed to, and will hear of no ruth while Meed hath the mastery, for a king's motto should be that no evil go unpunished and no good unrewarded. His answer is acclaimed, and the King says he will have him as a counsellor for ever. King and knights then go to church (Passus v.), and before the dreamer's eyes the scene changes again to the 'field full of folk,' and Conscience (in later versions Reason) preaches to them on their sins, with the peroration :

And ye, that secheth seynt James and seintes at Rome,
Secheth seint Treuthe ; for he may saven yow alle.

Repentance appears, and personifications of the Deadly Sins confess themselves, the shrift of Envy, Covetise, and Gluttony being described most fully. The last is the most dramatically told :

Now ginneth the Gloton for to go to schrifte,
And carieth him to chircheward his schrift for to telle.
Thenne Betun the brewstere bad him good morwe,
And sithen she asked of him whider that he wolde ?
'To holi chirche,' quod he, 'for to here masse,
And sithen I wil be shryven and synne no more.'
'I have good ale, gossib,' quod she. 'Gloton, wilt thou assaye ?'
'What havest thou ?' quod he. 'Any hote spices ?'
'I have peper and piones and a pound of garlik,
A ferthing-worth of fenel-seed for fasting-dayes.'

(A. Passus v. 146-156.)

Schрифte, confession ; brewstere, brewer-woman ; peper, pepper ;
piones, peony-seed.

After this follows a curious description of a game of barter at the tavern, and at last Glotton staggers away so foully drunk—

That with al the wo of this world his wyf and his wenche
Bere him home to his bedde and broughte him therinne,
And after al this surfet an accesse he had,
That he slepte Saturday and Sunday til sonne wente to reste.

Thenne he wakede of his wynk and wypede his eyghen;
The fyrste word that he spak was 'wher is the cuppe?'
His wif warnede him tho of wikkednesse and of sinne.
Thenne was he ashamed, that shrewe, and scraped his eren,
And gon to grede grimliche and gret deal to make
For his wikkede lyf that he i-lived hadde.

(Ibid. 208-217.)

Accesse, attack; wynk, nap; tho, then; gon, began; grade, cry out; deol, dole, lamentation.

At last comes Robert the robber:

Robert the robbere on Reddite he lokede,
And for ther nas not wher-with he wepte ful sore.
But yet the synful shrewe seide to himselven:
'Crist, that upon Calvarye on the crosse deydest,
Tho Dismas my brother bisoughte the of grace,
And haddest mercy of that man for memento sake,
Thi wille worth upon me, as I have wel deserved
To have helle for evere, if that hope ne were.
So rewe on me, Robert, that no rede have,
Ne nevere weene to wyne, for craft that I knowe.
But for thi muchel merci mitigacion I besече;
Dampne me not on domes-day for I did so ille.'

(Ibid. 242-253.)

Nas, was not; wher-with, i.e. to make reddite or restitution; shrewe, rogue; Tho, when; Dismas, the name given in legend to the Penitent Thief; memento, remember; worth, be done.

And the Passus, which in all its three forms is one of the best of the book, ends with a general repentance:

A thousent of men tho throngen to-geders,
Wepying and weylyng for here wikkede dedes,
Crying upward to Crist and to his clene moder
To have grace to seche saint Treuthe—God leve they so moote.

The folk set out (Passus vi.) to seek Saint Truth, but they know not the way; nor can a palmer, whom they ask, help them on their quest. The Ploughman, from whom the book is named, now makes his appearance:

'Peter!' quod a plowman and put forth his hed,
'I knowe hym as kyndely as clerk doth his bokes; naturally
Clene conscience and wit kende me to his place, taught
And didn enseure me sitthen to serve him for evere.

He is the pretest payer that pore men habbeth; 1, 2
He with-halt non hyne his hyre that he ne hath it at even. 3

He is as low as a lomb, lovelich of speche,
And if ye wollet h i-wite wher that he dwelleth, know
I wol wissen yow the wey hom to his place.' show

(A. Passus vi. 28-31, 40-45.)

1 Readiest. 2 Have. 3 He withholds not his hire from any servant so that he does not have it by evening.

He will take no hire, but the way, as he explains 'it, is intricate, passing the croft called 'Coveytenoght-mennes-catel-ne-her-wyves-Ne-none-of-her-servauntes-that-noyen-hem-myghte,' and other like-named landmarks. The pilgrims are daunted (Passus vii.), and Piers offers, if they will first help him to plough his half-acre, to go with them. Some work well, others sham sickness, others threaten Piers, but with the aid of Hunger he makes them work. But now (Passus viii.), as they are about to set out—

Treuthe herde telle her-of and to Pers sent,
To taken his teeme and tilyen the erthe,
And purchasede him a pardon a pena et a culpa
For him and for his heires ever-more after.
And bad holden hem at hom and heren heore leyes, 1
And al that evere hulpen him to heren or to sowen,
Or eny maner mester that myghte Pers helpen,
Part in that pardon the pope hath i-granted.

(A. Passus viii. 1-8.)

1 Plough their fields.

There is some rejoicing, but (Ibid. 90-100)—

'Pers,' quod a prest tho, 'thi pardon most I reden,
For I wil construe eche clause and knowen it in Englisch.'

And Pers at his preyere the pardon unfoldeth,
And I bihynden hem bothe bihelde al the bulle.
Al in two lynes it lay and not a lettre more,
And was i-written ryght thus in wintesse of treuthe;
Et qui bona egerunt, ibunt in vitam eternam;
Qui vero mala in ignem eternum.

'Peter,' quod the prest tho, 'I con no pardon fynde,
But Do wel and have wel, and God shal have thi soule,
And do yvel and have yvel, hope thou non other,
That after thi deth-day to helle shaltou wende!'
And Pers, for pure tene, pulled it asunder, and resolves to give up the active life and turn him to prayer and penance and weeping. The wrangling of Piers and the priest awakes the dreamer, with his head still full of Piers and his fate. But thus, as the manuscript says, ends the Vision of William concerning Piers Plowman; and 'the Life of Do-wel, Do-bet, and Do-best, according to Wit and Reason,' which follows upon it, is obviously an after-thought.

It will be seen from our summary that the poem, in this, its earliest, form, has a certain continuity—the continuity, that is, of a real dream. Characters are introduced, and we know not what becomes of them; but the plot, if it can be called one, moves forward, till Langland is face to face with the great problem of religion. Here he fails. His Pardon, as the priest is made to say, is no pardon. That they who have done good shall receive life everlasting, and they that have done evil be damned, taken by itself leaves mankind hopeless; and when Langland, starting from this position, set himself to write the so-called 'lives' of Do-well, Do-bet, and Do-best, despite the thirty years he gave to them, he effected far less than in the comparatively short poem which formed his first draft. In his first continuation 'Thought' suggests to him that

Do-well is a humble labourer, Do-bet one who adds to his meekness and honesty an active charity, Do-best a kind of bishop, the three selecting a king who rules them all by their assent. Then he imagines a castle of Anima, in which Do-well is a knight, Do-bet the soul's 'damoisele,' Do-best again a kind of bishop. But he feels that he is getting into deep waters, and after seeking counsel of 'Study,' 'Theology,' and 'Scripture,' represents himself as meeting once more with 'Hunger,' and with 'Fever,' the messenger of Death, and then hastening to finish his poem :

And whan this werk was wrought, ere Wille myghte aspie,
Deth delt him a dent and drof him to the erthe,
And is closed under clom. Crist have his soule ! clay

But he could not leave his poem alone. About 1377 (probably after some intermediate tinkering) he rewrote it from the beginning, suppressing the conclusion, altering almost every line, and inserting new passages (notably the famous apologue of the 'Mice who would bell the Cat'), suited to the reign in which he was now writing, or embodying new ideas. In this second form there are ten new books, or passus, concerning Do-well, Do-bet, and Do-best, but except here and there, as in the picture of Haukyn the Active Man, the characters introduced have little to do with contemporary manners : they are abstractions who talk. Amid a wilderness of discussion Langland comes near at one point to a solution which would have given religious and poetical completeness to his poem. Piers Plowman, from the type of the true-hearted worker, becomes almost identical with Christ Himself. Clad in the armour of Piers, Christ 'jousts' in Jerusalem against the Devil and harrows Hell. But the poet still wanted to work out in detail a gospel of action, and his ending is confused and inconclusive. In his old age, about 1393, possibly as late as 1398, he put forth a third version of his poem, following the lines of the second, but with countless alterations, seldom for the better, and many added passages (including five new passus), of which only those which touch on his own life possess much freshness. All these labours, which occupied so many years, added nothing to the poem as a work of art, and the immense additions repel rather than attract modern readers. On the other hand, they enabled Langland to pour into his poem everything he had to say, and amid much that is merely dull there are fine passages and felicities of thought and phrase which increase our respect for him as a poet. Witness such a line as—

'To se moche and suffre more, certes,' quod I, 'is Do-wel ;'
(B. xi. 402)

or these in a passage on the duty of godfathers—

For more bilongeth to the litel barne, er he the lawe knowe,

Than nempnyng of a name, and he nevere the wiser !
(B. ix. 77-78)

Yet on the old hypothesis his attempts to improve his poem were only very slightly successful ; in his successive alterations he omitted some of his finest lines, spoilt others, and inserted many passages of extraordinary dullness.

[In 1908 Professor J. M. Manly of Chicago University, writing on Piers the Plowman in vol. ii. of the Cambridge History of English Literature, made a new departure. Rejecting the theory of successive revisions by the same author, he assumes for the three texts five several authors, distinguishing two for the A text (one for Prologue and Passus i.-viii., and a continuator for Passus ix.-xii.), besides the John But, to whom some few lines at the end have been ascribed. The B text and the C text are also by different hands—the C text may date from the very last year of the fourteenth century. As the five authors differ widely in temperament, social outlook, theological and other interests, poetical accomplishment, and metrical skill, Professor Manly refuses to extract biographical materials from autobiographical suggestions in any or all of the sections, and William Langland becomes a discredited hypothetical assumption—a sort of composite photograph, not a personality. A Bibliography will be found on p. 162.]

Chaucer.

Chaucer, to whom we must now turn, used to be called the 'Father of English Poetry,' and although such epithets are rightly going out of fashion, if we call him the father of our modern poetry we shall be speaking the literal truth. While the works of his predecessors were not brought back into notice until the nineteenth century had begun, and still are read by few except professed students, Chaucer's poetry has been read and enjoyed continuously from his own day to this, and the greatest of his successors, from Spenser and Milton to Tennyson and William Morris, have joined in praising it. Moreover, he himself deliberately made a fresh beginning in our literature. He disregarded altogether the old English tradition, and even the work written at an earlier period under French influence. For miracle-plays and romances he had a sovereign contempt, and, for any influence which they exerted on him, the writings of his fellow-countrymen, from Cædmon to Langland, might never have existed. His masters in his art were the Frenchmen, Guillaume Lorris, Jean de Meung, Deguileville, Machault ; the Latins, Ovid, Virgil, and Statius ; above all, the Italians, Dante, Petrarch, and Boccaccio. The break between Layamon and the Old English writers before the Conquest is not greater than the break between Chaucer and his predecessors, and the break proceeded in each case from the same cause, the enlargement of the literary horizon and the adoption of new forms and subjects and ideas under foreign influence. We can see that there were special circumstances in Chaucer's life which helped him to make this new departure. He was, as far as we know, the first notable English poet who was born in London, the first who was a layman, the first who was connected with the Court. The writers of some of the romances may have possessed all these qualifications, but their work was impersonal and never rose to poetic self-consciousness; nor need we trouble to inquire if Minot also was a layman and a courtier. But to a real poet the three points were all of importance. With the English language still divided into widely different dialects the penalty of provincialism was crushing. To be born in London carried with it the use of the dialect which, in the now rapidly declining vogue of French, was fast assuming the position of standard English, and allowed the writer to appeal to the widest and best educated class of readers. To be a layman, and a layman in the king's service, was no less important. It meant a new standpoint, freedom from cramping influences, and a wider knowledge of life. For three centuries English poets had lived in the shade—a shade at first so gloomy that it crushed them out, and which even when it lightened must have numbed and depressed them. Now at last the gift of poetry came to an Englishman who was in the centre of English life, who had an audience ready to listen, quick to appreciate whatever he wrote. There is melancholy in Chaucer's early work, the melancholy from which hardly any true poet seems able to escape; but it is no deeper than the clouds in April, and the sense of the warmth and beauty of life pervades all he wrote. His 'May mornings' are, no doubt, conventional, but the love of the spring was in his blood, and he himself represents the spring-tide of our modern poetry.

An interesting theory that has been propounded claims that the name Chaucer, which is found in many different spellings, stands for 'Chauffecire,' or Chaff-wax, a chaff-wax being the officer who had to prepare the large wax seals then in use for official documents. The older explanation makes it equivalent to 'chaussier,' or shoemaker, and this is perhaps still the more probable. Whatever its origin, the name was not very uncommon in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, being found more especially in London and in the eastern counties. Chaucer's grandfather and father were connected with both these parts, living in London and holding some small estate at Ipswich. The grandfather, Robert Chaucer, was a collector of customs on wine; the father, John Chaucer, a vintner, who had a house in Thames Street, went abroad on the king's service in 1338, and ten years later acted as deputy to the king's butler in the port of Southampton. Geoffrey Chaucer was probably born nearer 1345 than 1340, but we first hear of him in April 1357, when, as fragments of her household accounts show, a pair of red and black breeches, a short cloak, and shoes were provided for him as one of the servants of the Lady Elizabeth, wife of Lionel, Duke of Clarence. An entry of another payment to him shows that Chaucer passed the winter of 1357-58 at her seat at Hatfield in Yorkshire, where his future patron, John of Gaunt, was a visitor. In 1359 he bore arms for the first time, taking part in the unlucky campaign of that year in France, till he was made prisoner at 'Retters,' probably Réthel, not far from Rheims. In March 1360 the king contributed £16 towards the amount required for his ransom; later that year Chaucer carried letters to Prince Lionel in England. He may next have studied at the Inner Temple; in 1367 we hear of him as Edward III.'s 'dilectus valettus' ('well-beloved yeoman'), to whom, in consideration of his past and future services, an annuity of twenty marks was granted for life. By this time Chaucer was married, for in 1366 (when she received a pension of ten marks) the name Philippa Chaucer appears among those of the ladies of the queen's bedchamber. In 1372 John of Gaunt granted her a pension of £10, and in 1374 this same pension was regranted to Geoffrey and Philippa Chaucer for good services rendered by them 'to the said Duke, his consort, and his mother the Queen.' It is practically certain that this Philippa Chaucer was a daughter of Sir Payne Roet of Hainault, and sister of the Katharine Swynford who ultimately became John of Gaunt's third wife.¹

By the year 1368, Geoffrey Chaucer was promoted to be one of the king's esquires; in 1369 he saw another campaign in France, and between 1370 and 1379 was abroad no fewer than seven times in the king's service. Two of these missions (those of 1370 and 1376) were secret, and we know nothing of them except that in the second Chaucer was in the suite of Sir John Burley. In 1377 he went to Flanders with Sir Thomas Percy, and in this year was at least twice sent to France in connection with negotiations for a peace and Richard II.'s marriage. The two missions still to be mentioned were the most important of all, for both took him to Italy. In December 1372 Chaucer was sent to Genoa to arrange with its citizens as to the choice of an English port where they should have privileges as traders; and in May or June 1378 he followed Sir Edward Berkeley to Lombardy, there to treat ('touching the King's expedition of war') with Bernabo Visconti, Lord of Milan, and with the famous free-lance Sir John Hawkwood. The earlier of these two Italian journeys probably only lasted a few months, but it has been said that during it Chaucer may have met at Padua the famous Petrarch, and learned from him the story of Griselda which Petrarch had recently turned into Latin from the Italian of Boccaccio. Of his second mission, on which he was away eight months, we know no such pleasing incident; but from the energy with which he devoted himself to poetry immediately after his return, and from the intimate acquaintance with the Italian of Dante, Petrarch, and Boccaccio which his own poems now first show, it must rank as one of the most important events in his life. *

On St George's Day 1374 Chaucer received from the king a grant of a pitcher of wine daily, which he subsequently commuted for an additional pension of twenty marks. In June of the same year he was appointed Comptroller of the Customs and Subsidy of Wools, Skins, &c. in the Port of London, with the obligation to keep the rolls of his office with his own hand. In 1375 he was made the guardian of a certain Edmund Staplegate of Kent, from whom he received, for wardship and marriage-fee, a sum of £104, or about £3000 modern value. The profits of another wardship granted at the same time are not known to us; but in 1376 we hear of a grant by the king of £71, 4s. 6d., the price of some wool forfeited at the customs for not paying duty. In 1382 the controllership of the petty customs was given him in addition to the post he already held, and in this new appointment he was allowed to employ a deputy. It is clear that Chaucer's income during these years must have been very considerable; but it is clear also that between his controllership at home and his missions abroad he was kept busily employed, and that until the missions ceased he could have had but little time for poetry.

Of the works which Chaucer, in his references to his own writings, ascribes to his earliest period several have not come down to us. The hymns for Love's holy days 'that highten Balades, Roundels, Virelayes' have nearly all perished; the translation of Innocent III.'s treatise, De Miseria Conditionis Humane ('Of the wretched engendring of mankynde,' as Chaucer calls it), has left its mark on a few stanzas of the 'Man of Law's Tale'; the story of 'Ceyx and Alcione,' from Ovid, survives, in part or whole, not as a separate piece, but in the prologue to the Dethe of the Duchesse. 'Origenes upon the Maudeleyne'—that is, a translation of the homily on St Mary Magdalene wrongly attributed to Origen—has perished utterly; and a 'Book of the Lion,' assigned to Chaucer by Lydgate, probably a translation of Guillaume Machault's Le Dit du Lion, has shared the same fate. Of what has become of Chaucer's translation of the Roman de la Rose, the poem of over twenty-two thousand French octosyllables, begun in the previous century by Guillaume de Lorris, and completed by Jean de Meung, it is difficult to write with brevity. A translation of about one-third of the French original has come down to us; but this translation has been shown to consist of two fragments, with a long gap between them, while the first of these fragments is again divided by linguistic tests into two sections, which yet read on without any obviously abrupt transition. The one manuscript which preserves these fragments does not give any suggestion as to who translated them; the attribution to Chaucer in the earliest printed edition—that of 1532—is of no value. The fragmentary translation is throughout quite good enough to be Chaucer's; but on the evidence of the linguistic tests, philologists have declared that, while lines 5811–7696 are not likely to be by Chaucer, lines 1706–5810 cannot possibly be by him, and lines 1–1705 not only may be, but certainly are, his work.¹

All that can here be said is, that by general consent the greater part of the extant Romaunt of the Rose is pronounced un-Chaucerian, and that the lines which have a good claim to be his come under some suspicion from the company in which they are found.

Of the early poems by Chaucer which have come down to us, all exhibit a vague melancholy and tender grace, and several are more or less distinctly religious. The Dethe of Blaunche the Duchesse, which he wrote in 1369–70 to commemorate Blanche of Lancaster, John of Gaunt's first wife, shows him strongly under the influence of his French models. The central feature of the poem (which runs to over thirteen hundred lines) is the description by the knight who represents John of Gaunt of the beauty and virtue of the 'goode faire white' whom he had won and lost. This is led up to by the conventional devices of a dream in which the poet finds himself in a fair park, joins in a hunt, and then strays from it, and finds, seated in sorrow beneath an oak, the knight, whom he persuades to tell him the cause of his grief. Perhaps a little before, perhaps a little after, the Dethe of Blaunche the Duchesse, Chaucer translated from the French of Guillaume de Deguileville a hymn to the Blessed Virgin, in which the stanzas began with the different letters of the alphabet in their order, whence its name The A.B.C. Most of the stanzas open well, but Chaucer had not yet learnt to translate with freedom and ease, and few of them end as well as they begin. A much finer poem, the Exclamation of the Dethe of Pite, is mostly connected with the Dethe of Blaunche the Duchesse, because its complaint against the cruelty of Love is thought to fit in well with a passage in the latter poem which speaks of the poet's sleeplessness and of a mysterious eight-year sickness, which is explained as referring to a hapless love-affair. It is by no means certain that either poem has any real biographical import, and the Dethe of Pite is so finely written that it seems rash to claim for it a very early date on the score of the meaning we read into it. With the dubious exception of an ingenious poem, the Compleynt of Mars (full of astronomical learning and with a possible reference to a Court intrigue between the Lady Isabella of York and Lord Huntingdon), claimed, on no very strong evidence, for the year 1379, we know of no other separate poems which Chaucer wrote during the 'seventies, and which are now extant. It seems certain, however, that three or four of the Canterbury Tales were written during this period, long before that great scheme had entered the poet's head, and were subsequently inserted in their place with more or less revision. The first of these is the 'Second Nun's Tale,' the 'Lyf of Saint Cecyle,' a weak translation from the Legenda Aurea of Jacobus de Voragine. As it stands among the Canterbury Tales the narrator is still made to speak of herself as a son of Eve; there is a reference to readers instead of listeners, and the feebleness with which the story is handled proves still more surely that it was written long before the earliest possible date at which the Tales, as a whole, can have been planned. With this we may reckon the 'Clerk's Tale' of the Patience of Griselda, the story, as he tells us himself, which Chaucer heard from Petrarch, from whose Latin version of Boccaccio's Italian it is translated; also the 'Man of Law's Tale' of the Fortitude of Constance (the Emperor of Rome's daughter, so cruelly persecuted by her heathen mothers-in-law), translated from the Anglo-French chronicle of Nicholas Trivet, a Dominican friar who had died soon after Chaucer was born. Both these are well told, with passages of pathetic beauty, and we can trace in them the increasing freedom with which Chaucer used his poetic material. The last Canterbury Tale for which an early date is claimed, the story of the tragedies of great men told by the sporting Monk, seems at first sight obviously late, for one of the stories refers to the death of Bernabo Visconti of Milan in 1385. But it is possible, without hair-splitting, to divide the seventeen tragedies into five written when the Canterbury Tales were in view, and twelve earlier ones; and even when these are thrown into the scale, Chaucer's extant work which can be assigned to an earlier date than 1380 remains strikingly small in comparison with his splendid productivity during the next ten or twelve years.

The great quickening of Chaucer's poetic gifts which we can trace about 1380 must be directly connected with the second of his two Italian missions, that of 1378-79. Six years before, when he had made his first journey to Italy, he had probably a good knowledge of Italian, but little money to buy books. His second mission enabled him to perfect himself in the language, and we cannot doubt that he brought home with him at least three Italian masterpieces, the Divina Commedia of Dante, and the Teseide and Filostrato of Boccaccio. At first he made experiments. A fragment of metrical essays, now called for convenience A Compleynt to his Lady, is partly written in Dante's terza-rima; and another fragment, Anelida and Arcyte, shows him beginning an ambitious rehandling of the Teseide, from which seventy of its three hundred and fifty-seven lines are translated. His third manuscript proved more immediately productive, for (probably between 1380 and 1383) he carried to completion his magnificent version of the Filostrato, the Troilus and Creseyde, which still remains the finest narrative poem of its kind in the English language. Here for the first time his absolute poetic mastery is apparent. He translates, when he chooses to translate, with ease and grace, and he raises the whole poem to a higher level, investing the faithless Creseyde with a piteousness which pleads for her forgiveness, and turning her go-between uncle, Sir Pandarus, whose original character has made his name a hateful word, into a good-natured humorous friend, whose easy code of morals is quite distinct from baseness. While at work on the Troilus, Chaucer seems to have found time to translate a treatise of a very different kind, the De Consolatione Philosophiæ of the Roman statesman Boethius, who wrote it in prison while awaiting his murder by the Emperor Theodoric in A.D. 525. The De Consolatione is written in alternate prose and verse. Chaucer rendered it all into rather obscure and laboured prose, but some of the passages which most attracted him appear after this date embedded in his poetry, the easy flow of the verse presenting a striking contrast to the artificiality of his prose. He was called off again from the Troilus in 1381 or 1382 to celebrate the betrothal of Richard II. to Anne of Bohemia, and in the Parlement of Foules, with its tale of the mustering of the birds on St Valentine's Day, and their debate as to which of her suitors is worthiest of the beautiful 'formel-eagle,' who represented the queen, produced the brightest and daintiest of courtly allegories.

When the Troilus was finished Chaucer turned to his Divina Commedia, and in the Hous of Fame endeavoured to describe a journey with a heaven-sent guide, in which, despite its lighter vein, the influence of Dante is clearly discernible. When contrasted with the De the of Blaunche the Duchesse, written in the same octosyllabic couplet, the growth of metrical power in the Hous of Fame is very marked. It contains also fine passages, notably the description of the temple of Fame and of the suitors to the wayward goddess, but Chaucer's lack of constructive genius left it a failure and a fragment. The golden eagle of Jupiter had soared with him to Fame's abode, and he had been shown all that there was to see; but there was no possible climax to be reached, and for lack of a climax Chaucer left the poem unfinished.

His next venture, as to which we can speak with certainty,¹ the Legende of Good Women, shared the same fate. Elsewhere he refers to this poem as the 'Seintes Legende of Cupide,' the Legend of Cupid's Saints, of the fair women who had loved too well, and had died as Love's martyrs. In a prologue, of which two versions exist, both admirably written, he feigns that Love had threatened him with punishment for the treasons he had written against him in his translation of the Roman de la Rose, and in Troilus and Creseyde; that he had been saved by the intercession of Love's queen, the fair Alcestis—the heroine of Greek legend who died for her unworthy husband, Admetus—and had been bidden to write these stories of women's faithfulness as a palinode. There were to be nineteen such stories, with that of Alcestis herself to crown them, and the book when finished was to be presented to the queen (not Cupid's, but Richard II.'s), who was no doubt intended to identify herself with Alcestis. Not nineteen but nine stories were written, the earlier ones, especially those of Cleopatra and Dido, together with the prologue, being admirably told. But, as the Greek philosophers had long since discovered, while wickedness is multiform, virtue admits of less variation; and as Chaucer wrote story after story of faithful women—Thisbe, Medea, Lucretia, Ariadne, Philomela, Phyllis, Hypermnestra—he began to tire of so uniform a theme, and even falls from tragedy into comedy by throwing out a hint that he was the only man to whom women could safely trust. In 1385 he was permitted to exercise his Controllership of the Customs of Wool by deputy, a privilege accorded from the first in the case of the petty customs; and perhaps in this or the next year a holiday pilgrimage to Canterbury, made in his own person, set his brain throbbing with a new scheme which, in its variety and boundless possibilities, was in striking contrast with that on which he was engaged. In any case, the Legende of Good Women was abandoned, and the Canterbury Tales, the crowning work of his life, took its place.

At this date of 1385-86, when we think of Chaucer as beginning to plan his Canterbury Tales, he was eminently prosperous. The Tales can have been only just begun when misfortune befell him. In October 1386 he sat in Parliament as one of the knights of the shire for Kent, an accession of dignity which, by bringing him into active political life, may have cost him his offices. His patron, John of Gaunt, was out of England, and his place in the government was filled by the hostile Duke of Gloucester. A commission was appointed to inquire into the state of the subsidies and customs, and by December new appointments show us that Chaucer had been superseded in both his controllerships. He may possibly have resigned of his own free will, for literary or family reasons, but it seems at least as likely that the supersession was political, and would not have been enforced had he not sat in Parliament a month before. In the second half of 1387 he lost his wife's pension (granted her in 1366), either by her death or by its being commuted. In May 1388 he assigned away his own pensions from the king, obviously in order to raise money, and was thus, as far as we know, left with nothing but the pension of £10 originally granted by John of Gaunt to Philippa Chaucer, but subsequently regranted to both husband and wife. It seems reasonable to believe that it was during these distressful times that Chaucer wrote some or all of the series of balades, The Former Age, Fortune, Truth, Gentillesse, Lak of Stedfastnesse, which all owe something to the De Consolatione Philosophiæ of Boethius. In the Truth, with its fine opening, 'Flee from the press, and dwell with soothfastness,' we must imagine that Chaucer is consoling himself; in the Fortune (the balade de visage sans peinture, the 'unpainted face' of a faithful friend) he makes the fickle goddess herself plead on his behalf:

Prynces, I prey you of your gentillesse
Let nat this man on me thus crye and pleyne,
And I shal quyte you your bysnesse.

In the Lak of Stedfastnesse, which has been strangely misinterpreted, and therefore misdated, he seems to applaud the measures which Richard II. took against the 'merciless Parliament' when he declared himself of age in May 1389. According to a copyist (Shirley), who records several such traditions, this poem was sent by Chaucer 'to his sovereign lorde kynge Rycharde the secounde, than being in his Castell of Windesore,' and nothing that we know of Chaucer makes it likely that he would have offered advice unless he was sure it would be acceptable. In any case, he speedily profited by the change of Ministry, being appointed Clerk of the King's Works in July 1389, and a Commissioner of the Roadway between Greenwich and Woolwich in 1390. But a year later he had lost his clerkship again, and even if he is to be identified with the Geoffrey Chaucer who about this time was made Forester of North Petherton Park in Somersetshire, his income must have seemed to him sadly small (though Professor Manly argues that he was in comfortable circumstances).

It was probably during these five years (1386-91) of financial vicissitudes that the bulk of the Canterbury Tales were written. If Chaucer had less income he had more leisure, and he used it to good purpose. The idea of the Canterbury Pilgrimage as a framework for a series of stories seems to have been entirely his own. Pilgrimages were still immensely popular in England, and that to the shrine of St Thomas of Canterbury the most popular of all. It offered a pleasant holiday in varied company, and with religious opportunities which the pilgrims could use as they pleased. The men and women whom Chaucer pictures as meeting at the Tabard Inn at Southwark, the usual starting-point for pilgrims from London and the neighbourhood, were distinctly holiday folk, but they were religious enough to be willing to listen to a very long sermon as they drew near their destination. In his immortal Prologue Chaucer tells us all about them—about the brave courteous Knight, his son the Squire, and their sturdy Yeomen; about the Lawyer and the Doctor who rode on pilgrimage, though the one was so busy and the other's study was 'but little on the Bible'; about the dinner-loving Franklin, the Merchant with his thoughts always on his business, the pirate Shipman, the rascally Miller, the drunken Cook, the crafty Manciple, the crabbed Reeve, the five London burgesses, and the honest, kind-hearted Ploughman; most of all about the 'religious' people—the tender-hearted Prioress, with her lady-chaplain and priests, the hunting Monk, the Friar, 'the best beggar in his house,' the Summoner and Pardoner, types of the very worst hangers-on of the Church; and, to balance these, the good Parson and the studious Clerk of Oxford, with not an ounce of worldliness between them. All these Chaucer paints for us in lively colours, and then starts them on their four days' ride through Deptford, Greenwich, Rochester, and Sittingbourne, fitting them with tales of chivalry and romance, of noble endurance and low adventure, of medieval miracle and old-world legend and myth, a range of narrative as great as the diversity of the tellers, and the narrative, with few exceptions, almost perfectly told. It was a great scheme worthily carried out, though not to completion, for instead of the hundred and twenty tales originally planned only twenty-four were written, and of these one was only just begun, another left incomplete, and two others more dramatically broken off before they were finished.

The scheme which Harry Bailey, the host of the 'Tabard,' proposed to his guests was that each of them should tell two tales on the way to Canterbury and two on the return journey, and that the teller of the best tale should be rewarded by a supper at the cost of the rest. In the morning, when they reach the halting-place known as the Watering of St Thomas, lots are cast as to who shall tell the first tale, and the Knight, to whom the lot falls, responds with the story of Palamon and Arcyte, a splendid rendering of Boccaccio's Teseide. Then follow tales by two of the Churls, the Miller and Reeve, each seeking to discredit the other's craft by a knavish story, into the telling of which, more especially the Reeve's, Chaucer put all his skill. A similar tale by the Cook is placed next in order, but is a mere fragment; and these are all Chaucer wrote for the first day's ride from Southwark to Deptford.

The next day's tale-telling, after a late start (ten o'clock) from Deptford, begins with the old story of Constance (see page 62), which Chaucer, rather unsuitably, assigns to the Man of Law. Then the Shipman tells a story of a trusting husband, faithless wife, and roguish monk; to which an effective contrast is offered by the Prioress's legend, told with devout simplicity, of a little Christian chorister murdered by the Jews. The poet himself is then called upon, and the 'merry words' of Harry Bailey, the host of the 'Tabard,' who acted as leader of the party, may serve as a good example of the talks on the road with which the Tales are linked together:—

Whan seyde was al this miracle, every man
As sobre was that wonder was to se,
Til that oure Hoste japeu tho bigan jest then

And than at erst he looked upon me, then at first
 And seyde thus : 'What man artow?' quod he ; art thou
 'Thou lookest as thou woldest fynde an hare ;
 For ever upon the ground I se thee stare.

Approché neer, and looke up murily.
 Now war yow, sires, and lat this man have place ; beware
 He in the waast is shape as wel as I ;
 This were a popet in an arm t'embrace
 For any womman, smal and fair of face.
 He semeth elvyssh by his contenance,
 For unto no wight doth he daliaunce.

Sey now somewhat, syn other folk have sayd ;
 Telle us a tale of myrthe, and that anon.
 'Hosté,' quod I, 'ne beth nat yvele apayd, x
 For other talé certés kan I noon, know
 But of a rym I lernéd longe agoon.' rhyme
 'Ye, that is good,' quod he, 'now shul we heere
 Som deyntee thyng, me thynketh by his cheere.'

But Chaucer was far too wise really to put one of his dainty things into his own mouth. The rhyme 'he lerned longe agoon' proves to be a parody of the old romances, the delightful 'Tale of Sir Thopas,' which, of course, Harry Bailey takes quite seriously and indignantly interrupts. Then Chaucer gives up poetry and tells an interminable tale of 'Melibeus and his wife Prudence' (translated from a French version of the Liber Consolationis of Albertano of Brescia, written c. 1238), which is heard to the bitter end. As if this were not enough, the Monk, instead of a hunting story, pours out the string of 'tragedies' which Chaucer had written some years before, with five new ones, and the Knight and Harry Bailey interrupt him most righteously. Unlike Chaucer, he will not make a second attempt, but the Nun's Priest comes to the rescue with a bright rendering of the old folk-tale of the 'Fox and the Hen,' filled out in the poet's happiest vein.

To the morning of the third day have been assigned, with no great certainty, the Doctor of Physic's very poor retelling of the story of Appius and Virginia (from the Roman de la Rose), the Pardoner's unblushing Prologue, with its revelations of the tricks of his wretched trade, and his story (ultimately of Indian origin) of the three ruffians who went out in search of Death, and found him by murdering each other in their eagerness to have possession, each for himself alone, of a treasure-trove of gold. It is as likely as not that these tales belong to the fourth day ; but to the third, while the Pilgrims were on their way to dine at Sittingbourne, and thence, according to the accustomed route, to sleep at Ospringe, we can certainly assign five stories. Of these, the first, preceded by a prologue as shameless and as amusing as the Pardoner's, is the Wife of Bath's tale of the knight who, when he took courage to marry the hag who had saved his life, found her a fair maid. This is followed by the tales in which, like the Miller and Reeve, the Friar and Summoner cast stones at each other's calling ; the Summoner's Tale, though its humour is of the lowest, being another example of Chaucer's supreme skill. After a break the Clerk is furnished with a story by Chaucer's hunting up his old version of Patient Griselda, with some added stanzas ; and then the Merchant redresses the balance by his tale showing how Jove himself could not prevent a young wife from fooling her old husband.

The fourth day's story-telling opens on a higher level with the Squire's 'half-told' romance of Cambuscan and the horse of brass, followed by the Franklin's version of a lost French story in which a wife is ready to sacrifice even her honour rather than break her word. In reading this, as in the stories of Constance and Griselda, we have to remember that medieval moralists were apt to think of only one virtue at a time, and when this is understood it takes a high place among the Tales. Again there is a gap. Then the legend of St Cecilia, left in all its weakness of early work, is assigned to the Prioress's attendant Nun, to be followed by an unexpected incident, the overtaking of the Pilgrims by a Canon and his Yeoman, who have ridden hard to catch them up. The Canon is an alchemist, who wastes his own substance and that of his dupes in trying to turn silver into gold ; and his Yeoman, after putting his master to flight by his frank confessions, tells a tale of another rogue of the same sort. After this the Manciple explains (from Ovid) how a white crow's indiscreet revelations caused Apollo to turn all crows black ; and then, as Canterbury comes in sight, the Pilgrims bethink them of their religious duties, and listen to a long sermon on repentance, delivered by the good Parson, who at an earlier stage of the journey had been very peremptorily given to understand that no preaching was wanted.

Altogether the Canterbury Tales contain some eighteen thousand lines of verse besides the two prose treatises—i.e. the tale of Melibee and the Parson's sermon. We have no record and no sure grounds for conjecture as to over how many years their composition was spread, but except it be in the Doctor's tale or the Manciple's they show no sign of failing power ; and it is probable that they were written in quick succession, until loss of favour at Court or some other cause discouraged the poet, and he laid his bulky manuscript aside, unfinished. As we have seen, he lost his Clerkship of the Works in 1391 ; and if, as seems probable from the occurrence of the date '12 March 1391' [O.S.] in one of its calculations, he was writing the treatise on the Astrolabe soon after this, we may fairly take it as a sign that his interest in the Tales was already waning. In his humorous Envoy a Bukton, which was written about 1396, he prays his friend to read the 'Wife of Bath' upon the marriage question ; and we are left to wonder whether he allowed copies of the Tales in their incomplete form to be multiplied during his life, or whether it was only after his death that they reached a wider public than his immediate friends. Of other work he did but little during the last decade of his life. His treatise on the Astrolabe (an instrument for taking astronomical observations), addressed to his little ten-year-old son Lewis, was left incomplete, like so much else, though in this case he had the treatises of the old Arabian astronomer Messahala, and of the Yorkshire mathematician John Holywood (Johannes de Sacro Bosco), on which to draw. Of poems of this period we have only four remaining, all of them short, and all apparently written with something less than his wonted ease. The sportive Envoy a Scogan, on the vengeance he might expect from Venus for having 'given up' his lady, may belong to the year 1393, and ends with a pitiful request from the poor road-commissioner that the favoured dweller 'at the stream's head'—i.e. the Court at Windsor—would 'mind his friend there it may fructifye.' The so-called Compleynt of Venus, a triple balade from the French of Graunson, a Savoyard knight, pensioned by Richard II. in 1393, may belong to the same year. The Envoy a Bukton, giving him his 'counseil touching mariage,' is dated by its reference to the English expedition to Friesland in 1396. The Compleynt to his Purs, sent to the 'Conquerour of Brutes Albioun,' from whom it elicited a fresh pension, belongs, of course, to 1399. None of these poems are unworthy of Chaucer, and it is true that he never wrote his balades and short poems with the ease of his narrative in the couplet stanza, but they seem to belong to a later and less happy period than any of the Canterbury Tales, and we may reasonably conclude that the Tales, though the crowning work of his life, were not being written right up to the last.

In truth, it is to be feared that the last nine years of Chaucer's life were not very prosperous or happy. His friends did not desert him, for in 1394 Richard II. granted him a new pension of twenty pounds a year; but we find him frequently anticipating it by small loans from the Exchequer, and in May 1398 he obtained from the king letters of protection to prevent his creditors suing him. In October Richard granted him a tun of wine yearly, apparently in answer to a petition which begged for it as a 'work of charity;' and a year later, when Richard had been deposed, Henry IV., the son of Chaucer's old patron, John of Gaunt, by an additional pension of forty marks (£26, 13s. 4d.), granted in answer to the Compleynt to his Purs, placed the old poet once more in comfortable circumstances. On the following Christmas Eve Chaucer took a long lease, for fifty-three years, of a house in the garden of St Mary's Chapel, Westminster, which his son, Thomas Chaucer, the King's Butler, occupied after an interval following his death; and there are records of his drawing instalments of his pensions in February and June of 1400. The June payment was received on his behalf by a friend, which may, or may not, point to his already being ill. All that we know is that, according to an inscription on a tomb erected to him by a lover of his works in 1556, he died on 25th October 1400, and that he was buried in St Benet's Chapel in Westminster Abbey, the first of the many poets who have found their last resting-place in what we now know as Poets' Corner.

In estimating Chaucer's position among English poets we have to consider his work in relation to that of his predecessors and contemporaries, and, secondly, the extent of his actual achievement. On the first point something has already been said; but the most important difference which separates Chaucer from the poets whose work we have already reviewed is that he first of English writers whose names we know (the limitation is introduced to exclude the author of Pearl, a possible exception) conceived of poetry as an art. Our earlier poets, whose subjects would often have been as fitly treated in prose, wrote 'straight on,' with very little ornament, and very little care for finding the right word or varying their verse. Their modesty saved them from many mistakes, and though their work is always on a level, it is by no means on a dead level. But any one who will read, say, the Cursor Mundi from end to end and not find it tedious must have a special taste for old-world things. Even Langland, who was continually recasting his Vision, recast it not so much that he might improve what he had already said, but that he might say something different; and, as we have noted, he as often changed a good line for a worse as a poor line for a better. In Chaucer's poetry, on the other hand, we find a continuous development, and evidence of the hard work and enterprise by which that development was attained. He begins as a mere translator, and becomes, in his own way, one of the most individual of poets; he begins with monotonous verse, full of padding, and attains a metrical freedom as complete as Shakespeare's; he begins in the prevalent fashion, and soon enriches English literature with two new metres of capital importance (the seven-line stanza and decasyllabic couplet), and with a new range of subjects. Though he had to work harder for his living than most of his predecessors, he took his art far more seriously, and starting at a happier moment and with greater natural gifts, he attained results which differ from theirs not merely in degree but in kind.

As regards his positive achievement some large admissions must be made. The pretty little songs in the Dethe of the Duchesse and the Parlement of Foules do not entitle us to claim for him any serious lyrical gift, and his shorter poems generally are known rather by fine single lines than as successful wholes. With the absence of the lyrical faculty goes the absence of passion and depth of thought. The true tragic note is not sounded once in all his poems, and his portrayal of love is languishing and sensuous, never strong. Three of his women are perfectly drawn: the fashionable

Prioress, the triumphantly vulgar Wife of Bath, as sketches; the small-souled, piteous Cressida as a finished portrait. The rest are personifications or conventional types, quickened now and again by some happy touch, but not possessed of flesh and blood. As for his asserted deep religious feelings, there has certainly been much exaggeration. He was interested in the problems of free-will and predestination; he had the man of the world's admiration for practical piety wherever he saw it; he had his religious moments, and towards the end of his life may have been devout; but the humorous lines in 'The Knightes Tale'—

His spirit chaunged hous and wente ther,
As I cam never, I kan nat tellen wher :
Therfore I stynte, I nam no divinistre
Of soules fynde I nat in this registre, are typical of his spirit in the heyday of his powers; and though he laid bare the worldliness and knavery of the hangers-on of religion, they fill him with no deep repugnance.

Lastly, it must be owned that Chaucer had little or no constructive power. He could fill in other men's outlines and improve other men's work as triumphantly as Shakespeare himself, but the inconclusiveness of the Dethe of the Duchesse and the Parlement of Foules, and the unfinished condition of every other poem in which he tried to work on his own lines—as regards plot, prove that he had no aptitude for inventing a story and developing it from prelude to climax.

When all these admissions have been made, Chaucer yet remains one of the greatest English poets, because in his own art of narrative verse he attained a mastery which has never been approached. Where he should be ranked, as compared with Shakespeare, Milton, Pope, Shelley, or Tennyson, depends entirely on the value the critic attaches to different kinds of excellence. In his own Chaucer stands first. While his predecessors lack readers because they had too little art, later writers have often failed because they have tried to introduce too much. In Chaucer alone we find narrative in perfection—simple, direct, fluent, varying easily with the subject, full of his own individuality, everywhere controlled and enlivened by his abounding humour, and written in verse of never-failing music and metrical power. He is a great artist, with an artist's self-consciousness; at the same time he is absolutely natural and at his ease. There are few English poets to whom we should attribute the combination of these qualities; there is no other who has combined them to the same extent.

A narrative poet can never receive justice from quotations, but the extracts which follow are chosen to illustrate as far as is possible in a few pages the variety of Chaucer's verse and his happiness in dealing with different subjects. We take him first in his early days as the pensive, rather sentimental young poet, weaving his own sorrows, real or imagined, into his lament for the wife of his patron, John of Gaunt,¹ of which our quotation forms the opening lines :

I have gret wonder, by this lyghte,
How that I lyve, for day ne nyghte
I may slepe wel neigh noight ;
I have so many an ydel thoght,
Purely for defeaute of slepe,

¹ This and the following quotations are taken from the 'Globe' Chaucer, The Works of Geoffrey Chaucer, edited by A. W. Pollard, H. F. Heath, Mark H. Liddell, W. S. McCormick (Macmillans, 1898). The Canterbury Tales were printed by Caxton in 1478 and 1483, and reprinted by Pynson (c. 1492) and Wynkyn de Worde (1498). Caxton also printed the Parlement of Foules and some of the minor poems about 1478, and the Troilus about 1483, this being printed again by Wynkyn de Worde in 1517. In 1526 Pynson printed most of Chaucer's works in a volume in three parts, but the first collected edition was that printed by Godfray in 1532, and edited by Thynne. This was reprinted in 1542 and 1550, and again (with additions supplied by the antiquary John Stowe) in 1561. In 1598 and 1602 editions appeared edited by Thomas Spaght, and others were issued in 1687 and 1721, the latter edited by Urry. These collected editions contained many works not by Chaucer, and their text was disfigured by every possible blunder, so that the music of Chaucer's verse was entirely lost and his meaning obscured. A beginning of better things was made by Thomas Tyrwhitt's edition of the Canterbury Tales (1775-78), a really fine piece of editing for its date. Thomas Wright's edition for the Percy Society (1842), and that of Richard Morris in Bell's Aldine Classics (1866), both of them founded on Harleian MS. 7334, were further improvements. But no accurate text was possible until Dr Furnivall founded the Chaucer Society in 1866, and printed parallel texts from all the best manuscripts available, including the Ellesmere. From these texts Skeat edited for the Clarendon Press The Complete Works of Geoffrey Chaucer (6 vols. 1894), with a wealth of illustrative notes. A modern one-volume edition is Robinson's (1934). Neither Furnivall nor Skeat had access to the important Cardigan Chaucer MS. (c. 1450) which, still unedited when offered for sale in 1925, contains new readings. The Chaucer Society cleared up the sources of many poems, and settled the order of the Canterbury Tales, the letters A-I which appear in references to line-numbers denoting the different groups under which, in their incomplete condition, it is necessary to arrange them. The gentle melancholy of this prelude finds a more sonorous echo in the Compleynt of the Dethe of Pitee, from which also we may quote the opening lines :

. Pitè that I have sought so yore ago
 With hertè sore and ful of besy peyne,
 That in this worlde was never wight so wo
 With-outè dethe ; and if I shal not feyne,
 My purpos was to Pitè to compleyne

To illustrate Chaucer's earlier narrative work, we must be content with three stanzas from the 'Tale of Constance.' They strike that note of pathos and pity which with Chaucer takes the place of deeper tragedy. King Alla had married Constance after the miracle which proved her innocent of a murder of which she had been falsely accused ; but now, in his absence from home, he is beguiled, and sends a letter his cruel mother changes into an order that both Custance and his little child are to be thrust out to sea in a rudderless boat in three days' time :

Wepen bothe yonge and olde in al that place
 Whan that the kyng this curséd lettré sente,
 And Custance, with a deedly palé face,
 The ferthè day toward the ship she wente ; fourth
 But natheles she taketh in good entente
 The wyl of Crist, and knelynge on the stronde,
 She seyde, 'Lord, ay welcome be thy sonde ; sending

He that me kepté fro the falsé blame,
 While I was on the lond amongés yow,
 He kan me kepe from harm, and eek fro shame,
 In saltè see, al-though I se noght how.
 As strong as ever he was he is yet now.
 In hym triste I, and in his mooder deere,—
 That is to me my seyl, and eek my steere.' sail—rudder

Hir litel child lay wepyng in hir arm,
 And knelynge, pitously to hym she seyde,
 'Pees, litel sone, I wol do thee noon harm !'
 With that hir coverchief of hir heed she breyde, 1
 And over his litel eyen she it leyde,
 And in hir arm she lulleth it ful faste,
 And into hevене hir eyen up she caste.

('Man of Lawes Tale,' Canterbury Tales, B. 820-840.)

1 She tore the kerchief from her head.

From all this tenderness we must pass rapidly to the tales of chivalry and romance, full of vivid colour, the brightness of youth, and joy of love, which are the most prominent feature in Chaucer's second period. Among these Troilus and Cressida stands supreme ; and we may take from it first this picture of Criseyde when Troilus first sees her, and is suddenly struck down, amid his mockery of love, by the beauty he despised :

Among thise othré folk was Criseyda
 In widwes habit blak ; but natheles, widows
 Right as our firstè lettre is now an A,
 In beauté first so stood she makélés : matchless
 Her goodly loking gladéd al the prees ; crowd
 N'as neverè seyn thing to ben prayséd derre, 1, 2
 Nor under cloudé blak so bright a sterre, star

As was Criseyde, as folk seyde everychone
 That her behelden in her blaké wede.
 And yit she stood ful lowe and stille alone
 Behinden othré folk in litel brede breadth
 And nigh the dore, ay under shamés drede, 3
 Simple of atir and debonaire of chere, attire
 With ful assuréd loking and manére.

This Troilus, as he was wont to gide
 His yongé knightés, ladde hem up and doun
 In th'ilké largé temple on every side, that same
 Biholding ay the ladies of the toun,
 Now here, now there ; for no devocioun
 Hadde he to non, to reven him his reste, deprive
 But gan to preyse and lakken whom him leste. disparage

And in his walk ful faste he gan to wayten watch
 If knight or squiér of his companýe
 Gan for to sike or lete his ýen bayten sigh—feed
 On any woman that he coude espyé :
 He woldé smile and holden it folýe,
 And seye him thus, 'God wot, she slepeth softe
 For love of thee, whan thou tornest ful ofte !

'I have herd told, pardieux, of your livinge,
 Ye lovers, and your lewéd óbservauncés, 4
 And which a labour folk han in winnífge
 Of love, and in the keping which doutauncés ;
 And whan your preye is lost, wo and penauncés !
 O verray foolés, nyce and blynd ben ye ! foolish
 Ther n'is nat oon can war by other be !' beware

And with that word he gan caste up the browe
 Ascaunces, 'Lo! is this nat wisly spoken?'
 At which the God of Love gan loken rowe roughly Right for despit, and shop for to ben wroken: 5
 He kidde anon his bowe n'as nat broken! showed
 For sodeinly he hitte him at the fulle;
 And yit as proud a pecok can he pulle! pluck (Troilus and Cressida, Bk. i. ll. 169-210.)

¹ There was not. ² More dearly. ³ In dread of being shamed
 (she was daughter of the Greek Calchas). ⁴ Common, foolish.
⁵ Prepared himself to be avenged.

Cupid made Troilus pay heavily for his gibes, and cheated him at the last; yet he allowed him a little spell of happiness; and here is Chaucer's description of the supreme moment of love's reward:

O, soth is seid, that heléd for to be
 As of a fevere, or other gret siknése,
 Men mosté drinke, as men may alday see,
 Ful bittre drinke; and for to han gladnése,
 Men drinken ofté peyne and gret distresse:
 I mene it here, as for this aventure
 That thorough a peyne hath founden al his cure.

And now swetnéssé semeth moré swete
 That bitternesse assayed was biforn;
 For out of wo in blissé now they flete; float
 Non swich they felten sin they weré born. since
 Now is this bet than bothé two be lorn! better
 For love of God, take every womman hede
 To werken thus, whan it com'th to the nede!

Criseyde, al quit from every drede and tene, sorrow
 As she that justé cause had him to triste, trust
 Made him swich feste, it joyé was to sene,
 Whan she his trouthe and clene ententé wiste;
 And as aboute a tree with many a twisté
 Bitrent and wryth the swoté wodébinde, 1
 Gan ech of hem in armés other winde.

And as the newe abayséd nightingale abashed
 That stinteth first whan she biginneth singe, stops
 Whan that she hereth any herdé tale, herdsman talk
 Or in the hegges any wight steringe, hedges—stirring
 And after siker doth her vois out-ringe; in sure tones
 Right so Criseyde, whan her dredé stente, ceased
 Opned her herte, and tolde al her entente.

And right as he that saw his deth y-shapen,
 And dodeyn moste, in aught that he may gesse, must
 And sodeinly rescous doth him escapen, 2
 And from his deth is brought in sikernes; safety
 For al this world, in swich présent gladnése
 Is Troilus, and hath his lady swete.—
 With worsé hap God lat us neveré mete!

(Troilus and Cressida, Bk. iii. ll. 1212-1246.)

 causes him to escape.

In the end, as we all know, Criseyde failed to fight against the stress of circumstance and was faithless; and Chaucer, as he tells of the death of Troilus, takes, for the moment, a higher strain:

Swich fyn hath tho this Troilus for love! Such end
 Swich fyn hath al his greté worthinesse!
 Swich fyn hath his estat réal above! royal
 Swich fyn his lust, swich fyn hath his noblesse!

Swich fyn, this falsé worldès brotelnesse!—brittleness
 And thus bigan his loving of Criseyde
 As I have told, and in this wise he deyde.

—O yongé fresshé folkés, he or she,
 In whiche ay love up-groweth with your age,
 Repeireth hom fro worldly vanité!
 And of your herte up-casteth the visagé
 To th'ilké God that after his imagé
 You made; and thinketh al n'is but a faire
 This world, that passeth sone as flourés faire!

And loveth Him, the whiche that right for love
 Upon a cros, our soulés for to beye, buy, redeem
 First starf, and roos, and sit in hevene above; 1, 2
 For He n'il falsen no wight, dar I seye,
 That wol his herte al hoolly on him leye!
 And sin He best to love is, and most meke, since
 What nedeth feynéd lovés for to seke?

The Troilus, which has this solemn end, is a 'tragedy,' but it is a tragedy as full of light as of shade; in it we first find Chaucer's humour in its perfection, and to suit this humour he attunes his verse to another key with masterly ease. Here is a passage from an earlier part of the poem describing a call paid (in the interest of Troilus) by Sir Pandarus on his niece, then in the stage of widowhood in which thoughts of consolation may be trifled with:

Whan he was come unto his neces place,
 'Wher is my lady?' to her folk quod he:
 And they him tolde, and he forth in gan pace, passed
 And fond two othré ladies sete and she seated Withinne a pavéd parlour; and they three Herden a mayden reden hem the geste story
 Of al the sege of Thebés, whil hem leste.

Quod Pandarus, 'Madamé, God you see,
 With al your book and al the companýe!'—
 'Ey, uncle, now welcôme y-wis!' quod she; surely
 And up she ros, and by the hond in hye hastily
 She took him faste, and seyde, 'This night thrye— thrice
 To goodé mote it torne!—of you I mette.' dreamt
 And with that word she doun on bench him sette.

'Ye, necé, ye shal faré wel the bet, better
 If God wile, al this yer!' quod Pandarus; will
 'But I am sory that I have you let hindered
 To herken of your book ye preisen thus.
 For Goddés love, what seith it? Tel it us!
 Is it of love? O, som good ye me lere!' teach
 'Uncle!' quod she, 'your maistresse is not here!'

With that they gonne laughe; and tho she seyde,
 'This romaunce is of Thebés, that we rede;
 And we han herd how that King Laius deyde
 Thorough Edippus his sone, and al that dede;
 And here we stinten at thise lettres rede, 1, 2
 How that the bisshop, as the book can telle,
 Amphiorax, fil thorough the grounde to helle.'

Quod Pandarus, 'Al this knowe I my-selve,
 And al th' assege of Thebés, and the care;
 For herof ben ther makéd bookés twelve.
 But lat be this, and tel me how ye fare.

Do wey your barbe, and shewe your face bare. 3
Do wey your book : ris up, and lat us daunce,
And lat us don to May som óbservaunce !'

'Ey, God forbedé!' quod she, 'Be ye mad?
Is that a widwes lif, so God you save?
By God, ye maken me right sore adrad ! afraid
Ye ben so wilde, it semeth as ye rave !
It saté me wel bet, ay in a cave would be fit
To bidde and rede on holy seintés lives ! pray
Lat maydens gon to daunce, and yongé wives !'
(Troilus and Cressida, Bk. ii. ll. 78-119.)

¹ Stop. ² The chapter-heading written in red letters in a manuscript. ³ A collar partly hiding the face.

The absolute ease of this passage is in striking contrast to Chaucer's early use of the stanza in the story of St Cecyle, and has perhaps never been equalled in the same form save by Byron. To accompany these quotations from the Troilus, we may take the 'Knights Tale' out of its place in the Canterbury series, in order to show how Chaucer treats chivalry under arms, as in the Troilus he treats of chivalry in love. The cousins Palamon and Arcite both love the fair Emily, sister to their enemy, Theseus, 'Duke' of Athens. Arcite overhears Palamon speaking of his love when in hiding from Theseus, and, as his cousin is weaponless, rides off to fetch him armour and weapons that they may fight out their quarrel. The quotation describes how they arm each other and then fight furiously till Theseus interrupts them. It is the more noteworthy because, while Chaucer is translating the Teseide of Boccaccio, all the vivid and dramatic touches are his own :

Arcite is riden anon unto the toun,
And on the morwe, er it were dayés light,
Ful prively two harneys hath he dight, 1, 2
Bothe suffisaunt and meté to darreyne fight out
The bataille in the feeld betwix hem tweyne ;
And on his hors, allone as he was born,
He carieth al the harneys hym biforn :
And in the grove, at tyme and place y-set, appointed
This Arcite and this Palamon ben met.
To chaungen gan the colour in hir face,
Right as the hunters, in the regne of Trace, 3
That stondest at the gappé with a spere,
Whan hunted is the leoun or the bere,
And hereth hym come russhyng in the greves, groves
And breketh both bowés and the leves,

After the Troilus came the Hous of Fame, and from this, did space permit, we should quote Chaucer's autobiographical colloquy with the Golden Eagle, and some of the prayers of Fame's suitors and their answers. But we must hasten to the Legende of Good Women, and choose from this a characteristic passage on Chaucer's favourite season, Spring, not unlike that at the end of the Parlement of Foules, but written with more freedom :

Forgeten had the erthe his pore estate
Of wyntir, that him naked made and mate, forlorn.
And with his swerd of colde so soré greved ;
Now hath the atempré sonne al that releved temperate
That naked was, and clad it new agayne.
The smalé foulés, of the sesoun sayne,
That of the panter and the nette ben scaped, a bag-net:
Upon the fowler, that hem made a-whaped scared:
In wynter, and destroyed hadde hire broode,
In his dispite hem thoghte it did hem goode
To synge of hym, and in hir songe dispise
The foulé cherle, that, for his coveytise,

Had hem betrayéd with his sophistrye.

This was hir songe, 'The foweler we deffye,
And al his crafte.' And somé songen clere
Layés of love, that joye it was to here,
In worshipynge and in preysing of hir make ;
And, for the newé blisful somers sake,
Upon the braunchés ful of blosmés softe,
In hire delyt, they turnéd hem ful ofte,
And songen, 'Blesséd be Seynt Valentyne !
For on his day I chees you to be myne,
Withouten répentynge myne herté swete !'
And therewithal hire bekés gonnen meete,
Yellyng honóur and humble obeysaunces
To love, and diden hire othere observaunces
That longeth onto love, and to nature ;
Construeth that as yow lyst, I do no cure.

And tho that haddé don unkyndénesse,—
As doth the tydif, for newfangelnesse,— Besoghté mercy of hir trespassynge,
And humblély songen hir répentynge,
And sworn on the blosmés to be trewe,
So that hire makés wolde upon hem rewe,
And at the lasté maden hir acorde.

(Legende of Good Women, ll. 125-159.)

All the Prologue to the Legende, whence this is taken, is in Chaucer's happiest vein, both in its earlier and in this later form ; and as in the last quotation it was hard to have to stop before Theseus' speech in which he first condemns and then chaffs the lovers, so here it would be pleasant to quote all the talk with Cupid and Alcestis which follows on our extract. From the legends themselves we can only take these few lines as an example of how vigorously Chaucer could describe a sea-fight of the ancient kind :

Antonius was war, and wol nat fayle
To meten with thise Romaines, if he may,
Took eke his rede, and both upon a day,
His wyf and he, and al his ost, forthe wente
To shippe anon, no lenger they ne stente,
And in the see hit happéd hem to mete.
Up goth the trumpe, and for to shoute and shete,
And paynen hem to sette on with the sonne ;
With grisly sounne out goth the greté gonne,
And heterly they hurtelen al at ones,
And fro the top down cometh the greté stones.
In gooth the grapénel so ful of crokes,
Amonge the ropés, and the sheryng hokes ;
In with the polax preseth he and he ;
Byhynde the maste begyneth he to fle,
And out agayn, and dryveth hem over borde ;
He stynteth hem upon his sperés orde ;
He rent the sayle with hokés lyke a sithe ;
He bryngeth the cuppe, and biddeth hem be blithe ;
He poureth pesen upon the hacches slidre ;
With pottés ful of lyme, they goon togidre ;
And thus the longé day in fight they spende,
Til at the last, as every thing hath ende,
Antony is shent, and put hym to the flyghte ;
And al his folke to-go, that best go myghte.

(Legende of Good Women, ll. 629-653.)

We come now to the Canterbury Tales, and as from the portrait-gallery of the Prologue we can only take two examples, two have been chosen which show in effective contrast the good and bad sides of religion in Chaucer's day. Here is the good Parson :

A good man was ther of religioun,
And was a POURÉ PERSON OF A TOUN ;
But riche he was of hooly thought and werk ;
He was also a lerned man, a clerk,
That Cristés Gospel trewely wolde preche :
His parisshe devoutly wolde he teche.
Benygne he was, and wonder diligent,
And in adversitee ful pacient ;
And swich he was y-prevéd ofté sithes.
Ful looth were hym to cursen for his tithes,
But rather wolde he yeven, out of doute,
Unto his pouré parisshe aboute,
Of his offryng and eek of his substaunce :
He koude in litel thyng have suffisaunce.

Wyd was his parisshe, and houses fer asonder,
But he ne lasté nat, for reyn ne thonder,
In siknesse nor in meschief to visite

The ferreste in his parisshe, much and lite, rich and poor
Upon his feet, and in his hand a staf.

This noble ensample to his sheepe he yaf
That firste he wroghte and afterward he taughte.

Out of the gospel he tho wordés caughte,
And this figure he added eek therto,

That if gold rusté what shal iren doo ?

For if a preest be foul, on whom we truste,

No wonder is a lewéd man to ruste ;

And shame it is, if a prest také keepe,

A shiten sheperde and a clené sheepe.

Wel oghte a preest ensample for to yive

By his clenesse how that his sheepe sholde lyve.

He setté nat his benefice to hyre

And leet his sheepe encombred in the myre,

And ran to Londoun, unto Seint Poules,

To seken hym a chaunterie for soules ;

Or with a bretherhed to been withholde,

But dwelte at hoom and kepté wel his folde,

So that the wolf ne made it nat myscarie,—

He was a sheperde, and noght a mercenarie :

And though he holy were and vertuous,

He was to synful man nat despitous,

Ne of his spech daungerous ne digne, difficult nor haughty

But in his techyng discrete and benygne,

To drawn folk to hevenc by fairnesse,

By good ensample, this was his bisynesse :

But it were any persone obstinat,

What so he were, of heigh or lough estat,

Hym wolde he snybben sharply for the nonys.

A bettre preest I trowe that nowher noon ys ;

He waited after no pompe and reverence,

Ne makéd him a spicéd conscience,

But Cristés loore, and his Apostles twelve,

He taughte, but first he folwed it hym selve.

(Canterbury Tales, Prologue, ll. 477-528.)

¹ To lodge in a monastery.

And here the rogue of a Pardoner :

With hym ther rood a gentil PARDONER
Of Rouncivale, his freend and his compeer,
That streight was comen fro the court of Romé.

Ful loude he soong Com hider, lovè, to me!
 This Somonour bar to hym a stif burdoun, accompaniment
 Was never trompe of half so greet a soun.
 This Pardoner hadde heer as yellow as wex hair
 But smothe it heng as doth a strike of flex; hank of flax
 By ounces henge his lokkès that he hadde, In small pieces
 And therwith he his shuldres overspradde.
 But thynne it lay by colpons oon and oon; 2
 But hood, for jolitee, ne wered he noon,
 For it was trussed up in his walèt.
 Hym thoughte he rood al of the newè jet; fashion
 Dischevelee, save his cappe, he rood al bare. 3
 Swiche glarynge eyen hadde he as an hare,
 A vernycle hadde he sowed upon his cappe; 4
 His walet lay biforn hym in his lappe
 Bret-ful of pardon, come from Rome al hoot. Brimful
 A voys he hadde as smal as hath a goot.
 But of his craft, fro Berwyk unto Ware
 Ne was ther swich another pardoner,
 For in his male he hadde a pilwè-beer, bag—pillow-case
 Which that, he seyde, was oure lady veyl; lady's
 He seyde he hadde a gobet of the seyl piece
 That Seint Peter hadde, whan that he wente
 Upon the see, til Jhesu Crist hym hente.
 He hadde a croys of latoun, ful of stones, cross of brass
 And in a glas he haddè piggès bones.
 But with thise relikès, whan that he fond found
 A pourè person dwellynge upon lond,
 Upon a day he gat hym moore moneye
 Than that the person gat in monthès tweye;
 And thus with feynéd flaterye and japes
 He made the person and the peple his apes.
 But, trewely to tellen attè laste,
 He was in chirche a noble ecclesiaste;
 Wel koude he rede a lessoun or a storie,
 But alderbest he song an Offertorie; best of all
 For wel he wistè, whan that song was songe,
 He mostè preche, and wel affile his tonge polish
 To wynne silver, as he ful wel koude;
 Therefore he song the murierly and loude. more merrily

From the Tales themselves we have already quoted an example of Chaucer's chivalrous style;
 our second extract exhibits him where he is perhaps at his strongest of all—as the teller of tales of low life, tales of which he can only have received from others the mere outline, while his expansions of them are full of humour and individuality. As to the stories of this class, Chaucer himself ad-visèd some of his readers to 'choose another page,' and the folk-story of the 'Fox and Hen' assigned to the Nonnes Prest is the only one of them which can be recommended virginibus puerisque; but this incident from the 'Reeves Tale,' of how a knavish miller frustrated the device of the two Cambridge clerks to prevent him from stealing their corn, stands by itself, and is altogether delightful. The clerks, it should be said, are northerners, and speak in the northern dialect.
 Symond is the miller:

'Symond,' quod John, 'by God, nede has na peer,
 Hym boes serve hymself that has na swayn, 1, 2
 Or elles he is a fool, as clerkes sayn.
 Our manciple I hope he will be deed expect
 Swa werkès ay the wangès in his heed; 3, 4, 5, 6
 And forthy is I come and eek Alayn. therefore
 To grynde oure corn and carie it ham agayn. home
 I pray yow spede us heythen that ye may.' hence
 'It shal be doon,' quod Symkyn, 'by my fay!
 What wol ye doon, whil that it is in hande?'
 'By God, right by the hopur wil I stande,' hopper
 Quod John, 'and se how that the corn gas in. goes
 Yet saugh I never, by my fader kyn,
 How that the hopur waggès til and fra.' to and fro
 Aleyn answeárdè, 'John, and wiltow swa?
 Thanne wil I be bynethè, by my croun!
 And se how that the melè fallès down
 Into the trough,—that sal be my disport;
 For, John, y-faith, I may been of youre sort,
 I is as ille a millere as are ye.'

This millere smylèd of hir nycètee, foolishness
 And thoghte, 'Al this nys doon but for a wyle; 7
 They wenè that no man may hem bigile;
 But by my thrift yet shal I blere hir eye, cheat them
 For al the sleighte in hir philosophye.
 The morè queyntè crekès that they make, cunning devices
 The morè wol I stelè whan I take.
 In stide of flour yet wol I yeve hem bren; bran
 The gretteste clerkès been noght wisest men,
 As whilom to the wolf thus spak the mare; 8
 Of al hir art ne counte I noght a tare.'
 Out at the dore he gooth ful prvyely,
 Whan that he saugh his tymè softely.
 He looketh up and down til he hath founde
 The clerkès hors, ther as it stood y-bounde.
 Bihynde the mille, under a levèsel, bower
 And to the hors he goth hym faire and wel;
 He strepeth of the brydel right anon, strips off
 And whan the hors was laus, he gynneth gon 9, 10
 Toward the fen, ther wildè marès renne,— run
 Forth with 'Wehee!' thurgh thikkè and thurgh thenne.

This millere goth agayn, no word he seyde,
 But doth his note and with the clerkès pleyde, business
 Til that hir corn was faire and wel y-grounde;
 And whan the mele is sakkèd and y-bounde,
 This John goth out, and fynt his hors away, findeth
 And gan to crie, 'Harrow!' and, 'Weyl-away!
 Oure hors is lorn; Alayn, for Goddès banes bones
 Stepe on thy feet; com out, man, al atanes! at once
 Allas, our wardeyn has his palfrey lorn!
 This Aleyn al forgat bothe mele and corn;
 Al was out of his mynde his housbondrie.
 'What, whilk way is he geen?' he gan to crie.
 The wyf cam lepynge inward with a ren;
 She seyde, 'Allas, youre hors goth to the fen
 With wildè mares, as faste as he may go;
 Unthank come on his hand that boond hym so,
 And he that bettre sholde han knyht the reyne!'
 'Allas,' quod John, 'Aleyn, for Cristès peyne,
 Lay doun thy swerd, and I wil myn als wa. also
 I is ful wight, God waat, as is a raa; 11
 By Goddès hertè! he sal nat scape us bathe. both
 Why nadstow pit the capul in the lathe? 12
 Il-hayl, by God, Aleyn, thou is a fonne.' Ill-luck—fool
 Thise sely clerkès han ful faste y-ronne innocent
 Toward the fen, bothe Aleyn and eek John;

And whan the millere saugh that they were gon,
He half a busschel of hir flour hath take,
And bad his wyf go knede it in a cake.
He seyde, 'I trowe the clerkès were aferd ;
Yet kan a millere make a clerkès berd,
For al his art ; now lat hem goon hir weye !
Lo wher they goon ; ye, lat the children pleye ;
They gete hym nat so lightly, by my croun !'

Lastly, as a contrast to these broad humours, here from the 'Prioresses' Tale' is a return to Chaucer's earlier manner of tenderness and devotion, no less graceful and pleasing than of yore, and written with far greater mastery. The legend is one of many which good men—Heaven forgive them!—all over Europe sincerely believed, of a little Christian boy wantonly murdered by the Jews :

A litel scole of cristen folk ther stood Doun at the ferther ende, in which ther were

Children an heepe, y-comen of Cristen blood,

That lerned in that scolè yeer by yere
Swich manere doctrine as men used there,—

This is to seyn, to syngen, and to rede,

As smale children doon in hire childhede.

Among these children was a wydweis sone,

A litel clergeoun, seven yeer of age, chorister

That day by day to scolé was his wone ;

And eek also, where as he saugh
thymage saw the image

Of Cristes mooder, he hadde in usage,
As hym was taught, to knele adoun

and seye
His Ave Marie, as he goth by the weye.

The image shows a highly textured, high-contrast black and white photograph of a book cover. A vertical band of lighter, possibly metallic or embossed, material runs down the center. This band is decorated with a repeating pattern of stylized, three-lobed floral or foliate motifs. The background is dark and grainy, suggesting an aged or worn surface. The overall appearance is that of a vintage or antique book cover.

Of Chaucer's prose two short specimens will be given below (pp. 81 sq.). Here it is sufficient to say that, though he could write with ease and simplicity when off his guard, in his attempts at more ornate prose he never attained to the artistic mastery which everywhere marks his verse.

John Gower.

John Gower was born before Chaucer, possibly as early as 1325, and as a worker on older lines from which Chaucer soon broke loose has some claim to have been given precedence. But his only English poem can hardly have been written until after Chaucer's Troilus and Hous of Fame, and as it was probably his friend's success which caused him to abandon the French and Latin in which he had previously written, for English, he may be ranked with those whom Chaucer influenced, though not in the same sense as Lydgate and Hoccleve. He came of the Kentish Gowers, and must have been a kinsman of the Sir Robert Gower buried in Brabourne Church near Ashford, as Sir Robert's manor of Kentwell in Suffolk passed into his possession. John Gower owned other property in Norfolk, Suffolk, Essex, and Kent itself. By a grant from Richard II., from 1390 to 1397 the rectory of Great Braxted in Essex, close to Gower's Essex property, was held by a clerk of the same name, and the fact that the rector is spoken of as a clerk, not as a priest, has caused him to be identified with the poet, who, however, at the time he wrote his Mirour de l'Omme, was not even a clerk (see l. 21772). Without any aid from ecclesiastical preferment, the poet must have been a man of considerable wealth and importance. In the first edition of his Confessio Amantis he tells how Richard II. met him on the Thames, invited him to come into his barge, and bade him write a book for him to read. He must, therefore, have been well known to the king and have had a footing at Court. Gower, however, ultimately sided with Henry of Lancaster, and in 1393 transferred to him the dedication of his poem, being rewarded soon after by the present of a collar. In 1397, when he must have been nearly seventy, Gower married one Agnes Groundolf, and lived with her henceforth within the Priory of St Mary Overy's (now St Saviour's), Southwark, to the rebuilding of which he was a generous contributor. In 1400 he became blind, but lived for another eight years, dying in 1408, and being buried in St Saviour's, where his tomb, which bears his effigy, still remains. In this his head is resting on his three chief works, the French Speculum Meditantis (or, as it is also called, Speculum Hominis, or Mirour de l'Omme), the Latin Vox Clamantis, and the English Confessio Amantis, with which only we are much concerned. The Speculum Meditantis, after having been lost sight of for many years, was rediscovered at Cambridge in 1895, and is contained in the first volume of the complete edition (4 vols.) of Gower's works, edited by G. C. Macaulay, published by the Clarendon Press in 1899-1901. The Speculum or Mirour is a poem of nearly thirty thousand lines of passable verse, in which a classification of the Vices and Virtues leads up to a survey of modern society, and this in its turn to a life of the Blessed Virgin, by whose mediation society was to be bettered. There are interesting passages in the poem, notably those which initiate us into the tricks of the fourteenth-century tradesmen, but its poetical value is not high. Gower did far better work in French in the Cinkante Balades, printed by Mr Macaulay in the same volume as the Mirour, for some of these are really of great merit.

Wat Tyler's rising of 1381 was the occasion of the Latin poem, Vox Clamantis, and the choice of language, though probably mainly due to the belief that Latin was the proper medium for an historical poem, may have been partly dictated by the same motive which caused Godwin in 1793 to publish his Political Justice at a prohibitive price—the desire to escape any accusation of inflaming popular passions. For Gower, though a landowner and a Conservative, was outspoken in his denunciation of wrong. Later on he chose the same language for his Chronicon Tripartitum, a poem on Richard II.'s misgovernment. This was an attack on the unfortunate king even more bitter than the English Richard the Redeles ascribed to Langland.

The Confessio Amantis, by which Gower takes his place in English literature, contains a prologue, seven books on the seven deadly sins, and one on the duties of a king. As had already been shown in the Handlyng Synne, such a book need by no means be dull; and although Gower's poem has not that close touch with the daily life of its time which gives interest to its predecessor, it contains excellent reading. The sins are illustrated by stories, mostly from Ovid, but also from Statius, Josephus, Vincent de Beauvais, the Gesta Romanorum, and other sources. The duties of a king are laid down mainly from a celebrated medieval treatise, the Secreta Secretorum, supposed to have been written by Aristotle for the guidance of Alexander the Great. The octosyllabic couplets in which the poem is written are handled with freedom, and both rhymes and rhythm are regular and good. If accepted dates are right, Gower must have been nearly sixty when he wrote the Confessio Amantis, and it has the easy, pleasant garrulity which is sometimes found in old men's verse. This is how it began in its first form, written, it is thought, between 1383 and 1386. (The Confessio, of which some 40 MSS. are known, was printed by Caxton in 1483.) Our quotation is taken from Professor Morley's edited text in his Carisbrooke Library (1889), an excellent example of a popular edition :

Of hem that writen us to-fore	wrote

Ensamed of the oldé wise,
So that it might in suche a wise,
Whan we be dede and ellés where,
Belevé to the worldés ere,	Remain
In timé comend after this.	coming
But for men sain, and sothe it is,
That who that al of wisdom writ	writeth
It dulleth ofte a mannés wit
To hem that shall it allday rede ;	them
For thilké cause, if that ye rede,
I woldé go the middel wey
And write a boke betwene the twey,
Somwhat of lust, somewhat of lore,	pleasure
That, of the lasse or of the more,	either of poor or rich.
Som man may like of that I write.
And for that fewé men endite
In our Englishe, I thenké make
A boké for King Richardes sake,
To whom belongeth my legeaunce
With all min hertes obeisaunce
In all that ever a legé man
Unto his king may don or can,
So ferforth, and me recommaunde
To him which all me may commaunde,
Preiénd unto the highé regne	Praying
Which causeth every king to regne

That his coroné longé stonde.

I thenke and have it understonde
As it befell upon a tide,
As thing which shuldé tho betide,
Under the town of newé Troye,
Which toke of Brute his firsté joye,
In Themsé, whan it was flowend	flowing
As I by boté came rowend,
So as Fortune her timé sette,
My legé lord perchaunce I mette,
And so befell as I came nigh
Out of my bote, whan he me sigh,	saw
He bad me come into his barge,
And whan I was with him at large,
Amongés other thingés said
He hath this charge upon me laid
And bad me do my besinesse
That to his highé worthynesse
Some newé thing I shuldé boke	put into book form
That he himself it mighté loke
After the forme of my writing.

When Gower had transferred his service to Henry of Lancaster, he changed all the latter part of this, and wrote :

I thenké make
A boké for Englonde sake,
The yere sixtente of King Richard ;
What shall befallé here-afterward,
God wote, for nowé upon this side
Men seen the worlde on every side
In sondry wisé so diversed
That it wel nigh stant all reversed.

Richard had been no ill patron of poetry, and the unanimity with which Chaucer, Gower, and Langland (if he wrote Richard the Redeles) all welcomed the change of dynasty, though it may really represent the trend of popular opinion, proves also that, if poets do well not to put their trust in princes, princes on their side have small reason to trust poets.

In 1377, when starting for his second visit to Italy, Chaucer had appointed Gower one of his agents to look after his affairs during his absence ; in 1382 or 1383 he sportively dedicated his Troilus to the 'moral' Gower and the 'philosophical' Strode, the 'moral' Gower having probably just completed his Vox Clamantis. Five or six years later, in the talk on the road which precedes the 'Tale of Constance,' as it takes its place in the Canterbury series as the 'Man of Lawes Tale,' Chaucer goes out of his way to express his horror of the story of Canacee which Gower had taken from Ovid and included in the Confessio Amantis. There can be no doubt that the attack was dictated by personal feeling against Gower, and the cause may perhaps have been that the latter had included in the Confessio not only an epitome of the Troilus story, but also the very tale of Constance which the Man of Law was about to tell. We need not concern ourselves with this poets' quarrel, but the comparison between the two versions of Constance's story is not uninteresting. Here is

Gower's rendering of the scene on the seashore of which Chaucer's version has already been given on page 68 :

There was wepinge and there was wo,
But finally the thinge is do.
Upon the see they have her brought,
But she the causè wistè nought.
And thus upon the flood they wone
This lady with her yongè sone.
And than her hondès to the heven
She straught, and with a mildè steven voice
Knelend upon her barè kne
She saide : ' O highè magestee
Which seest the point of every trouth,
Take of thy wofull woman routh
And of this childe that I shal kepe.'
And with that word she gan to wepe
Swounend as dede, and there she lay,
But he, whiche allè thingès may,
Comforteth her, and attè laste
She loketh and her eyen caste
Upon her childe, and saydè this :
' Of me no maner charge it is What sorwe I suffre, but of thee
Methenketh it is great pitee,
For if I stervè thou shalt die,
So mote I nedès by that weie,
For moderhed and for tendernesse,
With al min hotè besinesse,
Ordeigné me for thilke office,
As she that shal be thy norice.'
Thus was she strengthed for to stonde,
And tho she toke her childe in honde
And gaf it souke and ever amonge
She wepte and otherwhile songe
To rockè with her childe aslepe.

Gower was not happy when he made Constance tell her babe that she would

With al min hotè besinesse
Ordeigne me for thilke office, and there is no line in his version of the exquisite simplicity of Chaucer's 'Pees, litel sone, I wol do thee noon harm,' but it would be hypercritical to deny Gower very considerable merit as a storyteller ; and as we find him turning from one tale to another and putting each of them into straightforward verse, not without some adjustment of tone to subject, it becomes possible for us to understand how for two centuries and more his name was always linked with Chaucer's, as only a little his inferior. In reality the difference was immense, but it was hardly greater than that which separates Gower's pleasant and readable verse from the pretentious prolixities of the next century.

Chaucer's Successors.

That Chaucer's delightful spring-tide should have been immediately succeeded, as far as what we may call literary poetry is concerned, by sheer November fog seems at first sight one of the strangest of accidents. In other departments of literature during the fifteenth century good work was being done. Prose, if it did not advance rapidly, was yet in quite a healthy condition. There was a respectable undergrowth of unpretentious religious verse ; the English ballads came into existence ; and in the miracle-plays and moralities, along with much very poor stuff, vivid and forcible writing can easily be found. But for a century and a half after Chaucer's death the literary or Court poetry at its best gives but little pleasure, at its average is tedious, and at its worst represents the lowest depth to which English poetry has ever fallen.

To attribute this long interregnum to an accident by which for more than a century no Englishman was born with an aptitude for poetry is against the law of average ; nor is it really difficult to find an explanation of the collapse. During the whole of the century every circumstance was unfavourable to literature. The continual wars told on the rich and educated classes even more heavily than on the commons, and the absolute cessation of the English school of illumination and calligraphy, which had reached such perfection at the end of the fourteenth century, proves how few wealthy patrons of literature were left in England during the Wars of the Roses. Closely connected with this is the depressing environment in which any literary poet must have found himself. After Agincourt there is nothing to be proud of in English history for the rest of the century, and the poverty of the country was probably a bar to literary intercourse with the Continent. When Chaucer began to write, English poetry was in great need of fresh inspiration, and through him she obtained it first from France, and then, to a far more important extent, from Italy. Among Chaucer's successors Stephen Hawes availed himself of French help to the extent of going back to that very dried-up fountain, the Roman de la Rose ; but no one turned to Italy at all ; and as far as kinship of spirit is concerned, not Lydgate, Hoccleve, or Hawes should be reckoned as Chaucer's real followers, but Surrey and Wyatt, who, by the help of Italian models, restored to English poetry the secrets of rhythm which he had found and his immediate successors had lost. Why they had lost them brings us to our last point, the fact, namely, that, while language is always in a state of transition, the condition of the English language was peculiarly transitional in the fifteenth century. Chaucer himself, with a poet's instinct, had probably been slightly archaic in matters of pronunciation and grammatical inflection. The music of his verse depends entirely on its full force being given to every syllable, and on the due pronunciation of the final e as an integral part of many words and as an inflection. During the fifteenth century the final e was largely disused, and the struggles of poets who took Chaucer as their model under these changed conditions are truly pitiable. On the one hand, his mobile decasyllabics are parodied by lifeless lines which require absolute monotony of voice for their scansion, and are made worse by their authors' fondness for long words; on the other, it seems possible that through the dropping of the final e many later writers misread the decasyllabics altogether, and regarded Chaucer's heroic couplets as only a new variety of the old octosyllables, to be read with four beats and a hasty slurring of any inconvenient syllables. Both these errors were destructive to poetry, and from the causes we have suggested the centre of poetic interest after Chaucer's death is transferred to Scotland (see page 166), where his example was as inspiring as that of Dante, Petrarch, and Boccaccio had been to him.

We pass now to the first successors of Chaucer, Thomas Hoccleve and John Lydgate, of whom, though the birth-date of neither is known with certainty, Hoccleve was probably a year or two the elder. In a poem written presumably in 1421 or 1422 he says of himself, 'Of age am I fifty winter and three,' and he must therefore have been born in 1368 or 1369—that is, about the time when Chaucer was writing his Dethe of Blaunche the Duchesse. He was probably born in London, and remained there till his old age, living in Chester's Inn. Originally intended for the priesthood, when he was nineteen or twenty he entered the Privy Seal Office as a clerk (c. 1387), and, as no ecclesiastical preferment was offered him, stayed there all his working life—some five-and-thirty years—till in 1424, by way of a retiring allowance, he was quartered on the Priory of Southwick, Hants. In November 1399 Henry IV., within six weeks of his accession (his even speedier benevolence to Chaucer will be remembered), had granted Hoccleve an annuity of £10 until some such provision could be made for him; and in 1409 this had been increased to £13, 6s. 8d. His earnings over and above this annuity, according to his own account, were no more than £4 a year, so that lack of pence pursued him all his life, and he may have sadly envied the comparative wealth with which a discriminating age rewarded Chaucer. But, as he justly remarks himself,

He that but little hath may do excess
In his degree, as well as may the rich;

and in his youth Hoccleve was a spendthrift, and in middle age, when he had given up hopes of a benefice, took 'more tow on his distaff' (his own phrase) by marrying a wife. When he writes of his follies and troubles Hoccleve becomes interesting. He was a weak creature, who tried to win popularity by spending more than he could afford, sinned and repented with much facility, and was always complaining. But he shows us himself just as he was, and writes in these passages with more ease and simplicity than on any other subject. His longest poem is the Regement of Princes, dedicated to Henry V., when Prince of Wales, in 1412, our illustration from Arundel MS. 38 in the British Museum, the Prince's own copy, representing the poet on his knees before his patron. The Regement of Princes is a patchwork from the De Regimine Principum of Ægidius Romanus (c. 1280), the Secreta Secretorum, the moral treatise of Jacobus de Cessolis afterwards printed by Caxton as 'The Game and Pley of the Chesse,' and other works. It is written in Chaucer's seven-line stanza, abounds in long words, and, save for its prologue, is tedious and dull. Another poem of some length, the story of 'Jereslaus' Wife,' from the Gesta Romanorum, is cast on the same lines as the 'Tale of Constance' used by Chaucer and Gower, and is readable, though poorly told. But all Hoccleve's best work is contained in the autobiographical prologue to the Regement; his Male Regle de T. Hoccleve, in which he recites his youthful follies; his Dialogue with a Friend; and some few others of his minor poems, not all of which have yet been printed.

Here, from the Male Regle, are some of his reminiscences (ll. 177-208):

Wher was a gretter maister eek than I,
Or bet acqweyntid at Westmynstre yate
Among the taverneres namely, specially
And cookes whan I cam, eerly or late?
I pynchid nat at hem in myn acate, 1, 2
But payed hem as that they axé wolde;
Wherefore I was the welcomer algate, always
And for 'a verray gentilman' y-holde.

And if it happid on the someres day
That I thus at the taverne haddé be,
Whan I departé sholde and go my way
Hoom to the Privee Seel, so wowed me wooed
Hete and unlust and superfluitee distaste
To walke unto the brigge and take a boot, boat
That nat durste I contrarie hem all three,
But dide as that they stiréd me, God woot.

And in the wyntir, for the way was deep,
Unto the brigge I dressid me also,
And there the bootmen took upon me keep, heed
For they my riot kneewen fern ago: long
With them was I y-tugged to and fro,
So wel was him that I with woldé fare
For riot paieth largely evermo;
He styntith never til his purs be bare.

Othir than 'Maister' callid was I nevere,
Among this meynce, in myn audience. company
Methoughte I was y-maad a man for evere,
So tikelid me that nyce reverence foolish

That it me madé larger of despense
Than that I thoght han been. O Flateriè!
The guye of thy traitérous diligence
Is folk to mescheef haasten and to hie. hurry

The Prologue to the Regement of Princes, with its talk of Chaucer, the follies of fashionable clothing, and the treatment of old soldiers, is interesting throughout, but we can only quote from it Hoccleve's complaint of the irksomeness of his work as a clerk:

With plow can I nat medlen, ne with harwe,
Ne wot nat what lond good is for what corne;
And for to lade a cart or fille a barwe,—
To which I never uséd was to-forne,—
My bak unbuxum hath swich thyng forsworne, stubborn
At instance of Writyng, his werreyour foeman
That Stopping hath hym spilt with his labour. hurt

Many men, fadir, wenen that writynge
No travaile is; thei hold it but a game:
Art hath no foe but swich folk unconnyng: 1
But whoso list disport hym in that same,
Let him continue, and he schal fynd it grame; harm
It is well gretter labour than it seemeth;
The blindé man of coloures al wrong deemeth.

A writer mot thre thyngés to hym knytte,
And in tho may be no disseverance;
Mynde, eye and hand, non may fro othir flitte
But in hem mot be joynt continuance.
The mynde all hoole, withouten variance, whole
On the eye and hand awayté moot alway,
And thei two eek on hym: it is no nay.

Whoso schal wryté, may nat holde a tale talk
With hym and hym, ne syngé this ne that; this man and that
But all his wittés hoolé, grete and smale,
Ther must appere, and halden hem ther-at;
And syn he speké may, ne syngé nat,
But bothé two he nedés moot forbere,
Hir labour to hym is the alengere. more troublesome

Thise artificers se I day by day,
In the hottéste of al hir bysynessé
Talken and syng and maké game and play,
And forth hir labour passith with gladnessé;
But we labour in travailous stilnessé; irksome
We stowpe and stare upon the shepés-skyn,
And keepé muste our song and wordés in.

The whole passage is good, and the last couplet gives Hoccleve a claim to the affectionate respect of all the many poets since his day who have had, by some distasteful occupation, to earn the livelihood which their verses would not buy them. It need hardly be said, however, that a writer whose claims to remembrance have to be based on work like this had only the slightest touch of poetry in him, and Hoccleve himself seems to have regarded his verse-making chiefly as a means of winning influential friends. When he left the Privy Seal

Office he appears almost to have given up writing, but 'a Balade to my gracious Lord of Yorke' (the father of Edward IV.) shows that he must have lived till 1450 or thereabout, and still occasionally cudgelled out poetry. It need only be added that Hoccleve was a very orthodox person, argued with Sir John Oldcastle about his heresies in a poem of five hundred and twelve lines, and thoroughly approved of the burning of John Badby in 1410. His Regement of Princes and minor poems were edited for the Early English Text Society by Furnivall, from whose introductions our notice of him has been largely drawn. Gollancz edited a further volume of Minor Poems (E.E.T.S., 1925).

In 'London Lyckpenny,' John Lydgate showed that he could invest his verse with the same interest which attaches to Hoccleve's reminiscences. Unfortunately this short poem¹ is the only thing of the kind among the hundred and fifty thousand lines assigned to him. Born in 1370 or a little after, at Lydgate, near Newmarket. John entered his noviciate at the great Benedictine abbey at Bury St Edmunds before he was fifteen, became a sub-deacon in 1389, deacon in 1393, and priest in 1397. In 1423 he was elected Prior of Hatfield Regis, but in 1434 went back to Bury for his health's sake. In his old age he received, in conjunction with a certain John Baret, a small pension, his share coming to £3, 16s. 8d., and he lived apparently till 1449. He may have studied in his youth at Oxford, and in 1421 he was at Paris, on what business we know not, but apart from his duties as a monk, his sole occupation was to turn out verses, and this he did with painful abundance.

Adopting the chronology of Dr Schick, the editor of his Temple of Glass for the Early English Text Society (1891), we find that before he was thirty Lydgate versified some of the fables of Æsop, and wrote two poems, the Chorl and Bird, and Horse, Goose, and Sheep, which subsequently enjoyed the honour of being printed and reprinted by Caxton. During the next dozen years (1400-1411) he is credited with having written the Flour of Curtesie, Black Knight, Temple of Glass, Assembly of Gods, Court of Sapience, Reason and Sensuality, and a Lyf of Our Lady. From 1412 onwards his work increases enormously in volume, and deteriorates in quality. The Troy-Book (30,000 lines) is thought to have occupied him till 1420, and to have been immediately succeeded by the Storie of Thebes (4716 lines). The Pilgrimage de Mounde, translated from the French of De Guilleville (12,000 lines), was his next large work; and in 1430 he began the Fall of Princes, a prolix rendering from Boccaccio's De Casibus Illustrium Virorum, which runs to over thirty-six thousand lines, or about twice as much as all the verse in Chaucer's Canterbury Tales. At intervals amid these compositions Lydgate wrote on Guy of Warwick, on the Dance of Death, on St Margaret, St Edmund (with unusual success), and St Alban. In 1445 he composed verses for Queen Margaret's entry into London, and about this time wrote his poetical Testament and engaged in a rendering of the Secreta Secretorum, which was finished after his death by Bennet Burgh, the last line of Lydgate's section being the curiously apposite, 'Death all consumeth, which may nat be denied.'

Lydgate's admiration for Chaucer was as hearty as Hoccleve's. His Complaint of the Black Knight is an imitation of Chaucer's Dethe of Blaunche, and his Siege of Thebes was written as an additional Canterbury Tale, which he supposes himself to have told on the way home at Harry Bailey's request. He wrote in all of Chaucer's three chief metres; in the octosyllabic couplet with some fluency; in seven-line decasyllabics, woodenly enough, but not so badly as to be past hope of scansion; in the decasyllabic couplet, even if allowance be made for the defects of the sixteenth-century texts, with an absolute failure to grasp the elementary principles of its music. Save as specimens of language all these poems are dead, and it is waste of space to speak of them; but here, in contrast to them, is Lydgate's one bit of real life, poetry only of a very low order, but with vigour and swing in it, and still full of interest. The poet has come to Westminster to seek justice, but finds that without money in his purse he can do nothing, and so he goes from place to place and fares no better, till he takes his way back again to the country:

To London once my steppes I bent,
Where trouth in no wyse should be faynt;
To Westmynster-ward I forthwith went,
To a man of law to make complaynt;
I sayd, 'For Mary's love, that holy saynt!
Pity the poore that wold procede;
But for lack of mony I cold not spede.

And as I thrust the prese amonge, crowd
By froward chaunce my hood was gone,
Yet for all that I stayd not longe,
Tyll to the Kinges Bench I was come.
Before the judge I kneled anon,
And prayd hym for Godes sake to take heed;
But for lack of mony I myght not spede.

In Westmynster-Hall I found out one,
Which went in a long gown of raye; striped cloth
I crowched and kneled before him anon,
For Mary's love I of help hym pray.
'I wot not what thou meanest,' gan he say:
To get me thence he dyd me bede: pray
For lack of mony I cold not spede.

Within this hall, nether rich nor yett poor
Wold do for me ought, although I shold dye:
Which seing, I gat me out of the doore,
Where Flemings began on me for to cry:
'Master, what will you copen or by? purchase

¹ H. N. MacCracken, who edited the Minor Poems (E.E.T.S., 1912-34), contests Lydgate's authorship of it. Other E.E.T.S. publications include the Troy Book (1906-35), the Pilgrimage (1889-1904), the Fall of Princes (1924-27), and the Dance of Death (1931).

Fyne felt hattes? or spectacles to reede?
Lay down your sylver, and here you may speede.'

Then to Westmynster-gate I presently went,
When the sonnè was at hyghè prime: about nine o'clock
Cookès to me they tooke good entente,
And profered me bread, with ale and wyne,
Rybbès of befe, both fat and ful fyne;
A sayrè cloth they gan for to sprede,
But, wantyng mony, I myght not speede.

Then unto London I dyd me hye,
Of all the land it beareth the pryse;
'Hot pescods!' one began to cry;
'Strabery ripe, and cherries in the ryse!' on the bough
One bad me come nere and by some spyce;
Peper and safforne they gan me bede; offer
But, for lack of mony, I myght not spede.

Then to the Chepe I gan me drawne,
Where much people I saw for to stand;
One ofred me velvet, sylke, and lawne;
Another he taketh me by the hande,
'Here is Parys thred, the fynest in the land!'
I never was used to such thynges, in dede;
And, wantyng mony, I myght not spede.

Then went I forth by London Stone,
Throughout all Canwyké Streete: 1
Drapers much cloth me ofred anone;
Then met I one cryed 'Hot shepe's feete';
One cryde 'makerell'; 'ryshes grene' another gan cry
greete;
One bad me by a hood to cover my head;
But, for want of mony, I myght not be sped.

Then I hyed me unto Est-Chepe,
One cryes rybbs of befe, and many a pye;
Pewter pottes they clattered on a heape;
There was harpe, pype, and mynstralsye;
'Yea, by cock! nay, by cock!' some began cry; by God
Some songe of Jenkin and Julyan for their mede; 2
But, for lack of mony, I myght not spede.

Then into Cornhyll anon I yode, went
Where was much stolen gere amonge;
I saw where honge mine ownè hoode
That I had lost amonge the thronge;
To by my own hood I thought it wronge:
I knew it well, as I dyd my Crede;
But, for lack of mony, I could not spede.

The taverner tooke me by the sleve,
'Sir,' sayth he, 'wyllyou our wyne assay?'
I answered: 'That can not much me greve,
A peny can do no more then it may;'
I drank a pynt, and for it dyd paye;
Yet, sore a-hungerd from thence I yede, went
And, wantyng mony, I cold not spede; &c.

Lydgate was not the only ecclesiastic prolific of bad verses in Chaucerian metres; we have, for instance, the Legends of the Saints, in some ten thousand decasyllabics, by Osbern Bokenam, a Suffolk man and an Augustinian friar; also the Life of St Katherine of Alexandria, in seven-line stanzas (some nine thousand lines), by John Capgrave, another Augustinian, belonging to the neighbouring county (see below, page 89). Benet Burgh, the 'young follower' who carried on Lydgate's version of the Secreta Secretorum, translated also the Moralia of Dionysius Cato in stanzas quite up to the average work of this century. George Ashby, a Clerk of the Signet, may be said to have carried on Hoccleve's tradition by the dreary poem on the Active Policy of a Prince, which he addressed to Edward Prince of Wales, possibly in 1460, possibly ten years later. He wrote also a Prohemium unius Prisonarii ('A Prisoner's Prologue'), and Englished in verse some of the 'Sayings of the Philosophers,' afterwards printed by Caxton in Lord Rivers' prose. His chief interest is that he illustrates with unusual clearness the process by which Chaucer's five-foot decasyllabics were being converted into a ragged line of four beats. It is not too much, indeed, to say that in all this wilderness of tedious verse the only oases to be found (outside pieces at one time attributed to Chaucer himself) are a few devotional poems in which true feeling has gifted some unknown writer with a felicity he could hardly himself have appreciated. The 'Vernon' manuscript, printed by the Early English Text Society in 1892, contains some such pieces; and here is a snatch from another, embedded in a Speculum Christiani ('Christian's Looking-Glass') printed by William de Machlinia about 1485, attributed not very certainly to John Watton:

Mary moder, wel thou be!
Mary moder, thenke on me;
Mayden and moder was never none
Togeder, Lady, saf thou allone.
Swete Lady, mayden clene,
Schilde me fro ille schame and tene;
Out of synne, Lady, schilde thou me,
And oute of dette for charitee.

Lady, for thy joyès fyve,
Gete me grace in thys lyve,
To knowe and kepe over all thyng
Cristen feith and Goddes byddyng,
And trewly wynne alle that I nede
To me and myn clothe and fede.

Helpe me, Lady, and alle myne;
Schilde me, Lady, from helle pyne; torment
Schilde me, Lady, from vyleny,
And from all wicked companye.

Poetry was not utterly dead when such simple lines as these could be written; and in another quarter modern research has recently discovered for us three poets who, writing for their own pleasure and not at the bidding of prince or abbot, have enjoyed the distinction of having their work pass for nearly four centuries under the name of Chaucer himself. The first of these is a certain Clanvowe, identified with a Sir Thomas Clanvowe, who, though he ultimately held Lollard views, was a courtier and friend of Prince Hal's in the reign of Henry IV. His poem is The Cuckoo and the Nightingale, written in a five-line stanza with a delicacy and sense of rhythm not unworthy of Chaucer himself. Witness these lines:

'Allas,' quod she, 'my herté wol to-breke
To heren thus this falsé brid to speke
Of love, and of his worshipful servyse.
Now, god of love, thou help me in som wyse
That I may on this Cukkow been awreke.'

Me thoughté than that I sterte up anon
And to the brooke I ran, and gat a ston,
And at the Cukkow hertély I caste;
And he, for dredé, fley away ful faste;
And glad was I when that he was a-goon.

And evermore the Cukkow, as he fley,
He seyde 'Farewel! farewel, papinjay!'
As though he hadde scornéd, thoughté me;
But ay I hunted him fro tree to tree
Til he was fer al out of sighte away.

And thanné com the Nightingale to me,
And seyde 'Frend, forsothe I thanké thee,
That thou hast lyked me thus to rescowe;
And oon avow to Love I wol avowe,
That al this May I wol thy singer be.'
(Chaucerian and other Pieces; ed. Skeat, 1897.)

Professor Skeat has shown that a reference to the queen at Woodstock must apply to Joan of Navarre, who held the manor of Woodstock as part of her dower, and that the poem must have been written between 1403 and 1410, a date quite in keeping with the purity with which the fragrance of Chaucer's manner has been preserved.

Our second poet is a Sir Richard Ros, a Leicestershire knight, who about 1460 translated La Belle Dame sans Merci of Alain Chartier. Despite the charm of its title, which the translator had the good sense to retain, Chartier's poem is a dull one, and the best that can be said of Sir Richard's rendering is, that it is smoother and more fluent than most of the verse of its time. But he prefixed to it a short prologue of his own, and the two splendid lines with which this begins—

Half in a dream, not fully well awaked,
The golden sleep me wrapt under his wing—

entitle their author to respectful mention.

Our last Chaucerian poet is unidentified, a fact the more to be regretted as it can hardly be doubted that she was a lady. The two pieces which are assigned to her are (1) The Flower and the Leaf, a delightfully pretty poem, based on Chaucer's line, 'I ne wot who serveth Leef ne who the Flower,' in the prologue to the Legend of Good Women; and (2) the less 'happily conceived Assembly of Ladies. Both are written in Chaucer's seven-line stanza with ease and abundant music. Here, from the former poem, is a description of the effect of heat and storm on the gay company of the flowers:

For-shronk with hete; the ladies eek to-brent burnt up
That they ne wist where they hem might bestow;
The knightés swelt, for lak of shade ny shent;
And after that within a litel throw,
The wind began so sturdily to blow,
That down goth al the flourés everichon,
So that in al the mede there laft not on,

Save suche as socoured were, among the leves,
Fro every stormé, that might hem assail,
Growing under hegges and thikké greves;
And after that there came a storm of hail
And rain in-fere, so that, withouten fail,
The ladies ne the knightés ne hadde o threed together
Drye upon hem, so dropping was hir weed.

And when the storm was clené passed away,
Tho clad in whyte, that stood under the tree,
They felté nothing of the grete affray
That they in greené without had in y-be.
To hem they yedé for routh and pité,
Hem to comfort after their greet disese;
So fain they were the helpless for to ese.

1 Sweltered. 2 Almost destroyed.

Professor Skeat, to whom scholars are under deep obligations for his admirable edition of these 'Chauceriana,' places these two poems, mainly for linguistic reasons, as late as the last quarter of the fifteenth century. If this be so, the three poets, Clanvowe, Ros, and the unknown lady, come at the beginning, the middle, and the end of the dullest century of English verse, and certainly help greatly to redeem its credit.

English Prose Writers, 1380-1500.

The necessity of exhibiting the influence of Chaucer's poetry on his successors has caused us to leave the history of English prose far behind, but we must now review its development during this period. Chaucer's own work in prose, though very inferior to his poetry, is not without its interest and importance. The 'Tale of Melibee' and the 'Parson's Sermon' in the Canterbury Tales, considering that they are both translations, are written with fluency and directness. In the address to his little son Lewis, prefixed to the treatise on the Astrolabe, he stumbled, as other writers have done in talking to children, on a graceful simplicity. With the omission of a few sentences, it runs thus:

Lyte [little] Lowys my sone, I aperceyve wel by certeyne evidences thyn abilité to lerne sciences touching nombres and proporciouns; and as wel considre I thy bisy praier in special to lerne the Tretys of the Astrelabie. . . . Therefore have I yeven the a suffisant Astrolabie as for oure orizonte [horizon] compowned [constructed] after the latitude of Oxenforde; upon which, by mediacioun of this litel tretys, I propose to teche the a certain nombre of conclusions perteynyng to the same instrument. . . .

This tretis, divided in five parties, wol I shewe thee under full light reules and naked wordes in Englyshe, for Latyn canst thou yit but small, my litel sone. But natheles suffice to thee these trewe conclusions in Englisshe as wel as sufficith to these noble clerkes Grekes these same conclusions in Greke; and to Arabiens in Arabike, and to Iewes in Ebrewes, and to the Latyn folk in Latyn; whiche Latyn folke had hem first oute of othere dyverse langages, and writen hem in her owne tunge, that is to seyn in Latyn. And God woot that in alle these langages and in many moo han these conclusions ben suffisantly lerned and taught, and yit by diverse reules; right as diverse pathes leden diverse folke the right way to Rome. Now wol I preie mekely every discret persone that redith or herith this litel tretys to have my rude endityng for excused, and my superfluite of wordes, for two causes. The first cause is for that curiouse endityng and harde sentence [meaning] is ful hevy at onys [once] for such a childe to lerne. And the secunde cause is this, that sothly me semith better to writen unto a childe twyes a gode sentence, than he forgete it onys.

And Lowys, yf so be that I shewe the in my light Englissh as trewe conclusions touching this mater, and not only as trewe but as many and as subtile conclusions, as ben shewid in Latyn in eny commune tretys of the Astrelabie, konne me the more thanke. And preie God save the king, that is lorde of this language, and alle that him feithe berith and obeieith, everiche in his degre, the more and the lasse. But conside wel that I ne usurpe [claim] not to have founden this werke of my labour or of myn engyn [ingenuity]. I nam but a lewde [ignorant] compiler of the labour of olde astrologiens, and have it translatid in myn Englissh only for thy doctrine [instruction]. And with this swerde shal I sleen [slay] envie.

In his only other prose work, his translation of the De Consolatione Philosophie of Boethius, Chaucer's positive success is much less. The De Consolatione is a difficult book, and Chaucer's translation often needs the Latin to make it intelligible. But the test of progress in prose is the ability of the writer to find phrases for new ideas, and to arrange in due order sentences of a more complex kind than are used in conversational narrative. In making the first English translation of a philosophical work—a work, moreover, full of high-flown metaphor—Chaucer had to face these difficulties; and though he is often defeated, his attempt was a noteworthy event in the history of English prose. Here are a few sentences from his version of the fifth 'Metre' of Book I., 'O stelliferi conditor orbis':

O thow makere of the wheel that bereth the sterres, whiche that art festnyd to thi perdurable chayer [throne], and turnest the hevene with a ravyschyng sweighe [sound as of wind], and constreynest the sterres to suffren thi lawe; so that the moone som-tyme, schynyng with hir fulle hornes metyng with alle the beemes of the sonne hir brothir, hideth the sterres that ben lasse, and som-tyme, whan the moone pale with hir derke hornes aprocheth the sonne, leeseth hir lyghtes; and that the eve sterre, Hesperus, whiche that in the first tyme of the nyght bryngeth forth hir colde arysnynges, cometh eft ayen hir used cours, and is pale by the morwe at wysyng of the sonne, and is thanne clepid Lucifer! Thow restreynest the day by schortere duellyng in the tyme of cold wynter, that maketh the leeves falle. Thow devydest the swyfte tydes of the nyght, whan the hote somer is comen. Thy myghte attempreth the variauntes sesouns of the yer, so that Zephirus, the debonere wynd, bryngeth ayen in the first somer sesoun the leeves that the wynd that hyghte Boreas hath reft away in autumpne; and the seedes that the sterre that highte Aucturus saugh, ben waxen heye cornes whan the sterre Syrius eschaufeth [warms] hem. Ther nys no thyng unbounde from his olde lawe, ne forleteth [nor that foregoes] the werk of his propre estat. O governour, governyng alle thynges by certein ende, whi refusetow only to governe the werkes of men by duwe manere?

Crabbed as this seems at a first reading, the successive clauses rise and fall with a true prose rhythm; and that Chaucer attained this rhythm, however fitfully, in translating so difficult a book, gives him a place among the pioneers of the more complex harmonies of English prose, as distinct from simple narrative.

Chaucer's translation was responsible for another prose work, the Testament of Love, which, until the discovery that the opening letters of its chapters formed the sentence, 'Margarete of vertu have merci on thin[e] Usk,' was often attributed to his own pen. Thomas Usk was arrested in 1384 for complicity in the schemes of John of Northampton (Mayor of London, 1381-83), to whom he had acted as secretary. He gave evidence against his associates, and on this score, and because of his return from Lollardy to orthodoxy (his Margaret, or Pearl, of Virtue probably stands for the Church), confidently expected an acquittal, but was executed in 1388. During his imprisonment he wrote the Testament of Love, a kind of adaptation of the De Consolatione to his own case, in which he alludes to Chaucer by name, and makes free use not only of his translation of Boethius, but of his House of Fame as well. Though intolerably tedious, the book is not badly written; but lovers of Chaucer still owe it a grudge because of the accusation of treachery founded on it at the time when it was, quite inexcusably, reckoned among his works.

We come now to another book about which modern research has dispelled some venerable errors—the Travels of Sir John Mandeville. Mandeville, it used to be said, wrote an account of his own travels in English in 1356, and thereby became the 'Father' of English Prose, just as Chaucer was the 'Father' of English Poetry. We now know that, though an English knight named Sir John Mandeville lived at an earlier date, his only connection with the Travels was that the real compiler of them chose to use this name at first as a nom de guerre, eventually (apparently) as if it were really his own. This compiler was a certain Jean de Bourgogne¹ or Jean à la Barbe, who depicts himself as meeting 'Mandeville' on his travels. Thirdly, though this Jean de Bourgogne may have visited Palestine, there is no probability of his having gone farther afield, his description of other lands being demonstrably borrowed from earlier writers, such as Jacques de Vitry and Friar Odoric of Pordenone. Fourthly, the Travels were originally written not in English, nor in Latin, but in French, and the earliest English reference to them is to the original and not to any English version. Lastly, three distinct English translations are extant, all probably made within twenty years before or after 1400, and all showing clear traces of their origin by obvious blunders due to misreading French words. A full account of all three versions and of the French original will be found in the introduction to G. F. Warner's edition of the most northern of the English translations (printed for the Roxburghe Club, 1889). The Travels thus not being an original work, their importance in the history of English prose is naturally diminished; but it must also be said that, even as an original work, their importance would not be so great as used to be maintained. Any one who looks at the Prologue in the best of the three versions (that of the unique Cotton MS. in the British Museum) will see at once that the writer was absolutely incapable of dealing with a complex sentence, while in simple narrative he is certainly not superior to Hampole. The real importance of the 'Mandeville' lies in its subject. From the Conquest to the reign of Richard II. there is no English prose except on religious subjects. At last Englishmen are tempted to render into their own tongue a delightful book of travels, and the novelty of this attempt, aided by the straightforward narrative of the original, lends a charm and a freshness to their style which has enabled the book to retain its hold on English readers for five centuries. As the use of the plural in our last sentence indicates, the English version of the Travels now current is really of composite authorship, owing much to a slightly earlier rendering, made from a defective French text, but which was much the most popular. This earlier version was printed by Wynkyn de Worde, often reprinted in the sixteenth century, and in 1933. The current text exists only in a single manuscript, and was first printed in 1725; while the third version, also extant only in one manuscript, was first printed by Mr Warner in 1889. Our specimen is taken from the current text, and follows the Cotton manuscript itself:

From that contree men passen be [by] many marches [borders] toward a contree a ten journeyes thens, that is clept Mabaron; and it is a gret kyngdom, and it hath many faire cytees and townes.

In that kyngdom lith the body of seynt Thomas the Apostle in flesch and bon, in a faire tombe in the cytee of Calamyne; for there he was martyred and buried. And men of Assirie beere his body into Mesopatayme, into the cytee of Edisse, and after, he was brought thider agen. And the arm and the hond that he putte in oure Lordes syde, whan He appered to him after His resurrexioun and seyde to him, Noli esse incredulus sed fidelis, is yit lyggyng [lying] in a vessell withouten the tombe. And be that hond thei maken all here [their] juggementes in the contree, whoso hath right or wrong. For whan ther is any dissencioun betwene two partyes and every of hem [them] meynteneth his cause and seyth that his cause is rightfull, and that other seyth the contrarye, thanne bothe partyes writen here causes in two billes and putten hem in the hond of Seynt Thomas, and anon he casteth away the bille of the wrong cause, and holdeth stille the bille with the right cause, and therfore men comen fro fer contrees to have juggement of doutable causes, and other juggement use thei non there.

Also the chirche where seynt Thomas lyth is bothe gret and fair and all full of grette simulacres, and tho be grette ymages that thei clepen here goddes, of the whiche the leste is als [as] gret as two men. And amonges theise othere there is a gret ymage, more than any of the othere, that is all covered with fyn gold and precious stones and riche perles, and that ydole is the god of false cristene that han reneyed [denied] hire feyth. And it sytteth in a chayere of gold; full nobely arrayed, and he hath aboute his necke large gyrdles wrought of gold and precious stones and perles. And this chirche is full richely wrought and all over-gylt withinne. And to that ydole gon men on pilgrimage als comounly and with als gret devocioun as cristene men gon to seynt James or other holy pilgrimages. And many folk that comen fro fer londes to seke that ydole, for the gret devocoun that thei han, thei loken nevere upward, but everemore down to the erthe, for drede to see any thing aboute hem that scholde lette [hinder] hem of here devocioun. And somme ther ben that gon on pilgrimage to this ydole that beren knyfes in hire hondes, that ben made full kene and scharpe, and allweyes as thei gon thei smyten himself in here armes, and in here legges, and in here thyves with many hidouse woundes, and so thei schede here blood for love of that ydole. And thei seyn that he is blessed and holy that dyeth so for love of his god. And othere there ben that leden hire children for to sle to make sacrificie to that ydole, and after thei han slayn hem thei spryngen [sprinkle] the blood upon the ydole. And somme ther ben that comen fro ferr, and in goinge toward this ydole, at every thrydde pas that thei gon fro here hous, thei knele and so contynnew till thei come thider. And whan thei comen there thei taken ensense and other aromatyke thinges of noble smell and sensen the ydole, as we wolde don here Goddes precyouse body. And so comen folk to worshipsche this ydole, sum fro an hundred myle and somme fro many mo.

And yee schull understonde that whan grette festes and solempnytees of that ydole, as the dedicacioun of the chirche and the thronyng of the ydole, be, all the contree aboute meten there togidere, and thei setten this ydole upon a chare [car] with gret reverence, wol arrayed with clothes of gold of riche clothes of Tartarye, of Camacia, and other precyous clothes, and thei leden him aboute the cytee with gret solempnytee. And before the chare gon first in processioun all the maydenes of the contree two and two togydere full ordynatly; and after the maydenes gon the pilgrymes; and somme of hem falle down under the wheles of the chare and lat the chare gon over hem so that thei be dede anon, and somme han here armes or here lymes all to-broken and somme the sydes, and all this don thei for love of hire god in gret devocioun. And he thinketh that the more peyne and the more tribulacioun that thei suffre for love of hire god the more joye thei schull have in another world. And schortly to seye you thei suffren so grete paynes and so harde martyrdomes for love of here ydole that a cristene man, I trowe, durst not taken upon him the tenthe part the peyne for love of oure lord Jhesu Crist.

And after I seye you before the chare gon all the mynstrelles of the contrey withouten number with dyverse instrumentes, and thei maken all the melodye that thei cone. And whan thei han gon all aboute the cytee thanne thei returnen agen to the mynstre and putten the ydole agen into his place. And thanne for the love and in worschipe of that ydole and for the reverence of the feste thei slen hem-self, a cc or ccc persones, with scharpe knyfes. Of the whiche thei bryngen the bodyes before the ydole, and than thei seyn that tho ben seyntes, because that thei slown hem-self of here owne gode wille for love of here ydole. And as men here that hadde an holy seynt of his kyn wolde thinke that it were to hem an high worschipe right so hem thinketh there. And as men here devoutly wolde wryten holy seyntes lyfes and here myracles and sewen for here canonyzaciouns, right so don thei there for hem that sleen hemself wilfully for love of here ydol, and seyn that thei ben gloriouse martyres and seyntes and putten hem in here wrytynges and in here litanyes, and avaunten hem gretly, on to another, of here holy kynnesmen that so becomen seyntes and seyn I have mo holy seyntes in my kynrede than thou in thine.

With the Mandeville translators must be mentioned John of Trevisa, a Cornishman, born in 1326, who became an Oxford scholar, and devoted many years of his long life to translations, and even wrote a little treatise (A Dialogue between a Lord and a Clerk) on how the work of translation should be done. Among other books, he rendered into English the great medieval compilation of natural history, De Proprietatibus Rerum ('Of the Properties of Things'), by Bartholomew the Englishman; a sermon of Richard Fitzralph, Archbishop of Armagh, against the Friars; Vegetius, De Re Militari; Ægidius, De Regimine Principum; and Nicodemus, De Passione Christi. But the book by which Trevisa is best known, chiefly because Caxton continued and printed it, is his translation, finished in 1387, of the Polychronicon, or General History, written by Ranulph Higden, a monk of Chester, about 1350. As we have already seen (page 33), in Englishing Higden's Latin, Trevisa sometimes interpolated an interesting note, and when his author gives him a chance he can find vigorous enough English, as witness this account of the deposition of Edward II.:

The same while the kyng of Engelond was i-take in the castel of Neth in West Wales, and i-putte in ward, in the castel of Kelyngworthe. Hewe the Spenser the yonge was i-take with the kyng, and anhonged and to-drawe at Hereford, byheded and i-quartered, and his heed was i-sent to Londoun brige. Also that yere in the occabis [octave] of the Twelfthe Day was made a parlement at Londoun, there by comoun ordynaunce weren solempne messangers i-sent to the kyng that was in prisoun, thre bisshoppes, thre erles, tweye barouns, two abbottes and two justices, forto resigne to the kyng that was thoo in warde the homage that was i-made to hym somtyme, for they wolde no lenger have hym for her lord. One of hem, Sire William Trussele, knyght and procuratour of all the parlement, spak to the kyng in the name of all the othere and seide these wordes: 'I, William Trussell, in the name of alle men of the lond of Engelond, and of al the parlement procuratour, I resign to the, Edward, the homage that was i-made to the somtyme, and fro this tyme forthward I defie the, and prive the of al real [royal] power, and I schal nevere be tendaunt to thee as for kyng after this tyme.' Also this was opounliche i-cried at Londoun.

But the general level of the Polychronicon is not high, and no such popular success as the 'Mandeville' attained was possible to its translator.

John Wyclif.—The philosophy of Boethius, the travels of Mandeville, the nature-lore of Bartholomæus Anglicus, and the history of Higden were all put into English prose within a few years of 1380, and it was just at this time also that the scholar, theologian, and patriot, John Wyclif, awoke to the importance of the weapon which the development of English prose offered to his hand. Born about 1320 near Richmond in Yorkshire, and probably connected with the family of Wycliffe who were lords of the manor of Wycliffe-on-Tees, John Wyclif must have entered Oxford as a lad, and by 1360 had become Master of Balliol. This office he resigned in 1361 to become Rector of Fillingham, in Lincolnshire; but in 1365 he was again at Oxford, holding the Wardenship of Cantorbury Hall (afterwards incorporated with Christ Church), from which in 1367 he was ousted by Archbishop Langham to make room for a monastic head.

Up to this date Wyclif had been simply an Oxford scholar, and had no doubt gained his reputation by the Latin treatises on Logic and Metaphysics, which have come down to us among his works. He was now to take a prominent part in public affairs, and he seems to have been singled out as a champion against papal aggression owing to his maintenance of a theory of dominium, or the ideal source of all rights in property, which is so important, as the keynote of his teaching, that it may be briefly explained.

The feudal system had accustomed men's minds to expect that all property should be held by tenure from some higher power, and there had been great controversy on the Continent as to whether the Emperor was the source of all earthly lordship and himself held the Empire direct from God, or whether he and every one else held their lordship only through the Pope. As England was outside the Holy Roman Empire, the question had presented itself in a different light in this country, and indignation at the compact by which King John held his crown subject to tribute to the Pope offered further inducements to a broader view. Thus Wyclif was only following Richard Fitzralph, Archbishop of Armagh, in maintaining that God Himself was the chief lord of all possessions, and that, ideally, all property was held directly from Him and subject to the obligation of faithful service. That at a later date this theory was misrepresented as justifying the mob in depriving wicked property-owners of their wealth does not detract from its ideal truth. With it Wyclif combated the theological and historical arguments adduced to prove the Pope's right to 'provide' for his servants at the expense of the patrons of English livings, and to justify the excessive endowment of the clergy. We must not trench on English history by narrating in detail how he supported the king and Parliament in their refusal of Pope Urban V.'s demand (made in 1366) for the arrears of tribute due under John's compact; or how he took part in the movement to confiscate superfluous clerical endowments, and was one of a mission to Bruges in 1374 to treat with the papal delegates in the matter of 'Provisions'; or, finally, how he was summoned before the Archbishop of Canterbury at St Paul's on February 19, 1377, to answer for his opinions, and saw his judges routed by the influence of the Court on the one hand, and of the Londoners on the other. Papal bulls were issued against him, but an attempt to enforce them at Lambeth met the same fate as the previous trial at St Paul's; and meanwhile the Great Council showed its respect for Wyclif by submitting to him the question whether it could rightly forbid money to be taken out of the country for the Pope's behoof.

Up to this time, as far as we know, Wyclif had concerned himself chiefly with the politics of Church and State, and no charge of heresy in other matters had been brought against him; but the papal schism of 1378, which led to the supporters of the rival popes taking up arms against each other, shook his belief in the whole fabric of medieval theology. He now attacked the papacy on nearly every point on which the English Church subsequently revolted, and by this time, if not before, was maintaining with great vehemence a quarrel with the Friars, and sending out his 'Poor Preachers' into the villages to take their place. He still wrote in Latin with restless activity, but he wrote now, both in controversy and in teaching, in English far more than ever before. In these English tracts he was aided, no doubt, by many of his Oxford friends, so that many of them must be roughly classed as Wyclifite rather than assigned dogmatically to Wyclif himself—a distinction which applies also to the great work of translating the Bible, with which his name will always be connected. At Oxford his influence was very great, even after he began the attacks on papal doctrines, which were far less calculated to enlist popular support than those on papal practice.

From 1380 to 1382 the battle went on, and at last Wyclif's friends in the university were finally defeated by the Archbishop's influence, and forced to submit. But Wyclif himself, for some reason, was left practically unmolested, and died peacefully at his rectory of Lutterworth on the last day of 1384. Of his work as a preacher and a theologian this is not the place to speak; nor is any one of his English tracts, taken by itself, of any importance in English literature. Collectively their importance is considerable, for they enlarged the bounds of the language, and by their individual appeal and vigorous tone brought a new element into English literature. The extracts which follow are taken from The English Works of Wyclif hitherto Unprinted, edited by Mr F. D. Matthew (E.E.T.S., 1880; see also Bibliography, p. 162), and are all from tracts which in the editor's judgment may reasonably be assigned to Wyclif himself. As here printed the spelling has been slightly normalised. The first quotation is from the tract 'Of Servants and Lords,' and combats accusations of socialism:

But yet summe men that ben out of charite sclaudren pore prestes with this errour, that servauntes or tenauntes may lawefully withholde rentes and service fro here lordes, whan lordes ben openly wickid in here livynge. And thei maken thise false lesynges [lies] upon pore prestes to make lordes to hate hem, and not to meyntene treuthe of Goddes lawe, that thei techen openly for worschipe of God and profit of the rewme [realm] and stablynge of the kynges power and destroyng of synne. For these pore prestes destroien most by Goddes lawe rebelté of servauntes agens lordes, and charge servauntes to be suget [subject], though lordes be tirauntes. For Seynt Peter techeth thus: 'Be ye servauntes suget to lordes in alle manere of drede, not only to goode lordes and bonere [kindly], but also to tirauntes, or siche that drawn fro Goddes scole.' For, as Seynt Poul seith, ech man oweth to be suget to heighere potestates, that is to men of heighe power, for ther is no power but of God; and so he that agenstondeth [resist] power, stondesth agens the ordynance of God; but thei that agenstonden geten to hemself dampnacioun.

Our second extract, from the Tractatus de Pseudo-Freriis, is from one of Wyclif's milder denunciations of the Friars:

The thridde deceyt of thise ordres is that thei passen othere in prayeres, both for tyme that thei preyen and for multitude of hem. Who shuld not bye dere siche preyeris? sith thei bryngen men swiftliche to hevene; and other men when thei slepen on nyghtes haven of hem preyeris at midnyght, that crien devowteliche on God bi clere voys, stif and clene. Here men seyen that in this poynt many seculers ben deceyved, for thise ordres witen not whether that thei shal come to hevene, and so hou is here conscience brent [seared], that thei dar thus selle siche preyeris; and algates sith it is propriid [reserved] to God to parte [apportion] merites as hym liketh, and noon man may approve [establish] his merites but as God judgeth that it is worthi; and thus this preyer of thise ordres is of a nest of blasfemye and chaffaryng of fendes [fiends] preyer bi the craft of symonye. And where thei maken hem a rewele to ryse reweliche [regularly] at midnyght, thei passen Crist and David and the ordynauce of the Godhede; for God undisposeth ofte tymes men to ryse thus at midnyght, and asketh of hem a bettere lif, that thei putten off bi here statute. Crist dwelled in preyere al the nyght, but by hym-self withoute swiche coventes; and so thise ordres holden not Cristes rewele, neither in tyme, nor in stede [place], for Crist preyede withoute siche crynge, lyk to the state of innocence, bi hym-self under the cope of heven.

Our last quotation is from the De Officio Pastoralis (Cap. xv.), and leads us to a very important subject:

The Hooley Gost gaf to the apostles wit at Witsunday for to knowe al maner langages to teche the puple [people] Goddes lawe therby; and so God wolde that the puple were taught Goddes lawe in diverse tungen; but what man on Goddes halfe shulde reverse Goddes ordenaunce and his wille? And for this cause Seynt Jerom travelede and translatede the Bible fro diverse tungen into Latyn, that it myghte be after translated to othere tungen. And thus Crist and his apostles taughten the puple in that tunge that was most known to the puple; why shulden not man do so now? And herfore [for this cause] autours of the newe law, that weren apostles of Jesu Crist, writen ther gospels in diverse tungen that weren more known to the puple. Also the worthy rewme of Fraunce, notwithstandinge alle lettings [hindrances] hath translated the Bible and the Gospels with othere trewe sentences of doctours out of Latyn into Freynsch, why shulden not Engliche men do so? as lordes of Englund han the Bible in Freynsch, so it were not agen resoun that they hadden the same sentence [meaning] in Engliche; for thus Goddes lawe wolde be bettere known and more trowed for onehed [unity] of wit, and more acord be bi-twixe rewmes.

This brings us to the greatest of the works connected with Wyclif's name, the first English translation of the whole Bible. The allusion in it to the Bible as read by Englishmen in French may help us to understand why such a translation had not been undertaken before. From the earliest times efforts had been made to translate certain portions of the Bible, especially the Psalms and the Gospels, into the vulgar tongue. Thus we hear of Bede as engaged on a version of St John's Gospel at the time of his death, and of King Alfred translating the Psalms. In the tenth century we find the priest Aldred interlineating an English gloss in the famous Lindisfarne manuscript of the Latin Gospels, and in this century also we have a translation of the Gospel of St Matthew and glosses on the other three evangelists which go by the name of the Rushworth Gospels. By the beginning of the eleventh century Ælfric had translated or epitomised the Pentateuch, Joshua, Judges, Kings, Job, Esther, Judith, and the Maccabees, though not without misgivings lest some ignorant priest, on reading of polygamy in the Bible, should imagine that it was a practice to be imitated. After the Conquest the Anglo-Saxon versions of the Gospels were kept in existence by fresh copies as late as the twelfth century, but the work of English translation was effectually stopped by the fact that every one who could read at all could read French, and probably Latin as well. There was no demand for translations of any book into English prose, and therefore the Bible, like other books, remained untranslated, though attempts were made, as in the Ormulum, the Cursor Mundi, and the miracle-plays, to make the Bible story familiar to the unlearned as well as the learned. Translation was resumed early in the fourteenth century—that is, as soon as the English language was definitely coming to the front—with a verse-rendering of the Psalter, followed soon afterwards by the prose version by William of Shoreham, and then by the two widely differing translations with commentaries, both attributed to Richard Rolle of Hampole, who died in 1349.

After the century had entered on its second half, Bible translation took a distinct step forward. A commentary on the Apocalypse, a very favourite book in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, was written by an unknown author, and with the commentary there was given a translation of the text. Under the title One of Four—that is, a book of all four Gospels gathered shortly into one story—there was also made a translation of the Monotessaron, or Harmony of the Latin Gospels, originally compiled by Clement, Prior of Llanthony in Monmouthshire. Both these works have been claimed as Wyclif's, but without any good evidence. That such books should appear at this time was in accordance with the steady development of our vernacular literature, and there is no adequate reason for attributing them to Wyclif's hand. We now come to the translation of the complete Bible, and the first fact we find is the existence at the Bodleian Library of two copies of a translation of the Old Testament as far as Baruch iii. 20. One of these is the original manuscript of the translator, and the other, which is copied from it, contains a note attributing the version to Nicholas Hereford. This Nicholas Hereford was one of Wyclif's prominent supporters at Oxford, and on the Feast of the Ascension, May 15, 1382, had preached before the university in his defence. The following month, when Wyclif's followers at Oxford were finally defeated, Hereford disappeared, and went to Rome, and was there imprisoned. But by 1394 he had made his peace, for in that year we hear of him as appointed Chancellor of the Diocese of Hereford; he even became an examiner of heretics, and in 1417 joined the Carthusian monastery at Coventry, and there died. It is important to note this fact as proving that no suspicion of unorthodoxy would be likely to attach, at a later date, to the translation on the ground of his having had a hand in it. Meanwhile it is difficult not to imagine that the cause of the abrupt discontinuance of the translation at Baruch iii. 20 was Hereford's retirement from Oxford in June 1382. The translation was completed by another hand in a less cramped style, and our illustration is taken from a splendid manuscript specially made for Thomas of Woodstock (Edward III.'s youngest son), murdered by Richard II. in 1397.

It is usually taken for granted that the task of completing Hereford's translation was undertaken by Wyclif himself, and it is pleasing to imagine him in his retirement at Lutterworth occupying himself with this pious and uncontroversial work. But except that the rendering becomes less stiff and constrained when the second hand took up the task, and that Wyclif was a vigorous writer, there is no jot of positive evidence to justify an assertion that the translation of the New Testament was Wyclif's own work, while against it is the probability that during the years 1383 and 1384 he was incapacitated by illness from undertaking such a task. The fault of Hereford's translation was his adherence to a word-for-word rendering, involving an introduction of Latin constructions quite foreign to the English language. Soon after its completion a new version was undertaken, and a copy of this preserved at Trinity College, Dublin, gives us strong reasons for attributing the translation to its first owner, John Purvey, a faithful Oxford friend of Wyclif's, who lived with him in his retirement at Lutterworth, and who, though as late as 1400 he was in trouble for his opinions, is yet mentioned with the greatest respect by one of Wyclif's chief opponents. The translator, however, only speaks of himself as a 'simple creature,' and though we have a reasonable ground for identifying him with Purvey, the identification can hardly be stated as a fact. Fortunately he has left us a long preface, in the course of which, besides much else of extreme interest, he has told us in the clearest way how he set about his task. Here, from the great edition by Forshall and Madden (Oxford, 1850), is the most important passage, which follows immediately upon a statement of the chief reasons why the work of translation had been undertaken :

For these resons and othere, with comune charite to save alle men in oure rewme whiche God wole have sauid, a symple creature hath translaid the Bible out of Latyn into English. First, this symple creature hadde myche travaille, with diverse felawis and helperis, to gedere [gather] manie elde [old] biblis and othere doctouris, and comune glossis, and to make oo [one] Latyn bible sumdel [in some respects, fairly] trewe; and thanne to studie it of the newe [afresh], the text with the glose, and othere doctouris, as he might gete, and speciali Lire [i.e. Nicolas de Lyra, the great medieval commentator] on the elde testament, that helpeid ful myche in this werk; the thridde tyme to counseile with elde gramariens, and elde dyvynis, of harde wordis, and harde sentencis, hou tho mighten best be undurstonden and translaid; the iiij. tyme to translate as cleerli as he coude to the sentence [meaning] and to have manie gode felawis and kunnynges at the correcting of the translacioun. First it is to knowe, that the best translating is out of Latyn into English, to translate afir the sentence, and not oneli afir the wordis, so that the sentence be as opin [plain], either openere, in English as in Latyn and go not fer fro the lettre; and if the lettre may not be suid [followed] in the translating, let the sentence evere be hool [whole] and open, for the wordis owen [ought] to serve to the entent and sentence, and ellis the wordis ben superflu eithir false. In translating into English, many resolucions moun [must] make the sentence open, as an ablatif case absolute may be resolvid into these three wordis, with covenable [suitable] verbe, the while, for, if, as gramariens seyn; as thus, the maister redinge, I stonde, may be resolvid thus, while the maistir redith, I stonde, either, if the maistir redith, etc. either for the maistir, etc.; and sumtyme it wolde acorde wel with the sentence to be resolvid into whanne, either into astirward, thus, whanne the maistir red, I stood, either astir the maistir red, I stood; and sumtyme it mai wel be resolvid into a verbe of the same tens, as othere ben in the same resoun, and into this word et, that is, and in English, as thus, arescentibus hominibus pro timore, that is, and men shulen wexe drie [dry] for drede. Also a participle of a present tens, either preterit, of active vois, either passif, may be resolvid into a verbe of the same tens and a conjunccioun copulatif, as thus, dicens, that is, seyunge may be resolvid thus, and seith, either that seith; and this wole, in many placis, make the sentence open, where to Englissh it afir the word, wolde be derk and douteful.

The grammatical portion of this paragraph is of great interest in showing how intelligently the work of translation was approached, while the sentences which precede it show that there must have been an amount of co-operation in the translation which almost entitles us to speak of it as the work of a committee of translators. It has already been mentioned (page 84) that Trevisa also set down his thoughts upon translation into English, and the fact that we find an allusion to his having translated the Bible makes it possible that he was one of the Oxford men with whom Purvey (if, for convenience, we may assume his authorship) took counsel. Nicholas of Hereford must have been another, for it is clear that Purvey took his work as his basis, and in the few verses we now quote from the two translations of the 'Song of Moses' we see Purvey carrying out his grammatical theories by the smoother turn he gives to some of the phrases, changing, for instance, Hereford's 'The Lord as a man fighter, Almighty his name,' into 'The Lord is as a man-fighter, his name is Almighty.'

Synge we to the Lord, forsothe gloriously is he magnified; the hors and the steyer up he threwe down into the see. My strengthe and my preysyng the Lord; and he is maad to me into helthe. This my God, and hym Y shal gloryfie; the God of my fader, and hym Y shal enhance. The Lord is a man fighter, Almighty his name; the chare of Pharao and his oost he threwe fer into the see. ¹ The following transcript of the facsimile showing the translation of St Jerome's preface to Isaiah is taken from that prepared for the Palaeographical Society, but with the addition of punctuation, by Forshall and Madden, from whose text also the gap between the two columns is supplied. The page is headed 'Isaye.' The passage is a striking example of the clumsy English of the first translator. British Museum, Egerton MSS. 617, 618. Before A.D. 1397:

Short as this quotation is, it suffices to show that the task of translating the Bible into English had made a splendid beginning, and the success of the work, from the point of view of its reception, was immediate and great. In the great edition by Forshall and Madden no fewer than one hundred and seventy manuscripts (nearly four times as many as exist of the Canterbury Tales) are enumerated, and the book circulated freely during the fifteenth century, a splendid copy (sold in the Ashburnham 'supplement' sale in 1899 for £5000) being accepted as a gift by the Brigittine Monastery of Sion at Isleworth, most orthodox of orthodox houses. The honesty and absence of bias of the translators, perhaps also their wisdom in not obtruding their names, contributed to this result; and the acceptance of the book was so complete that Sir Thomas More evidently believed that the Wyclifite translation was something quite different, while in our own day it has even been contended that Wyclif made no translation at all. In the bare literal sense of the words this latter theory may possibly be true. We know that Tyndale and Coverdale took pen in hand and translated day by day till their work was done. There is no part of the Bible for which we can say with certainty that Wyclif did this, and in the present writer's opinion the terms of Purvey's preface make it highly improbable that his leader and master had himself engaged in the task. But if Wyclif did not translate with his own hand, it was by his followers and under his inspiration that the work was carried through, and it would be ungrateful to dissociate his name from it. Were it not for this the work might perhaps best be called the 'Oxford' translation, for it certainly was the work of a group of Oxford men, and the word 'Wyclifite' suggests a sectarian character from which it is wholly free. But, despite his vehemence in denunciation, this absolute honesty and zeal for truth were among the most prominent characteristics of Wyclif himself, and few students will wish, as none is likely to be able, to deprive him of the honour which is justly his in connection with this great work.

Purvey's version of the New Testament was later rendered into the Scots vernacular of the early sixteenth century; of this specimens are given below at page 213.

As we have seen, English prose in the second half of the fourteenth century was mainly concerned with translation (the best possible training for style), and in the fifteenth century this was no less the case. But three writers of original prose, a chronicler, a jurist, and a theologian, now demand our attention.

John Capgrave, provincial of the Austin Friars in England, was an earnest and zealous ecclesiastic and a most industrious and voluminous author. He was born at Lynn in Norfolk in 1393, and there in 1464 he died. He studied probably at Cambridge, and was ordained priest about 1418, having already entered his order at Lynn. His works include, in Latin, Bible commentaries; sermons; Nova legenda Angliæ, printed by Wynkyn de Worde in 1516; De illustribus Henricis, giving the lives of twenty-four German emperors, kings of England, &c., all of the name of Henry; and Vita Humfredi Ducis Glocestriæ. Among his English works are a Life of St Katherine in verse (see page 80; ed. by Horstmann, Early Eng. Text Soc. 1893) and a Chronicle of England from the Creation to 1417. The last and the De illustribus Henricis were edited by Hingeston for the 'Rolls Series' in 1858. In style the Chronicle is simple, but eminently lacking in rhythm, vigour, or variety:

In this tyme on Jon Wyclef, Maystir of Oxenforth, held many straunge opiniones:—That the Cherch of Rome is not hed of alle Cherchis. That Petir had no more auctorite thanne the othir Aposteles; ne the Pope no more power than anothir prest. And that temporal lordes may take away the godes fro the Cherch, whan the persones trespassin. And that no reules mad be Augustin, Benet, and Fraunceys, adde no more perfeccion over the Gospel than doth lym-whiting onto a wal. And that bischoppis schuld have no prisoners; and many othir thingis. Upon these materes the Pope sent a bulle to þat for þe present bacbytynge bi which nyng of a straunge tunge lest þe iewis

chis of him, of þe falsheode of scripturis.

the archbishop of Cauntirbury and of London, that thei schuld areste the same Wiclef, and make him to abjure these seid opiniones. And so he ded, in the presens of the duk of Lancastir: but aftirward he erred in these, and in mo [more]. The same tyme thei of London wold a killid the forseid duk, had thei not be lettid be her [prevented by their] bischop. . . .

In the V. zere of Richard, Jon Wiclef resumed the eld dampned opinion of Berengari, that seide,—Aftir the consecration of Cristis body, bred remayned as it was before. Mani foul errouris multiplied Wiclef more than Berengari:—That Crist was there, as he is in othir places, but sumwhat more specialy; That this bred was no bettir than othir bred, save only for the prestis blessing; and, if Cristis bodi was there, it was possible to a man for breke Cristis nek. He seide eke it was lasse synne to worchip a tode than the Sacrament: for the tode hath lyf, and the Sacrament non. . . .

In the IX. zere of this Kyng, John Wiclef, the orgon of the devel, the enemy of the Cherk, the confusion of mien, the ydol of heresie, the meroure of ypocrisie, the norischer of scisme, be the rithful dome [judgment] of God, was smet with a horibil paralsie thorw oute his body. And this veniauns [vengeance, punishment] fell upon him on Seynt Thomas day in Cristmasse; but he deyd not til Seynt Silvestir day. And worthily was he smet on Seynt Thomas day, ageyn whom he had gretely offendid, letting men of that pilgrimage; and conveniently [appropriately] deied he in Silvestir fest, ageyn whom he had venemously berkid for dotacion of the Church.

The French scholastic theologian Berengarius of Tours, who died in 1088, was in trouble for forty years because of his opinions on transubstantiation; and the Sylvester against whom Wyclif barked was Pope Sylvester I., to whom the Emperor Constantine was said (in the 'False Decretals') to have made the famous donation on which the pope's claim to temporal power was long based. Sylvester's Day was 31st December. St Thomas here was Thomas Becket.

Sir John Fortescue, the first notable English writer on Constitutional law, was born in Somersetshire about 1394 apparently, and educated at Exeter College, Oxford. Called to the Bar at Lincoln's Inn, he became serjeant-at-law and Lord Chief-justice of the Court of King's Bench, and was knighted. In the struggle between the Houses of Lancaster and York he was a zealous Lancastrian, and was attainted under Edward IV. He accompanied Margaret of Anjou and her young son, Prince Edward, on their flight into Scotland, and is supposed to have there received the nominal appointment of Lord Chancellor from Henry VI. Thence also he wrote a series of tracts, Latin and English, in support of the Lancastrian claims, afterwards recanted. In 1463 he embarked with the queen and her son for Flanders. During his exile he wrote his celebrated work, De Laudibus Legum Angliæ, for the instruction of Prince Edward, who was his pupil. But on the final defeat of the Lancastrian party at the battle of Tewkesbury (1471), where he is said to have been taken prisoner, Fortescue submitted to Edward IV. He seems to have died about 1476. The De Laudibus was not printed until 1537; it was translated by Mulcaster in 1573. His principal English work, written about 1475, is

The Governance of England, otherwise called The Difference between an Absolute and Limited Monarchy (1714; new ed. by Plummer: Clarendon Press, 1885). It restates some of the arguments of the De Laudibus; contrasts constitutional and absolute monarchy, with illustrations from French usages; and discusses how to render the central administration more effective. It was much cited during the civil troubles of the seventeenth century. As basing its argument on a comparison of existing institutions instead of on the speculative deductions of the Middle Ages, this work is modern in method. The prose style, lucid, vigorous, and direct, is, in spite of lingering archaism, distinctly more modern than that of Chaucer or Wyclif, or of the Mandeville translations. The whole work extends barely to fifty pages in the best edition. The chapter dealing with the national defence (printed here with th for an occasional þ, and the contractions filled out) is entitled 'What Harme wolde come to England yff the Commons theroff were Pouere?'

Some men haue said that it were good ffor the kyng that the commons off Englande were made pore, as be the commons off Ffraunce. Ffor than thai wolde not rebelle, as now thai done oftentymes; wich the commons off Ffraunce do not, nor mey doo; ffor thai haue no wepen, nor armour, nor good to bie it with all. To theis maner off men mey be said with the phylosopher, ad pauca respicientes de facili enunciant. This is to say, thai that see but few thynges, woll sone say thair advyses. Ffor soth theis ffolke consideren litill the good off the reame [realm] off Englund, wheroff the myght stondith most vppon archers, wich be no ryche men. And yff thai were made more pouere [poor] than thai be, thai shulde not haue wherwith to bie hem bowes, arroes, jakkes, or any other armour off defence, wherby thai myght be able to resiste owre enymes, when thai liste to come vppon vs; wich thai mey do in euery side, considerynge that we be a Ilelonde; and, as it is said be fore, we mey not sone haue soucour off any other reame. Wherfore we shall be a pray to all owre enymies, but yff we be myghty off owre self, wich myght stondith most vppon owre pouere archers; and therefore thai nedun not only haue suche ablements [habiliments] as now is spoken off, but also thai nedun to be much excersised in shotyng, wich mey not be done with owt ryght grete expenses, as euery man experte ther in knowith ryght well. Wherfore the making pouere of the commons, wich is the making pouere off owre archers, shalbe the destruccion of the grettest myght off owre reame. . . . Item, whan any rysinge hath be made in this londe be ffor theis dayis by commons, the pouerest men theroff haue be the grettest causers and doers ther in. And thryfty men haue ben loth therto, ffor drede off lesyng off thair gode. But yet oftentymes thai haue goo with thaim, through manasheyng [menacing] that ellis the same pouere men wolde haue toke thair godes, wher in it semyth that pouerte hath be the holl cause off all suche rysynges. The pouere man hath be sturred therto be occasion off is pouerte, for to gete gode, and the riche men haue gone with hem, be cause thai wolde not be pouere be lesyng off ther gode. What than wolde ffall, yff all the commons were pouere? Trewly it is lyke that this lande then shulde be like vnto the reame off Boeme [Bohemia], wher the commons ffor pouerte rose apon the nobles, and made all thair godis to be comune. . . . Item, the reame off Ffraunce givith neuer ffrely off thair owne gode will any subsidie to thair prince, be cause the commons theroff be so pouere, as thai mey not give any thyng off thair owne godis. And the kyng ther askith neuer subsidie off is nobles, ffor drede that yff he charged hem so, thai wolde confedre with the commons, and perauentur putt hym doune. But owre commons be riche, and thefore thai give to thair kyng, at somme tymes quinsimes [fifteenths] and dessimes [tenths], and ofte tymes other grete subsidies, as he hath nede ffor the gode and defence off his reame. How gret a subsidie was it, when the reame gaff to thair kyng a quinsime and a desime quinqueniale, and the ixth ffiese [fleece] off thair wolles, and also the ixth shefe off ther graynes, ffor the terme off v. yere. This myght thai not haue done, yff thai hade ben impouershed be thair kyng, as be the commons off Ffraunce; nor such a graunte hath be made by any reame off cristendome, off wich any cronicle makith mencion; nor non other mey or hath cause to do so. Ffor thai haue not so much ffredome in thair owne godis, nor be entreted by so ffauorable lawes as we be, except a ffewe regions be ffore specified. Item, we se dayly, how men that haue lost thair godis, and be ffallen into pouerte, be comme anon robbers and thieves; wich wolde not haue ben soche, yff pouerte hade not brought hem therto. Howe many a theff then were like to be in this lande, yff all the commons were pouere. The grettest surete trewly, and also the most honour that mey come to the kyng is, that is reame be riche in euery estate. Ffor nothyng mey make is people to arise, but lakke off gode, or lakke off justice. But yet sertainly when thay lakke gode thai woll aryse, sayng that thai lakke justice. Neuer the les yff thai be not pouere, thay will neuer aryse, but yff ther prince so leue justice, that he give hym selff all to tyranne. (Chap. xii.)

Fortescue thus enlarges on English courage :

It is not pouerte that kepith Ffrenchmen ffor rysinge, but it is cowardisse and lakke off hartes and corage, wich no Ffrenchman hath like vnto a Englysh man. It hath ben often tymes sene in Englande, that iij. or iiij. theves ffor pouerte haue sett apon vj. or vij. trewe men, and robbed hem all. But it hath not bene sene in Ffraunce, that vj. or vij. theves haue be hardy to robbe iij. or iiij. trewe men. Wherefore it is right selde that Ffrenchmen be hanged ffor robbery, ffor thai haue no hartes to do so terable an acte. Ther bith therefore mo men hanged in Englande in a yere ffor robbery and manslaughter, then ther be hanged in Ffraunce ffor such maner of crime in vij. yeres. Ther is no man hanged in Scotlande in vij. yere togedur ffor robbery. And yet thai ben often tymes hanged ffor larceny, and stelynge off good in the absence off the owner theroff. But thar hartes serue hem not to take a manys gode, while he is present, and woll defende it; wich maner off takynge is callid robbery. But the Englysh man is off another corage. Ffor yff he be pouere, and see another man havyng rychesse, wich may be taken ffrom hym be myght, he will not spare to do so, but yff that pouere man be right trewe. Wherefore it is not pouerte, but it is lakke off harte and cowardisse, that kepith the Ffrenchmen ffor rysynge. (From Chap. xiii.)

Reginald Pecock was a keen-witted theologian, who by too venturesome arguments in support of orthodoxy fell into condemnation. Born in Wales about 1395, he was a fellow of Oriel, Oxford, and received priest's orders in 1422. His preferments were the mastership of Whittington College, London, together with the rectory of its church (1431); the bishopric of St Asaph's (1444), and that of Chichester (1450). He plunged into the Lollard and other controversies, and compiled many treatises: the Donet (c. 1440), on the main truths of Christianity; The Reule of Crysten Religioun (c. 1443; ed. Greet, E.E.T.S., 1927); and a treatise on Faith (c. 1456; ed. Morison 1909). The object of his most famous work, The Repressor of Over Much Blaming of the Clergy (c. 1455), was to promote the cause of the Church against Lollardy. His breadth and independence of judgment brought upon him the suspicions of the Church. In 1457 he was denounced for having written on profound questions in English, for setting reason and natural law above the Scriptures, and for diminishing the authority of the fathers and doctors. He was summoned before Archbishop Bouchier, condemned as a heretic, and given the alternative of abjuring his errors or being burned. Electing to abjure, he gave up fourteen of his books to be burnt, and, forced into resigning his bishopric, spent the rest of his days in the abbey of Thorney in Cambridgeshire, dying about 1460. The Repressor is acutely logical—to the point of being casuistical—in argument, and in style is wonderfully clear and vigorous. It deals chiefly with the Lollard arguments against images, pilgrimages, clerical landholding, hierarchical distinctions, papal and episcopal authority, and monasticism.

Refuting the Lollards' denunciation of the monastic orders as unscriptural, Pecock thus begins an argument from the first chapter of the Epistle of St James :

The firste of these iiij. argumentis is this : It is writun, Iames the i^o. c., thus : A cleene religioun and an vnwemmed anentis God and the Fadir is this ; to visite fadirles and modirlees children and widows in her tribulacioun, and to kepe him self vndefiled fro this world. Out of this text a man may argue in twei maners. In oon maner thus : Iames assigneth this gouernaunce now rehercid in his text to be a cleene religioun and an vnwemmed [undefiled] anentis [before] God and the Fadir; wherefore noon other gouernaunce saue this same, as bi the entent and meenyng of Iames in his now rehercid text, is a cleene religioun and vnwemmed anentis God and the Fadir; and so the religiouns now had and vsid in the chirche ben not cleene and vnwemmed anentis God and the Fadir. In an other maner thus : What euer religioun lettith and biforbarrith [hinders and disallows], 3he [yea], and forbedith the religioun to be doon and vsid, which is a clene and vnwemmed religioun anentis God and the Fadir, is an vnleeful [unlawful] religioun, and not worthi be had and vsid.

Sir Thomas Malory.

While English was thus being recognised as the language in which an English theologian, jurist, or historian should naturally write, the work of translation still went on; but the book to which we must now turn, Le Morte D'Arthur of Sir Thomas Malory, though avowedly a compilation from various French sources, stands in a very different category from the renderings of Palladius On Husbandry, of the Secreta Secretorum (falsely attributed to Aristotle), of the Sayings of the Philosophers, and other works which translators were now rendering accessible to English readers. Despite the ridicule which Chaucer had cast on the romances in his Sir Thopas, English versifiers still continued to handle and rehandle them. Thus there are fifteenth-century versions of a long series of Charlemagne romances, of Guy of Warwick and Bevis of Hampton. Thomas Chester, in the second quarter of the century, wrote a metrical romance of Sir Launfal; and there are two versions (known as the 'Thornton' and the 'Harleian' from the MSS. which preserve them) of the Morte D'Arthur. The work which Malory undertook was of a different character, being nothing less than the welding into some approach to unity of the whole Arthurian cycle. Until 1896 nothing was known of Malory beyond the information given in the first edition printed by Caxton in 1485. In his preface Caxton tells us how he, 'under the favour and correctyon of al noble lordes and gentylmen, enprysed to enprynte a book of the noble hystories of the sayd kyng Arthur, and of certeyn of his knyghtes, after a copye unto me delyverd, whyche copye Syr Thomas Malorye dyd take oute of certeyn bookes of Frensshe and reduced it into Englysshe.' Besides this note of Caxton's we have the author's own farewell to his readers:

And here is the ende of the deth of Arthur. I praye you all jentyl men and jentyl wymmen that redeth this book of Arthur and his knyghtes from the begynnyng to the endyng, praye for me whyle I am on lyve that God sende me good delyveraunce, and whan I am deed I praye you all praye for my soule. For this book was ended the ix. yere of the regne of kyng Edward the fourth, by syr Thomas Maleore knyght, as Ihesu helpe hym for hys grete myght, as he is the seruaunt of Ihesu bothe day and nyght.

In 1896 it was pointed out that the name of a Sir Thomas Malorie occurs among those of a number of Lancastrians excluded from a general pardon granted by Edward IV. in 1468. Further research, mainly by Professor Kittredge,¹ identified this outlaw with a Sir Thomas Malory of Newbold Revell, Warwickshire, an adherent of Richard Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick, and afterwards, probably, for a time, of Warwick the King-maker. This Malory represented his county in the Parliament of 1444-45, died on 14th March 1471, and was buried in the chapel of St Francis at the Grey Friars near Newgate. Of his fortunes between his outlawry in 1468 and his death in 1471 we have no information, but the petition, 'praye for me whyle I am on lyve that God sende me good delyveraunce, and whan I am deed I praye you all praye for my soule,' seems peculiarly appropriate to these glimpses which we catch of an outlaw under the shadow of impending death. The end of the thirty-seventh chapter of Malory's Book ix. certainly heightens the probability of the identification. There he writes:

So sire Tristram endured there grete payne, for sekenesse had undertake hym, and that is the grettest payne a prysoner maye have. For alle the whyle a prysoner may have his helthe of body, he maye endure under the mercy of God and in hope of good delyveraunce. But whanne sekenes toucheth a prysoners body thenne may a prysoner say al welthe is hym berafte, and thenne he hath cause to wayle and to wepe. Ryght so dyd syre Tristram whanne sckenes had undertake hym, for thenne he tooke suche sorow that he had almost slayne hym self.

It is difficult not to find in the simple pathos of these words a touch of the feeling born of personal suffering; and in the first chapter of Book xxi. we seem to find once more a personal note very suitable to one who had fought on both sides in the civil war and had at last grown weary of change:

Than was the comyn voys emonge them, that wyth Arthur was none other lyf but warre and stryffe, and wyth Syr Mordred was grete joye and blysse. Thus was syr Arthur depraved and evyl sayd of. And many ther were that kyng Arthur had made up of nought and gven them landes myght not than say hym a good worde. Lo ye, al Englyssh men, see ye not what a myscheyf here was? For he that was the moost kyng and knyght of the world and moost loved the felyship of noble knyghtes, and by hym they were al upholden, now myght not this Englyssh men holde them contente wyth hym. Loo, thus was the olde custome and usage of this londe. And also men saye that we of thys londe have not yet loste ne foryeten [forgotten] that custome and usage. Alas, thys is a grete defaulte of us Englysshe men. For there may no thyng please us noo terme [i.e. no length of time].

If we may accept the identification which these passages certainly support, Malory through his connection with the Warwicks must have seen whatever of the pomp of chivalry endured amid the horrors of the civil wars. He must have been, however, an old man when he wrote his book, for he is credited with having served at the siege of Rouen in 1418, and so could hardly have been born after 1400. But we must turn now from the man to his book, and note in the first place that literary antiquaries have traced the greater part of it, chapter by chapter, to the Merlin of Robert de Borron and his successors (Books i.-iv.); to the English metrical romance, *La*²

² It may be noted that the English romances are indifferently called La Mort and La Morie, the masculine referring to the title regarded as a phrase, and the feminine to the proper gender of mort.

Morte Arthur of the Thornton MS. (Book v.), the French romances of Tristan (Books viii.-x.) and of Lancelot (Books vi., xi.-xix.); and lastly, to the English Morte Arthur of the Harleian MS. (Books xviii., xx., xxi.), or perhaps rather to its French source. No original has yet been found for Book vii., which tells the story of Sir Gareth; and in Book xviii., chap. 20, which describes the arrival of the body of the Fair Maiden of Astolat, and chap. 25, which discourses on True Love, have been singled out as original additions; but in the main the work is, what it professes to be, a compilation from 'Frensshe bookes.' It is perhaps worth noting that in 1464 Raoul Le Fèvre, chaplain of Philip the Good of Burgundy, had in a similar way 'composed and drawn out of divers books in Latin into French' his Le Recueil des Histoires de Troie, and that while Malory was at work on the Morte D'Arthur Caxton was busy translating the Recueil into English. It is possible that it was Le Fèvre's 'Troy book' which gave Malory the idea for his own work; in any case it is worth while mentioning the two books together, because the contrast between them brings into strong relief the difference between the work of Malory and that of an ordinary compiler, even though possessed of Le Fèvre's industry and very respectable skill. There are blemishes in the Morte D'Arthur. The story of Tristram should either have been told more briefly, or have been carried to an end, and there are episodes in which a better version than that used by Malory is now known to exist. But Malory, like every other writer of his day, could only work from the books he was able to procure; and of the insight and sympathy he brought to his task, the judgment with which he selected and omitted, and the skill with which he keeps his work throughout at the highest level of chivalry and romance there cannot be any question. Caxton's words, 'whyche cople Syr Thomas Malorye dyd take oute of certeyn bookes of Frensshe,' seem to point to his having printed from the author's own manuscript. But this was obviously left unrevised, for the printer himself had to act as a clumsy editor, dividing the work into books and chapters, and adding chapter-headings. For lack of revision disjointed sentences and awkward constructions are occasionally to be found, but in general Malory's style possesses that highest merit of perfect adaptation to its subject. An independent MS. was discovered at Winchester in 1934. Our extracts follow, with modern punctuation, Caxton's text as edited by Dr Sommer in 1889. The first relates to Arthur's sword, Excalibur:

Howe Arthur by the meane of Merlin gate Excalibur his swerde of the Lady of the Lake: Ryghte so the kyng and he departed & wente untyl an ermyte that was a good man and a grete leche. Soo the heremyte serched all his woundys & gaf hym good salves; so the king was there three dayes, and thenne were his woundes wel amendyd that he myght ryde and goo, & so departed. And as they rode Arthur said, 'I have no swerd.' 'No force' [No matter], said Merlin; 'here-by is a swerd that shalle be yours and [if] I may.' Soo they rode tyl they came to a lake, the whiche was a fayr water and brood, and in the myddes of the lake Arthur was ware of an arme clothed in whyte samyte, that held a fayr swerd in that hand. 'Loo,' said Merlin, 'yonder is that swerd that I spak of.' With that they sawe a damoisel goyng upon the lake: 'What damoyssel is that?' said Arthur. 'That is the lady of the lake,' said Merlin; 'and within that lake is a roche, and thereyn is as fayr a place as ony on erthe, and rychely besene [arrayed], and this damoyssell wyll come to yow anone, and thenne speke ye sayre to her that she will gyve yow that swerd.' Anone with-all came the damoyssel unto Arthur and salewed hym, and he her ageyne. 'Damoyssel,' said Arthur, 'what swerd is that, that yonder the arme holdeth above the water? I wold it were myne, for I have no swerd.' 'Syr Arthur, kyng,' said the damoyssell, 'that swerd is myn, and yf ye will gyve me a yefte [gift] whan I aske it yow, ye shal have it.' 'By my feyth,' said Arthur, 'I will yeve yow what yefte ye will aske.' 'Wel,' said the damoisel, 'go ye into yonder barge & rowe yourself to the swerd, and take it and [the] scaubart with yow, and I will aske my yefte whan I see my tyme. So syr Arthur & Merlyn alyght, & tayed their horses to two trees, & so they went into the ship, & whanne they came to the swerd that the hand held, syre Arthur toke it up by the handels & toke it with hym—and the arme & the hand went under the water; & so come unto the lond & rode forth.' (Book i. chap. 25.)

The constant single combats in the Morte D'Arthur are apt to seem a little monotonous to modern readers. The specimen of them which follows is not only good in itself, but is diversified by an interest of another kind. Gareth, a younger son of the Queen of Orkney, on arriving in disguise at Arthur's court had asked as the first of the king's promised boons only that he should have his meat and drink for a twelvemonth. The request was thought plebeian, and Sir Kay, the seneschal, while he dubbed him Beaumains because of his fair hands, kept the lad in the kitchen. At the end of the year, when a damsel came to Arthur's court for a knight to help her mistress, Beaumains demanded and was granted the quest, much to the anger of the damsel, who, despite the exploits he soon performed, continued to rail at him as a kitchen-knave. Our extract relates to his combat with the second of a series of four knights, Black, Green, Red, and 'of the colour of Ind [i.e. indigo, or blue]:'

How the brother of the knight that was slain mette with Beaumains and fought with Beaumains til he was yelden [yielded]: Thus as they rode to-gyders they sawe a knyght come dryvend [riding quickly] by them, al in grene, bothe his hors & his harnais; and whanne he came nyghe the damoyssel he asked her, 'Is that my broder the Black Knyghte that ye have brought with yow?' 'Nay, nay,' she sayd, 'this unhappy kechen knave hath slayne your broder thorou unhappynesse [mischance].' 'Allas,' sayd the Grene Knyghte, 'that is grete pyte that soo noble a knyghte as he was shold soo unhappely be slaine, and namely [especially] of a knaves hand, as ye say that he is. A! traytour,' sayd the Grene Knyghte, 'thou shalt dye for sleynge of my broder. He was a ful noble knyghte, and his name was syr Pereard.' 'I defy the,' said Beaumayns, 'for I lete the wete I slewe hym knyghtely, and not shamefully.' There-with-al the Grene Knyghte rode unto an horne that was grene, and hit henge [it hung] upon a thorne, and there he blew thre dedely motys [calls], and there came two damoyssels and armed hym lyghtly. And thenne he took a grete hors, and a grene shelde and a grene spere. And thenne they ranne to-gyders with al their myghtes, and brake their speres unto their handes, and thenne they drewe their swerdes, and gaf many sadde strokes, and either of them wounded other ful yll. And at the last at an overthwart [cross-encounter] Beaumayns with his hors strake the Grene Knyghtes hors upon the syde, that he felle to the erthe. And thenne the Grene Knyghte avoyded his hors lightly, and dressid hym [made himself ready] upon foote. That sawe Beaumayns, and there-with-al he alighte, and they rasshed [rushed] to-gyders lyke two myghty kempys [champions] a longe whyle, and sore they bledde both. With that cam the damoyssel and said, 'My lorde the Grene Knyghte, why for shame stand ye soo longe fyghtyng with the kechyn knave? Allas, it is shame that ever ye were made knyghte, to see suche a ladde to matche suche a knyghte, as [as if] the wede overgrew the corne.' There-with the Grene Knyght was ashamed, and there-with-al he gaf a grete stroke of myghte, & clafe his shelde thorow. Whan Beaumayns sawe his shelde cloven a-sonder he was a lytel ashamed of that stroke, and of her langage; and thenne he gaf hym suche a buffet upon the helme that he felle on his knees: and soo sodenly Beaumayns pulled hym upon the ground grovelynge. And thenne the Grene Knyghte cryed hym mercy, and yelded hym unto syre Beaumayns, and prayd hym to slee him not. 'Al is in vayn,' said Beaumayns, 'for thou shalt dye, but yf [unless] this damoyssel that came with me praye me to save thy lyf.' And ther-with-al he unlaced his helme, lyke as he wold slee [slay] hym. 'Fy upon the, false kechen page, I wyll never pray the to save his lyf, for I will never be soo moche in thy daunger [obliged to you].' 'Thenne shalle he deye,' sayde Beaumayns. 'Not soo hardy, thou bawdy [dirty] knave,' sayd the damoyssel, 'that thou slee hym.' 'Allas,' said the Grene Knyghte, 'suffre me not to dye, for a fayre word may save me. Fayr knyzt,' said the Grene Knyghte, 'save my lyf, & I wyl foryeve the [thee] the dethe of my broder, and for ever to become thy man, and xxx knyghtes that hold of me for ever shal doo you servyse.' 'In the devyl's name,' sayd the damoyssel, 'that suche a bawdy kechen knave shold have the and thyrty knyghtes servyse.' 'Sir knyght,' said Beaumayns, 'alle this avaylleth the not, but yf my damoyssel speke with me for thy lyf.' And ther-with-al he made a semblaunt [pretence] to slee hym. 'Lete be,' sayd the damoyssel, 'thou bawdy knave, slee hym not; for and thou do, thou shalte repente it.' 'Damoyssel,' said Beaumayns, 'your charge is to me a pleasy, and at your commaundement his lyf shal be saved, & els not.' Thenne he said, 'Sir Knyghte with the grene armes, I releace the quyte at this damoyssels request; for I wyll not make her wrothe; I wille fulfille al that she chargeth me.' And thenne the Grene Knyghte kneled doune, and dyd hym homage with his swerd. Thenne said the damoisel, 'Me repenteth, Grene Knyghte, of your domage [hurt], and of youre broders dethe the Black Knyghte; for of your help I had grete myster [need]; for I drede me sore to passe this forest.' 'Nay, drede you not,' sayd the Grene Knyghte, 'for ye shal lodge with me this nyghte, and to-morne I shalle helpe you thorow this forest.' Soo they tooke theyre horses and rode to his manoyr, whiche was fast there besyde.

While this extract shows how a knight could endure and overcome a lady's caprice, our next exhibits the serious and religious aspect of knight-errantry at its highest:

How syr Boors mette syr Lyonel taken and beten wyth thornes, and also a mayde which shold have been devoured: Upon the morne, as soone as the day appiered, Bors departed from thens, and soo rode in-to a foreste vnto the houre of mydday, and there bifelle hym a merveyllous adventure. So he mette at the departyng of the two wayes two knyghtes, that ledde Lyonel his broder al naked, bounden upon a straunge hakney, & his handes bounden to-fore his brest: And everyche [each] of hem helde in his handes thornes, where-with they wente betynge hym so sore that the blood trayled doune more than in an honderd places of his body, soo that he was al blood to-fore and behynde, but he said never a word, as he whiche was grete of herte; he suffred alle that ever they dyd to hym as though he had felte none anguysshe. Anone syre Bors dressid hym to rescowe hym that was his broder: and soo he loked upon the other syde of hym, and sawe a knyghte whiche brought a fair gentylwoman, and wold have set her in the thickest place of the forest, for to have ben the more surer oute of the way from hem that sought hym. And she, whiche was no thyng assured, cryed with an hyghe voys, 'Saynte Mary, socoure your mayde!'

And anone she aspyed where syre Bors came rydynge. And whanne she came nygh hym, she demed hym a knyghte of the Round Table, wherof she hoped to have some comforte; and thenne she conjured hym, by the feythe that he ought [owed] 'unto hym in whos servyse thou arte entryd in [i.e. Christ], and for the feythe ye owe unto the hyghe ordre of knyghthode, & for the noble kyng Arthurs sake, that I suppose made the [thee] knyght, that thou help me, and suffre me not to be shamed of this knyghte.'

Whanne Bors herd her say thus, he had soo moche sorowe there he nyst [knew] not what to doo. 'For yf I lete [leave] my broder be in adventure [risk] he must be slayne, and that wolde I not for alle the erthe. And yf I helpe not the mayde, she is shamed for ever, and also she shall lese her vyrgynyte, the whiche she shal never gete ageyne.' Thenne lyfte he up his eyen, and sayd wepyng, 'Fair swete lord Jhesu Cryste, whoos lyge man I am, kepe Lyonel my broder that these knyghtes slee hym not; and for pyte of yow, and for Mary sake, I shalle socoure this mayde.'

Lastly we may take a passage from an episode which, even without the popular currency which has been given to it by Tennyson's 'Elaine,' might deservedly be famous—that which tells of the arrival at Arthur's court of the body of the fair maid who died because she could not win Lancelot to love her:

How the corps of the Mayde of Astolat arryved before Kyng Arthur: Soo by fortune [chance] kyng Arthur and the quene Guenevere were spekyng to-gyders at a wyndowe, and soo as they loked in to Temse [Thames] they aspyed this blak barget, and hadde marville what it mente. Thenne the kyng called sire Kay & shewed hit hym. 'Sir,' said sir Kay, 'wete you wel there is some newe tydynges.' 'Goo thyder,' sayd the kyng to sir Kay, 'and take with yow sire Brandyles and Agrayayne and brynge me redy word what is there.' Thenne these four knyghtes departed and came to the barget and wente in, and there they fond [found] the fayrest corps lyenge in a ryche bedde and a poure man sitting in the bargets ende, and no word wold he speke. Soo these foure knyghtes retorned unto the kyng ageyne and told hym what they fond. 'That fayr corps wylle I see,' sayd the kyng. And soo thenne the kyng took the quene by the hand & went thydder. Thenne the kyng made the barget to be holden fast, and thenne the kyng and the quene entred with certayn knyghtes wyth them, and there he sawe the fayrest woman lye in a ryche bedde, coverd unto her myddel with many ryche clothes, and alle was of clothe of gold, and she lay as though she had smyled. Thenne the quene aspyed a letter in her ryght hand and told it to the kyng. Thenne the kyng took it and sayd, 'Now am I sure this letter wille telle what she was, and why she is come hydder.' Soo thenne the kyng and the quene wente oute of the barget, and so commaunded a certayne wayte [watch] upon the barget. And soo whan the kyng was come within his chamber he called many knyghtes aboute hym, and saide that he wold wete [know] openly what was wryten within that letter. Thenne the kyng brake it, and made a clerke to rede hit, and this was the entente [purport] of the letter: 'Moost noble knyghte sir Launcelot, now hath dethe made us two at debate for your love. I was your lover that men called the fayre mayden of Astolat. Therfor unto alle ladyes I make my mone. Yet praye for my soule and bery me atte [at the] leest, and offere ye my masse peny. This is my last request. And a clene mayden I dyed, I take God to wytnes. Pray for my soule, sir Launcelot, as thou art pierles [peerless].' This was alle the substance in the letter, and whan it was redde the kyng, the quene, and alle the knyghtes wepte for pyte of the doleful complayntes.

(Book xviii. chap. 20.)

'Herein may be seen,' wrote Caxton of the Morte D'Arthur, 'noble chyvalrye, curtosye, humanyte, frendlynnesse, hardynnesse, love, frendshyp, cowardyse, murdre, hate, vertue and synne. Doo after the good and leve the evyl and it shal brynge you to good fame and renomme.' That is perhaps the best comment that has been passed on a book at which some good men, since the days of Ascham, have shaken their heads, but which, as even our few extracts will have shown, epitomises in itself so much of the magic, the pity, and the chivalry of the old romances, that it ranks high among the masterpieces of our literature.

William Caxton.¹

The original manuscript of the Morte D'Arthur has disappeared, and it is thus the first English classic for which we are dependent on a printed text, Caxton's edition, printed in 1485, being itself so rare that only two copies of it are known, while one of these is imperfect.

Even in the days of manuscripts books had been manufactured for the English market in Flanders and the north of France, and as early as about 1475 a Breviary for English use had been printed at Cologne. By an Act of Richard III. special facilities were granted for the importation of books from abroad, and while one Sarum missal was printed at Basel and others at Venice, numbers of English service-books came from Paris or Rouen, and the Latin grammars for use in English schools were mostly printed in France and the Low Countries. Other books cannot be ear-marked in the same way, but the presses of Venice, Paris, Basel, and Cologne supplied the learned books needed by English scholars with sufficient completeness to deter any English printer from trying to rival them. William Caxton, who set up his press at Westminster in 1476, though a man of real literary taste, was not himself a scholar, and had quite another class of customers in view. Born in the Weald of Kent probably soon after 1420, he had been apprenticed in 1438 to a London mercer, and some time before 1453 had started in business at Bruges. Here in 1462 he was appointed by Edward IV. to the responsible post of Governor of the English Merchants, and continued in this office for some seven or eight years, at the end of which he entered the service of the Duchess Margaret (sister of Edward IV.), who had married Charles the Bold in 1468. In March 1469 he began to translate Raoul Le Fèvre's Recueil des Histoires de Troye, but then laid it on one side till March 1471, when, at the command of the Duchess, he resumed his work and carried it to a completion in the following September. When the book was finished, Caxton was besieged with commissions for copies of it, and as the readiest means of satisfying them turned to the new art of printing. Having watched an edition of the De Proprietatibus Rerum through the press at Cologne, 'himself to advance' in the rudiments of the craft, he associated himself with a Bruges calligrapher, Colard Mansion, and at Bruges the two in partnership printed seven books, Caxton's Recuyell of the Histories of Troy and its French original, Caxton's The Game and Playe of the Chesse (a translation from Jehan de Vignay's French version of the Ludus Scacchorum Moralizatus by Jacopus de Cessolis), Le Fèvre's Les Fais et prouesses du noble et vaillant chevalier Jason, Caxton's English rendering of this, and two French devotional treatises. The translation of the Chess-book was finished 31st March 1475, and all these books were probably printed in 1475-76. But in September 1475 Charles the Bold had begun the unlucky campaigns which two years later ended in his death, and even without the inducement of a quieter market which England thus offered, Caxton had good reason to wish to ply his double craft of printing and translating in his native land. At Michaelmas 1476 he rented from the Dean and Chapter a shop in the Sanctuary at Westminster for ten shillings a year, and in 1477 produced the first book printed on English soil, The Dictes and Sayengis of the Philosophres, translated by Earl Rivers, the king's brother-in-law, and edited by himself.

This is not the place to follow Caxton minutely through the ceaseless activity of the next fourteen years, during which he printed upwards of eighty books, or upwards of a hundred including new editions. What we have to remember is that as he took up the craft in order to multiply copies of his first translation, so the work of translation continued his own main employment. Both as translator and editor-publisher his attention was divided fairly equally between imaginative literature and books of popular edification and devotion. Of romances he translated and printed, besides the Recuyell and the Jason, those of Godfrey of Boloyne, Paris and Vienne, Blanchardyn and Eglantyne, The Four Sons of Aymon, and Charles the Great—all from the French. His renderings of the story of the Aeneid and of the fables of Aesop were also made from French versions, that of the former bearing very little resemblance to Virgil's poem; for Reynard the Fox he had recourse to the Dutch. In poetry he was a whole-hearted admirer of Chaucer, printing two editions of the Canterbury Tales, also the Parlement of Foules (under the title of the Temple of Brass), Anelyda and Fals Arcyte, the Book of Fame, and Troilus and Cressida, besides the prose version of Boethius. He printed also Gower's Confessio Amantis, and some seven poems by Lydgate. In history, at the instance of Hugh Bryce, a fellow-mercator, he translated from the French and printed a compilation called The Mirrour of the World, and he also edited and continued Higden's Polychronicon in Trevisa's version, and a popular fourteenth-fifteenth century compilation, known from its opening words as the Chronicle of Brut, to which he gave the title the Chronicle of England. In religious literature his most notable undertaking was the translation of the Golden Legend of Jacobus de Voragine, from the French version of Jehan de Vignay; but he also translated a Life of St Winifred and a Doctrinal of Sapience, was engaged at the time of his death on a translation of the Lives of the Fathers, and under the title of the Royal Book made a fresh version of the Somme des Vices et des Vertues of Frère Lourens, which had already entered into English literature in the Ayenbytt of Inwytt. Nor did he neglect edifying books of other kinds, translating and printing, besides The Game and Playe of the Chesse, the Fayts of Arms and of Chivalry of Cristine de Pisan, Alain Chartier's Curial, the Knight of the Tour (for the better education of girls), and a Book of Good Manners. Lord Rivers supplied him with the translation of The Dictes and Sayengis of the Philosophres (of which an earlier English rendering already existed), and of the Moral Proverbs of Cristine de Pisan, and the Earl of Worcester with that of Cicero, De Amicitia, the version of the De Senectute being probably by Sir John Fastolfe. Caxton printed also a book of Statutes of Henry VII., a Latin speech made by John Russell, Bishop of Lincoln, at the investiture of Charles the Bold as Knight of the Garter, some diplomatic correspondence between the Pope and the Venetian Republic relative to a war about Ferrara, a few books for teaching children morals and manners, several devotional treatises, some of the smaller service books, and some indulgences. But the total bulk of all these is but small compared with that of the books which Caxton himself translated or edited. He had a shrewd eye for the class of books which the nobles of the court and the rich city merchants cared to read and buy, and he produced them, year after year, mainly by his own literary diligence. Working, as he must have done, always under pressure, and with no French or Latin dictionaries to help him, his translations are often slipshod and not free from errors; but they have a homely and straightforward style, and the prefaces and epilogues show that Caxton was an excellent critic, and had a pleasant humour of his own. As a specimen of his style we may take first his own account of his edition of The Dictes and Sayengis of the Philosophres, the first book printed on English soil:

Here endeth the book named the dictes, or sayengis, of the philosophres, enprynted by me, William Caxton, at Westmestre, the yere of our lord M.CCCC.Lxxvij. Whiche booke is late translated out of Frenshe into Englyssh, by the noble and puissant lord, Lord Antone, Erle of Ryvvers, Lord of Scales and of the Ile of Wyght, defendour and directour of the siege apostolique for our holy Fader the Pope in this Royame [realm] of England, and Governour of my lord Prynce of Wales. And it is so, that at suche tyme as he had accom-plysshid this sayd werke, it liked him to sende it to me in certayn quayers [quires] to oversee, whiche, forthwith, I sawe, and fonde therin many grete, notable, and wyse sayengis of the philosophres, acordyng unto the bookes made in Frenshe, whiche I had ofte afore redd. But, certaynly, I had seen none in Englyssh til that tyme. And so, afterward, I cam unto my sayd lord and told him how I had red and seen his booke, and that he had don a meritory dede in the labour of the translacion therof into our Englyssh tunge, wherin he had deservid a singuler lawde and thank, &c. Thenne my sayd lord desired me to oversee it and where as I sholde fynde faute to correcte it; wherein I answerd unto his lordship that I coude not amende it, but if I sholde so presume, I might apaire it, for it was right wel and connyngly made and translated into right good and fayr Englyssh. Notwithstandyng, he willed me to oversee it, and shewid me dyverce thinges, whiche as him semed, myght be left out, as diverce lettres missives sent from Alisander to Darius and Aristotle, and eche to other, whiche lettres were lityl appertinent unto [the] dictes and sayenges aforsayd, forasmuch as they specyfie of other maters. And also desired me, that don, to put the sayd booke in enprinte. And thus obeying hys request and comaundement, I have put me in devoyr to oversee this hys sayd booke, and beholden, as nyghe as I coude, howe it accordeth wyth the origynall, beyng in Frensh. And I fynde nothyng dyscordaunt therin, sauf [save] onely in the dyctes and sayengys of Socrates, wherein I fynde that my saide lord hath left out certayn and dyverce conclusions towchyng women. Wherof I mervaylle that my sayd lord hath not wreton them, ne what hath mevyd [moved] hym so to do, ne what cause he hadde at that tyme. But I suppose that som fayr lady hath desired hym to leve it out of his booke. Or ellys he was amorous on somme noble lady, for whos love he wold not sette yt in his booke; or ellys, for the very affeccyon, love and goodwille that he hath unto alle ladyes and gentylwomen, he thought that Socrates spared the sothe and wrote of women more than trouthe, whyche I cannot think that so trewe a man and so noble a phylosophre as Socrates was, shold wryte otherwyse than trouthe. For, if he had made fawte in wryting of women, he ought not, ne shold not be belevyd in hys other dyctes and sayenges. But I apperceyve that my sayd lord knoweth verly that suche defaultes ben not had, ne founden, in the women born and dwellyng in these partyes ne regyons of the world. Socrates was a Greke, born in a ferre contre from hens, whyche contre is alle of othre condycions than thys is, and men and women of other nature than they ben here in this contre. For I wote wel, of what somer condicion women ben in Grece, the women of this contre be right good, wyse, playsant, humble, discrete, sobre, chaste, obedient to their husbandis, trewe, secrete, stedfast, ever besy and never ydle, attemperat in speking and vertuous in alle their werkis, or at the leste sholde be soo. For whyche causes, so evydent, my sayd lord, as I suppose, thoughte it was not of necessite to sette in his booke the saiengis of his auctor, Socrates, touchyng women. But, for as moche as I had comandment of my sayd lord to correcte and amende where as I sholde fynde fawte, and other fynde I none sauf that he hath left out these dictes and saynges of the women of Grece, therefore, in accomplisshing his comandement, for as moche as I am not in certayn wheder it was in my lordis cople or not, or ellis, peradventure, that the wynde had blown over the leef at the tyme of translacion of his booke, I purpose to wryte tho same saynges of that Greke Socrates whiche wrote of the women of Grece and nothyng of them of this royaume whom I suppose he never knewe. For, if he had, I dar plainly saye that he wold have reserved [excepted] them, in especiall, in his sayd dictes. Alway not presumyng to putt and set them in my sayd lordes booke, but in the ende, aparte, in the rehersayll of the werkis; humbly requiring all them that shal rede this lityl rehersayll, that yf they fynde ony faulte, to arette [ascribe] it to Socrates and not to me, whiche wryteth as hereafter foloweth.

There is a touch of Chaucer's sly humour in this passage which explains Caxton's enthusiasm for him; and we shall not show the printer-editor at a disadvantage if as a second extract we take his 'Prohemye' to the second edition of the Canterbury Tales. This is full, as usual, of generous praise of the great poet, and interesting also for the light it throws on the difficulties against which the early printers had to contend in their efforts to find the right books to print from:

Grete thanks, lawde and honour ought to be gyven unto the clerkes, poetes, and historiographs, that have wreton many noble bokes of wysedom, of the lyves, passions, and myracles of holy sayntes, of hystories, of noble and famouse actes, and faittes [deeds], and of the cronycles sith the begynnyng of the creacion of the world, unto thys present tyme, by whyche we ben dayly enformed, and have knowleche of many thynges, of whom we shold not have knowen yf they had not left to us theyr monumentis wreton. Emong whom and in especial to-fore alle other we ought to gyve a singuler laude unto that noble and grete philosopher Gefferey Chaucer, the which for his ornate wrytyng in our tongue maye well have the name of a laureate poete. For to-fore that he by hys labour embelysshed, ornated, and made faire our Englishe, in thys royaume was had rude speech and incongrue, as yet it appiereth, by olde bookes, whyche at thys day ought not to have place ne be compared among ne to hys beauteuous volumes and aournate [adorned] wrytynges, of whom he made many bokes and treatyces of many a noble historye as wel in metre as in ryme and prose, and them so craftly made that he comprehended hys maters in short, quyck, and hye sentences, eschewyng prolyxite, castyng away the chaf of superfluyte, and shewyng the pyked grayn of sentence utteryd by crafty and sugred eloquence, of whom emong all other of hys bokes I purpose to emprynte by the grace of God the book of the Tales of Cauntyrburye, in whiche I finde many a noble hystorie of every astate and degre, Fyrst rehercyng the condicions and the arraye of eche of them as properly as possyble is to be sayd, And after theyr tales, whyche ben of noblesse, wysedom, gentylesse, myrthe, and also of veray holynesse and vertue, wherin he fynyshyth thys sayd booke, whyche booke I have dylygently oversen and duly examyned to the ende that it be made accordyng unto his owen making. For I fynde many of the sayd bookes whyche wryters have abyrdgyd it and many thynges left out. And in some place have sette certayn versys that he never made ne sette in hys booke, of whyche bookes so incorrecte was one brought to me vj yere passyd whyche I supposed had been veray true and correcte. And accordyng to the same I dyde do emprynte a certayn nombre of them, whyche anon were sold to many and dyverse gentylmen, of whom one gentylman cam to me and said that this book was not accordyng in many places unto the book that Gefferey Chaucer had made. To whom I answered that I had made it accordyng to my cople and by me was nothyng added ne mynusshyd. Thenne he sayd he knewe a book whyche hys fader had and moche lovdy, that was very trewe and accordyng unto hys owen first book by hym made, and sayd more, yf I wold emprynte it agayn he wold gete me the same book for a cople, how be it he wist well that hys fader wold not gladly departe fro it. To whom I said, in caas that he coude gete me suche a book, trewe and correcte, that I wold ones endevoyre me to emprynte it agayn for to satsfyfe the auctor, where as to-fore by ygnorance I erryd in hurtyng and dyffamyng his book in diverse places, in setting in some thynges that he never sayd ne made, and levying out many thynges that he made whyche ben requysite to be sette in it. And thus we fyll at accord [came to an agreement]. And he ful gentilly [courteously] gate of hys fader the said book and delyverd it to me, by whiche I have corrected my book as here after alle alonge by the ayde of almyghty God shal folowe, whom I humbly beseche to gyve me grace and ayde to achyve and accomplysse to hys lawde, honour and glorye, and that alle ye that shal in thys book rede or heere wyll of your charyte emong your dedes of mercy remembre the sowle of the sayd Gefferey Chaucer, first auctour and maker of thys book. And also that alle we that shal see and rede therin may so take and understonde the good and vertuous tales, that it may so prouffyte unto the helthe of our sowles that after thys short and transitorye lyf we may come to everlastyng lyf in heven. Amen.

Caxton's busy life came to an end in 1491, and his printing business was carried on by his foreman, Jan Wynkyn de Worde—that is, of Werden in Lorraine.

Other presses had by this time been established. In 1478 a Cologne printer named Theodor Rood started at Oxford, and there, by himself or in conjunction with an English bookseller, Thomas Hunte, printed a few text-books, of which fifteen have come down to us. Of these the latest is given a date equivalent to 19th March 1487, and after this we hear of no more printing at Oxford till 1517. In London, John of Lettou, or Lithuania, started a press in 1480, and was joined two years later by William de Machlinia—that is, of Mechlin. The partners seem to have been mainly law printers, but printed other books as well, though sometimes on commission. Their most notable publications, from a literary standpoint, are the Revelations of St Nicholas to a Monk of Evesham, the Speculum Christiani (from which a few lines of verse have been quoted on page 80), and an edition of the Chronicles of England. Lettou disappears about 1484, but Machlinia continued printing till about 1491, Richard Pynson, a native of Normandy, being his successor. A translation by John Kay of a short description of the Siege of Rhodes, written in Latin by Gulielmus Caorsin, may have been printed by Machlinia, or by some one not known to us who had a similar but not identical fount of type. In 1479 or 1480 a schoolmaster at St Albans started a press there, printing altogether eight books of which we know, in types of the same character as Caxton's, and in one instance certainly borrowed from him. Of the eight books six are scholastic treatises, the other two being the then very popular Chronicles of England and the treatise on hawking, hunting, and coat-armour commonly known as the Book of St Albans, and commonly ascribed to Dame Juliana Berners. This ascription rests on the fact that one of the sections of the book, the metrical treatise on hunting, ends with the words, 'Explicit [Here ends] Dam Julyans Barnes in her boke of huntynge.' On the strength of these words the authorship of the whole book is popularly attributed to this otherwise unknown lady, Juliana Bernes or Berners, who is represented as being a daughter of Sir James Berners (executed in 1388), and prioress of the nunnery of Sopwell, a dependency of the abbey of St Albans. As to this, we know that one prioress was elected in 1426, and another superseded on account of old age in 1480, and it is possible that there was a gap between the two which Juliana Berners filled; but we have no shred of evidence as to this, or as to any single fact about her, and if she was really the daughter of Sir James Berners, the dates do not fit in very happily. At the Bodleian Library there is a manuscript poem on the terms of the chase which is said to correspond closely to the poem ascribed to 'Dam Julyans Barnes' in the Book of St Albans, but as it is anonymous no conclusion can be drawn from it. Whatever the lady's connection with the 'Book of Huntynge,' there is nothing to suggest that she wrote also the treatises on Hawking and Heraldry, and the probability seems to be that the three works were drawn from different sources and edited by the schoolmaster-printer. As for the 'Treatyse of Fishing with an Angle,' this does not appear at all in the first edition, though a manuscript of another version of it (first printed in 1883), from the character of the handwriting, is judged to have been in existence before 1480. This treatise was first added to the work in Wynkyn de Worde's edition of 1496, with the obvious intention of completing it as a kind of 'Gentleman's Vade-Mecum.' Throughout the sixteenth century the book remained very popular, its different parts being frequently reprinted. But its popularity was that of a text-book rather than a work of literature, and it is to its attractive subject and the mystery that surrounds its authorship, rather than to any literary merit, that it owes its fame. Here is a typical extract from the 'Book of Hawking':

And if yowre hawke be harde pennyd [strongly feathered] she may be drawne to be reclaymed [pulled by a string to be taught to come back]. For all the while that she is tender pennyd, she is not habull to be reclaymed. And if she be a Goshawke or Tercell that shall be reclaymed ever fede hym [sic] with washe meete at the drawyng and at the reclaymyng, bot loke that hit be hoote, and in this maner washe it. Take the meet and go to the water and strike it upp and downe in the water, and wringe the waater owte and fede hir therwith and she be a brawncher [a hawk just able to leave its nest]. And if it bene an Eyesse [a hawk reared in captivity] show most wash the meete clenner than ye doo to the brawncher, and with a linne [linen] cloth wipe it and fede hir, &c.

The treatise on coat-armour offers rather more scope for the display of literary skill, and it is only fair to make some brief extracts from this also. Here is one on the origin of nobility, a point with which several writers of this period are concerned:

How Gentilmen shall be knowyn from churlis and how they first began.—Now for to devyde gentilmen from chorlis in haast it shall be preved. Ther was never gentilman nor churle ordenyd by kynde [nature] bot he had fadre and modre. Adam and Eve had nother fadre nor modre, and in the sonnys of Adam and Eve war founde bothe gentilman and churle. By the sonnys of Adam and Eve, Seth, Abell and Cayn, devyded was the royall blode fro the ungentill. A brother to sleigh his brother contrary to the law where myght be more ungentelnes. By that did Cayn become a chorle and all his ofspryng after hym, by the cursyng of God and his owne fadre Adam. And Seth was made a gentilman thorow his fadres and moderis blissyng. And of the ofspryng of Seth Noe come a gentilman by kynde.

From another section we may take these few lines, which tell us the vices which a gentleman must especially eschew:

Ther be ix. vices contrary to gentilmen.—Ther ben ix. vices contrari to gentilmen, of the wiche v. ben indeternynable and iii. determynable. The v. indeternynable ben theys: oon to be full of slowthe in his werris, an other to be full of boost in his manhode, the thride to be full of cowardnes to his enemy, the fourth to be full of lechri in his body, and the fifthe to be full of drynkyng and dronckunli. Ther be iii. determynable: on is to revoke his own chalange, an other to sleigh his presoner with his own handis, the thride to voyde from his soueraygnes baner in the selde, and the fifthe to tell his soueraygne fals talys.

Lastly, here is a passage with a pleasant reference to King Arthur:

Here begynnyth the blasynge of armys.—I haue shewyd to yow in thys booke a-foore how gentilmen began, and how the law of armys was first ordant, and how moni colowris ther be in cootarmuris, and the difference of cootarmuris with mony other thynggis that here needis not to be rehersed. Now I intende to procede of signys in armys and of the blasynge of all armys. Bot for to reherce all the signys that be borne in armys, as Pecok, Pye, Batt, Dragon, Lyon and Dolfyn, and flowris and leevys, it war to longe a taryng, ner I can not do hit: ther be so mony. Bot here shall shortli be shewyd to blase all armys if ye entende diligentli to youre rulyng. And be cause the cros is the moost worthi signe among al signys in armys: at the cros I will begynne, in the wich thys nobull and myghti prynce kyng Arthure hadde grete trust, so that he lefte his armys that he bare of iii. Dragonys, and on that an other sheelde of iii. crownys, and toke to his armys a crosse of silver in a feelde of verte [green], and on the right side an ymage of owre blessid lady with hir sone in hir arme. And with that signe of the cros he dyd mony maruelis after, as hit is writyn in the bookis of cronyclis of his dedys.

Extracts like these may serve to explain the great popularity of the book, which gave just the information which a country gentleman would be most likely to prize, and at the same time was written in a tone sufficiently high to explain the readiness of a schoolmaster-printer to edit and publish it. But its main interest can hardly be called literary.

The Paston Letters.

To offer a similar judgment on the famous collection of letters which passed between members of the Paston family during the best part of a century (1424-1506) would be superfluous. Private letters, interspersed with law papers, have no pretensions to be regarded as literature, but these possess an interest which compels literature to take cognizance of them, in much the same way as the secret diary which Samuel Pepys wrote for no one's reading save his own has become a classic. The Pastons were a Norfolk family, belonging to the little village of that name near the coast, some twenty miles north of Norwich. Their origin was so obscure that their enemies, of whom they had many, tried to fasten on them the disabilities which attached to servile descent, but in the fifteenth century a William Paston (d. 1444) was a justice of the Common Pleas; and his son John, also a lawyer, as executor and heir to the estates of Sir John Fastolf, rose to a very perilous and unstable importance. This John Paston (d. 1466) had five sons, of whom both the first and the second bore his own name and succeeded to his estate. From the second son was descended Robert Paston, first Earl of Yarmouth (d. 1683), and the second Earl sold the family papers to the famous antiquary Peter Le Neve. After passing through other hands, a selection from the letters was published by Sir John Fenn in 1787, and aroused immediate interest. They present, indeed, the most vivid picture which we possess of life in the gloomy days of the fifteenth century, when, over and above the convulsions of civil war, private disputes were carried on by armed forces, and the forms of law were merely the instruments of oppression. William Paston, the judge, was noted for his uprightness; but his son John was a hard man, and in his unceasing quarrels, in which his houses were more than once formally besieged, he may have been as often wrong as right. His parents contracted him to Margaret Mauteby, who, though she had never seen him till the marriage was arranged, speedily proved herself a loving and even heroic wife. The second John was a softer and more pleasure-loving person than his father, and his mother worked hard, sometimes not without bitterness, to protect the family interests from his fits of neglect. This John's letters often contain references to his books; through another section of the correspondence there runs a whole love-story; we have accounts of tourneys and public events, notably one of the murder of the Duke of Suffolk on board ship (May 1450); the constant theme of legal struggles, with their violent incidents; and abundant references to food, clothes, and other matters which help to bring the daily life of the time close to us.

The Library Edition of The Paston Letters, ed. by J. Gairdner, is in 6 vols. (1904). See also Selections, ed. by Alice Greenwood (1921), and H. S. Bennett, The Pastons and their England (1922).

The most interesting letters are those of Margaret Paston, whose passionate devotion to the interests of her husband and family often gives her correspondence a literary value despite her bad spelling. This is the account given by her future mother-in-law of Margaret's reception of her bridegroom:

Agnes Paston to William Paston (about 1440).—To my worshepefull housbond, W. Paston, be this letter takyn,—Dere housbond, I recomaunde me to yow &c. Blessyd be God I sende yow gode tydynggs of the comyng, and the brynggyn hoom, of the gentylwomman that ye wetyn of fro Redham, this same nyght, acordyng to poyntmen [appointment] that ye made ther for yowr self.

And as for the furste aqweyntaunce be-tween John Paston and the seyde gentylwomman, she made hym gentil chere in gyntyl wise, and seyde, he was verrayly your son. And so I hope ther shall nede no gret trete [negotiations] be-twyxe hym.

The parson of Stocton toold me, yif ye wolde byn [buy] her a goune, here moder wolde yeve ther-to a godely furre. The goune nedyth for to be had; and of colour it wolde be a godely blew, or erlys [else] a bryghte sanguelyn. I prey yow do byen for me ij pypys of gold [rolls of gold thread]. Your stewes [fish-ponds] do weel.

The Holy Trinite have you in governaunce.

Wretyn at Paston, in hast, the Wednesday next after Deus qui errantibus [the third Sunday after Easter] for defaute of a good secretarye.—Youres, AGN. PASTON.

Our next letter (No. 36), written some three years later (28th September 1443), shows that the readiness with which Margaret Paston had accepted her husband had soon ripened into anxious affection:

Margaret Paston to John Paston.—To my ryghth worchepful husbond, John Paston, dwellyng in the Inner Temple at London, in hast:—Ryth worshipful husbon, I recomande me to yow, dasyryng hertely to her [hear] of yowr wilfar, thankyng God of yowr a-mendyng of the grete dysese that ye have hade; and I thancke yow for the letter that ye sent me, for be [by] my trowthe my moder and I wer nowth in hertys es [not in heart's ease] fro the tyme that we woste [knew] of yowr sekenesse, tyl we woste verely of your a-mendyng. Lastly, we may take this letter (No. 685) of 29th November 1471 to her son, in which the cry, 'It is a death to me to think upon it,' shows how the prosperity of the family had become the passion of the woman's life:

Margaret Paston to John Paston.—To John Paston, Esquier [the second son], be this delyverd in hast:—I grete zow welle, and send zow Goddes blyssyng and myn, letyng zow wete that I have a letter from zour brother, wherby I undyrstand that he cannot, ner may, make no porveyans [provision] for the C. mark [£66, 13s. 4d.]; the wyche causythe me to be rythgh hevvy, and for other thynges that he wrytht to me of that he is in dawnger. For remembering wat we have had befor thys and ho sympplyly [how foolishly] yt hath be spente and to lytyl profythe to any of us, and now am in soche casse that non of us may welle helpe other with-owte that we schuld do that wer to gret a dysworschip [that which would be too great a

Your fadyr, God blysse hys sowle, hathe had as gret maters to do as I trowe he hathe had thys terme [session], and hath not spend halfe the mony up-on them in so lytyl tyme, and hath do ryth well. At the reverens of God, avyse hym zet [yet] to be war of hys expences and gydyng that yt be no schame to us alle. Yt is a schame and a thyng that is myche spokyn of in thys contre that zour faders graveston is not mad. For Goddes love, late yt be remembyrd and porveyde [provided] for in hast. Ther hathe be mych mor spend in waste than schuld have mad that.

The urgent need of money; the shame of raising it by any means that would show the straits to which she was reduced; the fear that her eldest son was suspicious of the friends she consulted, and was wasting money in London and managing his case worse than his father would have done; the grief that for years after that father's death no stone had been set up to his memory—what a picture of an anxious woman's heart it all makes, and how clearly it speaks to us across the centuries! If this is not literature, it is at least the stuff of which literature is made.

Caxton's Successors.

Returning from this episode of family letters to more formal attempts at literature, we may continue to take an interest in the work of the printers, not for its own sake, but because the industry with which it has been registered enables us to take a general survey of the literary output of the time, and to form some idea of the wants of the reading public and how they were supplied. To obtain such a survey we need not concern ourselves with small firms like Julyan Notary (1496–1520) or Richard Faques (1509–1530), each of whom issued a few English books in addition to liturgies and legal works. For the forty years which followed the deaths of Caxton and Machlinia the English book-trade was mainly in the hands of two men—Jan Wynkyn de Worde (d. 1534) and Richard Pynson (d. 1530). From the presses of the former some five hundred different editions can still be traced, from that of Pynson some three hundred; or an average for Wynkyn of about twelve books a year, and for Pynson of about eight. Even if we allow liberally for books issued by the smaller firms, and for those which have perished so absolutely as not to leave any trace behind, it is probable that a 'Publishers' Catalogue' of those days would not have contained more than forty entries a year, or a total for the whole of England of about a fifth, as near as we can reckon, of the contemporary output of Venice alone. Deficient in quantity, it cannot be said that in quality English books took any higher rank. It is noteworthy that the earliest references we have to our book-trade are both highly uncomplimentary. In the Interlude of the Four Elements (see infra, page 152), probably written about 1520, the unknown author asks his readers—

To regard his only intent and good wyll
Whiche in his mynde hath oft tymes ponderyd,
What nombre of bokes in our tonge maternall
Of toyes and trifellys be made and impryntyd,
And few of them of matter substancyall;
For though many make bokes, yet uneeth ye shall
In our Englysshe tonge fynde any warkes
Of connyng, that is regarded by clerkes.

There may have been a pedantic view of literature in the mind of a man who goes on to complain that—

Now so it is in our Englyshe tonge
Many one there is, that can but rede and wryte,
For his pleasure wyll oft presume amonge
New bokys to compyle and balades to indyte,
Some of love or other matter, not worth a myte.

Presumption in literature is often a virtue rather than a crime, but the fact remains that there is little trace of scholarship of any kind in the books printed in England during this long period. No doubt many such books were imported, and the handful of learned Englishmen by writing in Latin were able to have their books printed abroad;¹ but it is clear evidence of the low state of English scholarship when we find so few books of any pretence to learning printed in all England, and that neither of the universities could provide work to maintain a printer.¹ Our other reference to the printing-trade is from a Dialogue in verse prefixed by Robert Copland to an edition of the chapbook, Seven Sorrows that women have when theyr husbundes be deade, which must have been written soon after 1525. The dialogue is between a customer who lays down, as an axiom, 'A peny, I trow, is ynough on bokes,' and a printer who replies to the criticism

By my soule, ye prynters make such Englyshe,
So yll spelled, so yll poynted, and so pevysshe,
That scantly one can redé lynés two
But to fynde sentence he hath ynough to do; the meaning with the kindred sentiment—

I care not greatly, so that I nowe and than May get a peny as wel as I can.

It can only be said that the printers and readers were worthy of each other, and the ignorance and indifference which they shared in common show how low literature had fallen in England. Unless we are to reckon Barclay's translation of Sallust's Jugurtha, which has the text printed in small type at the side, Pynson's edition of Terence (1497) was not followed by any other Latin classic till Wynkyn's Bucolica Virgillii of 1512, and an edition of Cicero's Philippics by Pynson in 1521 completed the two printers' contributions to classical learning, no Greek book being printed in England until 1543. Of Latin schoolbooks there is a steady increase after 1510, and the appearance among them of works by Colet, Erasmus, and Linacre, as well as the manuals of the prolific Whittinton, was a good omen for the future of English schools. Historical books, with the exception of Fabian's New Chronicles of England and France (Pynson, 1516) and Lord Berners' translation of Froissart (Pynson, 1523-25), are confined to reprints of Caxton's editions. The court historiographers of this period were the Frenchman Bernard André and the Italian Polydore Vergil, but the royal munificence did not go so far as to subsidise an English printer to publish their Latin annals. Travel was represented by Mandeville, of which it seems probable that Caxton himself had planned an edition; by the Pylgrymage of Sir Rychard Gylforde (Pynson, 1511); and by little handbooks of 'informacyon for pylgrymes.' The stately and delightful but rather antiquated De Proprietatibus Rerum of Bartholomew the Englishman in Trevisa's translation (Wynkyn, before 1500) until 1521 was almost the only printed book on science, but was then honourably reinforced by several medical treatises by Linacre. Of theology, properly so called, there is little till we come to the king's ¹ As examples of books written in Latin by Englishmen at this period and printed abroad we may note More's Utopia (Louvain, 1517), Progymnasmatia Tho. Mori et Gul. Lillii sodalium (Basel, 1518), More's Epigrammata (Basel, 1520), Fisher's De unica Magdalena (Paris, 1519), Assertionis Lutheranae Confutatio (Basel, 1523), Sacri Sacerdotii Defensio (Cologne, 1528), Linacre's editions of Galen's De Temperamentis (Venice, 1498, reprinted at Cambridge in 1521) and De Methodo Medendi (Paris, 1525). Another proof of the difficulty of getting learned books printed in England at this time may be found in the important works which were left lying unprinted. Practically the whole of Dean Colet's theological works had to wait till Mr J. H. Lupton published them in five volumes between 1847 and 1876; More's History of Richard III. was first published in a continuation of Harding's Chronicle in 1543; even some of Lord Berners' translations had to wait for a publisher. In the reign of Elizabeth it became the fashion to keep poems and essays in manuscript, but at this period it would seem as if English readers cared so little for new works of any learning that publishers and authors were genuinely deterred from printing them.

Assertio Septem Sacramentorum, nor any edition of the Bible, unless we should mention the apocryphal 'Gospel of Nicodemus' which was frequently printed. In religious literature we may note a good many Lives of the Saints, from reprints of Caxton's Golden Legend and the Vita Patrum, which he had left unfinished, to thin quartos, in verse and prose, on the miracles of our Lady and the Lives of St Katharine, St Margaret, St Bridget, St Werburg, St Francis, St George, St Thomas of Canterbury, and a few others. Edification of another kind was provided in religious treatises, also extending from works of some size, like the Dives and Pauper of Henry Parker, an exposition of the Ten Commandments, of which Wynkyn and Pynson issued rival editions early in their career, down to little manuals of no literary interest. With these we may especially notice a translation of the De Imitatione Christi, of which the first three books were rendered by William Atkinson, chaplain to the Lady Margaret, Henry VII.'s mother, and the fourth by that princess herself. Of liturgies a good many were printed in England, though the foreign supply still continued; and we meet also with a fair number of law-books—not learned treatises like those printed in Italy, but summaries and manuals. In poetry Chaucer was reprinted, and some of Lydgate; and Skelton, Barclay, and Hawes, first among English poets in this one respect, enjoyed the pleasure of seeing some of their works in print. Plays also began to be printed, a few by Pynson and Wynkyn, and quite a little handful by John and William Rastell, a father and son, who, though both lawyers, were printers also, and took a personal interest in the stage. The books of light reading which Pynson and Wynkyn supplied on their own initiative were abridged and beposed romances, such as Richarde Cuer de Lyon, The Byrth of Marlyn, Torrent of Portingal, &c.; or chapbooks, in verse or prose, such as the Complaynte of a lovers lyfe, Complaynte of the too late married, the Fifteen Joys of Marriage, the Smith and his Dame, the Treatise of a Galaunt, the Gestes of the Wydowe Edith, or the already mentioned Seven Sorrows that women have when theyr husbandes be deade, whose titles afford a fair index to their contents. All these popular books are anonymous, and it is probable that they were mostly produced by humble imitators of Caxton whom the printers kept in their employ. Robert Copland, who belonged to this class, was a printer on his own account, as well as an assistant to Wynkyn de Worde. For himself or Wynkyn he translated from the French the Kalendar of Shepherdes (a miscellany of weather-lore, morality, and devotion), the History of Kynge Apollyon of Thyre, and the History of Helyas Knyght of the Swanne, and to these and other works contributed prologues, both in verse and prose, which gave him a respectable position among his not very distinguished contemporaries. The Knyght of the Swanne was translated 'at the instygacion of the Puyssaunt illustrious Prynce Lorde Edward Duke of Buckyngham;' but the commission was not given directly to the humble Copland, but to Wynkyn de Worde, who used to style himself in his books 'prynter unto the moost excellent pryncesse the kynges graundame' (the Lady Margaret). Had Copland been a man of higher position he would probably have carried on Caxton's work as editor-publisher with far more enterprise than the two foreigners, Wynkyn and Pynson, who nearly monopolised the English book-trade. But Caxton's real successor as a translator was no poor printer, but a nobleman and diplomatist, who took an active part in pageants as glittering as those he described.

John Bouchier, Lord Berners, was born in 1467, four years before the death of his father in the battle of Barnet, and succeeded to the title on the death of his grandfather in 1474. His grand-uncle, who had been appointed to the see of Canterbury in 1454, was still Archbishop on the accession of Henry VII., and the young noble was much at court, and intimate with Henry VIII. On the latter's accession he was constantly employed both in diplomacy and war. Thus he took part in the campaign of Terouenne, acted as chamberlain to the Princess Mary when she married Louis XII., negotiated in 1518 for an alliance with Charles V., and on his return from Spain attended the king at the Field of the Cloth of Gold. In 1520 he was made Deputy of Calais, and held this office till 1526, and from 1531 till his death in 1533, amid constant money troubles, despite grants of manors in four southern counties which Henry VIII. made him in 1528. His Deputyship left him leisure for literary work, and at the king's suggestion he carried through a translation of the Chronicles of Froissart, which Pynson published for him, the first volume in 1523, the second in 1525. Lord Berners also translated from the French The History of the moost noble and valyaunt Knight, Arthure of Lytell Brytaine (i.e. Brittany); the Charlemagne romance, Huon of Bordeaux; and Berthault's French version of the Spanish treatise of Guevara, El Reloj de Principes, under the title The Golden Book of Marcus Aurelius. His version of the Castel d'Amor of Diego de San Pedro was translated direct from the Spanish, 'at the instaunce of Lady Elizabeth Carew, late wyfe to Syr Nicholas Carewe, Knight.' All these minor translations were probably made late in his life, and fell into the hands of different printers after his death. His fame rests on the great Froissart, or, to give it its full title, the volumes of Sir John Froyssart of the Cronycles of Englande, Fraunce, Spayne, Portyn-gale, Scotland, Bretayne, Flaunders, and other places adjoynynge, translated out of Frenche into our maternall Englysshe tonge, which form a history of the courts and wars of Europe during the fourteenth century. When in Spain, Lord Berners had himself sent Henry VIII. an account of a Spanish bull-fight, and for his letters to the Privy Council describing the Field of the Cloth of Gold he was accorded the Council's thanks. No translator could have been more thoroughly in sympathy with his original, or have caught its spirit more happily without tedious adherence to the letter. Only the great size of the Chronicle has prevented it from vying with Mandeville as one of the most popular of English translations, and from its vivid pages picturesque extracts might be given almost without number. That which we have here chosen (from Chap. l.) describes the sea-fight of Sluys :

Of the batell on the see before Sluse in Flaunders, bytwene the kyng of England and the Frenchmen.—Nowe let us leave som what to speke of therle of Henalt [the Earl of Hainault] and of the duke of Normandy : and speke of the kyng of England, who was on the see to the intent to arryve in Flaunders, and so into Heynalt to make war agaynst the Frenchmen. This was on mydsomer evyn, in the yer of our Lorde M.CCC.xl., all the Englyssh flete was departed out of the ryver of Tames and toke the way to Sluse. And the same tyme, bytwene Blankeberque and Sluse on the see, was sir Hewe Kyryell, sir Peter Bahuchet, and Barbnoyr : and mo than sixscore greate vessels besyde other, and they wer of Normaynes, bydaulx [lightly armed peasants], Genowes [Genoese], and Pycardes : about the nombre of xl. m. Ther they were layd by the French kyng to defend [forbid] the kyng of Englandes passage. The kyng of England and his came saylyng tyll he came before Sluse : and when he sawe so great a nombre of shippes that their mastes semed to be lyke a gret wood, he demaunded of the maister of his shyp what peple he thought they were : he answered and sayd, 'Sir, I thynke they be Normayns layd here by the Frenche kyng, and hath done gret dyspleasur in Englande, brent [burnt] your towne of Hampton and taken your great shyppe the Christofer.' 'A,' quoth the kyng, 'I have long desyred to fyght with the Frenchmen : and nowe shall I fyght with some of them by the grace of God and saynt George, for truly they have done me so many dyspleasurs that I shall be revenged and I may.' Than the king sett all his shippes in order, the grettest befor, well furnyshed with archers, and ever bytwene two shippes of archers he had one shipp with men of armes, and than he made an other batell [division] to ly a-lofe [aloof] with archers to confort [reinforce] ever them that were moost wery, yf nede were. And ther were a great nombre of countesses, ladyes, knyghts' wyves and other damosels that were goyng to se the quene at Gaunt [Ghent]. These ladyes the kyng caused to be well kept with thre hundred men of armes and five hundred archers.

Whan the kyng and his marshals had ordered his batayls, he drewe up the seales [sails] and cam with a quarter wynde to have the vantage of the sonne. And so at last they tourned a lytell to get the wynde at wyll : and when the Normayns sawe them recule [withdraw] back, they had marvell why they dyde so. And some sayd, 'They thynke themselfe nat mete to medyll with us : wherfore they woll go backe.' They sawe well howe the kyng of England was ther personally, by reason of his baners. Than they dyd appareyle [make ready] their flete in order, for they wer sage and good men of warr on the see : and dyd set the Christofer, the which they had won the yer before, to be formast, with many trumpettes and instrumentes ; and so set on their enemies. Ther began a sore batell on bothe partes : archers and crosbowes began to shote, and men of armes aproched and fought hande to hande, and the better to come togyder they had great hokes and grapers [grapplers] of yron to cast out of one shyppe into an other, and so tyed them fast togyder. Ther were many dedes of armes done, takyng and rescuyng agayne, and at last the great Christofer was first won by the Englysshmen, and all that were within it taken or slayne. Then ther was great noyse and cry, and the Englysshmen aproched and fortified the Christofer with archers, and made hym to passe on byfore to fyght with the Genoweyes. This batayle was right fierse and terryble : for the batayls on the see ar more dangerous and fiercer than the batayls by lande. For on the see ther is no reculyng nor fleyng ; ther is no remedy but to fight and to abyde fortune, and every man to shewe his prowes. Of a trouthe sir Hewe Kyriell and sir Bahuchet and Barbe Noyer were ryght good and expert men of warre. This batayle endured from the mornyng tyll it was noone, and the Englysshmen endured moche payne, for their enemies were foure agaynst one and all good men on the see. Ther the kyng of England was a noble knight of his owne hands ; he was in the flower of his youth. In likewyse so was the erle of Derby, Pembroke, Herforde, Huntyngdon, Northampton, and Glocetter, Sir Raynolde Cobham, sir Richard Stafforde, the lorde Percy, sir Water of Manny, sir Henry of Flaunders, sir John Beauchamp, the lorde Felton, the lorde Brasseton, sir Chandos, the lorde Dalawarre, the lorde of Multon, sir Robert Dartoys, called erle of Rychmont, and dyverse other lordes and knyghtes, who bare themselfe so valyantly with some socours that they had of Bruges and of the countrey there about, that they obtayned the vycorie. So that the Frenchmen, Normayns, and other were dysconfetted, slayne, and drowned ; there was not one that scaped, but all were slayne. Whanne this vycorie was atchyved the kyng all that nyght abode in his shyppe before Sluse with great noyse of trumpettes and other instrumentes.

Our second example of Lord Berners' happiness in translation shall be taken from a book very unlike the Froissart, but in its own day quite as famous. The official chronicler of Charles V.—Lord Berners may have known him personally—was a Franciscan monk, Antonio de Guevara, Bishop of Mondoñedo (d. 1545). His Reloj de Principes, or 'Dial of Princes,' has been attractively described as 'a didactic novel with Marcus Aurelius for its hero,' and was designed for the edification of the Emperor Charles. A rather transparent pretence that it was translated from a Greek manuscript in a library at Florence was virulently exposed in Spain, but passed muster in France and England ; and Lord Berners' translation, made from an intermediate French version at the request of Sir Francis Bryan, and completed at Calais a week before the translator's death, was called The Golden Book of Marcus Aurelius, Emperour and Eloquent Oratour. First published in 1539, it went through at least seven editions, of which the last is dated 1586, and its influence was thus presumably as great as or greater than that of the later version by Sir Thomas North (The Dial of Princes), first issued in 1568. Guevara's rhetorical style was one of the influences which fostered the growth of English Euphuism, and this early rendering of his Reloj de Principes by the translator of Froissart is thus an interesting link between two eras. In our quotation, in which the writer is supposed to be Marcus Aurelius himself, the Euphuistic note only shows itself towards the end :

There was an auncient lawe, none mighte be taken and received for a citisen in Rome, but he were first examined by the Censore. In the tyme of Cato Censorius, whan any woulde be a citezen of Rome, this examinacion was made of hym : He was not demaunded, of whens he was, nor what he was, nor whens he came, nor wherfore he came, nor of what kinne or auncient stocke he came : but onely thei toke his handes betwene theirs, and if they felt them softe and smothe, forthwith as an idell vacabunde man they dispatched and sent him awaie ; and if they found his handes harde and ful of hard knottes, by and by [forthwith] they admitted him a citisen and dweller in Rome. Also when any officers toke any ill doers, and put them in prison, that was called Marmotine, instede of informacion, the first thyng that they toke hede of was theyr handes, whiche yf they had bene as a labourers handes, and a workeman, though his crime were grevous, yet his chastisement was mitigate and more easye ; and yf the unhappy prisoner chaunced to have ydell handes, for a littell faute, he shoulde have sharpe punishment. It hath ben an olde sayyng : He that hath good handes, must nedes have good custome. I saie, I chastised never a laboureyng man, but I was sory for it : nor I never caused to whyppe a vacabunde, but I was gladde of it. I wyll tell you more of this Cato Censorius, whiche was greatly feared. For even as children in the scholes, hering theyr maister commyng in, renne to their bokes, so when Cato went through the stretes of Rome, every body went to theyr worke. O right happy baron, before whom the people feared more to be ydell, than to be yll before any other.

Than beholde ye at this houre, what force vertue hath, and how valiaunt a vertuous man is, seeyng that all the world feared Rome, onely for hir worthynes in armes : and all Rome feared Cato, onely for his vertues. The adventures of men are so divers, and the suspect fortune geveth so many overthwart turnes, that after that a great space she hath geven great pleasures, incontinent we are cyted to hir subtyll travailes of repentaunce. O happie Cato Censorine, who with suche as have folowed his waies, are now sure from the abatementes of fortune. Than he that will have glory in this lyfe, and attaine glory after death, and be beloved of many, and feared of all : let him be vertuous in doyng of good workes, and deceive no man with vaine wordes. I sweare unto you by the lawe of a man of worship, that if the goddes woulde accomlishe my desyre, I had rather to be Cato with the vertuous policies that he used in Rome, than to be Scipio with the abundance of blod that he shedde in Affricke.

Less picturesque, but of native growth, was Fabyan's Chronicles, the other historical work mentioned as printed by Pynson (page 102).

Robert Fabyan (d. 1513) was still rather a chronicler than a historian—one of those who hardly aimed at literary excellence or critical treatment. Fabyan, a clothier who became an alderman and sheriff of London, wrote a general chronicle of English history, called by him the Concordance of Histories, but printed (1515) as the New Chronicles of England and France (edited by Sir Henry Ellis in 1811). It is particularly minute with regard to what would probably appear the most important of all things to the worthy alderman, the succession of officers of all kinds serving in the city of London ; from the accession of Richard I. it is really a chronicle of London, and amongst other events of the reign of Henry V. the author does not omit to note that a new weather-cock was placed on the top of St Paul's steeple. Fabyan, who repeats the fabulous stories of early English history elaborated by Geoffrey of Monmouth, occasionally 'drops into poetry' or doggerel. Fabyan thus tells the story of Jack Cade's rebellion :

And in the moneth of Iuny this [1450], the comons of Kent assemblyd them in grete multytude, and chase to theym a capitayne, and named hym Mortymer, and cosyn to the duke of Yorke ; but of moste he was named Iak Cade. This kepte the people wonderously togyder, and made suche ordenaunces amonge theym, that he brought a great nombre of people of theym vnto the Blak Heth, where he deuyd a bylle of petycions to the kynge & his counsayll, and shewyd therein what iniuries and oppressions the poore commons suffred by suche as were aboute ye kynge, a fewe persones in nombre, and all vnder coloure to come to his aboute [obedience]. The kynges counsayll seyng this byll, disalowyd it, and counsayled the kynge, whiche by the vii. daye of Iuny had gaderid to hym a stronge hoost of people, to go agayne his rebellys, and to gyue vnto theym batayll. Than the kynge, after the sayd rebellys had holden theyr felde vpon Blak Heth vii. dayes, made towarde theym. Wherof herynge, the capitayne drewe backe wt his people to a vyllage called Seuenok, and there enbataylled. . . . [Fabyan then tells how Sir Humphrey Stafford, sent against the rebels, is defeated and slain.] And so soon as Iak Cade had thus ouercommyn the Staffordes, he anone apparaylled hym with the knyghtes apparayll, and dyd on hym his bryganders [body-armour] set with gylt nayle, and his salet [helmet] and gylt sporis ; and after he had refresshid his people, he retourned agayne to Blak Heth, & there pyght [pitched] agayne his felde, as here tofore he had done, & laye there from the xxix. daye of Iuny, beyng seynt Peters day, tyll the firste day of Iuly. In whiche season came vnto hym the archebyssshop of Caunterbury, and the duke of Bukkyngham, with whom they had longe communycacion, and fande hym right discrete in his answeys : how be it they coude nat cause hym to lay downe his people, and to submyt hym vnto ye kynges grace.

In this whyle, the kynge and the quene herynge of the encreasyng of his rebellys, and also the lordes feryng theirowne seruantes, lest they wolde take the capitaynes partye, remoued from London to Kyllingworth [Kenilworth], leuyng the cytie without ayde, except oonly the lorde Scalys, whiche was left to kepe the Tower, and with hym a manly and warly [warlike] man named Mathewe Gowth. Thanethe capitayne of Kent thus hounge [hovering] at Blakheth, to ye ende to blynde the more the people, and to brnyg hym in fame that he kept good iustyce, behedyd there a pety capitayne of his named Parys, for somoche as he had offendyd agayne such ordnaunce as he had stablissed in his hoste. And heryng yt the kyng & all his lordes were this [thus] departyd, drewe hym nere vnto ye cytie, so yt vpon ye first day of Iuly he entred the burgh of Southwarke, beyng than Wednysday, and lodged hym there that nyght, for he myght nat be suffred to entre that cytie. . . . And the same afternoone, aboute v. of ye clok, the capitayne with his people entred by the brydge; and whan he came vpon the drawe brydge, he hewe the ropys that drewe the bridge in sonder with his sworde, and so passed into the cytie, and made in sondry places therof proclamacions in the kynges name, that no man, payne of dethe, shulde robbe or take any thyng parforce without payinge therfore. By reason wherof he wanne many hertes of the comons of the cytie; but all was done to begyle wt the people, as after shall euydently appere. He rode thorough dyuers stretes of the cytie, and as he came by London stone, he strake it with his sworde, and sayd, 'Nowe is Mortymere lorde of this cytie.' And whan he had thus shewyd hymselfe in dyuerse places of ye cytie, and shewyd his mynde to the mayre for the orderynge of his people, he retourned into Southwarke, and there abode as he before had done, his people commynge and goynge at lawfull houres whan they wolde. . . . [Cade caused several persons to be executed, one a sheriff of Kent accused of extortion.] Whan they hadde thus behedyd thys ii. men, they toke the hede of Croumer and pyght it vpon a pole, and soo entred agayne the cytie wit ye heddes of the lordes Saye and of Croumer; and as they passed the stretes, ioynd the poles togyder, and caused eyther deed mouth to kysse other dyuerse and many tymes. . . .

Then towarde nyghte he retourned into Southwarke, and vpon the morne reentred the cytie, and dyned yt daye at a place in seynt Margarete Patyn [St Margaret Pattens] parysshe, called Cherstis hous; and whan he hadde dyned, lyke an vncurteyse gest, robbyd hym, as the day before he hadde Malpas. For whiche ii. robberyes, albe it that the porayll [poor] and nedy people drewe vnto hym, and were parteners of yt ille, ye honest and thyrfty comoners caste in their myndes ye sequele of this matyer, and feryd leste they shuld be delt with in lyke maner, by meane wherof he loste ye peoples fauoure and hertes. For it was to be thought, if he had nat executyd that robory, he myght haue gone ferre and brought his purpose to good effect, if he hadde entyndyd wel; but it is to demeane and presuppose that the entent of hym was nat good, wherfore it myght nat come to any good conclucion. . . . Than vpon the v. daye of Iuly, ye capitayne beyng in Southwarke, caused a man to be behedyd, for cause of displeasure to hym done, as the fame went: and so kept hym in Southwarke al that day; how be it he myghte haue entred the cytie if he had wolde.

And whan nyght was comyng, the mayre and cytezeins, with Mathewe Gowth, lyke to their former appoyntment, kept the passage of the brydge, beyng Sunday, and defended the Kentysshmen, whiche made great force to reentre the cytie. Thenne the capitayne seyng this bekerynge [bickering] begon, yode [went] to harneys, & called his people aboute hym, and sette so fyersly vpon the cytezeins, that he draue theym backe from ye stulpis [boundary-posts] in Southwarke or brydge fote, vnto the drawe brydge. Then the Kentysshmen sette fyre vpon ye drawe brydge. In defendyng wherof many a man was drowned and slayne, amonge ye whiche, of men of name was Iohn Sutton, alderman, Mathewe Gowgh, gentylman, and Roger Heysande, cytezeyn. And thus contynued this skyrmysshe all nyghte tyll ix. of the clok vpon the morne. . . . Thus contynuyng this cruell fyght, to ye distruction of moche people on both sydes, lastly, after the Kentysshmen put to ye worse, a trewe [truce] was agreed for certayne houres; duryng ye which trew, ye archebysshop of Caunterbury, than chaunceller of Englande, sent a generall pardon to ye capitayn for hymselfe, and an other for his people: by reason wherof he and his company departyd the same nyght out of Southwarke, and so retourned euery man to his owne.

But it was nat longe after that ye capitayne wt his company was thus departed, that proclamacions were made in dyuers places of Kent, of Southsex [Sussex], and Sowtherey [Surrey], that who myght take ye foresayd Iak Cade, other on lyue or dede, shuld haue a M. marke [1000 marks] for his trauayl. After whiche proclamacion thus published, a gentylman of Kent, named Alexander Iden, awayted so his tyme, that he toke hym in a gardyn in Sussex, where in the takynge of hym the sayd Iak was slayne: and so beyng deed was brought into Southwarke the xi. daye of the moneth of 1450 and there leste in the Kynges Benche for that nyght. And vpon morowe ye deed corps was drawn thorough the hyghe stretes of the cytie vnto Newgate, & there hedyd and quarteryd, whose hede was than sent to London brydge, & his iiiii. quarters were sent to iiiii. sondry townes of Kent.

Edward Hall, or HALLE (c. 1499–1547), chronicler or historian, was a Londoner born, from Eton passed in 1514 to King's College, Cambridge, and next studied at Gray's Inn. He became a common serjeant in 1532. His Union of the Noble Famelies of Lancastre and Yorke (1542; 3rd ed. 1550; best ed. by Sir Henry Ellis, 1809) was only brought down to 1532; the rest, down to 1546, was completed by the editor and continuator, Richard Grafton (d. 1572), who was the printer of Matthew's Bible, of the first Book of Common Prayer, and of Hardyng's Chronicle, as well as of chronicles compiled by himself. Hall's dignity and the reality of his figures had a charm for Shakespeare; and for Henry VIII.'s reign the work is really valuable as the intelligent evidence of an eyewitness—though too eulogistic of the king. The following extract, describing the scene in the council-room of the Protector Gloucester (afterwards Richard III.), shows how closely Hall was sometimes followed by Shakespeare:

The lorde protectour caused a counsaill to be set at the tower on the fridaye the thirtene daye of Iune, where was muche commonyng [communing] for the honourable solemnitee of the coronacion, of the whiche the tyme appointed aproched so nere, that the pageauntes were a makynge daye & night at Westminster, and vitaille killed whiche afterwarde was caste awaye.

These lordes thus sittynge commonyng of this matter, the protectour came in among them about nyne of the clocke saluting them curteously, excusing him self that he had been from them so long, saying merely that he had been a sleper that daye. And after a litle talking with them he sayd to the bishopp of Ely, My lorde you haue verye good strawberies in youre garden at Holborne, I require you let vs haue a messe of theim. Gladly (my lord qd [quoth] he) I would I had some better thing as redy to your pleasure as that, and with that in all hast he sente his seruaunt for a dishe of strawberies. The protectour set the lordes faste in commonyng and there vpon prayed them to spare him a litle, and so he departed and came agayn betwene x. and eleuen of the clocke into the chambre all chaunged with a sowre angry countenance, knitting the browes, frowning and fretyng and gnawing on his lips, and so set hym doune in his place. All the lordes were dismaied and sore marueyled of this maner and sodeyne chaunge and what thyng should hym ayle. When he had sitten a whyle, thus he began: What were they worthy to haue that compasse and ymagine the destrucc-ion of me beyng so neare of bloud to the kyng & protectoure of this his royall realme: At which question, all the lordes sate sore astonyed, musyng muche by whom the question should be ment, of which euery man knew him self clere.

Then the lorde Hastynges as he that for the familiaritie that was betwene them, thought he might be boldest with him, answered and sayd that they were worthy to be punished as heynous traytours what soeuer they were, and all the other affirmed the same. That is (qd he) yonder sorceres my brothers wife and other with her, menyng the quene. At these wordes many of the lordes were sore abashed whiche fauoured her, but the lorde Hastynges was better content in hys mynde that it was moued by her then by any other that he loued better, albeit hys hart grudged that he was not afore made of counsaile of this matter as well as he was of the takyng of her kynred and of their puttyng to death, whiche were by hys assent before deuysed to be beheaded at Pomfret, this selfe same daye, in the whiche he was not ware that it was by other deuised that he hym selfe should the same daye be beheaded at London: then sayd the protectour in what wyse that sorceresse and other of her counsaile, as Shores wyfe, with her affinitie haue by their sorcery and witchecrafte this [thus] wasted my body, and therewith plucked vp his doublet sleue to his elbowe on hys lefte arme, where he shewed a weryshe [shrivelled] wythered arme & small as it was neuer other. And therupon, euery mannes mynde mysgaue them, well perceuyng that this matter was but a quarell, for well they wist that the quene was both to wyse to go about any such folye, & also if she would, yet would she of all folke make Shores wyfe least of her counsaile whom of all women she most hated as that concubine whom the kyng her husband most loued.

Also, there was no manne there but knewe that hys arme was euer such sith the day of his birth. Neuertheless the lorde Hastynges, which from the death of kyng Edward kept Shores wife, whom he somewhat doted in the kynges lyfe, saying it is sayd that he forbore her for reuerence toward his kyng, or els of a certayne kynde of fidelitie toward his frend. Yet now his hart somewhat grudged to haue her whom he loued so highly accused, and that as he knewe well vntreuly, therefore he answered and sayd, Heynously my lorde, yf they haue so done, they be worthy of heynous punishment. What, qd the protectour, thou seruest me I wene with yf and with and. I tell the they haue done it, and that wyl I make good on thy bodye traytour. And therewith (as in a great anger) he clapped his fyste on the borde a great rappe, at whiche token geuen, one cried treason without the chamber, and therewith a doore clapped, and in came rushing men in harneyes as many as the chamber could hold. And anone the prôtectoure sayd to the lorde Hastynges, I arrest the traytoure. What, me my lorde? qd he. Yea the traytoure, qd the protectour. And one let flye at the lorde Stanley, which shroncke at the stroacke and fell vnder the table, or els hys head had bene cleft to the teth, for as shortly as he shrancke, yet ranne the bloude aboute his eares. Then was the Archebishop of Yorke and doctour Morton bishopp of Ely & the lorde Stanley taken and diuers other whiche were bestowed in dyuers chambers, saue the lorde Hastynges (whom the protectour commaunded to speede and shryue him apace,) for by saint Poule (qd he) I wyl not dyne tyll I se thy head of. It boted hym not to aske why, but heuily he toke a priest at auenture and made a shorte shrift, for a lenger woulde not be suffered, the protectour made so much hast to his dyner, which might not go to it tyll this murther were done, for saying of hys vngracious othe. So was he brought furthe into the grene besyde the chapel within the towre, and his head layed doune on a logge of tymber that lay there for buildyng of the chapel, & there tyrannously stricken of, and after his body and head wer entered at Wyndesore by his maister kyng Edward the forth, whose soules Iesu pardon. Amen.

The Later Miracle-Plays and Religious Moralities.

We turned aside (page 49) from the history of the drama at the point which the miracle-plays had reached in the time of Chaucer when Herod and Pilate, as played by clerks or craftsmen on 'scaffolds high,' were already famous for their ranting, and the 'sorrow of Noah and his fellowship' when Noah's wife refused to come into the ark was a recognised theme for comic treatment. The great cycles 'of matter from the beginning of the world' were being acted all over England, and human nature, more especially the human nature of playwrights and actors, being what it is, it was only to be expected that the authors and players of each cycle should endeavour to introduce into their representation some special features whereby it might differ from and surpass others. The Bible story being common ground to all, these differences could only be introduced either by the importation of legends or by the use of the imagination in scenes in which it would not clash with the somewhat elastic medieval ideas of reverence. Of legendary accretions we have an example in a painful but dramatic episode in the so-called 'Coventry' cycle, where a summoner, of the kind Chaucer depicted in the Canterbury Tales, arraigns Joseph and Mary before the Bishop, and the Blessed Virgin's chastity is proved by an ordeal which brings confusion on her accuser. Of the use of imagination the stock instance is the comic development of the talk of the shepherds as they watch their flocks on the night of the Nativity. In the Chester Plays this takes the form of an enormous supper and a wrestling match between master and servant, in which the servant is, of course, victorious. In the 'Wakefield' cycle (often cited as the Towneley Plays, from the Towneley family in whose possession the unique manuscript long remained) the development is much more marked, for here we meet with the work of a playwright whose talent, when we remember the cramped conditions under which he wrote, may be said to have come near to genius. These Wakefield Plays have come down to us in a more composite form than any other cycle. The play of Jacob and Esau, from which a passage has already been quoted (page 48), has been regarded by good authorities as one of the most primitive fragments of the religious drama. Five plays were borrowed, in a corrupt form, from the cycle played at the neighbour city of York. What here concerns us is, that about the end of the fourteenth century, or the earliest years of the fifteenth, the cycle was revised and added to by this unknown genius, whose work can clearly be traced by his fondness for a particular metre and the extraordinary freedom with which he handled his subjects. His favourite metre is a nine-line stanza, with central rhymes in the first four lines (aaaa cdddc), and we find this used with admirable regularity through five long plays, that of Noah, two versions of a Shepherds' Play, and the plays of Herod the Great and the Scourging of Christ. In all of these, it will be noted, there are personages (Noah's wife, shepherds, soldiers, executioners) in whose case the silence of the Scriptures left the dramatist a free hand. In addition to the five complete plays, we find passages in the nine-line metre, obviously of the same authorship, embedded in two other plays connected with Christ's Passion, in a play on the Raising of Lazarus, and in another on the Last Judgment; and (although here the evidence of metre deserts us) we cannot be wrong in attributing to the same hand some interpolations of extraordinary humour and boldness in the killing of Abel. Thus we have altogether upwards of four thousand lines from this man's pen, and alike in their boisterous humour, their popular satire, and their grim portrayal of the terrors of death, they rank indisputably as among the most notable dramatic work produced before the reign of Elizabeth. Our first extract must be taken from the famous sheep-stealing episode in the second of the two Shepherds' Plays. The thief is a certain Mak, whom the shepherds suspect when they see him approach, but admit to share their supper. After disarming their suspicions by lying down in the midst of them, he rises while they sleep, carries off a fat sheep to his cottage, and then resumes his sleeping-place till the shepherds wake him, and he goes about his business. The shepherds miss the stolen sheep, quickly suspect Mak, and run to his cottage. Mak's wife, so he says, has just had a baby, but he welcomes them nevertheless, and here is the scene that follows:

(57)

Mak. I wold ye dynyd or ye yode, me thynk that ye swette.

2nd Shep. Nay, nawther mendys oure mode drynke nor mette.

Mak. Why, sir, alys you oght bot goode?

3rd Shep. Yee, oure shepe that we gett,
Ar stollyn as thay yode. Oure los is grette.

Mak. Syrs, drynkys!

Had I bene thore,
Som shuld have boght it full sore.

1st Shep. Mary, som men trowes that ye wore,
And that us forthynkys.

(58)

2nd Shep. Mak, som men trowys that it shuld be ye.

3rd Shep. Ayther ye or youre spouse—so say we.

Mak. Now if ye have suspowse to Gill or to me,
Com and rype oure howse, and then may ye se
Who had hir.

If I any shepe fott,
Aythor cow or stott—
And Gyll, my wyfe, rose nott
Here syne she laid hir.

(59)

As I am true and lele, to God here I pray,
That this be the fyrst mele that I shall ete this day.

1st Shep. Mak, as have I ceyll, avyse the, I say;
He lernyd tymely to steyll that couth not say nay.

Gill. I swelt!

Outt, thefys, fro my wonys!
Ye com to rob us for the nonys.

Mak. Here ye not how she gronys?
Youre hartys shuld melt.

(60)

Gill. Outt, thefys, fro my barne! negh hym not thor.

Mak. Wyst ye how she had farne, youre hartys wold be sore.

Ye do wrang, I you warne, that thus commys before
To a woman that has farne—bot I say no more.

Gill. A, my medyll!

I pray to God so mylde,
If ever I you begyld,
That I ete this chyld
That lygys in this credyll.

(61)

Mak. Peasse, woman, for godys payn! and cry not so:
Thou spyllys thy brane and makys me full wo.

2nd Shep. I trow oure shepe be slayn. What finde ye two?

3rd Shep. All wyrk we in vayn. As well may we go.
Bot hatters,

I can fynde no flesh,

Hard nor nesh,

Salt nor fresh,

Bot two tome platers.

(57) Yode, went; nawther, neither; mode, temper; mette, meat; alys, ails; oght bot goode, anything that is not good; los, lose; thore, there; forthynkys, makes sorry. (58) Suspowse, suspicion; rype, ransack; fott, fetched. (59) Ceyll, luck; swelt, faint; wonys, dwelling; for the nonys, for the nonce 'you come to seize your chance of robbing us.' (60) Negh, approach; thor, there; farne, fared; lygys, lies; credyll, cradle. (61) Spyllys, destroyest; Bot hatters, But hang it! nesh, tender; tome platers, empty platen.

(64)

2nd Shep. Mak, freyndys will we be, ffor we are all oone.
Mak. We! now I hald for me, for mendys gett I none.
Fare well all thre! all glad were ye gone!

[The shepherds leave.]

3rd Shep. Fare wordys may ther be, bot luf is ther none
This yere.

1st Shep. Gaf ye the chyld any thyng?

2nd Shep. I trow not oone farthyng.

3rd Shep. Fast agane will I flyng;

Abyde ye me there. [Goes back to the house.]

(65)

Mak, take it to no grefe if I com to thi barne.

Mak. Nay, thou dos me greatt reprefe, and fowll has thou farne.

3rd Shep. The child will it not grefe, that lytyll day-starne.

Mak, with youre leyfe, let me gyf youre barne
Bot sex pence.

Mak. Nay, do way: he slepys.

2nd Shep. Me thynk he pepys.

Mak. When he wakyns, he wepys.

I pray you go hence.

[The other shepherds come back.]

(66)

3rd Shep. Gyf me lefe hym to kys and lyft up the clowtt. [Seeing the sheep.]

What the dewill is this? he has a long snowte.

1st Shep. He is merkyd amys. We wate ill abowte.

2nd Shep. Ill spon west, i-wys, ay commys foull owte.

Ay, so!

He is lyke to oure shepe!

3rd Shep. How, Gyb! may I pepe?

1st Shep. I trow, kynde will crepe

Where it may not go.

(67)

2nd Shep. This was a qwantt gawde and a far cast.
It was a hee frawde.

3rd Shep. Yee, syrs, wast.

Lett bren this bawde and bynd hir fast.

A fals skawde, hang at the last;

So shall thou.

Wyll ye se how thay swedyll

His foure feytt in the medyll?

Sagh I never in a credyll

A hornyd lad or now.

(68)

Mak. Peasse byd I: what! lett be youre fare:

I am he that hym gatt, and yond woman hym bare.

1st Shep. What dewill shall he hatt? Mak? lo, God!
Makys ayre!

2nd Shep. Lett be all that. Now God gyf hym care, I sagh.

Gill. A pratty child is he

As sytts on a woman's kne;

A dyllydowne, perde,

To gar a man laghe.

(64) All oone, all agreed; hald, hold of; mendys, amends; luf, love; Gaf, gave; flyng, hasten. (65) Reprefe, reproof; fowll has thou farne, ill have you behaved; starnes, star; do way, cease. (66) Clowtt, cloth; Ill spon west . . . owte, Bad spinning makes bad cloth (a proverb); How, Gyb . . . pepe, This line is assigned in the MS. to the 3rd Shepherd, who has already seen the sheep; kynde will crepe, Nature shows itself somehow (another proverb). (67) Qwantt gawde, dainty trick; far cast, far throw, good try; hee, high; wast, it was; bren, burn; skawde, scold; swedyll, swaddle. (68) Fare, fuss; hatt, be called; ayre, heir; sagh, say; dyllydowne, pet; gar, make.

3rd Shep. I know hym by the eere marke, that is a good tokyn.

Mak. I tell you, syrs, hark! hys noyse was brokyn.
Sythen told me a clerk, that he was forspokyn.

1st Shep. This is a fals wark; I wold fayn be wrokyn:
Gett wepyn.

Gill. He was takyn with an elfe,
I saw it myself;

When the klok stroke twelf

Was he forshapyn.

(70)

2nd Shep. Ye two ar well feft, sam in a stede.

3rd Shep. Syn thay manteyn thare theft, let do thaym to dede.

Mak. If I trespas eft, gyrd of my heede.
With you will I be left.

1st Shep. Syrs, do my reede.

For this trespas,
We will nawther ban ne flyte,

Fyght nor chyte,

Bot have done as tyte,

And cast hym in canvas. [They toss Mak in a sheet.]

(71)

Lord! what I am sore, in poynt for to bryst!

In fayth I may no more. Therfor wyll I ryst.

2nd Shep. As a shepe of sevyen skore he weyd in my fyst.
For to slepe ay whore me thynk that I lyst.

3rd Shep. Now I pray you,
Lyg downe on this grene.

1st Shep. On these thefys yit I mene.

3rd Shep. Wherto shuld ye tene?

Do as I say you.

[An Angel sings 'Gloria in excelsis;' afterwards let him say.]

(72)

Angelus. Ryse, hyrd-men heynd! for now is he borne
That shall take fro the feynd that Adam had lorne:

That warloo to sheynd, this nyght is he borne.

God is made youre freynd, now at this morne.

He behestys,

At Bedlem go se,

Ther lygys that fre

In a cryb full poorely,

Betwyx two bestys.

(73)

1st Shep. This was a qwant stevyn that ever yit I hard.
It is a mervell to nevyn, thus to be skard.

2nd Shep. Of Godys son of hevyn he spak upward.

All the wod on a levyn me thoght that he gard Appere.

3rd Shep. He spake of a barne
In Bedlem I you warne.

1st Shep. That betokyns yond starnes.

Let us seke hym there.

(69) Noyse, nose; forspokyn, bewitched; wrokyn, avenged; wepyn, weapons; forshapyn, transformed. (70) Feft, endowed; sam, together; stede, place; dede, death; eft, again; gyrd of, strike off; With you . . . left, I put myself at your mercy; reale, advice; nawther ban ne flyte, neither curse nor scold; chyte, chide; as tyte, as quickly as possible. (71) What, how; in poynt for, ready to; sevyen skore, i.e. sevenscore pounds; ay whore, anywhere; mene, think; tene, sorrow; Do, text So. (72) Heynd, gentle; lorne, lost; warloo, warlock, wizard; sheynd, punish; behestys, bids; lygys, lies; that fre, that noble child. (73) Qwant, dainty; stevyn, voice; nevyn, speak of; shard, scared; on a levyn, lit by lightning; gard, caused; starnes, star.—Throughout this extract it will be noted that the northern forms are very marked.

Thus, after Gill's trick is exposed, the sheep found in the cradle, and Mak deservedly blanket-tossed, the play ends in orthodox fashion with the procession of the shepherds to Bethlehem and the presentation of their simple gifts to the Holy Child. But until the appearance of the Angels there is no religious element in it; it is purely secular comedy, a rustic play worked out to its end in a masterly fashion.

As a contrast to the foregoing extract we must, in justice to the range of our anonymous dramatist, quote the five grim stanzas which he interpolated into the York Play of Lazarus. Fresh from the grave, pointing to the marks of arrested but not yet effaced corruption, Lazarus preaches a sermon on Death, of which medieval poets ever took a morbid and horrible view, and which is here depicted with grisly power:

Ilkon in sich aray with dede thai shall be dight ^{1, 2}
 And closid colde in clay, wheder he be kyng or knyght;
 For all his garmentes gay, that semely were in sight,
 His flesh shall frete away, with many a wofull wight. ^{3, 4}
 Then wofully sich wightys ^{creatures}
 Shall gnawe thise gay knyghtys;
 Thare lunges and thare lightys,
 Thare harte shall frete in sonder;
 Thise masters most of myghtys,
 Thus shall thai be broght under.

(8)

Under the erthe ye shall thus carefully then cowche;
 The roye of youre hall youre nakyd nose shall towche;

The interpolation in the play of the Last Judgment is much longer than this, extending to some three hundred lines of broad satire, which ranges from the crimes of the perjurer and oppressor to the follies of the women, whose headgear makes them look 'horned like a cow,' and of those who pad their shoulders with moss and flock. 'Had domysday oght tarid,' say the devils, 'we must have biggid hell more [built hell larger], the world is so warid [cursed]':

Oure porter at hell yate
 Is haldyn so strate,
 Up erly and downe late,
 He rystys never.

The author of these plays and interpolations introduces, along with English proverbs and some allusions to popular stories, a few tags in Latin, and may have been in minor orders; but his interests and his turn of thought were certainly secular, and had he lived at a time when the secular drama had won a recognised place he must have left no mean mark on English literature. As it was, he carried the principle of humorous and satirical relief to the farthest point which the essentially religious character of the miracle-plays could admit, and no further development was possible.

The popularity of these miracle-plays was enormous and of long duration; but whether from the love of novelty or from the wish to apply the same methods to other branches of Christian teaching, a rival to them came into existence as early as the time of Wyclif, who, in urging the lawfulness of having the Bible in English, reminds his readers how 'herfore freris han taught in Englonde the Paternoster in Englissch tunge as men seyen in the playe of York' (De Officio Pastoralis, Cap. 15). This York Play of the Lord's Prayer (Ludus Oracionis Domini) was performed under the auspices of a special guild of the same name, which numbered in 1399 over a hundred members, and lasted till it was suppressed by Henry VIII. The play itself had an even longer life, for it was performed in 1558, and once again in 1572, in which last year Archbishop Grindal confiscated the manuscript under pretext of examining into the purity of its doctrine. A 'Creed Play,' which must have been much of the same nature, was performed at York once in ten years in the fifteenth century, and its revival in 1568 was only prevented by the adverse opinion, not of the Archbishop, but of the Dean. In the 'Creed Play' there may have been a mixture of history and allegory; in that of the Lord's Prayer the personages must have been mainly allegorical, personifications of virtues and vices; and this is the essential characteristic of the Morality Plays, of which the earliest extant specimens belong to the middle of the fifteenth century. These, from having at one time belonged to a Mr Cox Macro, are sometimes alluded to as the 'Macro Moralities.' They are three in number, and are respectively known as The Castell of Perseverance; Mind, Will, and Understanding (also called 'A Morality of the Wisdom that is Christ'); and Mankind. None of them is of high literary merit, a love of alliteration leading the authors into the frequent use of tags ('by fen and flood,' 'by street and sty,' 'by street and strond,' 'by down and ditch,' &c.); while the interest of the play is purely didactic, with hardly any relieving touch of humanity or humour. Yet the most laboured portrayal of the struggle of the powers of Good and Evil for man's soul can never be wholly lacking in tragic interest, and the Castell of Perseverance, though spun out to some 3500 lines, is not unreadable. The unique manuscript gives a rough drawing of a stage castle, with a moat, and five 'scaffolds' round it, to be occupied by the World, the Flesh, and the Devil (Mundus, Caro, Belial), Covetyse (Covetousness) and Deus. The play begins with a conference of the powers of ill, and then Humanum Genus (Mankind) comes forth as a new-born child to lament his lot. His Good and Bad Angels come to his side, and he follows the Bad, who brings him under the power of the World. Pleasure, Folly, and Backbiting, Belial and the Flesh, and all the seven sins, become his companions; but his Good Angel brings Confession, Shrift, and Penitence to his rescue, and he is lodged in the Castle of Perseverance. A battle ensues between the Sins and the Virtues, and the latter are for the time victorious; but Avaritia or Covetyse makes a fresh conquest of Mankind, and, amid his prayers to Misericordia (Mercy) and the gibes of the devils, his soul takes flight, to become the subject of a contention in heaven between Mercy, Justice, Truth, and Peace, in which, with an appeal to Christ's Passion, Mercy gains her cause. A fair idea of the dialogue by which the plot is carried out may be gained from the scene of the first triumph of Malus Angelus and the defeat of Bonus, as his opponent hurries off Humanum Genus to the court of Mundus. The quotation is taken from the writer's extract from the play in his English Miracle-Plays, Moralities, and Interludes (8th ed. 1927):

Humanum Genus. Whom to folwe wetyn I ne may :
I stonde in stodye and gynne to rave, begin
I wolde be ryche in gret aray,

And fayn I wolde my sowle save.

As watyr in wynde I wave :
Thou woldyst to the werld I me toke, gave myself
And he wolde that I it forsoke ;
Now so God me helpe, and the holy boke,
I not wyche I may have. know not

Malus Angelus. Cum on, man ! where of hast thou care ?
Go we to the werld, I rede the, blyve : 2
For ther thou schalt now ryth wel fare. right
In case if you thynke for to thryve,
No lord schal be the lyche. like thee
Take the werld to thine entent, Make the world your study
And late thi love be ther-on lent ; let—bestowed
With gold and sylvyr and ryche rent
A-none thou schalt be ryche.

Humanum Genus. Now, syn thou hast be-hetyn me so, 3
I wyl go with the and a-say ; make trial
I ne lette for frende ne fo, refrain
But with the world I wyl go play,
Certes a lytyl throwe. a little while
In this World is al my trust
To lyvyn in lykyng and in lust :
Have he and I onys cust, once kissed
We schal not part, I trowe.

Bonus Angelus. A ! nay, man ! for Cristes blod !
Cum agayn be strete and style ! 4
The werld is wyckyd and ful wod, mad
And thou schalt levyn but a whyle. live
What covetyst thou to wynne ?
Man, thynke on thyn endynge day,
Whanne thou schalt be closyd under clay ;
And if thou thenke of that a-ray,
Certes thou schalt not synne.

Malus Angelus. Ya, on thi sowle thou schalt thynke al

Cum forth, man, and take non hede,
Cum on and thou schalt holdyn hym inne. 5
Thi flesch thou schalt foster and fede
With lofly lyvys fode. With the food of dainty living
With the werld thou mayst be bold,
Tyl thou be sixty wynter hold ; old
Wanne thi nose waxit cold, waxeth
Thanne mayst thou drawe to goode.

Humanum Genus. I vow to God, and so I may if Make mery a ful gret throwe— while
I may levyn many a day,
I am but yonge, as I trowe,
For to do that I schulde.
Myth I ryde be somep and syke, 6
And be ryche and lord lyke, rich and like a lord
Certes, thanne schulde I be fryke bold
And a mery man on molde. on earth

Malus Angelus. Yys, be my feyth, thou schalt be a lord,
And ellys hange me be the hals. by the neck
But thou muste be at myn a-cord ; at my disposition
Other whyle thou muste be fals Occasionally
A-monge kythe and kynne.
Now go we forth swythe a-non, quickly at once
To the werld us must gon,
And bere the manly evere a-mong,
Whanne thou comyst out or inne.

Humanum Genus. Yys, and ellys have thou my necke,
 But I be manly be downe and dyche; 7
 And thou I be fals I ne recke, thought
 With so that I be lord lyche On condition that I folowe the as I can.
 Thou schalt be my bote of hale, remedy of harm
 For were I ryche of holt and hale of lands and house
 Thanne wolde I yeve nevere tale never take account
 Of God ne of good man.

Bonus Angelus. I weyle and I wrynge and make mone, wail
 This man with woo schal be pylt. buffeted
 I sye sore and gryssly grone, sigh sorely
 For hys folye schal make him spylt. destroyed
 I not weder to gone, know not whither to go

Pipe up mus[sic]

Mankynde hath forsakyn me!
 Alas, man, for love of the!
 Ya, for this gamyn and this gle
 Thou schalt grocchyn and grone. complain

1 I may not know. 2 Advise thee, quickly. 3 Since—promised.
 4 By street and stile, by any means. 5 Keep Good Angel in his place. 6 Might ride by swamp and stream. 7 If I be not manly by down and ditch—i.e. everywhere.

The play of Mind, Will, and Understanding is much duller than the Castell of Perseverance, but is diversified by some processions and dumb shows which at least gave the spectator something to look at. Mankind, which is probably of rather later date, is a little more dramatic, and 'Titivillus' in it is a moderately merry devil. Another morality, Mundus et Infans, though printed by Wynkyn de Worde in 1522 as a 'proper new interlude of the World and the Child,' from its free use of alliteration and the ranting speeches of some of the characters, is plainly also of the fifteenth century. It traces the course of man's life through infancy, boyhood, youth, manhood, and age, and though quite undramatic and only extant in an obviously corrupt text, has a certain rough vigour. Moralities like these in their turn influenced the writers of single miracle-plays, as distinct from the great cycles. Thus in the play of St Mary Magdalene, along with the whole history and legend of the saint, introducing scenes from the life of Christ, we find Good Angel and Bad Angel, the World and the Flesh, among the characters. In the 'Croxtton' play of the Sacrament, again (where the 'Croxtton' is probably the Norfolk town of that name), although there are no personifications, the sacramental teaching of the Church is brought within the scope of the drama. The subject of the play is the mutilation of the consecrated Host by Jews, and the miracle by which they are converted to belief in the Eucharist. The hand of one of the Jews is withered in consequence of his sacrilege, and a quack doctor, called in to heal it, indulges in much buffoonery. The play is as dull as it is painful, and represents the alliance of religion and the drama at its lowest. It should be noted that, as in the case of the so-called 'Coventry Plays,' it was acted by strolling-players, who went from one village to another.

Only one other play remains to be mentioned, 'A goodly interlude of Nature compyled by mayster Henry Medwall,' chaplain to Archbishop Morton. Though first printed in the sixteenth century, this play, which is some three thousand lines long, probably belongs to its predecessor, and, like the Castell of Perseverance, traces the career of man from birth to death. Its character and drift may be sufficiently gathered from the 'names of the players' given at the end:

Nature, Man, Reson, Sensualyte, Innocencye, Worldly affeccion, Bodily lust, Wreth, Envy, Slouth, Glotony, Humylite, Charyte, Abstynence, Lyberalyte, Chastyte, Good occupacyon, Shamefastnes, Mundus, Pacyence, Pryde.

It is a dull play, but by no means ill written, and the long opening speech of Nature is relieved by the really pretty verse:

Who taught the cok hys watche-howres to observe,
 And syng of corage wyth shryll throte on hye?
 Who taught the pellycan her tender hart to carve
 For she nolde suffer her byrds to dye?
 Who taught the nyghtyngall to recorde besyly
 Her strange entunys, in sylence of the nyght?
 Certes, I, Nature, and none other wyght.

Stephen Hawes.

The personification of abstract qualities which is so prominent a feature in these early moralities was characteristic of fifteenth-century poetry in general. In England, besides the morality-plays, it only produced one poem of any importance, The Pastime of Pleasure of Stephen Hawes. It has been conjectured that Hawes was a native of Suffolk, and there are the usual assertions that he had been educated at Oxford and also at Cambridge, and had studied, or at least travelled, on the Continent. Our first certain knowledge of him is from an entry in the household books of Henry VII. in 1502, where he is mentioned as receiving, as one of the grooms of the chamber, an allowance of four yards of black cloth for the queen's funeral. On 10th January 1506 Henry VII. gave him ten shillings as a reward for 'a ballett,' and in the course of the same year he dedicated to the king his Pastime of Pleasure. Three years later this was published by Wynkyn de Worde, who also printed in the same year two other poems by Hawes, The Convercyon of Swerers, which has no other merit than its morality, and A Joyfull Medytacyon to All Englande, on the coronation of Henry VIII. Other poems by Hawes printed by Wynkyn are The exemple of Vertu, in the whiche ye shall finde many goodly storys and naturall dysputacyons between four ladyes named Hardynes, Sapience, Fortune, and Nature, which may have suggested to Bishop Bale the title Virtutis exemplum which he bestows on Hawes himself, and The Comfort of Lovers. Both of these are so rare that little is known of them, though from an abstract which has been printed of the second, it appears to run on very much the same lines as the Pastime of Pleasure. For the 6th January 1521 there is an entry in Henry VIII's household accounts of a payment to 'Mr Hawse for his play.' Two years later, on the 16th of February 1523, the will was proved of a Stephen Hawes of Aldborough in Suffolk, who was probably the poet, for a reference to him as 'yonge Steven Hawse, whose soule God pardon,' in a book published in 1530, shows that he was then dead, and had died presumably before he was forty.

The full title of Hawes's chief work is The Passetyme of Pleasure, or the History of Graunde Amoure and La Bel Pucel, containing the knowledge of the Seven Sciences and the Course of Man's Life in this Worlde. The 'Seven Sciences' are those then usually studied, Grammar, Logic, Rhetoric, Arithmetic, Music, Geometry, Astronomy; and Hawes does not flinch from such a thorough treatment of his subject, as we find in these two stanzas:

Madame, quod I, for as moche as there be Eight partes of speche, I would knowe ryght fayne
What a noun substantive is in hys degre,
And wherefore it is so called certayne?
To whom she answered ryght gently agayne,
Sayeng alway that a nowne substantiye
Might stand wythout helpe of an adjectiye.

The Latyn worde whyche that is referred Unto a thyng whych is substancyall,
For a nowne substantiye is wel averred,
And wyth a gender is declynall;
So all the eyght partes in generall
Are Laten wordes, annexed properly
To every speche, for to speke formally.

A man who can write like this may stumble into poetry by accident, but plainly knows nothing of it as an art; and, indeed, it is rather the accident of the dull period in which he wrote than any merit of his own that gives Hawes a place in histories of literature. When 'Graunde Amoure' becomes enamoured of 'La Bell Pucel' in the 'Tower of Musik,' the verse certainly improves. Music commands her minstrels to play, and bids Grand Amour lead his lady to dance:

By her propre hande, soft as any sylke,
With due obeysaunce I dyd her then take;
Her skynne was white as whales bone or mylke.
My thought was ravysshed, I might not aslake
My brennyng hert, she the fyre dyd make;
These daunces truly Musyke hath me tought
To lute or daunce, but it awayleth nought.

For the fyre kyndled, and waxed more and more,
The dauncynge blew it, wyth her beaute clere,
My hert sekened and began to waxe sore;
A mynute vi. houres and vi. houres a yere
I thought it was, so hevy was my chere;
But yet for to cover my great love aryght,
The outwarde countenaunce I made glad and light.

And for fere myne eyes should my hert bewray,
I toke my leve and to a temple wente,
And all alone I to my selfe dyd saye:
Alas! what fortune hath me hyther sente,

To devoyde my joye and my hert torment;
No man can tell howe great payne it is,
But yf he wyll fele it, as I do y-wys.

Alas! O lady, how cruell arte thou,
Of pyteous doloure for to buylde a nest
In my true hert, as thou dost ryght nowe!
Yet of all ladyes I must love the best;
Thy beaute therto dyd me sure arest.
Alas, wyth love, when that it doth the please,
Thou mayest cease my care and my payne sone ease.

After leaving his lady Grand Amour pursues his studies of Geometry and Astronomy, and then leaves the tower of Science for that of Chivalry. He is knighted, prays at the temple of Venus, vanquishes a giant with seven heads, and a 'wonderful monstre of the seven metalles made by enchauntement.' At last he is married to La Belle Pucelle, and lives with her till he is arrested first by Old Age and then by Death, whence comes the need for an epitaph:

O mortall folke! you may beholde and se
Howe I lye here, sometime a myghty knyght;
The end of joye and all prosperite
In deth at last, through his course and myght;
After the day there cometh the derke night;
For though the day be never so longe,
At last the belles ringeth to evensonge.

It has been contended that if Hawes had never written anything but this last couplet, he would have deserved our grateful remembrance. It is probable, however, that they are only a peculiarly happy proverb dovetailed into his verse. Our quotations are taken from the Percy Society's reprint (1845) of Richard Tottel's edition of 1555.

See Berdan's Early Tudor Poetry (1920), and The Pastime of Pleasure, ed. Mead (E.E.T.S. 1928).

Skelton.

By virtue of his longer life, John Skelton is more conveniently noticed after Hawes, though he was probably born some fifteen or twenty years before him—that is, about 1460—in the neighbouring county of Norfolk. No biographer has bestowed on Skelton the epithet virtutis exemplum, though Pope's 'beastly Skelton' singles him out rather unfairly for a condemnation which other poets of his time, notably John Heywood, equally deserved. Our earliest reference to him is of a much more complimentary character, and comes from the pen of no worse a judge than William Caxton, who in 1490, in a very interesting preface to his 'Eneydos' on the happy mean between far-fetched and homely words in translation, writes:

Thenne I praye alle theym that shall rede in this lytyl treatys to holde me for excused for the translatynge of hit. For I knowliche my selfe ignorant of connyng to enprise on me so hie and noble a werke. But I praye Mayster John Skelton, late created poete laureate in the Unyversite of Oxenforde, to oversee and correcte this sayd booke. And to addresse and expowne where as shalle be founde faulte to theym that shall requyre it. For hym I knowe for sufficyent to expowne and Englysshe every dyfficulte that is therin. For he hath late translated the Epystlys of Tulle [i.e. Cicero] and the boke of Dyodorus Syculus and diverse other werkes oute of Latyn into Englysshe, not in rude and olde langage, but in polysshed and ornate terms craftely, as he that hath redde Vyrgyle, Ovyde, Tullye, and all the other noble poetes and oratours to me unknowen. And also he hath redde the nine muses and understande theyr musicalle scyences, and to whom of theym eche scyence is appropred. I suppose he hath dronken of Elycons well. Then I praye hym and suche other to correcte, adde, or mynyshe where as he, or as they, shall fynde faulte, &c.

Skelton's version of Cicero's Letters has perished; that of Diodorus Siculus rests among Archbishop Parker's manuscripts at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge. The degree of poet laureate to which Caxton refers had no connection with the royal laureateship, but was an academic honour, a medieval Doctorate of Letters, conferred for distinction in rhetoric and poetry. In 1493 Skelton received the same title from the University of Cambridge, and subsequently, it is said, from that of Louvain. He had already begun writing English poetry, mourning in verse in 1483 the death of Edward IV., and in 1489 that of Henry Percy, Earl of Northumberland. At the instigation of Henry VII.'s mother, the Lady Margaret, he made a new translation (Lydgate had already produced one) of Guillaume de Deguileville's Pèlerinage de la Vie Humaine; but this is now lost. Appointed tutor to the young Prince Henry, he composed for him, after the manner of royal tutors, a Speculum Principis, or 'Prince's Looking-Glass.' In 1498 he took holy orders; in 1500 Erasmus alludes to him as 'unum Britannicarum literarum lumen ac decus;' and about this time he received from Henry VII. a special dress, with the word 'Calliope' embroidered on it in silk and gold. By 1504 'Master John Skelton, laureat,' had become the parson of Diss in Norfolk, and it is probable that he disliked the necessity of residing among his parishioners as much as Herrick afterwards disliked his 'rocky Devonshire.' One result of his return to his native county was the Boke of Phylip Sparowe, written for Jane Scrope, a pupil of the Black Nuns at Carrow near Norwich, as a lament for a pet bird killed by a cat. As we shall see, Alexander Barclay thought fit to cast scorn on this poem; but its absolute freshness, its pleasant humour, and the music which runs through its short quick lines make it a very notable production, though it is certainly much too long.

Ware the Hauke, in similar short lines, written against a 'peakish parson' who followed his hawks into Skelton's churchyard, is another product of Norfolk, and so are the 'merrie tales' of his dealings with his parishioners and bishop, which Thomas Colwell printed in the middle of the century with the misleading title, 'Made by Master Skelton, poet laureat.' Written by Skelton they certainly were not, and some at least of them have plainly only been fastened on to his name; but it is not unfair to gather from them that his life was scandalous and a discredit to his cloth. A more authentic anecdote, embedded in a grave sermon on usury, tells us how, when he was referred to as a Latinist on a highwayman's demand to have his conviction quashed, because he had been indicted as fur (thief) instead of latro (robber), Skelton would see no difference between the words save that 'Fur sat on the bench, while Latro stood at the bar;' and the jest is of a piece with the freedom of speech which marks his later poems. In those 'agenst Garnesche' the virulence is merely humorous, for this was a poetic 'flyting' or bickering, in which Sir Christopher Garnesche was the challenger and Skelton the defender. But most of his later poems are satires; and, piqued, perhaps, at the reception accorded to some earlier dedications, he had the hardihood to choose Cardinal Wolsey as his chief butt. In his Colyn Cloute the attack on the corruption of the Church is mainly general, but there seem to be some side-hits at Wolsey. In Speke Parrot, an obscure poem, probably put together at various times, and preserved only in an incomplete condition, the satire is more outspoken. In Why come ye nat to Court? the Cardinal is virulently attacked throughout; and it is small wonder that Skelton, who is said already to have suffered imprisonment for his satires, was obliged to take sanctuary at Westminster with his friend Abbot Islip. In sanctuary he died 21st June 1529 (less than half a year before Wolsey's disgrace), and was buried at St Margaret's, Westminster.

Besides the works we have already named, Skelton wrote (probably about 1510) The Bowge of Court, the Court-Bouche or Court-Rations being the name he gives to a ship owned by the Lady Favour, and with Drede, Favell (Cajolery), Suspicion, Disdayne, Ryote, Dyssymulation, Disceyte, and Haruy Hafter (Harry Crafty) as its passengers, each with a speech as if in a pageant. The Tunnyng of Elynour Rummyng, in short lines, describes the drunken frolics of some women at Mrs Rummyng's alehouse near Leatherhead. It is said to have been written for the amusement of Henry VIII., whose palace of Nonsuch was not far off. In the 'ryght delectable tratyse upon a goodly Garlande or Chapelet of Laurell, studiously dyvysed at Sheryf-hotton Castell in the foreste of Galtres'—i.e. at Sheriff-Hutton, the residence of the Duke of Norfolk—Skelton celebrates the bestowal on him by some noble ladies of a wreath of laurel, and gives a list of his own works. Of his poems against the Scots, the earliest, printed by Dyce (The Poetical Works of John Skelton, with notes, by the Rev. Alexander Dyce, 1843), was called forth by the battle of Flodden in 1513; the second, Howe the douhty Duke of Albany, lyke a cowarde knyght, ran awaye shamfully, with an hundred thousande tratlande Scottes and saint-hearted Frenchemen, beside the 'Water of Twede,' refers to the Scottish campaign of 1523. Both are in short lines ; and of that on Flodden an earlier and shorter version, printed by Richard Fawkes, was discovered in 1878 in the binding of the French romance of Huon de Bordeaux, printed at Paris in the year of the battle. It is entitled A Ballade of the Scottysse Kyng, and ranks as the earliest separately printed ballad now extant. Besides his poems Skelton also wrote three plays, an Interlude of Virtue, the Comedy of Achademiss (both lost), and Magnificence, which will be noticed in a later section on the Drama (page 152). A fourth play, The Nigramansir, 'a morall enterlude and a pithie written by Maister Skelton, laureate, and plaid before the King and other estatys at Woodstoke on Palme Sunday,' is said by Warton to have been read by him in an edition printed by Wynkyn de Worde in 1504. Warton's statement has been received with suspicion, and no trace of such an edition can now be found.

Up to 1500 Skelton was a highly respectable person, a royal tutor, bepraised by foreign scholars ; after 1500 he became a country parson, always in trouble with his bishop, a satirist, and at last an outlaw, obliged to take sanctuary, though with some rich friends who still favoured him. His poetical progression was from laboured seven-line stanzas to the 'ragged, tattered, and jagged' metre, in which his abundant flow of words, his real feeling for rhythm and music, his humour and very considerable learning, his love of beauty, and his half-merry, half-savage raillery could all find free vent. His fluency often makes him try our patience by virtue of these 'ragged rhymes,' but he is the first poet after Chaucer in the best of whose work it is possible to take genuine pleasure. The following extracts are taken from Dyce's edition (R. Hughes reproduced Dyce's text in Poems by John Skelton, 1924). The first describes the accomplishments of Phyllyp Sparowe, slain by Gib the cat :

It was so prety a fole,
It wold syt on a stole,
And lerned after my scole
For to kepe his cut,
With, Phyllyp, kepe your cut !
It had a velvet cap,
And wold syt upon my lap,
And seke after small wormes,
And somtyme white bred crommes ;
And many tymes and ofte
Betwene my brestes softe
It wolde lye and rest ;
It was propre and prest.

Might poyson thy lyver and longes !
The mantycors of the montaynes
Myght fede them on thy braynes !
Melanchates, that hounde
That plucked Acteon to the grounde,
Gave hym his mortall wounde,
Chaunged to a dere,
The story doth appere,
Was chaunged to an harte :
So thou, foule cat that thou arte,
The selfe same hounde
Myght the confounde,
That his owne lord bote,
Myght byte asondre thy throte !
Of Inde the gredy gypes
Myght tere out all thy trypes !
Of Arcady the beares
Might plucke away thyne eares !
The wyld wolfe Lycaon
Byte asondre thy backe bone !
Of Ethna the brennyng hyll,
That day and night brenneth styl,
Set in thy taylor a blase,
That all the world may gase
And wonder upon the,
From Occyan the grete se
Unto the Iles of Orchady,
From Tyllbery fery
To the playne of Salysbery !
So trayterously my hyrde to kyl
That never ought the evyll wyll !

The following is from the poem on Flodden ; the 'ballad of the Scottish King,' its first form, began at line 49, 'Joly Jemmy,' &c., but with many variations :

Skelton Laureate against the Scottes.

Agaynst the prowde Scottes clatterynge,
That never wyll leave theyr tratlynge :
Wan they the felde, and lost theyr kyng ?
They may well say, fye on that wynnynge !

(Lines 1-64.)

¹ Babbling. ² Foolish. ³ Branxton Moor was the name by which the English called their victory. ⁴ Stubborn. ⁵ Quayre or quair, a book, especially of poetry. ⁶ A summoner—Chaucer's sompnour—was a kind of apparitor, a humble legal officer, ecclesiastical or other, who delivered summonses: James IV. is disrespectfully called Jemmy and a summoner, because of his citation or challenge to Henry VIII. ⁷ King Copping seems to have been a character or name in some rhyme, game, or play. ⁸ Hob Lobbyn was obviously also a personage in a rhyme or game; Lowdean being Lothian. ⁹ Locrian may be Lochryan; but Skelton used what he believed to be Scotch names at random. ¹⁰ Perth was called St Johnstoun.

In these lines from Colyn Cloute we have Skelton's criticism of his own verse:

And if ye stande in doute
Who brought this ryme aboute,
My name is Colyn Cloute.
I purpose to shake oute
All my connyng bagge,
Lyke a clerkely hagge;
For though my ryme be ragged,
Tattered and jagged,
Rudely rayne beaten,
Rusty and mothe eaten,
If ye take well therewith,
It hath in it some pyth.
For, as farre as I can se,
It is wronge with eche degre:

(Lines 46-74.)

Lastly, to show that the use of his 'ragged rhymes' for something besides railing was not confined to Phylip Sparowe, here are his lines 'To maystres Margaret Hussey':

Mirry Margaret, As mydsomer flowre, Jentill as fawcoun Or hawke of the towre; With solace and gladnes, Moche mirthe and no madnes, All good and no badnes, So joyously, So maydenly, So womanly	Her demenyng In every thyng, Far, far passynge That I can endyght, Or suffyce to wryght Of mirry Margarete, As mydsomer flowre, Jentyll as fawcoun Or hawke of the towre.
--	---

There is another charming poem to a lady in Speke Parrot; and it is fair to add that in his 'Wofully arrayed' Skelton showed that he could write on one aspect of Christ's passion with the fervour and occasional music of the best miracle-plays. [See Berdan's Early Tudor Poetry.]

Barclay.

Despite attempts to connect him with Devonshire, and the uncertainty of Bishop Bale as to his nationality, there can be little doubt that Alexander Barclay, the third poet of our trio, was a Scotsman. But the whole of his manhood was passed in England, and though a Scottish editor claimed to have detected Scottish forms in his writing, his language is substantially the ordinary literary English of his day, and he falls therefore to be considered among English authors. Born about 1475, he was probably educated, in part at least, at Oxford, seems to have travelled in France and Italy, took holy orders, and probably about 1500 was appointed priest in the college of Ottery St Mary in Devonshire by its warden, Bishop Cornish, to whom, in 1508, he dedicated his Ship of Fools, printed by Pynson the following year. He may have previously translated from the French Le Chateau de Labour (The Castell of Laboure), a dull poem by Pierre Gringoire, which Pynson had published without his name in 1506. An excellent prose translation, The famous cronycle of the warre which the romayns had agaynst Jugurth, usurper of the kyngdome of Numidy, from 'the renowned romayn Salust,' was published by Pynson without date. It was made 'at comaundement of the right hye and mighty prince, Thomas Duke of Northfolke,' for whom also Barclay compiled in 1521 an Introductory to write and to pronounce French. Meanwhile Barclay had left Ottery St Mary, and had gone to Ely as a Benedictine monk. While at Ely he translated, under the title of the Myrrour of Good Manners, the De Quatuor Virtutibus of Dominic Mancini, a popular poem of the fifteenth century in Latin elegiacs, which Turberville also Englished. He also wrote, probably in different years, five Eclogues (ed. White, E.E.T.S. 1928), of which the first three are imitated from the De Miseriis Curialium of Aeneas Sylvius (Pope Pius II.), and a Life of St George, from the Latin of Baptista Mantuanus. The year 1521, the date assigned to the Introductory to writt French, is the latest with which Barclay's literary activity can be connected; but he is said to have left the Benedictine Order for the Franciscan, and he was presented in 1546 to livings in Essex and Somersetshire, and in 1552 to that of All Hallows, Lombard Street. In this last year he died at Croydon, and was buried in Croydon Church on 10th June.

Barclay's Myrrour of Good Manners and his other minor works are of small importance, but his Ship of Fools and his Eclogues take a high rank in the literature of his day. A note to Pynson's edition of the former work informs us that 'this present Boke named the Shyp of Fols of the worlde was translated in the College of Saynt Mary Otery in the counte of Devonshyre out of Laten, Frenche, and Doche [i.e. German] into Englysshe tonge by Alexander Barclay, Preste;' and the mention of the three different languages throws some light on Barclay's methods. The famous Narrenschiff of Sebastian Brant, in which folly of every kind was satirised, was printed at Basel in 1494, translated into Latin verse three years later by Jakob Locher, and speedily retranslated from Latin into French by Pierre Rivière of Poitiers. If Barclay had been translating Brant as he translated Sallust, one version would have sufficed him; but a glance at the Latin text which he prints in his own edition suffices to show that his work is not a translation, hardly even a paraphrase, but a poem of very considerable claim to originality, in which the successive points of the original are taken up and worked out in Barclay's own way. Here, for example (we quote from Pynson's edition of 1509), is the description of the first fool of all, the Book-Fool, who acts as steersman to the ship:

I am the firste fole of all the hole navy,
To kepe the pompe, the helme and eke the sayle:
For this is my mynde, this one pleasoure have I,
Of bokes to have grete plenty and aparayle.
I take no wysdome by them, nor yet avayle,
Nor them perceyve nat, and then I them despyse.
Thus am I a foole and all that sewe that guyse. follow

That in this shyp the chefe place I governe
By this wyde see with folys wanderynge
The cause is playne and easy to dyscerne.
Styll am I besy bokes assemblynge,
For to have plenty it is a plesaunt thyng
In my conceyt, and to have them ay in honde,
But what they mene do I nat understonde.

But yet I have them in great reverence
And honoure, savyng them from fylth and ordure.
By often brusshyng and moche dylgence,
Full goodly bounde in plesaunt coverture
Of domas, satyn, or els of velvet pure, damask
I kepe them sure, feryng lest they sholde be lost,
For in them is the connyng wherin I me best.

But if it fortune that any lernyd men
Within my house fall to disputation,

I drawe the curtyns to shewe my bokes then,
That they of my cunnyng sholde make probacion,
I kepe nat to fall in altercacion;
And whyle they comon, my bokes I turne and wynde,
For all is in them, and no thyng in my mynde.

Tholomeus the ryche causyd longe agone Ptolemy
Over all the worlde good bokes to be sought.
Done was his commaundement anone;
These bokes he had and in his stody brought,
Whiche passyd all erthly treasoure as he thought,
But nevertheles he dyd hym nat aply
Unto theyr doctryne, but lyved unhappely.

So in lyke wyse of bokys I have store,
But fewe I rede, and fewer understande;
I folowe nat theyr doctryne, nor theyr lore;
It is ynoughe to bere a boke in hande,
It were to moche to be in suche a bande bondage
For to be bounde to loke within the boke.
I am content on the fayre coveryng to loke.

Why sholde I stody to hurt my wyt therby,
Or trouble my mynde with stody excessyve,
Sythe many ar whiche stody right besely,
And yet therby shall they never thryve?
The fruyt of wysdom can they nat contrive;
And many to stody so moche are inclynde
That utterly they fall out of theyr mynde.

I am lyke other clerkes whiche so frowardly them
gyve,
That, after they ar onys come unto promocyon, once
They gve them to plesour, theyr stody set asyde,
Theyr avaryce coveryng with fayned devocion.
Yet dayly they preche, and have great derysyon
Agaynst the rude laymen, and al for covetyse, Though theyr owne conscience be blynded with that vyce.

But if I durst trouth playnely utter and expresse,
This is the special cause of this inconvenience,
That greatest folos and fullest of lewdnes,
Havyng least wyt and symplest science,
Ar fyrst promoted and have greatest reverence.
For if one can flater and bere a hawke on his fyst
He shal be made Parson of Honyngton or of Clyst.

1 Commune.

The parsons of Honiton and Clyst have nothing to do with Brant. They were neighbours of Barclay's in Devonshire, and his introduction of them into his Ship shows the free spirit in which he handled his original.

So again, if we take the stanzas 'Of newe fasshions and disguised garmentes,' we shall find that some of them have a very English turn:

Drawe nere ye courtiers and galantz disguised,
Ye counterfayt caytifs, that ar nat content
As God hath you made: his warke is despysed,
Ye thynke you more crafty than God omnipotent.
Unstable is your mynde, that shewes by your garment;
A fole is knowen by his toyes and his cote,
But by theyr clothinge now may we many note.

Aparayle is apayred, al sadnes is decayde, gravity
 The garmentes ar gone that longed to honestye,
 And in newe sortes newe foles ar arayede,
 Despisyng the costom of good antiquyte.
 Mannys fourme is disfigured with every degre,
 As knyght, squyer, yeman, jentilman, and knave,
 For al in theyr goyng ungoodely them behave.

The tyme hath ben nat longe before our dayes
 Whan men with honest ray coude holde them self content :
 Without these disgisid and counterfayted wayes,
 Werby theyr goodes ar wasted, loste, and spent.
 Socrates with many mo in wysdom excellent, more
 Bycause they wolde nought change that cam of nature,
 Let growe theyre here without cuttinge or scissure.

At that tyme was it reputed to lawde and great honour
 To have longe here, the beerde downe to the brest,
 For so they used that were of most valour,
 Stryvyng together who myht be godlyest, goodliest
 Saddest, moste clenely, discretest, and most honest.
 But nowe adayes together we contende and stryve
 Who may be gayest, and newest wayes contrive.

Fewe kepeth mesure, but excesse and great outrage
 In theyr aparayle. And so therin they procede
 That theyr goode is spent, theyr londe layde to morgage,
 Or solde outright : of thryft they take no hede,
 Havinge no peny them to socour at theyr nede,
 So whan theyr goode by suche wastefulnes is loste,
 They sel agayne theyr clothes for half that they coste.

A fox furred jentelman of the fyrst yere or hede,
 If he be made a baillyf, a clerke, or a constable,
 And can kepe a packe or court and rede a dede,
 Than is velvet to his state mete and agreable.
 Howbeit he were more mete to bere a baby, bauble
 For his foles hode his iyen so sore doth blynde, eyes
 That pryde expelleth his lynage from his mynde.

Yet fynde I another sort almoste as bad as thay,
 As yonge jentylmen descended of worthy aunccetry,
 Whiche go ful wantonly in dissolute aray,
 Counterfayt, disgisid, and moche unmanerly,
 Blasinge and garded, to lowe or els to hye,
 And wyde without mesure, theyr stuffe to wast thus gothe,
 But other some they suffer to dye for lacke of clothe.

Than the courtiers careles that on theyr mayster wayte,
 Seinge hym his vesture in suche fourme abuse,
 Assayeth suche fassion for them to counterfayte,
 And so to sue pryde contynually they muse, follow
 Than stele they or rubbe they. Forsoth they can nat chuse,

For without londe or labour harde is it to mentayne ;
 But to thynke on the galows that is a careful payne.

But be it payne or nat, there many suche ende,
 At Newgate theyr garmentis ar offred to be solde,
 Theyr bodyes to the jevet solelymly ascende, gibbet
 Wavyng with the wether whyle theyr necke wyl holde.
 But if I shulde wryte al the yles manyfolde
 That procedeth of this counterfayt abusion
 And mysshapen fassions, I nevere shulde have done.

¹ Array.

Not content with thus anglicising his text,
 Barclay adds to each section an 'Envoy' of his own, of which the character may be guessed from two stanzas on the subject of fine clothes :

But ye proude galaundes that thus your selfe disgaise,
 Be ye asshamed, beholde unto your Prynce,
 Consyder his sadnes, his honestye devyse ; precise
 His clothyng expresseth his inwarde prudence,
 Ye se no example of suche inconvenyence
 In his hyghnes, but godly wyt and gravityte
 Ensue hym, and sorowe for your enormyte.

Away with this pryde, this statelynes let be,
 Rede of the prophetis clothyng or vesture,
 And of Adam firste of your ancestrye,
 Of John the Prophete—theyr clothyng was obscure,
 Vyle and homly ; but nowe what creature Cheap
 Wyl them ensue ? Sothly fewe by theyr wyl,
 Therefore suche folys my navy shall fulfyll.

In excerpts the Ship of Fools, with its side-lights on contemporary manners, is by no means an unattractive book, but it suffers from its length and its unrelieved didacticism. Barclay himself must have perceived this, for he ends his poem, not without bitterness :

Holde me excusyd, for-why my wyl is gode because
 Men to induce unto vertue and goodnes.
 I wryte no jest ne tale of Robyn Hode,
 Nor sawe no sparckes ne sede of vyciousnes. sow
 Wyse men love vertue, wylde people wantones.
 It longeth nat to my scyence nor cunnyng
 For Phylp the Sparowe the Dirige to synge.

To his credit, Skelton took this gihe good-humouredly ; and he could afford to do so, for his Phylp Sparowe has much the more real life in it.
 Nevertheless the Ship of Fools is a notable book, and deserved the reputation which it enjoyed, and of which the shadow has lasted to our own day.

To have introduced, in his Eclogues, the pastoral into English poetry is also a notable point to Barclay's credit. Pastoral poetry was subsequently worked to death, and is now held in but low esteem. Nevertheless the 'Prologe' to Barclay's
 'fyfte Eglog' Of the Cytezen and Uplondysh- man—here quoted from the Percy Society's reprint (1847) of an undated edition by Wynkyn de Worde—will show the novelty of the note which it brought into the English poetry of his day :

In colde January, whan fyre is comfortable,
 And that the felde be nere intollerable,
 Whan shepe and pastoures leveth felde and folde, 1
 And drawe to cotes for to eschewe the colde ;
 What tyme the verdure of grounde, and every tre,
 By frost and stormes is pryvate of beaute, deprived of
 And every small byrde thynketh the wynter longe,
 Whiche well apereth by ceasyng of theyr song ;—
 At this same season two herdes fresshe of age, herdsmen
 At tyme apoynted, met bothe in one cotage.
 The fyrst hyght Faustus, the seconde Amyntas. 2
 Harde was to know whiche better husband was ; 3
 For eche of them bothe set more by pleasour
 Than by habundaunce of ryches or tresour.
 Amyntas was formalle, and propre in his gere,
 A man on his cloke shoulde not aspyed a here, hair

Nor of his clothyng one wrynle stode a-wrye ;
 In London he lerned to go so manerly.
 Hygh on his bonet stacke a fayre broche of tynne,
 His pursys lynnynge was symple, poore, and thynne ;
 But a lordes stomake and a beggers pouche
 Full yll accordeth, suche was this comely slouche.
 In the towne and cyte so longe getted had he
 That frome thens he fledde for det and poverté.
 No wafrer, taverner, halehous, or taverner,
 To hym was there hydde, whyle he was hosteler.
 Fyrst was he hosteler, and than a wafrer,
 Than a costermonger, and last a taverner.
 Aboute all London there was no propre prym
 But long tyme had ben famylyer with hym ;
 But whan coyne fayled no favour more hadde he,
 Wherefore he was gladdé out of the towne to fle.
 But shepeherde Faustus was yet more fortunate,
 For alwaye was he content with his estate,
 Yet nothyng he hadde to conforte hym in age
 Save a melche cow, and a poore cotage ;
 The towne he used and grete pleasure hadde
 To se the cyte oft-tyme whyle he was ladde ;
 For mylke and botter he thyther brought to sell,
 But never thought he in cyte for to dwell,
 For well he noted the madde enormyte,
 Envy, fraude, malyce, and suche inyquyte,
 Whiche reygne in cytes ; therfore he ledde his lyfe
 Up londe in vyllage, without debate and stryfe.
 Whan these two herdes were thus together met,
 Havyng no charges nor labour them to let,
 Theyr shepe were all sure, and closyd in a cote,
 Themselve laye in lyttre, pleasauntly and hote ;
 For costly was fyre in hardest of the yere,
 Whan men have most nede, than every thyng is dere ;
 For passynge of tyme, and recreacyon,
 The bothe delyted in communycacyon,
 Namely they pleydyd of the dyversyte
 Of rural husbondes, and men of the cyte ;
 Faustus accused and blamed cytezens,
 To them imputynge grete fautes, crime, and synnes.
 Amyntas blamed the rural men agayne,
 And eche of them bothe his quareyl dyde maynteyne.
 All wrothe dyspysed, all malyce and yll wyll
 Clene layde a-parte, eche dyde reherse his skyl ;
 But fyrste Amyntas thus for to speke began,
 As he whiche counted hymselfe the better man.

This is but poor work compared with the best verse in the same vein of Barclay's fellow-countrymen, but it added a fresh element to English poetry, and for this Barclay deserves his share of honour. [See Berdan's Early Tudor Poetry.]

Of the three poets whose work we have been reviewing, Stephen Hawes attained only a meagre popularity in his own century ; the poems of Skelton and Barclay, on the other hand, were frequently reprinted. With the exception of Skelton's short-line poems, the Skeltonical verse to which he has given his name, the works of all three are now read only by literary antiquaries ; and several of those of Hawes and Barclay have only recently become accessible even to these, in modern editions. Despite snatches of music in Skelton, which invite a kinder verdict, the importance of all three poets is indeed mainly historical. But although their own works can hardly be said to live, they brought fresh life into English poetry, introducing new subjects and new ideas, and, in the case of Skelton, some metrical enrichment. Moreover, they made an experiment, which had to be made, though it was foredoomed to failure. Partly from the practice of translation, partly from the increased reading of foreign languages, especially classical Latin, new words were pouring into the English language, and the poetical value of these 'inkhorn terms' had to be tested by use. If we look down a page of the stanzas of any of these poets, the eye is struck at once with the length of the words with which the lines end. If a reckoning were made, it would probably be found that of the rhyme-words in these stanzas quite fifty per cent. are of Latin origin. 'I am but a yong mayd,' Miss Scrope is made to remark in Phylip Sparowe :

I am but a yong mayd,
 And cannot in effect
 My style as yet direct
 With Englysh wordis elect.
 Our naturall tong is rude,
 And hard to be enneude
 With pullysshed termes lusty.

freshly painted polished

But it was precisely this 'ennewing' by means of 'wordis elect' and 'pullysshed termes' that Hawes, Skelton, and Barclay aimed at in their serious poetry.

Chaucer, that famous clerke,
 His termes were not darke,
 But plesaunt, easy and playne ;
 No worde he wrote in vayne, sang Skelton ; but he goes on to explain that Lydgate wrote 'after an hyer rate'—that is, he used Latinisms instead of homely English or words which, if they had come from the French, had yet been made pliable by use in ordinary talk. Words like these, it was thought, were good enough for humorous poetry, but elegance was only to be attained by the use of a much more learned and 'curious' vocabulary. The court poets, the writers of interludes, the poetical preface-writers like Robert Copland, all aimed at this high-sounding phraseology, and in proportion to the amount of it which they introduced succeeded in making their works unreadable. It was fortunate that the experiment was not made at a time when there was finer poetic material to be spoilt.

Renaissance and Reformation.

When Chaucer was drawing from the new wells of Italian literature, the great movement was in progress which was ere long to transform not merely literatures but social and religious ideals throughout Europe. The Renaissance of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries was rather a revolt than a rebirth—a revolt against medieval dogma, against ecclesiastical tradition, against all that fettered the free-play of intellectual interests and impulses; against prejudice, routine, and stupidity, as well as against some better things. Passionate determination to know and enjoy to the full all the treasures of the classical tongues was accompanied by an outburst of new literary effort, so that pedantry was overborne by originality. As reverence for the Holy Roman Empire and its rival the Papacy declined, as feudalism yielded to the demand for liberty, the spirit of nationality developed, the national languages were cherished and cultivated. If in the East the Turk increased his power at the expense of Christendom, yet the fall of Constantinople stocked Italian towns with accomplished Greek scholars and invaluable Greek manuscripts; and in the West the Saracens were driven out of Spain. The Cape was rounded, America discovered; Copernicus prepared the way for Galileo; books were printed; and philosophy, science, and art were vivified. The Middle Ages were past, and the old world had become new.

The Humanism of France was not as that of Italy, and in Germany, in the Low Countries, and in England the Revival of Letters ran a different course. In Italy the Renaissance paganised religion, dulled moral insight, and tolerated if it did not create a new type of princely and oligarchic tyranny. In France the religious outcome was checked by reaction and systematic repression. In Germany, the Low Countries, and England the love of learning was closely associated with religious earnestness and an eager desire for reforms in Church and State, in education, national economy, and human life. Biblical studies were fostered; and the outcome was the New Learning and the Reformation—though in all countries there were earnest reformers who held with Erasmus and More rather than with Luther or Calvin, and in the Reformation saw the triumph of narrower over more truly liberal ideals.

England was later than the great Continental countries to be drawn fully into the current of the Renaissance, and the forces which made for secular culture were swiftly followed by those which heralded the religious revolt. It is difficult to say how far Lollardy remained a living power; some of the roots of the new movement were certainly of native growth. William Grocyn (c. 1446–1519) and Thomas Linacre (1460–1524) brought literary humanism back with them from Italy, and by the end of the fifteenth century had established the study of Greek at Oxford. Cambridge followed a little later, and Erasmus, the friend of More and Colet, lectured there for a short time. William Lilly (c. 1468–1522) taught Greek in London early in the sixteenth century as he had learnt it in Italy from Constantinopolitan refugees. But John Colet (1467–1519), who also went to meet the new light in Italy, was more drawn to Savonarola than to Pico and Ficino, to the Bible more than even to Plato and the Pseudo-Dionysius; and on his return gave at Oxford the famous lectures on St Paul and his Epistles which departed utterly from the traditional verbal and allegorical exegesis. At London as Dean of St Paul's he continued to preach, in English as well as in Latin, on the Gospel story, the Creed, and the Lord's Prayer. Though doubts of his orthodoxy were raised, and though he demanded many and sweeping reforms, he, like his friend More, was in no wise disposed to break with the historical Church, and he died before the crisis came. Sir Thomas More was the most conspicuous representative of the movement founded by Linacre and directed by Colet. Ascham, though he cautiously took sides with the governing powers, had more in common with Erasmus than either with Colet or with Luther.

From 1517 the eyes of all Europe were fixed on the great world-drama being enacted in Germany, where the audacity of the Augustinian monk Luther had renewed in another shape the old-established hostility between Pope and Emperor, between Church officialism and national and personal independence, between Latin and Teutonic Europe. As the opposition became more direct and the breach widened, Wittenberg became for a time the centre of European interests. English and Scottish students pilgrimaged thither; and Lutheran books, in Latin, French, German, and English, were imported into Britain. The bishops impounded these heretical works, printed or written, and More supported Wolsey in trying to keep them out, Tyndale's Testament amongst the rest; Cambridge first and then Oxford were infected by Lutheranism; the king, the Lord Chancellor, and Bishop Fisher wrote against Luther and his sect in vain; and heresy asserted itself more and more.

What the course of the Reformation in England might have been but for the masterful and erratic personality of Henry VIII. and the political currents and accidents of the time it is idle to conjecture; nor can its history be traced here. By 1532 the breach with Rome was complete, and the best English energies were largely absorbed in the religious and political controversies and struggles of the time. The culmination of the Renaissance movement in England fell well within the sixteenth century—into the spacious and glorious times of Queen Elizabeth, when—though not without dissentients—the nation had as a whole thoroughly made up its mind.

Hence it is well to reckon the Newer English Literature from the marvellous outburst in Elizabeth's reign; though here, as elsewhere, it is impossible to draw sharp dividing-lines across the intellectual history of a nation. The Newer English is sometimes held to begin with the sixteenth century: some books dating from the close of the fifteenth century are clearly more modern than others written well on in the next, survivals in temper and style from the older world. His epoch-marking (if not epoch-making) miscellany was issued in 1557 by the printer Tottel, who was still publishing industriously after masterpieces by Spenser and Sidney, by Peele and Greene, had seen the light. Ascham sent Toxophilus to the press under Henry VIII., and had not quite finished the Scholemaster at his own death in 1568. Though there is no magic in the figures 1558, yet it is on the whole remarkable how many of the writers who shed its peculiar glory on Elizabeth's reign began their distinctive work after and not before her accession. And so it is best to group the writers in the following sub-section, transition authors all of them, at the end of the old rather than at the beginning of the new.

Sir Thomas More, Lord Chancellor under Henry VIII., has had the honour of being reckoned the first writer of classical English prose—a prose not merely modern in contrast with that of his predecessors, but simple, direct, nervous, rhythmical, natural, and entertaining. Born in London, 7th February 1478, More was a son of a justice of the King's Bench, and as a boy was page in the household of Archbishop Morton, by whom he was sent to Oxford, and so was drawn to the New Learning then being forwarded by Grocyn and Linacre. Having completed his legal studies at New Inn and Lincoln's Inn, and seen much of Colet and Lilly, he was for three years reader in Furnival's Inn, and spent the four years 1499–1503 in the Charterhouse in 'devotion and prayer,' with thoughts of becoming a priest. But in 1504 he was returned to Parliament, and in 1505 he married his first wife. On the accession of Henry VIII. (1509) a brilliant prospect was opened up to More, though he had no natural inclination for public life. Introduced to the king through Wolsey, he became under-sheriff of London (1510), Master of Requests (1514), Treasurer of the Exchequer (1521), and Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (1525). He was Speaker of the House of Commons, and was sent on missions to Francis I. and Charles V. On the fall of Wolsey in 1529, More, against his own strongest wish, was appointed Lord Chancellor. In the discharge of his office he displayed a primitive virtue and simplicity. The one stain on his character as judge is the harshness of his sentences for religious opinions; he was unquestionably guilty of great severities in individual instances. Foxe treats him as a blinded papist and cruel persecutor. Even Froude, panegyrist of Erasmus, calls More 'a merciless bigot.' He no doubt was conscientiously of opinion that it was better that heretics should die than that they should continue in heresy. Like many of his friends, he would have welcomed a more reasonable theology and desired reform in the manners of the clergy, but never dreamt of defying the Church or disputing its dogmas. He saw with grave disapproval the successive steps which led Henry to the final schism from Rome, and in 1532 he resigned the Chancellorship. In April 1534, for declining the oath of adherence, which he thought would impugn the papal supremacy and sanction the royal divorce, he was sent to the Tower, and after a harsh imprisonment of over a twelvemonth, cheerfully met his fate by beheading on Tower Hill, 7th July 1535. From the writings of his friend, Erasmus, we realise all his virtues and all his attractions, but gather also that he was a charming friend rather than a commanding personality. His family life was singularly beautiful. In 1935 he was canonised by the Roman Catholic Church.

In 1510 More published a Life of Pico of Mirandola, from the Latin. His (incomplete) History of Richard III. (written c. 1513) has been called the first book in classical English prose; it is sometimes said to have been based on a Latin work by Archbishop Morton, not extant. More's greatest work is the sociological and satirical romance, written in Latin, the Utopia, which, describing an imaginary model country and people, added to the English language a term for any very 'advanced' scheme of national improvement. First printed at Louvain in 1516, it was received with enthusiasm by Tunstall, Erasmus, and the educated public; a second edition appeared in 1517. It was then revised by More, and sent, through Erasmus, to Frobenius at Basel to print (1518).

The plan of Utopia was no doubt suggested by the Atlantis described by Plato, and has something in common with Plato's Republic and Augustine's City of God. More works out a system of social arrangements whereby the happiness of the people might be secured to the utmost, idealising beyond what he really conceived to be possible to human nature; he expounded a kind of Socialism or Communism he explicitly disowned. One very important design of his imagined state was to exhibit a startling contrast to existing conditions in England and elsewhere, and so bring home to his contemporaries a serious satire on the avarice of the rich and the gross lives of the people. In his imaginary island all are contented with the necessities of life; all are employed in useful labour; in clothing no man desires aught but durability; and since wants are few and everybody must labour, no one need work more than six hours a day. Neither laziness nor avarice finds a place in this happy region. Instead of severely punishing theft, More would so elevate the morals and improve the condition of the people as to take away the temptation to crime. In Utopia war is never waged but for some gross injury done to the Utopians or to their allies; and the glory of a general is in proportion, not to the number, but to the fewness of the enemies whom he slays in gaining a victory. Criminals are punished with slavery, not by death, even for the greatest misdeeds. It is one of the oldest laws of the Utopians, that no man ought to be punished for his religion—'it being a fundamental opinion among them, that a man cannot make himself believe anything he pleases; nor do they drive any to dissemble their thoughts by threatenings, so that men are not tempted to lie or disguise their opinions among them; which, being a sort of fraud, is abhorred by the Utopians.' Every man may endeavour to convert others to his views by the force of amicable and modest argument, without bitterness against those of other opinions; but whoever adds reproach and violence to persuasion is to be condemned to banishment or slavery. Unhappily More did not in practice illustrate the principles he had so attractively expounded; religious zeal, his hearty abhorrence of the new theological doctrines, and the sense of public responsibility having modified his view of what was possible and necessary in the interests of the religious and moral welfare of the people.

The Utopia was translated in 1551 by Ralph Robinson, a Lincolnshire man, bred at Corpus Christi, Oxford, who held a small post in Cecil's service. The following, from Robinson's translation, shows that More as Utopist regarded sheep-farming with as little goodwill as Highland Land League reformers:

Your shepe that were wont to be so meke and tame, and so smal eaters, now, as I heare saye, be become so great deuowerers and so wylde, that they eate vp and swallow downe the very men themselves. They consume, destroye, and deuoure whole fieldes, howses, and cities. For looke in what partes of the realme doth growe the fynest, and therfore dearest woll, there noblemen and gentlemen: yea, and certeyn abbotes, holy men no doubt, not contenting them selves with the yearely reuenues and profytes, that were wont to grow to theyr forefathers and predecessours of their landes, nor beyng content that liue in rest and pleasure, nothing profiting, yea much noyinge the weale publique: leave no ground for tillage, thei inclose al into pastures: thei throw doune houses: thei plucke doune townes, and leaue nothing standynge, but only the churche to be made a shepehowse. And as though you loste no small quantity of grounde by forestes, chases, laundes, and parkes, those good holy men turne all dwellinge places, and all glebeland, into desolation and wildernes. Therefore that one couetous and vnsatiable cormaraunte and very plage of his natyue contrey may compasse aboute and inclose many thousand akers of grounde together within one pale or hedge, the husbandmen be thrust owte of their oune, or els either by coueyne and fraude, or by violent oppression, they be put besydes it, or by wronges and injuries thei be so wried, that they be compelled to sell all: by one meanes therefore or by other, either by hooke or crooke, they must needes departe awaye, poor selye, wretched soules, men, women, husbands, wiues, fatherlesse children, widowes, wofull mothers, with their yonge babes, and their whole household, smal in substance and much in numbere, as husbandrye requireth manye handes. Awaye thei trudge, I say, out of their knowen and accustomed houses, syndynge no place to reste in. All their household stuffe, whiche is verye litle woorth, though it myght well abide the sale; yet beeyng sodainely thruste out, they be constrained to sell it for a thing of nought. . . . They go aboute and worke not: whom no man wyl set a worke, though thei neuer so willyngly profe themselues thereto.

For one shepheard or heardman is ynoughe to eate vp that grounde with cattel, to the occupying wherof aboute husbandrye many handes were requisite. And this is also the cause why victualles be now in many places dearer. Yea, besides this, the price of woolle is so rysen, that poor folkes, which were wont to work it, and make cloth therof, be nowe hable to bye none at all.

More's other Latin works include epigrams, a translation of some of Lucian's dialogues, and pamphlets against the Lutherans. Of his English controversial works the most important is the Dyaloge against Lutheranism and Tyndale, in five books, two defending Catholic practice as to images, relics, and pilgrimages; a third denouncing Tyndale's New Testament (as a faulty translation with heretical glosses; see pages 130, 131); and a fourth attacking Luther heartily. Tyndale replied, and the controversy between More and Tyndale was a notable event in the English Reformation, each of the protagonists being accepted as a fit spokesman for his cause. In Tyndale's reply to More there was a large element of personal bitterness, for Tyndale, failing to understand More's attitude, thought him a time-server, suppressing his real convictions for professional reasons. And More, in his confutations of Tyndale's answer, descended to scurrility, believing, as he said, Tyndale's Wicked Mammon to be 'a very treasury and well-spring of wickedness.' In the main More stood for the supreme authority of the Church, Tyndale for the right of private judgment. The Dyaloge of Comfort against Tribulation dates from the time spent in the Tower.

In the History, Richard III. is thus described:

Richarde, the thirde sonne [of Richarde, Duke of York], was in witte and courage egall with either of [his two brothers], in bodye and prowesse farr vnder them bothe; little of stature, ill fetured of limmes, croke backed, his left shoulder much higher than his right, hard fauored of vifage, and such as is in states called warlye, in other menne otherwise, he was malicious, wrathfull, enuious, and from afore his birth, euer frowarde. . . . None euill captaine was hee in the warre, as to whiche his disposicion was more metely then for peace. Sundrye victories hadde hee, and sommetime ouerthrowes, but neuer in defaulte as for his owne parsonne, either of hardinesse or polytike order, free was hee called of dyspence, and somewhat aboute hys power liberall, with large giftes hee get him vnstedfaste frendshippe, for whiche hee was fain to pil and spoyle in other places, and get him stedfast hatred. Hee was close and secrete, a deepe dissimuler, lowlye of counteynaunce, arrogant of heart, outwardly coumpinable where he inwardly hated, not letting to kisse whome hee thoughte to kyll: dispitious and cruell, not for euill will alway, but after for ambicion, and either for the furetie or encrease of his estate. Frende and foo was muche what indifferent, where his aduantage grew; he spared no mans deathe, whose life withstode his purpose. He slewe with his own handes king Henry the sixt, being prisoner in the Tower, as menne constantly saye, and that without commaundement or knowledge of the king, whiche woulde vndoubtedly yf he had entended that thinge, haue appointed that boocherly office to some other then his owne borne brother.

Warlye, warlike; coumpinable or companionable, companionable; dispitious, for dispiteous, may be either full of despitte or pitiless.

The following is an extract from the Dyaloge Concernynge Heresydes:

Of al which [heretikes] that euer sprang in Christes church, the very worst & the most beastylye, bee these Lutheranes, as their opinions and their lewde liuyng sheweth. And let vs neuer dout but al that be of that secte if any feme good as verye fewe do, yet will they in conclusion decline to the like lewde liuinge, as their mayster & their felowes do, if thei might once (as by gods grace they neuer shall) frame the people to their owne frantike fantasie. Whiche dissolute liuinge they be driuen to dissemble, because their audience is not yet brought to the point to beare, whiche they surely trust to bryng about, and to frame this realme after ye fashion of Swycherlande or Saxony & some other partes of Germanye, where theyr secte hath alreadye fordene the faith, pulled down the churches, polluted the temples, put out and spoyled al good religious folke, joyned freres and nunnes together in lechery, despited all saintes, blasphemed our blessed lady, cast down Christes crofs, throwne out the blessed sacrament, refused all good lawes, abhorred all good governaunce, rebelled agaynst all rulers, fall to fighte amonge themselfe, and so many thousand slayn that the lande lyeth in manye places in maner deferte and desolate.

They fare as dyd once an olde sage father sole in Kent at fuche tyme as divers men of worschippe assembled olde folke of the countrey to commune and deuysie aboute the amendement of Sandewyche hauen. At whyche tyme as they beganne fyrste to ensearche by reason and by the reporte of old menne there about what thing had bene the ocasion that so good an hauen was in so fewe yeres so fore decayed, and fuche sandes rysen, and fuche shalowe flattes made ther with, that right small vessells had nowe muche worke to come in at dyuers tydes, where great shippes wer wthin fewe yeres passed accustomed to ryde without difficultie, and some laying the fault to Goodwyn sandes, some to the landes Inned by dyuers owners in the Isle of tenate [Thanet] out of ye chanell, in which the sea was wont to compasse the isle and bryng the vessells rounde about it, whose course at the ebbe was wont to scoure ye hauen whiche nowe the Sea excluded thence, for lack of such course and scouring is choked up with sande, as they thus alledged, diuers men diuers causes. There starte vp one good old father and said, Ye, masters say euery man what he wil, cha marked this matter wel as som other. And by god I wote how it waxed nought well ynough. For I knewe it good and haue marked, so chaue, whan it began to waxe worfe. And what hath hurt it, good father? quod the gentlemen. By my faith, maysters, quod he, yonder fame Tenterden steple, and nothyng els, that by ye mafs chorde twere a fair fish pole. Why hath the steple hurt the hauen, good father, quod they? Nay byr Lady, maysters, quod he, yche cannot tell you well why, but chote well it hath. For by God I knew it a good hauen till that steple was bylded, and by the mary maffe cha marked it well, it neuer throue since. And thus wisely spake these holy Lutheranes, which sowyng scifmes and sedycions among christen people, laye the losse thereof to the withstanding of the Turkes inuasion.

Fole is fool; inned, occupied; ye, yea; cha, ych ha, I have; waxed nought, became worthless; chaue, ych have, I have; chold, ych wolde, I would; yche, I; chote, ych wote, I know.

In his Second Booke of Comfort against Tribulation More begins thus a very lively and sarcastic version of the ass and the wolf coming to confession to the fox:

My mother had (when I was a lyttle boy) a good olde woman that tooke heede to her chyl dren, they called her mother Mawde. . . . Shee was wont when shee sat by the fire wyth vs (that were children) many chyl dysh tales. But as Plinius sayth that ther is no boke lightly fo badde but that some good thing a man may pyke out therof, so think I that ther is almost no tale fo fooly sh, but that yet in one matter or other, to some purpose it may hap to ferue. For I remember that among other of her fond tales she told vs once, that the Ass and the Wolfe came vpon a tyme to confession to the Foxe.

The following charming letter from More to his wife explains itself and illustrates the writer's character:

Mistres Alyce, in my most hartyswif I recommend me to you. And whereas I am enfourmed by my son Heron of the losse of our barnes and our neighbours also, wt all the corne that was therin; albeit (saving gods pleasure) it is gret pitie of so much good corne lost, yet sith it hath liked hym to fende vs such a chaunce, we must and are bounden, not only to be content, but also to be glad of his visitacion. He sent vs all that we haue lost; and sith he hath by such a chaunce taken it away againe, his pleasure be fulfilled! Let vs neuer grudge therat, but take it in good worth, and hartely thank him, as well for aduersite as for prosperite. And paraduenture we haue more cause to thank him for our losse than for our winning, for his wifedome better seeth what is good for vs then we do ourselves. Therefore, I pray you be of good chere, and take all the howfold with you to church, and there thanke god, both for that he hath giuen vs, and for that he hath taken from vs, and for that he hath left vs; which if it please hym he can encrease when he will. And if it please hym to leaue vs yet lesse, at hys pleasure be it.

I praye you to make some good enfeache what my poor neighbours have losse, and bidde them take no thought therefore; for if I shold not leaue myself a sponer, there shall no pore neighbour of mine bere no losse by any chaunce happened in my house. I pray you be with my children and your household mery in god; and deuise somewhat wt your frends what waye wer best to take, for prouision to be made for corne for our household, and for fede thys yere comming, if ye thinke it good that we keep the ground still in our hands. And whether ye think it good yt we so shall do or not, yet I think it were not best fodenlye thus to leaue it all vp, and to put away our folk of our farme, till we have somewhat aduised vs thereon. How beit, if we haue more nowe then ye shall nede and which can get them other maisters, ye may then discharge vs of them. But I would not that any man were fodenly sent away, he wote nere wether.

At my comming hither, I perceiued none other but that I shold tary still wt ye kinges grace. But now I shall (I think) because of this chance, get leue this next weke to come home and se you, and then shall we further deuise together vpon all thinges, what order shalbe best to take.

And thus as hartely fare you well with all our children as ye can wishe. At Woodestok, the thirde daye of September [1528] by the hand of

Your louing husbände,

THOMAS MORE, knight.

Father Bridgett has noted many of More's phrases as not merely pithy and familiar, but as sounding strangely modern in our ears; thus, 'Out of sight, out of mind;' 'When the wine were in and the wit out;' 'This good man shall see the sky fall first and catch larks ere it happen;' 'He cannot see the wood for the trees;' 'Sin it were to belie the devil.' More says things are not worth a fig, a straw, a rush, a button; talks of being as mad as a March hare, dead as a door-nail, harping on the right string, perceiving chalk from cheese, of playing bo-peep, and of doing various things 'after his own sweet will'—phrases not yet done to death by three centuries of use and abuse. 'Grass widows'—in More's usage unmarried women who had had a child—were not tenderly treated. A 'tale of a tub' is already a jocular phrase with him; 'Pluck up thy spirits' (see p. 126) was part of his last spoken sentence.

How a Sergeant would learne to playe the Frere (which, like a verse pamphlet on fortune, was written in youth) shows already the conservative temper of the Chancellor:

More recent studies are Fame of Blessed Thomas More, by Chambers and others (1930); Routh, More and his Friends (1934); and A. Cecil, Portrait of Sir Thomas More (1937). His English Workes were edited by a nephew (folio, 1557), with a dedication to Queen Mary; the modern edition is by Campbell (1931 et seq.). The Utopia was translated by Ralph Robinson (1551 and 1556), Bishop Burnet (1684), and A. Cayley (1808); see Campbell's study of this work (1930). Sampson's edition (1910) of the Utopia gives Robinson's translation, Roper's Life, and notes and bibliography by Guthkelch. The Utopia (a Latin spelling of a Greek coinage for Nowhere) has helped to create many an ideal 'Kennaquhair,' in some of which politics and in some romance has been dominant. Bacon's New Atlantis and Harrington's Oceana may be named; and among more modern works Butler's Erewhon and William Morris's News from Nowhere.

In the extracts from More's English works we reproduce the spelling of the 1557 folio, and have followed the usage of the period with regard as well to the long f as to the u for v, &c.

The printed 'Gothic' or Black Letter was modelled on the characters generally in use for MSS. (compare the Caxton on page 96 with the Chaucer and Wyclif MSS., pages 73, 88), till in Italy early in the fifteenth century the Caroline minuscules were revived as the (Roman or Italian) book-hand. In Italy and France, Roman and Gothic held divided sway in print almost from the first. But the first book to be printed in Roman letters in England was a Latin pamphlet by a Dean of St Paul's in 1518. The Roman shape gradually triumphed, but the Black Letter held its own in Bibles, proclamations, and acts of parliament. The first English Bible printed in Roman type dated from 1576. The first Roman fonts cast on the Continent had no J, U, W, j, or w, and u was used for v. The long f, a very early cursive form in writing, was used in all Black Letter at the beginning and in the middle of words, whereas at the end of words the short s appeared regularly; this plan was usual in Roman printing in England till the very end of the eighteenth century. The new system gradually triumphed in the nineteenth; but some of the ligatures, ct, fh, and especially ft, survived long after f separately had ceased to appear. In MSS. as early as the tenth century the V or capital (uncial) form of that Roman letter began to be preferred at the beginning of words, and u, the cursive form of the same letter, to be used in the middle. So in English printed books, though in modern English v and u have quite different sound-values, it was the rule down into the seventeenth century to put v at the beginning and u in the middle of words, whether the sound was u or v (vnto, vse, haue, deserue, themselues). Somewhat similarly with I and J, i and j; the J, originally a mere ornamental initial form of I, came gradually to be reserved for the consonantal use of I (=Y), and in English for the quite different sound-value of J. In the fourteenth century it became usual to substitute y for the vowel i, a custom that went out again in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Wt is with. When ye stands for the and yt for that the y is not really a y, but a device for representing þ, the old letter for th. The silent e at the end of English words is due to the Middle English obscure e, which was written and printed long after it ceased to be sounded. But 'in the sixteenth century it was frequently added to almost all words ending phonetically with a consonant; when the preceding consonant was short and accented the consonant was doubled, as in bludde, bedde.'

William Roper (1496-1578), son-in-law and biographer of Sir Thomas More, was the son of a Kentish gentleman, whom he (apparently university bred) succeeded in his post of prothonotary of the Court of King's Bench. In this capacity he became acquainted with More, and married his eldest and most gifted daughter Margaret. Soon after More's execution his son-in-law completed an admirably careful and affectionate biography, which was first printed at Paris in 1626. Roper remained a devout Catholic, and during Mary's reign sat in several parliaments for Kentish constituencies; but he made his peace with Elizabeth's government, and held his office in the Queen's Bench till his death. He thus describes the last scenes of More's life:

When Sir Thomas More came from Westminster to the Tower-ward againe, his daughter, my wife, desirous to see her father, whome she thought she should never see in this world after, and alsoe to have his finall blessinge, gave attendance about the Tower wharffe, where she knewe he should passe before he could enter into the Tower. Theare tarryeing his comminge, as soone as she sawe him, after his blessinge uppon her knees reverentlie received, she hastinge towards him, without consideracion or care of her selfe, pressinge in amongst the midst of the thronge and companie of the garde that with holbards and bills went round about him, hastelie ranne to him, and theare openlie in sight of them, imbraced him and tooke him about the neck and kissed him. Who well likinge her most naturall and deere daughterlie affection towards him, gave her his fatherlie blessinge and manie godlie wordes of comfort besides. From whome after she was departed, she not satisfied with the former sight of him, and like one that had forgotten herselfe, beinge all ravished with the entire love of her father, havinge respect neither to her selfe, nor to the presse of people and multitude that weare theare about him, suddainlie turned backe againe, ranne to him as before, tooke him about the necke and divers times kissed him lovinglie, and at last with a full and heavie heart, was faine to depart from him: the beholdinge whearof was to manie that weare present soe lamentable, that it made them for verie sorrow thearof to weepe and mourne.

Soe remained Sir Thomas More in the Tower more then a weeke after his judgment. From whence the daie before he suffered he sent his shirt of haire, not willing to have it seene, to my wife his deerlie beloved daughter, and a letter written with a cole, contained in the foresaid booke of his workes, expressing the fervent desire he had to suffer on the morrow in these wordes followeing: I comber you, good Margaret, much, but I would be sory if it should be anie longer then to morrow. For it is Saint Thomas even and the Utas of St Peeter: and therfore to morrow longe I to goe to God; it weare a daie verie meet and convenient for me. Deere Megg, I never liked your manner towards me better then when you kissed me last. For I like when daughterlie love and deere charitie hath noe leasure to looke to worldlie courtesie. And soe upon the next morrowe, Tuesdaie, beinge St Thomas his eve and the Utas of Saincte Peeter, in the yeere of our Lord 1535, accordinge as he in his letter the daie before had wished, earlie in the morninge came to him Sir Thomas Pope, his singular good freinde, on message from the Kinge and counsaile that he should the same daie before nine of the clock in the morninge suffer deathe, and that therfore he should forthwith prepare himself thearto. Mr. Pope, quoth Sir Thomas More, for your good tidings I hartelie thanke you. I have been alwaies muche bounden to the Kinge's Highnes for the benefites and honours that he hath still from time to time most bountifullie heaped upon me; and yet more bounden am I to his Grace for puttinge me into this place where I have had convenient time and space to have remembrance of my end. And soe, God helpe me, most of all, Mr. Pope, am I bounden to his Highnes, that it pleaseth him soe shortlie to ridd me from the miseries of this wretched world, and therfore will I not faile earnestlie to praie for his Grace bothe heere and allsoe in the worlde to come. The Kinge's pleasure is farther, quoth Mr. Pope, that at your execution you shall not use manie wordes. Mr. Pope, quoth he, you doe well to give me warninge, of his Grace's pleasure, for otherwise at that time had I purposed somewhat to have spoken, but of noe matter whearwith his Grace or any should have had cause to be offended. Nevertheles, whatsoever I intended, I am readie obedientlie to conforme my selfe to his Grace's commandement; and I beseeche you, good Mr. Pope, to be a meane to his Highnes that my daughter Margaret maie be at my buriall. The Kinge is content allreadie, quoth Mr. Pope, that your wife and children and other your freinds shall have libertie to be present thearat. Oh how muche beholdinge then, said Sir Thomas More, am I unto his Grace, that unto my poore buriall vouchsafethe to have soe gracious consideracion! Whearwithall Mr. Pope, takeinge his leave, could not refrain from weepinge. Which Sir Thomas More perceavinge comforted him in this wise. Quiet your selfe, good Mr. Pope, and be not discomfited: for I trust that we shall once in heaven see eache other full merrilie, where we shall be sure to live and love together in joyfull blisse eternallie. Upon whose departure, Sir Thomas More, as one that had binne invited to some solemn feast, chaunged himselfe into his best apparrell. Which Mr. Lieutenant espieing advised him to put it of, sayeing, that he that should have it was but a javell. What, Mr. Lieutenant, quoth he, shall I account him a javell that shall doe me this daie soe singuler a benifit? Naie, I assure you, weare it cloath of gold, I should thinke it well bestowed on him, as Saint Cyprian did, who gave his executioner thirtie peeces of gold. And albeit at length he through Mr. Lieutenant's importunate persuasion altered his apparrell, yet after the example of the holie Martyr Saint Cyprian did he of that little money that was left him send an angell of gold to his executioner. And soe was he by Mr. Lieutenant brought out of the Tower to the place of execution. Wheare goinge up the skaffold, which was soe weake that it was readie to fall, he saide merrilie to the Lieutenant, I praie you see me up safe, and for my comminge downe let me shift for my selfe. Then desired he all the people thearabout to praie for him, and to beare witness with him that he should theare suffer deathe in and for the faithe of the Catholicke Church. Which donne he kneeled downe, and after his prayers saide, turned to the executioner with a cheerfull countenance, and saide unto him, Plucke up thy spirits, man, and be not affraide to doe thine office: my neck is verie short, take heede therfore thou strike not awrie for savinge of thine honestie. Soe passed Sir Thomas More out of this world to God upon the verie same daie which he most desired. Soone after his deathe came intelligence thearof to the Emperor Charles. Whearuppon he sent for Sir Thomas Eliott, our Englishe Embassadour, and said to him; My Lord Embassadour, we understande that the Kinge your master hath put his faithfull servant and grave councillor Sir Thomas More to deathe. Whearuppon Sir Thomas Eliott answered, that he understoode nothinge thearof. Well, saide the Emperor, it is too true: and this will we saie, that had we binne master of such a servant, of whose dooings ourselves have had these manie yeeres noe small experience, we would rather have lost the best cittle of our dominions, then have lost such a worthie Councillor. Which matter was by the same Sir Thomas Eliott to my selfe, to my wife, to Mr. Clement and his wife, to Mr. John Heywood and his wife, and unto divers others his freindes accordinglie reported.

A cole is a bit of charcoal; utas, octave, eighth day after; javell, a worthless fellow, scamp. The lieutenant's suggestion was in view of the fact that the executioner was entitled to the clothes worn by his victim at the time of the execution.

John Fisher, Bishop of Rochester (c. 1469–1535), wrote largely in Latin against the Lutheran doctrines, and left some valuable works in English too. Born at Beverley, he studied at Cambridge. In 1502 Margaret, Countess of Richmond, Henry VII.'s mother, made him her chaplain and confessor, and in 1503 he was appointed first Lady Margaret Professor of Divinity. Next year he was ejected chancellor of the university, and consecrated to the see of Rochester. He zealously promoted the New Learning, and advocated reformation from within; as zealously he resisted the Lutheran schism. In 1527 he pronounced firmly against the divorce of Henry VIII.; and having lent too ready an ear to the 'revelations' of the Holy Maid of Kent, Elizabeth Barton, in 1534 he was attainted of treason, and, for refusing the oath of succession, was sent with More to the Tower. In May 1535 Pope Paul III. made him a cardinal; on 17th June the old man, worn by sickness and ill-usage, was tried for denial of the king's supremacy; on the 22nd he was beheaded on Tower Hill. In 1935 he was canonised. The English writings of Bishop Fisher consist of a treatise on the penitential psalms, sermons, and a few small religious tracts. Three of the sermons are of exceptional historical interest—one at the funeral of Henry VII.; one at the 'month's mind,' or memorial service for Henry's mother, the Countess of Richmond (1509); and one on occasion of the public burning of Luther's books, 'agayn y^e pernicious doctryn of Martin Luuther.' The treatise and the sermons alike contain, as Professor Mayor says, 'bursts of manly eloquence that entitle the writer to an honourable place among the early masters of English prose.' Fisher thus commemorated the Countess:

I wold reherce somewhat of her demeenyng in this behalve, her sobre temperaunce in metes and drynkes was knowen to al them that were conversaunt with her, wherin she lay in as grete wayte of herself as ony person myght, keping alway her straye mesure, and offendyng as lytel as ony creature myght; eschewing banquets, rere-suppers, ioncyrries betwex meales. As for fastynge for age and feblenes, albeit she were not bounde yet tho dayes that by the chirche were appoynted, she kept them diligently and sereously, and in especyall the Holy Lent throughtout, that she restrayned her appetyte tyl one fysshe on the day; besyde her other peculer fastes of devocion, as Anthony, saint Mary Maudeleyn, saynt Katheryn with other; and thorowe out all the yere, the friday and saterday she full truely observed. As to harde clothes wering she had her shertes and gyrdyls of heere, whiche whan she was in helth everi weke she fayled not certayne dayes to weare somtyme that one, somtyme that other, that full often her skynne as I herde her say was perced therewith. . . . In prayer every daye at her uprysnyng, whiche comynly was not longe after v of the klok, she began certayne devocions, and so after theym with one of her gentylwomen the matynes of our lady whiche she kepte her to; then she came into her closet, where then with her chapelayn she sayd also matyns of the daye. And after that dayly herde iiij or v masses upon her knees; soo contynuyng in her prayers and devocions unto the houre of dyner, whiche of the etynge daye was x of the clocke and upon the fastynge-day xi. After dyner full truely she wolde go her stacyons to thre aulters dayly; dayly her dyryges and commendacyons she wolde saye and her even songes before souper, both of the daye and of our lady, besyde many other prayers and psalters of Davyd through out the yere. And at nyght before she wente to bedde, she faylled not to resorte unto her chapell, and there a large quarter of an hour to occupye her in devocions. No mervayle though al this long tyme her knelinge was to her paynfull, and so paynfull that many tymes it caused in her backe payn and dysease. And yet nevertheles dayly whan she was in helth she fayled not to say the crowne of our lady, whiche after the maner of Rome conteyneth lx and thre aves, and at every ave to make a knelynge. As for meditacyon, she had dyvers books in Frensshe, wherwith she wolde occupy herself whan she was wery of prayer. Wherefore dyvers she dyde translate out of Frensshe into Englysshe. Her mervailous wepyng

Can also recorde the same tho that were present at any tyme when she was housylde, which was ful nye a dosen tymes every yere: what flodes of teres there yssued forth of her eyes.

Fisher's Latin works were published at Würzburg in 1597; his English works were edited for the E.E.T.S. by Mayor (vol. i. 1876) and Bayne (vol. ii. 1900). See Father Bridgett's Life (1888) and Bayne's edition (1921) of the Life ascribed to Richard Hall.

Sir Thomas Elyot was born about 1490 in Wiltshire, in 1511 became a clerk of assize, and in 1523 clerk of the king's council. In 1531–32, as ambassador to Charles V., he visited the Low Countries and Germany, having orders to procure the arrest of Tyndale. In 1535 he went on a second embassy to the emperor, whom he seems to have followed to Tunis and Naples. Member for Cambridge in 1542, he died at Carlton, Cambridgeshire, 20th March 1546. His chief work, The Boke named the Governour (1531), is the earliest English treatise on moral philosophy, and deals largely with education. Elyot protests against 'cruel and yrous schoolmasters, by whom children's wits be dulled'—a protest much needed in his generation. His main purpose was to emphasise the necessity of better education for the young nobles destined to govern the nation; his second to lay down principles of morality for the ruling classes. Other works were Of the Knowledge which maketh a Wise Man (1533); Pasquil the Playne (1533); Isocrates' Doctrinal of Princes (1534); Pico de Mirandola's Rules of a Christian Lyfe (1534); The Castel of Helth (1534); The Bankette of Sapience (1534); Bibliotheca (1538), the first Latin-English dictionary; The Image of Governance (1540); Defence of Good Women (1545); and Preservative against Deth (1545).

Elyot based the Governour largely on the Italians Pontano, De Principe, and Patrizi, De Regno, although much in him is quite original. The Governour passed through eight editions in forty years, was more popular than even the Utopia, and entered largely into the literature and life of the sixteenth century. Ascham's Scholemaster and Locke's Thoughts concerning Education develop theses laid down by Elyot. Apparently both Budæus and Sturmius learnt from him.

Elyot is the sole 'authority' we have for the story so admirably worked up in Shakespeare's Henry IV., Part Second, about the riotous Prince Hal and Judge Gascoigne. According to Mr Croft, who has given us an admirable edition of the Governour, with elaborate notes (2 vols., 1880), the story is utterly unhistorical; but the first English Prince of Wales, afterwards Edward II., was sent away from the court for an insult to a royal minister, and some chronicler's record of this fact may by misapprehension or design have been transferred to Prince Hal. From Elyot the incident passed to Hall, whence no doubt Shakespeare took it. The story is thus given in Mr Croft's edition of the Governour, in the chapter discussing 'How noble a vertue placabilite is':

We lacke nat of this vertue domesticall examples, I meane of our owne kynges of Englande; but moste specially one, whiche, in myne oppinion, is to be compared with any that euer was written of in any region or countray.

The moste renowned prince, kynge Henry the fyfte, late kynge of Englande, duryng the life of his father was noted to be fierce and of wanton courage. It hapned that one of his seruantes whom he well fauored, for felony by hym committed, was arrayned at the kynges benche; wherof he being aduertised, and incensed by light persones aboute hym, in furious rage came hastily to the barre, where his seruant stode as a prisoner, and commaunded hym to be ungyued and sette at libertie, where at all men were abasshed, reserued the chiefe iustice, who humbly exhorted the prince to be contented that his seruauant might be ordred accordyng to the auncient lawes of this realme, or if he wolde haue hym sauued from the rigour of the lawes, that he shuld optaine, if he moughte, of the kynge, his father, his gracious pardone; wherby no lawe or iustice shulde be derogate. With whiche answer the prince nothyng appeased, but rather more inflamed, endeoured hym selfe to take away his seruauant. The iuge consideringe the perilous example and inconuenience that moughte therby ensue, with a valiant spirite and courage commaunded the prince upon his alegeance to leue the prisoner and departe his waye. With whiche commandment the prince, being set all in a fury, all chafed, and in a terrible maner, came up the place of iugement—men thinkyng that he wolde haue slayne the iuge, or haue done to hym some damage; but the iuge sittynge styll, without mouynge, declarynge the maiestie of the kynges place of iugement, and with an assured and bolde countenance, hadde to the prince these words folowynge: Sir, remembre your selfe; I kepe here the place of the king, your soueraigne lorde and father, to whom ye owe double obedience, wherfore eftsones in his name I charge you desiste of your wilfulnes and unlauffull entrepryse, and from henceforth gyue good example to those whiche hereafter shall be your propre subiectes. And nowe for your contempt and disobedience, go you to the prisone of the kynges benche, where unto I committe you; and remayne ye there prisoner untill the pleasure of the kyng, your father, be further knownen. With whiche wordes beinge abasshed, and also wondrynge at the meruailous grauitie of that worshipful Justice, the noble prince, layinge his waipon aparte, doinge reuerence, departed and wente to the kynges benche as he was commaunded. Wherat his seruants disdainyng, came and shewed to the kynge all the hole affaire. Wherat he a whyles studienge, after as a man all rauished with gladness, holdyng his eien and handes up towarde heuen, abrayded, sayinge with a loude voice, O mercifull god, howe moche am I, aboue all other men, bounde to your infinite goodnes; specially for that ye haue gyuen me a iuge, who feareth nat to ministre iustice, and also a sonne who can suffre semblably and obey iustice!

Domesticall is domestic, native; renomed, renowned; ungyued, released from gyves or fetters; reserued, excepted—i.e. except; abrayded, broke suddenly into speech, cried out.

The English Bible.

Mention has already been made (page 123) of More's controversy with Tyndale as to the translation of the Bible into English, and we must now attempt the history of the great work in which the latter took so prominent a part. Although the possession of a copy of the Wyclifite version had been forbidden by the Convocation held at Oxford in 1408, throughout the first half of the fifteenth century the book seems to have circulated freely, and of the one hundred and seventy manuscripts of it which have been examined, the greater number, on the evidence of their handwriting, appear to have been produced between 1420 and 1450. The troubles of the next quarter of a century diminished the production of these as of other manuscripts, and almost alone among the countries of Europe, England made no use of the new invention of printing for the multiplication of copies of the Bible, whether in the original Hebrew and Greek, in Latin, or in the vernacular. By 1490 twelve different editions had been published of the Bible in German, and two in Low German. At Venice the Italian translation by Niccolo Malermi was printed at least eight times during the fifteenth century, though no other Italian town produced an edition. A French New Testament was printed at Lyons about 1474, a Dutch Bible at Delft in 1477, and a Bohemian at Prague in 1488. Of this last there was a second edition the next year, but outside Germany and Venice it is clear that reprints were not encouraged, and in face of the condemnation of 1408 it is not surprising that in England no vernacular edition was produced. Yet Caxton at least did something, for in his translation of the Golden Legend of Jacobus de Voragine he included not only sermons on the feasts commemorating the chief events in the life of Christ, but also the 'hystories' of Adam, Noah, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, Moses, the Giving of the Law, Joshua, Samuel, Saul, David, and Solomon, taken, with little omitted or added, from the Bible itself. As an example of this fifteenth-century version we may take the beginning of the history of Jacob, as printed in the original edition of 1483:

Ysaac began to wexe old and his eyen faylled and dymmed that he myght not clerly see, and on a tyme he called Esau his oldest sone and said to hym, 'Sone myne,' which answerde, 'Fader, I am here redy.' To whom the fader saide, 'Beholde that I wexe old and knowe not the day that I shal dye and departe out of this world; wherfore take thyn harneys, thy bowe and quyyer, with takles, and goe forth an huntynge. And whan thou hast taken ony venyson, make to me therof suche maner mete as thou knowest that I am woned [wont] to ete, and brynge it to me that I may ete it, and that my sowle may blesse the or I dye.' Whiche all these wordis Rebecca herde, and Esau wente forth for to accomplish the comandement of his fader, and she saide thenne to Jacob, 'I have herde thy fader saye to Esau thy brother, Brynge to me of thy venyson and make therof mete that I may ete and that I may blesse the to-fore our lord er I dye. Now my sone take hede to my conceyll, and goo forth to the flock and brynge to me two the beste kyddes that thou canst fynde, and I shal make of them mete suche as thy fader shal gladly ete, whiche whan thou hast brought to hym and hath eten he may blesse the er he dye.' To whom Jacob answerd, 'Knowest thou not that my brother is rowhe and heery [rough and hairy] and I smothe? Yf my fader take me to hym and taste me and fele, I drede me that he shal thynke that I mocke hym, and shal gyve me his curse for the blessyng.' The moder thenne said to hym: 'In me,' said she, 'be this curse, my sone. Nevertheles, here me, go to the flocke and doo that I have said to the.' He wente and fette [fetched] the kyddes and delyverd them to his moder, and she wente and ordeyned them in-to suche mete as she knewe wel that his fader lovyd, and toke the beste clothes that Esau had and dyde hem on Jacob, and the skynnes of the kyddes she dyde aboute his necke and handes there as he was bare, and delyveryd to hym brede and the pulmente [stew] that she had boyled, and he wente to his fader and saide, 'Fader myn,' and he answerd, 'I here. Who art thou, my sone?' Jacob saide, 'I am Esau, thy fyrste begoten sone. I have don as thou comaundest me. Aryse, sitte and ete of the venyson of myn huntyng, that thy soule may blesse me.'

The Golden Legend was frequently reprinted, and through this, through Lives of Christ, sermons, and popular books of devotion, the broad outlines of the Bible story were probably as well known as they are now. But save for the Psalms, of all in the Bible that is not story, notably the Prophets in the Old Testament and the Epistles in the New, there was small opportunity for any one ignorant of Latin to gain knowledge, and this was the case also with the whole Bible in respect of its text as distinct from its general purport. Meanwhile, however, materials for an accurate translation were accumulating. Between 1514 and 1517 Cardinal Ximenes had printed at Alcalá his splendid Polyglot Bible, which received the papal sanction in 1520 and was published in or before 1522. In 1516, under the title Novum Instrumentum, Erasmus had published at Basel the Greek text of the New Testament, with a new and scholarly Latin version. In September 1522 Martin Luther published at Wittenberg his German New Testament, the first instalment of his new translation of the entire Bible. In 1523 a French translation of the New Testament by Jacques Le Fèvre d'Étaples was printed at Paris, and other portions of the Bible followed till the translation was completed in six volumes in 1528. But the Parlement of Paris condemned the first instalments of the book, and this was no good omen for the work of translation in England. The man who undertook this task was William Tyndale, a member of a family which, on its migration to Gloucestershire from the north during the Wars of the Roses, had assumed as an alternative name that of Huchyns or Hychyns, which was used also by Tyndale himself. The date of his birth is unknown, but as William Hychyns he matriculated at Oxford in 1510, and took his degree as Master of Arts five years later. From Oxford he removed to Cambridge, where Erasmus had recently been acting as Lady Margaret Professor of Divinity. By 1522 (having in the meanwhile taken holy orders) he had become tutor to the children of Sir John Walsh, of Old Sodbury in Gloucestershire; was preaching in the neighbouring villages; holding controversies with the clergy, for which he had to answer to the Chancellor of the diocese; and translating the Enchiridion Militis Christiani of Erasmus. If Foxe, the martyrologist, may be trusted, he declared at this time that if God granted him life he would cause 'a boye that dryveth the plough' to know more of the Scriptures than his opponents.

In the summer of 1523 Tyndale came to London, with an oration of Isocrates translated from Greek into English, as a proof of his scholarship, and tried to obtain a post in the household of Cuthbert Tunstall, the Bishop of London, himself a man of learning. Repulsed by Tunstall, he was employed as a preacher at the church of St Dunstan's-in-the-West, and hospitably entertained for six months by one of his hearers, Humphrey Monmouth. But his mind was bent on translating the Bible. 'Even in the Bisshope of London's house,' he tells us (Preface to the Fyrst boke of Moses called Genesis), 'I intended to have done it;' and now, from what he saw of London and the London clergy, he 'understode at the laste not only that there was no rowme in my Lorde of London's palace to translate the New Testament, but also that there was no place to do it in all Englonde,' and from England accordingly he fled, sailing for Hamburg in May 1524. After a visit to Luther at Wittenberg, and a return to Hamburg for money, probably supplied him by some of the London merchants, he betook himself, with his assistant, William Roy, to Cologne, and there arranged with Peter Quentel and Arnold Byrckman for the production of his New Testament, the former being a well-known printer, and the latter a publisher who had special relations with the English book-trade. But at Cologne at this time there was staying a prolific pamphleteer on the papal side, Johann Dobneck (better known by his Latin nom de guerre 'Cochlæus'), who also was negotiating with Cologne printers. A story came to Dobneck's ears that all England was to be Lutherised through the exertions of two learned Englishmen; and on inquiry he found that three thousand copies of an English New Testament had already been printed in quarto as far as sheet K, a matter of eighty pages. The case was promptly brought before the Cologne Senate, and to escape arrest the 'two English apostates,' as Dobneck calls them, had to take boat quickly up the Rhine to Worms, bearing with them what they could of their unfinished work. Of the edition thus interrupted a solitary fragment survives in the Grenville Library at the British Museum. This consists of sheets A-H—that is, eight out of the ten printed off—and contains Tyndale's 'Prologe' and his translation of St Matthew's Gospel to the beginning of chapter xxii. The Prologue is partly Tyndale's own, partly borrowed from Luther; and this is the case also with the marginal glosses, of which there are some ninety in this fragment—about forty by Tyndale, and about fifty translated more or less closely from Luther. As a specimen of the translation we may take a passage to which, and to the side-note on it, we may be sure that Tyndale's critics themselves promptly turned, Matthew xvi. 5-28:

And when his disciples were come to the other syde of the water, they had forgotten to take breed with them. Then Jesus said unto them: Take hede and beware of the leuen of the pharises, and of the saduces. They thought a-monge themselves sayinge: we have brought no breed with us. When Jesus understode that he saide unto them, O ye of lytell fayth, why are youre myndes cumbred because ye have brought no breed; Do ye not yet perceave, nether remember those v. loves when there were v. M. men, and howe many basketts toke ye up? Nether the vii. loves when there were iiiii. M. and howe many baskets toke ye uppe, why perceave ye not then that y spake nunt unto you of breed when I sayde, beware of the leuen of the pharises and of the saduces? Then understode they howe that he bad nott them beware of the leuen of breed: butt off the doctryne of the pharises and of the saduces.

When Jesus came into the coosts of the cite which is called cesarea philippi, he axed hys disciples sayinge: whom do men saye that I the sonne of man am? They saide, some saye that thou arte Jhon baptiste, some helyas, some Jeremyas, or won [sic] of the prophetts. He seyde unto them, butt whom saye ye that I am? Symon Peter answered and sayde: Thou arte Christ the sonne of the levyng god. And Jesus answered and sayde to him: happy arte thou simon the sonne of Jonas, for fleshe and bloud have not opened unto the that, but my fater which ys in heven. And I saye also unto the, that thou arte Peter,¹ And apon thys roocke I wyll bylde my congregacion: and the gates of hell shall not preveye ageynst it. And I wyll yeve unto the the keyes of the kyngdom of heven, and whatsoever thou byndest uppon erth, yt shall be bounde in heven, and what soever thou lowsest on erthe yt shalbe lowsed in heven.

Then he charged his disciples, that they shulde tell no man that he was Jesus christ. From that tyme forth, Jesus began to shewe unto his disciples howe that he must go unto Jerusalem and suffer many things of the seniors and of the hye prestes and of the scribes, and must be killed and ryse agayne the thyrde day. Peter toke him asyde, and began to rebuke hym sayinge: master faver thy sylfe, this shall nott come unto the. Then turned he aboute, and sayde unto peter: ¹go after me satan, thou offendest me, because thou perceavest nott godly thinges: but worldly thinges.

Jesus then sayde to hys disciples, Yf eny man wyll folowe me leet him forsake him sylfe, and take his crosse and folowe me. For who-soever wyll save hys lyfe shall loose yt. And who-soever shall loose hys lyfe for my sake, shall fynde yt. Whatt shall hit proffet a man, yf he shulde wyn all the hoole worlde: so he loose hys owne soule? Or els what shall a man geve to redeme hys soule agayne with-all? For the sonne of man shall come in the glory of hys fater, with hys angels, and then shall he rewarde every man accordinge to hys dedes. Verely I saye unto you, some there be a-monge them that here stonde whych shall nott taste of deeth, tyll they shall have sene the sonne of man come in hys kyngdom.

Arrived at Worms, Tyndale arranged with a printer, who appears to have been Peter Schöffer, a descendant of the prototypographer of Mainz, and we learn from a contemporary diary that an edition of no fewer than six thousand copies was now printed. Of all these only two remain; and from the more perfect of the two, now in the library of the Baptist College at Bristol, a facsimile reprint was edited by Mr Francis Fry in 1862. From this facsimile we see that the text of the Cologne fragment was set up again with the correction of misprints, but that the side-notes are altogether omitted. There are references, however, to separate editions of the Gospels of St Matthew and St Mark which have now perished, and it is possible that these were annotated.

Dobneck and others had warned Henry VIII. and Wolsey what Tyndale was about, and on 24th October 1526 Bishop Tunstall threatened with excommunication all who kept copies of his translation in their possession. But the importation of them into England, and their sale at from two to four shillings apiece (pence being then of the present value of shillings), proceeded apace, till the agency was discovered and the sale checked in 1528. In the same year Tyndale shifted his quarters from Worms to Marburg, and there published in April his treatise on Justification by Faith entitled The Parable of the Wicked Mammon. This was succeeded in the following October by The Obedience of a Christen man and how Christen rulers ought to governe, in which he maintains the paramount authority of the Scripture in matters of faith, and of the king in matters of government, combating the charges of anarchy brought against the Reformers.

After a shipwreck and a stay at Hamburg, Tyndale made his way to Antwerp, where the folly of Bishop Tunstall in trying to suppress his New Testament by buying up copies of it supplied him with fresh funds. In 1530 he published, again at Marburg, his translation of the Pentateuch, with controversial side-notes, and also The Practyse of Prelates, a vehement attack not only on bishops in general, but on Wolsey, and also on the king for his proceedings for divorce. Sir Thomas More's Dyaloge, 'wyth many thyngys touchyng the pestylent secte of Luther and Tyndale,' had appeared in 1529, and in 1531 An Answer unto Sir Thomas More's Dialogue was printed for Tyndale at Antwerp, and elicited More's replies of 1532 and 1533. During part of 1531 a reconciliation with Henry VIII. seemed possible, but by the end of the year the king requested the emperor to arrest him as a spreader of sedition, and Tyndale was obliged to leave Antwerp. In 1533 Henry's hostility had cooled, and Tyndale returned to Antwerp, publishing in the same year a Brieffe Declaration of the Sacraments, in which he adopted the extreme Zwinglian view. In August 1534 he was annoyed, and with reason, to find that another Reformer, George Joy, had reprinted his New Testament with alterations of his own, among which was the substitution for the word 'Resurrection' of such phrases as 'the life after this.' His own revised version was then nearly ready, and was published in November 1534, with a translation of the portions of the Old Testament read on some Sundays and festivals as 'Epistles,' and with new marginal glosses. A copy of this issue, specially printed on vellum, was presented to Anne Boleyn, and is now preserved in the British Museum. A new edition 'yet once agayn corrected by Willyam Tyndale' is dated 1535; but in May of that year Tyndale was enticed from the 'English house'—that is, a house set apart for the use of the English merchants at Antwerp, where he was staying with his friend Thomas Poyntz, carried beyond the walls of the free city to where the emperor held sway, arrested, and imprisoned in the castle of Vilvorde. It is certain that Henry VIII. had no hand in this outrage, but the efforts of Tyndale's friends to urge him to interfere on his behalf were unsuccessful. During an imprisonment of more than a year Tyndale still laboured at his task of translation, till he was tried and condemned as a heretic. At last, in the autumn of 1536, after having been degraded from holy orders, he was strangled and burnt at Vilvorde. (See Mozley's Life, 1937).

How many editions of Tyndale's New Testament were printed during his life and soon after his martyrdom will never be known. There are allusions to three printed at Antwerp before 1534 without his revision, but all of these have perished utterly. Of editions dated 1536, the year of his death, there are some seven different varieties extant, and probably others once existed. Despite the difficulties which from time to time hampered their sale in England, upwards of thirty other editions were issued during the reigns of Henry VIII. and Edward VI. In the second half of the century Tyndale's version was practically superseded by the Genevan; but of this, as of every other Protestant translation, it was itself the basis. The fact that subsequent translators found so little to alter is the best testimony to Tyndale's scholarship and literary skill. His scholarship led him to go direct to his originals; and though his version shows traces of the influence of the Latin Testament of Erasmus, and in a less degree of the German of Luther, it is essentially his own interpretation of the Greek (and in the case of the Old Testament of the Hebrew), thus differing entirely from the Wyclifite translation, which, like that of Rheims, was based on the Latin Vulgate. Tyndale's literary judgment is equally beyond question. The objections taken by Sir Thomas More and other opponents to his use of such words as congregation, elder, love, favour, knowledge, repentance, instead of church, priest, charity, grace, confession, penance, with their ecclesiastical associations, have in some cases been sustained by subsequent revisers, in others not. Other changes were made to obtain what was thought a truer meaning or a happier rhythm; but, with the exception of that of Rheims, every subsequent version of the New Testament which we have to mention must be regarded as a modification of Tyndale's translation, not as a new work. Thus the credit for rhythm and beauty of phrase which is commonly assigned to the so-called 'Authorised Version' of 1611 is mainly due to William Tyndale, and to the very inferior scholar but able translator, Miles Coverdale, who immediately took up his work.

This Miles Coverdale (b. 1488) was a Yorkshireman, who had been educated at Cambridge and taken priest's orders in 1514. We hear of his making the acquaintance of Thomas Cromwell at the house of Sir Thomas More, of his preaching as a Reformer, and in 1531 of his taking the degree of Bachelor of Canon Law at Cambridge. Not very long after this, not on his own initiative ('It was neither my labour nor my desyre to have this worke put into my hand' is his own assertion), but apparently at the expense and instigation of a rich Antwerp merchant, Jacob van Meteren, he took up the task of making a translation of the entire Bible 'out of Douche [that is, the German versions of Luther and the Zurich translators] and Latyn.' There is great controversy as to where the book was printed, but it is perhaps best assigned to the press of Christopher Froshover of Zurich. No perfect copy is extant, but it is clear that there were two issues in 1535, in one of which the preliminary matter appears to have been set up afresh by an English printer, probably James Nycolson of Southwark. By an Act passed in 1534 books printed abroad could no longer enter England ready bound (lest the English binders should lose their profit), and the first sheet may have been damaged in transit, or have been reprinted merely to give the book an English look. In 1530 Henry VIII. had issued a proclamation 'for dampning of erronious bokes & heresies & prohibitinge the havinge of holy scripture translated into the vulgar tonges;' but now this new version was dedicated to the king, and in 1537 editions were issued by Nycolson not only 'newely oversene and correcte,' but 'set forth with the kynges most gracious license.'

Meanwhile another editor was at work, John Rogers, a Cambridge graduate (born at Aston, near Birmingham, about 1500), who had come under Tyndale's influence at Antwerp, and had apparently received from him a manuscript which brought his version of the Old Testament to the end of the second book of Chronicles. A Bible in which the rest of the Old Testament was supplied from Coverdale's rendering was now in 1537 printed abroad (probably at Antwerp) for the London publishers, R. Grafton and E. Whitchurch, and this also circulated in England as 'set forth with the kinges most gracyous lycence.' To secure this it was necessary to suppress Tyndale's name, and the book was therefore put forth as 'truly and purely translated into Englysh by Thomas Matthew,' a pseudonym at this time apparently intended for Tyndale, but which was afterwards regarded as an alias of Rogers himself.

In 1539 a new edition of this 'Matthew's Bible' was printed at London 'by John Byddell for Thomas Barthlet [the king's printer], newly recognised with great diligence after most faythful exemplars, by Rychard Taverner.' This Richard Taverner was a lawyer who had been educated at Oxford, and had had to do penance there in 1528 for helping to circulate Tyndale's New Testament. He was an excellent Greek scholar, and the numerous small changes he made, especially in the New Testament, were all in the interest of greater accuracy and clearness; but after 1539 his Bible and New Testament were each only reprinted once, and his edition exercised no influence on subsequent revisions. Thus the important issue of the year 1539 was not Taverner's, but a new recension by Miles Coverdale, undertaken at the instance of Thomas Cromwell, Earl of Essex. This, which measures fifteen inches by ten and ranks as the first of the so-called 'Great Bibles,' was originally set up, by license of the French king, by the Paris printer François Regnault, under the supervision of Coverdale and Richard Grafton; but in December 1538, when the text was nearly finished, the Inquisition intervened, and the work was stopped. After a brief interval, however, Coverdale and Grafton were able to convey the presses, types, and workmen to London, and rescued also a great quantity of the printed sheets. By April 1539 the work was completed in London, and was issued with a title-page designed by Hans Holbein, representing Henry VIII., Archbishop Cranmer, and Cromwell all distributing Bibles. It was stated to be 'truly translated after the veryte of the Hebrue and Greke textes, by the dylygent studye of dyverse excellent learned men, expert in the forsayd tonges,' and it differs from the text of 'Matthew's Bible' more especially by the use made in the Old Testament of the commentary by Sebastian Münster published in 1534-35. Exactly a year later (April 1540) was published the second 'Great Bible,' which, from its containing a prologue by Cranmer and the note 'apoynted to the use of the Churches,' is often quoted as Cranmer's Bible. In it Coverdale carried his revision a little farther, and with this issue his work as a Bible-translator closes. The third 'Great Bible' was published in July 1540; the fourth, with the arms of Cromwell cut out from Holbein's title-page (he had been executed on 28th July), in the following November. The title of this edition runs: 'The Byble in Englyshe of the largest and greatest volume, auctorysed and apoynted by the commaundemente of oure moost redoubted Prynce, and soveraygne Lorde, Kyng Henrye the VIII., supreme heade of this his church and Realme of Englande: to be frequented and used in every church within this his sayd realme;' and in 1541 royal proclamation was made for this 'Byble of the largest and greatest volume to be had in every church,' its price being fixed at ten shillings unbound, or 'for every of the sayde Bybles well and sufficientlye bounde, trymmed and clasped, not above twelve shylynges.' To supply the demand created by this proclamation three other editions had to be issued in May, November, and December 1541; but the reaction in the king's policy had already set in, and from 1541 to the end of his reign there was no more Bible-printing in England. That a translation of the complete Bible had been printed and circulated in England was due, in different degrees, to the zeal of five men, Tyndale, Coverdale, Rogers, Cromwell, and Cranmer. Of these, Coverdale lived to a great age, held for a short time the bishopric of Exeter, translated upwards of thirty different theological works, and died peacefully in 1565. Of the other four, Tyndale, Rogers, and Cranmer were burnt, and Thomas Cromwell beheaded.

We have now brought down the history of Bible translation in England to the end of the reign of Henry VIII., but instead of stopping here it will be convenient to continue our narrative to the completion of the 'Authorised Version' in 1611. The publication of English Bibles was naturally resumed under Edward VI., and checked again in the reign of Queen Mary. Of the Protestant divines who fled from England to escape her persecution, many found a home in Switzerland, more especially at Geneva; and it was thus at Geneva, where Beza had recently edited a new Latin translation of the New Testament, that William Whittingham, a Fellow of All Souls College, Oxford, and a connection by marriage of Calvin, set about a fresh English version of the same book. This was printed in 1557, and was followed three years later by a complete Bible, the work of Whittingham and some of his fellow-exiles, the printing being paid for by members of the English congregation at Geneva. This new version was accompanied by marginal notes, which naturally showed the Calvinistic leanings of their authors. But the revised translation, which took Tyndale's edition of 1535 as its basis for the New Testament and the Great Bible in the case of the Old, was a sober and scholarly piece of work, and sprang at once into popularity.

Although the Geneva version was cordially approved by the chief English theologians, it was never adopted for use in churches, chiefly, no doubt, because it had originated with the extreme section of the Reformers. In 1563 Matthew Parker, one of the most learned occupants of the see of Canterbury, formulated a scheme for a new translation, which was published five years later, and is generally known as the 'Bishops' Bible,' from the fact that eight of its thirteen revisers were bishops. As might, perhaps, be expected from this fact, there seems to have been very little consultation among them, all being busy men, and some with no great inclination for their task. A second edition, in which the New Testament was further revised, appeared in 1572; and between that date and 1606 some twenty other editions were printed, the majority of them in large folio, suitable only for use in churches. The Geneva Bible, of which about a hundred editions, mostly in octavo, were printed in the same period, completely held the field for private use.

In 1582, more than half a century after Tyndale had begun his work, the priests of the English College at Rheims issued a New Testament for the use of Roman Catholic Englishmen. It was translated, not directly from the Greek, but from the Vulgate Latin version, although it is clear that in some minor points, notably as to the use of the definite article, the Greek original was carefully consulted. The main object of the translators seems to have been to produce a version which should be in strict accordance with Catholic tradition, and should be read in the light of the commentary by which it was accompanied. Many words were rather transliterated than translated, so that we have such words as 'Parasceue,' 'Azymes,' the 'bread of Proposition,' 'exinanited' (Phil. ii. 7), the contention of the editors being that where an exact equivalent could not be found it was best to leave the word as it stood and refer the reader to a note for its explanation. After the New Testament had been issued the English College moved from Rheims to Douay, and here in 1609—that is, after an interval of twenty-seven years—by the addition of the Old Testament, this version of the Bible was completed. Adherence to the same principles made the Douay Old Testament even more difficult reading than the earlier volume, and the Rheims and Douay Bible went through very few editions until it was carefully revised by Bishop Challoner in the eighteenth century. The chief scholars who helped to produce it were Gregory Martin, late of St John's College, Oxford; Dr Bristow, late of Exeter College; Dr Worthington; and, it is said, though with no great certainty, Cardinal Allen. As a specimen of this translation in a simple passage where it shows to advantage, we may take the same extract from St Matthew xvi. as we chose in the case of Tyndale's edition of 1525. It is expounded in numerous notes of considerable length, which need not here be reproduced:

And when his disciples were come over the water, they forgot to take bread. Who said to them, Looke wel and beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and Sadducees. But they thought within them selves saying, Because we tooke not bread. And Jesus knowing it, said, Why do you thinke within your selves, O ye of litle faith, for that you have not bread? Do you not yet understand, neither do you remember the five loaves among five thousand men, and how many baskets you tooke up? Neither the seven loaves, among foure thousand men, and how many maundes you tooke up? Why do you not understand that I said not of bread to you, Beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and Sadducees? Then they understoode that he said not they should beware of the leaven of bread, but of the doctrine of the Pharisees and Sadducees.

And Jesus came into the quarters of Cæsarea Philippi: and he asked his disciples, saying, Whom say men that the Sonne of man is? But they said, Some John the Baptist, and othersome Elias, and others Hieremie, or one of the Prophets. Jesus saith to them, But whom do you say that I am? Simon Peter answered and said, Thou art Christ the sonne of the living God. And Jesus answering, said to him, Blessed art thou Simon bar-Jona; because flesh and bloud hath not revealed it to thee, but my father which is in heaven. And I say to thee, that thou art Peter; and upon this rocke wil I build my church, and the gates of hel shal not prevaile against it. And I wil give to thee the keies of the kingdom of heaven. And whatsoever thou shalt binde upon earth, it shal be bound also in the heavens: and whatsoever thou shalt loose in earth it shall be loosed also in the heavens.

Then he commaunded his disciples that they should tel no body that he was Jesus Christ.

From that time Jesus began to shew his disciples, that he must goe to Hierusalem, and suffer many things of the Ancients and Scribes and cheefe-Priestes, and be killed, and the third day rise againe. And Peter taking him unto him, began to rebuke him, saying, Lord, be it farre from thee, this shal not be unto thee. Who turning said to Peter, Go eafter mee, Satan, thou art a scandal unto me: because thou savourest not the things that are of God, but the things that are of men.

Then Jesus said to his disciples, If any man wil come after me, let him denie him self, and take up his crosse and follow me. For he that will save his life, shal lose it, and he that shal lose his life for me, shal finde it. For what doth it profite a man, if he gaine the whole world, and sustaine the damage of his soule? We come now to the version of 1611, which is still used in English churches in our own day, although a fresh revision was undertaken in 1870 and completed in 1885. The version of 1611 took its origin from the famous Hampton Court Conference at the beginning of the reign of James I. Among the objections which the Puritan party made to the English Church Service, one was that it introduced faulty renderings of the Holy Scriptures. Independently of this, the inferiority in popular esteem of the Bishops' Bible to the Genevan version was felt to be a misfortune, and, under the personal supervision of the king himself, a new revision was undertaken, in which the plan of dividing the task among separate translators, which had been imperfectly carried out in the case of the Bishops' Bible, was now very carefully organised. Six committees, consisting of from seven to ten members each, were formed, two of them sitting at Westminster, two at Oxford, and two at Cambridge. Definite rules were drawn up for their guidance, among them being that the Bishops' Bible was to be 'as little altered as the truth of the original will permit,' that the 'old ecclesiastical terms' were to be kept, that marginal notes were to be confined to references and fuller explanations of difficult words, and that 'these translations be used when they agree better with the text than the Bishops' Bible: Tindale's, Matthew's, Coverdale's, Whitchurch's, Geneva.' To have formally added the Rheims New Testament to these would doubtless have been impolitic; despite its omission, there seems no doubt that this also was used. The new version appeared in a splendid folio in 1611, with a long preface from the pen of Dr Miles Smith, afterwards Bishop of Gloucester, who admirably states the principle of the revision in the sentence, 'Truly (good Christian Reader) wee never thought from the beginning, that we should neede to make a new translation, nor yet to make of a bad one a good one (for then the imputation of Sixtus had bene true in some sort, that our people had bene fed with gall of Dragons in stead of wine, with whey in stead of milke :) but to make a good one better, or out of many good ones one principall good one, not justly to be excepted against, that hath bene our indeavour, that our marke.' With no less happiness he proceeds: 'The worke hath not bene hudled up in seventy-two days [an allusion to 'the posting haste' attributed by legend to the authors of the Septuagint], but hath cost the workemen, as light as it seemeth, the paines of twise seven times seventie-two dayes and more: matters of such weight and consequence are to bee speeded with matyritie; for in a businesse of moment a man feareth not the blame of convenient slacknesse. Neither did wee think [it] much to consult the Translators or Commentators, Chaldee, Hebrew, Syrian, Greeke or Latine, no nor the Spanish, French, Italian or Dutch; neither did we disdaine to revise that which we had done and to bring backe to the anvill that which we had hammered: but having and using as great helpes as were needfull, and fearing no reproch for slownesse, nor coveting praise for expedition, we have at the length, through the good hand of the Lord upon us, brought the worke to that passe that you see.'

With such loving care was the version prepared which even after three centuries seems as firmly rooted in the affections of the English people as at any previous time. To illustrate its relations to its predecessors we show in a table printed on the opposite page the first ten verses of 1 Timothy ii., as they appear respectively in Tyndale's revised edition of 1534, in Cromwell's Bible of 1539 (which represents Coverdale's revision of his edition of 1535), in the Geneva Bible of 1560, in the Bishops' Bible of 1572, and in the version of 1611. A similar table for the Old Testament would yield similar results, but this is the less necessary since in the 'Prayer Book version' of the Psalms, which is taken from the Great Bible (the standard translation at the period at which the English Prayer Book was compiled), Coverdale's work is familiar to most Englishmen precisely where it is most successful. To make comparison more easy, words in the earlier versions which have been changed in that of 1611 are printed in italics, but no attempt has been made to draw attention to transpositions or omissions. It will be noted that the Genevan was the first version to introduce the unhappy division into numbered verses.

The affection with which most members of the English-speaking race regard this version of 1611 (its popular title, 'The Authorised Version,' sprang rather from general consent to use it than from any enactment) may make us overrate the felicity of the minor alterations, which, despite the substantial adherence to Tyndale's text, may be found in every verse. But the felicity is a real thing, no mere fancy due only to loving familiarity and associations. The translators themselves must have had a similar reverence for the versions they had to rehandle; and in editing texts already some three-quarters of a century old they must have felt the full charm of slight archaisms. Of what this final version of the Bible (final, that is, as a monument of language) has done for our literature there is no need to speak. It has supplied a model of archaic prose which has been freely used both for translations from ancient works in many languages and also for religious writing of every kind, and familiarity with it has helped at once to enrich and to sober the style of almost every subsequent English writer, and to stay the degeneration of our daily speech.

A. W. P.

Hugh Latimer (1485?-1555) distinguished himself as a zealous, popular, and effective Reformer. The son of a yeoman at Thurcaston, near Leicester, he was educated at Cambridge, where he became a fellow of Clare and university preacher. In 1524, in proceeding B.D. he maintained a thesis against Melancthon, being 'as obstinate a papist as any in England,' he himself said. But, becoming acquainted with Thomas Bilney, a celebrated defender of the doctrines of Luther, he 'began to smell the Word of God, forsaking the school doctors and such fooleries,' and erelong was preaching doctrines strongly savouring of heresy. His preaching at Cambridge gave great offence to the Catholic clergy, and before Cardinal Wolsey as papal legate Bilney recanted and Latimer disowned Lutheranism. Bilney afterwards disclaimed his abjuration, and suffered martyrdom. Latimer was known to favour the king's divorce, and as one of the divines appointed to examine the lawfulness of Henry's marriage with Catharine, reported against its validity. This secured him royal favour, and he was made chaplain to Anne Boleyn and rector of West Kington in Wiltshire. In 1535 he was consecrated Bishop of Worcester; and at the opening of Convocation on 9th June 1536 he preached two powerful sermons urging the work of reformation. It is fair to remember that when John Forest, Queen Catharine's confessor, was roasted to death with peculiar barbarities as a Catholic recusant, it was Latimer who preached the sermon exhorting the victim, all in vain, to recant. When the Court became lukewarm in the work of reformation Latimer retired to his diocese, and laboured in 'teaching, preaching, exhorting, writing, correcting, and reforming, either as ability would serve or the time would bear.' Twice during Henry's reign he was sent to the Tower, in 1539 and 1546, on the former occasion resigning his bishopric. At Edward VI.'s accession he declined to resume his episcopal functions, but devoted himself to preaching till Edward's death (1553). In April 1554 he was examined at Oxford, and committed to Bocardo, the common jail there, where he lay for more than a twelvemonth, feeble and sickly. In September 1555, with Ridley and Cranmer, he was brought before a commission, and found guilty of heresy. On 16th October he was burned with Ridley opposite Balliol College, exclaiming to his companion, 'Be of good comfort, Master Ridley, and play the man: we shall this day light such a candle by God's grace in England as I trust shall never be put out.' Latimer was brave, honest, devoted, and energetic, homely and popular. He was conspicuous amongst the Reformers in substituting for incredible and often preposterous legendary tales of saints, martyrs, and miracles discourses on gospel truths and moral and religious duties. Humour and earnestness, a vein of familiarity and drollery, manly sense and devout evangelical fervour, distinguish his sermons and his life.

In the first of his Seven Sermons preached before Edward VI. in 1549 (and reprinted by Mr Arber), Latimer takes occasion to describe his parentage and upbringing, with a casual reference to his father's having fought for Henry VII. against the Cornish rebels at Blackheath in 1497. The laborious puns on 'double,' 'two,' and 'two too' will be noted:

My father was a Yoman, and had no landes of his owne, onely he had a farme of iii. or iiij. pound by yere at the vttermost, and here vpon he tilled so much as kepte halfe a dosen men. He had walke for a hundred shepe, and my mother mylked xxx. kyne. He was able and did find the king a harnesse, wyth hym selfe, and hys horsse, whyle he came to ye place that he should receyue the kynges wages. I can remembre yat I buckled hys harnes when he went vnto Blacke heeath felde. He kept me to schole, or elles I had not bene able to haue preached before the kinges maiestie nowe. He maryed my systers with v. pounce or xx. nobles a pece, so that he broughte them vp in godlines, and feare of God.

He kept hospitalitie for his pore neighbours. And sum almess he gaue to the poore, and all thys did he of the sayd farme. Wher he that now hath it, paieth xvi. pounce by yere or more, and is not able to do any thing for his Prynce, for himselfe, nor for his children, or geue a cup of drincke to the pore. Thus al the enhansinge and rearing goth to your priuate commoditie and wealth. So that where ye had a single to much, you haue that: and syns the same, ye haue enhansed the rente, and so haue encreased an other to much. So now ye haue doble to muche, whyche is to to much. But let the preacher preach til his tong be worne to the stompes, nothing is amended. We haue good statutes made for the common welth as touching comeners, enclosers, many metinges and sessions, but in the end of the matter their commeth nothing forth. Wel, well, thys is one thyng I wyll saye vnto you, from whens it commeth I knowe, euen from the deuill. I knowe his intent in it. For if ye bryng it to passe, that the yomanry be not able to put their sonnes to schole (as in dede vniuersities do wonderously decaye all redy) and that they be not able to mary their daughters to the auoidyng of whoredome, I say ye plucke saluation from the people and vtterly destroy the realme. For by yomans sonnes, the fayth of Christ is and hath bene mayntained chefully. Is this realme taught by rich mens sonnes? No, no, reade the Cronicles; ye shall fynde sumtime noble mennes sonnes, which haue bene vnpreaching byshoppes and prelates, but ye shall finde none of them learned men. But verilye, they that shoulde loke to the redresse of these thynges, be the greatest against them.

The value of archery as an exercise is thus enlarged on in the sixth sermon, and contrasted with bollyng (trolling the bowl, tipping), glossyng (glozing, flattering), and gullyng (cheating):

Menne of Englande in tymes paste, when they woulde exercyse theym selues (for we must nedes haue some recreation, oure bodyes canne not endure wythoute some exercyse) they were wonte to goo a brode in the fyeldes a shootyng, but nowe is turned in to glossyng, gullyng, and whoring wythin the house.

The arte of shutyng hath ben in tymes past much esteemed in this realme, it is a gift of God that he hath geuen vs to excell all other nacions wyth all. It hath bene goddes instrumente, whereby he hath gyuen vs manye victories agaynste oure enemyes. But nowe we haue taken vp horyng in tounes, in steede of shutyng in the fyeldes. A wonderous thyng, that so excellent a gift of God shoulde be so lytle esteemed. I desyer you my Lordes, euen as ye loue the honoure and glory of God, and entende to remoue his indignacion, let ther be sente fourth some proclamacion, some sharpe proclamacion to the iustices of peace, for they do not their dutye. Iustices now be no iustices, ther be manye good actes made for thys matter already. Charge them vpon their allegiaunce yat this singular benefit of God maye be practised, and that it be not turned into bollyng, glossyng and whoryng wythin the townes, for they be neglygent in executyng these lawes of shuting. In my tyme my poore father was as diligent to teach me to shote as to learne anye other thyng, and so I thynke other menne dyd theyr children. He taughte me how to drawe, how to laye my bodye in my bowe, and not to drawe wyth strength of armes as other nacions do, but with strength of the bodye. I had my bowes boughte me accordyng to my age and strength as I encreased in them, so my bowes were made bigger, and bigger, for men shal neuer shote well, excepte they be broughte vp in it. It is a goodly art, a holsome kynde of exercise, and much commended in phisike. Marcellius Ficinus in hys boke de triplici uita (it is a greate while sins I red hym now) but I remembre he commendeth this kinde of exercise, and sayth, that it wrestleth agaynst manye kyndes of diseases. In the reuerence of God, let it be continued.

In the third of these sermons he thus describes uncomplimentarily the Reformation in Germany:

Germany was visited xx. yeaes wyth goddes word, but they dyd not earnestlye embrace it, and in lyfe folowe it, but made a myngle mangle and a hotchpotch of it, I can not tell what, partely poperye, partelye true religion mingeled together. They say in my contrye, when they cal theyr hogges to the swyne trouge: Come to thy myngle mangle, come pyr, come pyr; euen so they made mingle mangle of it.

They coude clatter and prate of the Gospell, but when all commeth to al, they ioyned poperye so wyth it, that they marde all together, they scratched and scraped all the lyuynge of the churche, and vnder a couloure of relygion turned it to theyr owne proper gayne and lucre. God, seyng that they woulde not come vnto hys worde, now he visiteth them in the seconde tyme of hys visitacion with his wrathe. For the takyng awaye of Goddes word is a manyfest token of hys wrath. We haue now a fyrst visitacyon in Englande, let vs beware of the seconde. We haue the mynstracyon of hys worde, we are yet well, but the house is not cleane swepte yet.

And yet to haue pulpites in churches it is very well done to haue them, but they woulde be occupied, for it is a vayne thyng to haue them as they stand in many churches. I heard of a Byshop of Englande that wente on visitacion, and (as it was the custom) when the Byshop shoulde come and be runge into the toun, the greate belles clapper was fallen doune, the tyall [tie, fastening] was broken, so that the Byshop coude not be runge into the toun. Ther was a greate matter made of thys, and the chiefe of the paryshe were muche blamed for it in the visitacion. The Byshop was some what quicke wyth theym, and signified that he was muche offended. They made theyr aunsweres, and excused them selues, as wel as they coude; it was a chaunce, sayd they, that ye clapper brake and we coude not get it amended by and by, we must tarrye til we can haue done it. It shal be amended as shortely as maye be. Amonge the other there was one wyser then the rest, and he commes me to the Bishop. Why my Lord, sayth he, doth your lordship mak so great matter of the bell, that lacketh hys clapper? here is a bell, sayeth he, and poynted to the pulpit, that hath lacked a clapper thys xx. yeres. We haue a parson that fetteth [fetheth] out of thys benefice fitye poundes euerye yere, but we neuer se hym. I warrant you ye Byshop was an vnpreachyng prelate. He could fynde faute wyth the bel that wanted a clapper to ryng hym into the toun, but he could not fynd any fault wyth the parson that preached not at his benefice. Euer thys office of preachyng hath bene least regarded, it hath skante hadde the name of goddes seruyce. They must synge Salve, festa dies aboute the churche, that no man was the better for it, but to shewe theyr gaie cotes and garmentes. I came once my selfe to a place, ridyng on a iornay home warde from London, and I sente worde ouer nyghte into the toun that I would preach there in ye morninge because it was holy day, and me thought it was an holye dayes worcke. The church stode in my waye, and I toke my horse, and my companye, and went thither. I thoughte I shoulde haue founde a greate companye in the churche, and when I came there, the churche dore was faste locked.

I tarried there halfe an houer and more, at last the keye was founde, and one of the parishe commes to me and sayes; Syr, thys is a busye daye wyth vs, we can not heare you, it is Robyn Hoodes daye. The parishe are gone a brode to gather for Robyn Hoode, I praye you let [hinder] them not. I was fayne there to geue place to Robyn Hooode, I thought my rochet shoulde haue bene regarded, though I were not, but it woulde not serue, it was fayn to geue place to Robyn Hoodes men.

It is no laughyng matter, my friendes, it is a wepyng matter, a heauy matter, a heauy matter, vnder the pretence for gatherynge for Robyn Hooode, a traytoure and a thefe, to put out a preacher, to haue hys office lesse esteemed, to prefer Robyn Hode before the ministracion of Gods word, and al thys hath come of vnpreachyng prelates. Thys Realme hath ben il provided for, that it hath had suche corrupte iudgements in it, to prefer Robyn Hode to goddes worde. Yf the Byshoppes had bene preachers, there shoulde neuer haue been any suche thyng, but we haue a good hope of better. We haue had a good begynnynge, I besech God to continewe it.

In another he tells at length 'Master More's' story of Tenterden steeple (page 123). The famous description of the devil as the most diligent preacher in England is from the sermon on the Ploughers (1549—also reprinted by Mr Arber):

And now I would aske a straunge question. Who is the most diligent bishoppe and prelate in al England, that passeth al the reste in doinge his office, I can tel, for I knowe him, who it is, I knowe hym well. But now I thinke I se you lysting and hearkening, that I shoulde name him. There is one that passeth al the other, and is the most diligent prelate and preacher in al England. And wyl ye knowe who it is? I wyl tel you. It is the Deuyl. He is the moste dyligent preacher of al other, he is neuer out of his dioces, he is neuer from his cure, ye shal neuer fynde hym vnoccupied, he is euer in his parishe, he keepeth residence at al tymes, ye shal neuer fynde hym out of the waye, cal for him when you wyl, he is euer at home, the diligenteste preacher in all the Realme, he is euer at his ploughe, no lordynge nor loytringe can hynder hym, he is euer applyng his busynes, ye shal neuer fynde hym idle, I warraunte you. And his office is to hinder religion, to mayntayne supersticion, to set vp idolatrie, to teach al kynde of popetrie, he is readye as can be wished, for to sette forth his ploughe, to deuise as manye wayes as can be, to deface and obscure Godes glory. Where the Deuyl is residente and hath his plough goinge: there awaye with bokes and vp with candelles, awaye wyth Bibles and vp with beades, awaye wyth the lyghte of the Gospel, and vp with the lyghte of candells, yea at noone dayes. Where the Deuyl is residente, that he maye preuaile, vp wyth al superstition and idolatrie, sensing, peintynge of ymages, candles, palmes, asshe, holye water, and newe seruice of menes inuenting, as though man could inuent a better waye to honoure God wyth then God him selfe hath apointed. Downe with Christes crosse, vp with purgatory picke purse, vp wyth hym, the popish pourgatorie I mean. Awaye wyth clothinge the naked, the pore and impotent, vp wyth deckynge of ymages and gaye garnishinge of stockes and stones, vp wyth mannes traditions and his lawes, downe wyth Gods traditions and hys most holy worde, downe wyth the olde honoure dewe to God, and vp wyth the new gods honour, let al things be done in latine. There must be nothyng but latine, not as much as Memento homo quod cinis es, et in cinerem reuerteris. Remembre man that thou arte asshe, and into asshe thou shalte returne. Whiche be the wordes that the minister speaketh to the ignoraunte people, when he gyueth them asshe vpon asshe wensdaye, but it muste be spoken in latine. Goddes worde may in no wyse be translated into englyshe. Oh that our prelates woulde be as diligente to sowe the corne of good doctrine as Sathan is to sowe cockel and darnel. And this is the deuyls she ploughinge, the which worketh to haue thynges in latine, and letteth the fruteful edification. But here some man will saie to me, what, sir, are ye so priue of the deuils counsell that ye know al this to be true? Truli I know him to wel, and haue obeyed him a litle to much in condescentinge to some follies. And I knowe him as other men do, yea, that he is euer occupied and euer busie in folowinge his plough. I know bi saint Peter which saith of him: Sicut leo rugiens circuit querens quem deuoret. He goeth aboute lyke a roaringe lyon seekynge whome he maye deuoure. I woulde haue thys texte wel vewed and examined euerye worde of it. Circuit, he goeth aboute in euerye corner of his dioces. He goeth on visitacion dayle. He leaueh no place of hys cure vnvisited. He walketh round aboute from place to place and ceaseth not. Sicut leo, as a lyon, that is, strongly, boldly, and proudly, stratelye and fiercelye, with haute lookes, wyth hys proude countenaunces, wyth hys stately braggynge. Rugiens, roaringe, for he letteth not slippe any occasion to speake or to roare out when he seeth his tyme. Querens, he goeth about seekynge and not sleepynge, as oure bishoppes do, but he seketh diligently, he searcheth diligently al corners, wheras he may haue his pray, he roueth abrode in eueri place of his dioces, he standeth not styl, he is neuer at reste, but euer in hande wyth his plough that it may go forwarde. But there was neuer such a preacher in England as he is.

Archbishop Cranmer.—After the translations of the Bible, especially the Authorised Version, probably no one book has been so influential in establishing a standard of dignity and grace for the English tongue as the Book of Common Prayer. And both the first Prayer Book of Edward VI. and the second—which is substantially the Prayer Book still in use—were drawn up under the supervision of Thomas Cranmer, and doubtless owe much of their beauty and dignity of devotional utterance to his inspiration and guidance. The history of this great successor of Becket—sometimes so much of an opportunist as to draw on him the charge of being a 'time-server'—is so well known that here we need do no more than recapitulate the chief dates of his life. Born in Nottinghamshire in 1489, and educated at Jesus College, Cambridge, he in 1529 pleased Henry VIII. by his suggestion that the question of a divorce should be referred to the universities of Christendom. Successively royal chaplain and archdeacon of Taunton, he was consecrated Warham's successor at Canterbury in 1533, and played a very conspicuous part in Church and State—especially in the great revolution known as the Reformation under Henry VIII. and Edward VI.—until Mary's accession; he was convicted of treason and of heresy; recanted his heresy, and then recanted his recantation; and died calmly at the stake in 1556.

Prejudices of the most opposite kinds have too long prevented correct views of his character; in a very difficult time he was no doubt somewhat defective in strength of character, but he was unquestionably one of those who did most to mould the polity of the Church of England. He was without dispute the most learned English theologian of his time. Latimer made no pretence to scholarship or learning; Gardiner had a knack of skilfully using theological commonplaces in controversy, but little more; his younger contemporary, Bishop Jewel, was also mainly a controversialist; and Bishop Ridley declared of Cranmer, 'He passeth me no less than the learned master his young scholar.' Over forty works by him are known. He translated many devotional forms into noble English, and, as we have seen, the Prayer Book owes much to his command of the mother-tongue. He certainly wrote some hymns, and there is even ground for believing that the version of 'Veni Creator Spiritus' in the ordination service is from his own pen. The preface to the first Prayer Book was entirely his, and so was the vigorous preface to the reprints (1540-41) of the Great Bible, of which the following—with its interesting reference to the 'Saxon' and other old translations—is the first part:

For two sondrie sortes of people, it semeth moche necessary that somethynge be said in the entrie of thys booke, by the waye of a preface or prologue; wherby hereafter it maye be both the better accepted of them which hitherto coulde not well beare it, and also the better vsed of them which hertofore haue mysused it. For truly some there are that be to slowe, and nede the spurre: some other seme to quicke, and nede more of the brydell: some loose theyr game by shorte shotynge, some by ouer-shotynge: some walke to moche on the left hande, some to moche on the ryght. In the former sorte be all they that refuse to reade, or to heare redde the scripture in theyr vulgar tonges; moche worse they that also let or discourage the other from the readyng or hearinge therof. In the latter sorte be they, whiche by their inordinate readyng, undiscreepe speakynge, contentious disputynge, or otherwyse, by their licencious lyvynge, slaunder and hynder the worde of God moost of al other, wherof they wolde seme to be greatest furtherers. These two sortes, albeit they be moost farre unlyke the one to the other, yet they both deserue in effecte lyke reproche. Neyther can I well tell whyther of them I maye iudge the more offender, hym that doth obstinately refuse so godlye and goodly knowledge, or hym that so ungodly and so ungodly doth abuse the same.

And as touchynge the former, I wolde marvaile moche that any man sholde be so madd as to refuse in darkenes lyght; in honger, foode; in colde, fyer: for the worde of God is lyght; lucerna pedibus meis uerbum tuum: Foode; non in solo pane uiuit homo, sed in omni uerbo Dei: Fyer; ignem ueni mittere in terram, et quid uolo, nisi ut ardeat? I wolde marvaile (I saye) at thys, saue that I consyder how moche custome and vsage maye do. So that yf there were a people, as some wryte De Cimmeriis, which neuer sawe the Sunne by reason that they be situated farre towarde the north pole, and be enclosed and ouershadowed with hygh mountaynes; it is credyble and lyke ynough that yf, by the power and wyll of God, the mountaynes sholde synke downe and gyve place, that the lyght of the Sunne myght haue enteraunce to them, at the fyrst some of them wolde be offended therwyth. And the olde prouerbe affermeth, that after tyllage of corne was fyrst founde, many delyted more to fede of maste and acornes, wherwyth they haue bene accustomed, than to eate breed made of good corne. Soche is the nature of custome, that it causeth vs to beare all thynges well and easilye, wherwyth we haue bene accustomed, and to be offended with all thynges thervnto contrary. And therefore I can well thynte them worthy pardon, whych at the comynge abroad of scripture doubted and drewe backe. But soch as wyll persyste styl in theyr wylfulness, I muste nedes iudge not onely foolyshe, frowarde, and obstinate, but also peusyshe, peruerse, and indurate.

And yet, yf the matter sholde be tryed by custome, we myght also allege custome for the readyng of the scripture in the vulgare tonge, and prescrysbe the more auncient custome. For it is not moch aboute one hundreth yere ago, sens scripture hath not bene accustomed to be redde in the vulgar tonge within this realme; and many hundred yeres before that it was translated and rede in the Saxones tonge, whych at that tyme was oure mothers tonge. Wherof there remayneth yet diuers copenes founde lately in olde abbeis, of soch antique maners of wrytynge and speaking, that fewe men now ben able to reade and vnderstande them. And when this language waxed olde and out of comen vsage, because folke shulde not lacke the frute of reading, it was agayne translated in the newer language. Wherof yet also many copies remayne and be dayly founde.

But nowe to let passe custome, and to weye, as wyse men euer shulde, the thyng in hys awne nature: let vs here discusse, What it auayleth scripture to be had and redde of the laye and vulgare people. And to this question I entende here to saye nothyng but that was spoken and wrytten by the noble doctour and most morall diuine saynt John Chrisostome, in hys thyrd sermon De Lazaro: albeit I wilbe somethynge shorter, and gether the matter into fewer wordes and lesse rowme then he doth there, because I wolde not be tedious.

John Leland, 'father of English antiquaries,' was born in London about 1506, and educated at St Paul's School, Cambridge, and Oxford; he also made some stay in Paris. He was one of the earliest Greek scholars in England; was acquainted with French, Italian, and Spanish; and studied (as very few then did) Welsh and Anglo-Saxon. Henry VIII. made him one of his chaplains, and bestowed several benefices upon him; and in 1533 made him 'king's antiquary,' with a commission to search for documents and antiquities in all cathedrals, abbeys, and colleges, or wherever records and antiquities were deposited. With this commission he began a tour which lasted six (if not more) years, and amassed a vast store of information designed to be worked up into the 'Historie and Antiquities of the Nation.' He was terribly distressed by the shocking destruction of priceless documents at the dissolution of monasteries, and earnestly besought Cromwell to authorise him to collect the MSS. for the king's library; and he did thus secure a few from being utterly lost. He laboured with prodigious industry, but in vain, to digest his vast collection of material, into which Stow and Camden and William Burton and Dugdale burrowed. The last five years of his life were darkened by insanity; he died in 1552. He published in his lifetime some Latin poems and a few English and Latin tracts; but his great work, The Itinerary, though current in several MS. copies, was first printed in 1710-12 by Thomas Hearne (new ed. by L. T. Smith, 5 vols. 1906-10). Many of his papers are now in the Bodleian Library and British Museum. Hall edited the Commentarii de Scriptoribus Britannicis in 1709; and Hearne published six volumes of the Collectanea in 1715. Derwentwater, the Roman Wall, and Tintagel are described in these extracts from the Itinerary; the fourth records one of many such traditions:

On the Est Side of the Yfle, where as the Water of Darguent risith, is a lytle poore Market Town cawld Kefwike, and yt is a Myle fro S. Herebertes Isle that Bede speketh of. Divers Springes cummeth owt of Borodale, and so make a great Lowgh that we cawle a Poole; and ther yn be iii. Isles. Yn the one ys the Hedd Places of M. Radclyf. an other is cawld S. Hereberts Isle, wher is a Chapel. the iii. ys Vycar Isle, ful of trees lyke a Wyldernes.

Bytwyxt Thyrrwal and North Tyne yn the waft Ground stondeth yet notable Peaces of the Wall, the which was made ex lapide quadrato, as yt there appereth yet. Looke wher as the Grownd ys best enhabited thorowg the Walle, so there yt left appereth by reafon of Buildinges made of the Stones of the Waule. The Walle on the farther side toward the Pictes was strongly dichyd. Beside the Stone Wall, ther appere yet yn very many Places vestigia muri cespititii, that was an Arrow Shot a this side the Stone Wal; but that it was thoroughly made as the Stone wal was yt doth not wel appere there.

Fro Bolnes to Burgh about a iii. Myles. fro thens yt goeth within half a Myle of Cairluel, and leffe on the North side, and crosseth over Edon a iii. Quarters of a Myle benethe Cairluel, and so to Terreby a litel Villag a Myle fro Cairluel. then thorowgh the barony of Linftok; and thorowgh Gillesland on the North side of the River of Arding a Quarter of a Myle of the Abbay of Lenarcoft, and then a iii. Myles above Lenarcoft yt crosseth over Arding, then over the litte Brooke of Polt roffe, the which devideth Gillesland in Cumberland from Sowth Tyndale yn Northumbreland. then to a Castel cawld Thirlewal, stondyng on the same. thems directly Eft thorowgh Sowth Tyndale not far fro the great Ruines of the Castel of Cairvorein, the which be nere Thyrrlewal, and so over North Tyne, then directly Est thorowgh the Hedd of Northumbreland.

Wyth yn iii. Myles of the sayde Camylford apon the North Clif ys Tintagel, the which Castel had be lykehod iii. Wardes, wherof ii. be woren away with gulfyng yn of the Se. yn so much that yt hathe made ther almost an Isle, and no way ys to enter ynto hyt now but by long Elme Trees layde for a Bryge. So that now withoute the Isle renneth alonly a Gate Howfe, a Walle, and a fals Braye dyged and walled. In the Isle remayne old Walles, and yn the Est Part of the fame, the Grownd beyng lower, remayneth a Walle embateled, and Men alyve saw ther yn a Postern Dore of Yren. Ther is yn the Isle a prety Chapel with a Tumbe on the left Syde. Ther ys also yn the Isle a Welle, and ny by the fame ys a Place hewen owt of the Stony Grownd to the Length and Brede of a Man. Also ther remayneth yn the Isle a Grownd quadrant walled as yt were a Garden Plot. And by this Walle appere the Ruines of a Vault. The Grownd of this Isle now nuryshyth Shepe and Conys.

Maftar Paynell told me that he saw at Brakley in the Parts by Bukyngham manifest Tokens that it had bene a Wallyd Toun, and Tokens of the Gates and Towres in the Walles by the halfe Cirkles of the Foundations of them. (I fowght diligently, and could find no Tokens of Wales or Diches.) And that there hathe bene a Castell, the Dyke and Hills whereof do yet appere. (I saw the Castle Plott.) And that there hathe bene dyvars Churches in it. And that ther was of late a Place of Croffyd Friers, and that one Nevill a great Gentilman there was buried. And that one Neville apon a tyme kylyd in the Churche at Brakeley a Priest and buried hym in his sacrid Vestiments: and that this Nevill toke there an othar Prift and buried hym quike.

George Cavendish was gentleman-usher to Cardinal Wolsey, was strongly attached to him, and after the prelate's fall continued to serve him faithfully till his death, when he returned to Suffolk. He died about 1562, leaving in manuscript a Life of Cardinal Wolsey, long attributed to his brother, Sir William, one of Henry VIII.'s privy councillors. This first separate biography in the English tongue, written about 1557 by a devout Catholic full of regrets for the past, could not well be published in Elizabeth's days, but circulated in MS. copies, about a dozen of which are still extant. It was published first for party purposes in 1641, in a mutilated form; like this, all the other editions down to 1815 were very imperfect. Mr Singer believed himself to have been fortunate enough to identify the author's own autograph MS., and from it he printed his very careful edition, with introduction, notes, and appendices. But unluckily he not merely 'modernised' the spelling, but sought occasionally to improve the style, even altering the author's words; so that the Kelmscott edition, printed in 1893 from a transcript of the autograph in the British Museum, was the first to give us the book as the author left it. Our extracts are from the Kelmscott edition. Of the work Mr Singer said : ' It is a work without pretension, but full of natural eloquence, devoid of the formality of a set rhetorical composition, unspoiled by the affectation of that classical manner in which all biography and history of old time was prescribed to be written, and which often divests such records of the attraction to be found in the conversational style of Cavendish. . . . Our great poet has literally followed him in several passages of his King Henry VIII., merely putting his language into verse. Add to this the historical importance of the work, as the only sure and authentic source of information upon many of the most interesting events of that reign, and from which all historians have largely drawn (through the secondary medium of Holinshed and Stow, and adopted Cavendish's narrative), and its intrinsic value need not be more fully expressed.' The following is an account of a 'tryhumphant bankett' given by Wolsey to the king and court :

And whan it pleased the kyng's majestie for his recreation to repayer unto the Cardynall's howsse, as he dyd dyvers tymes in the yere, at whiche tyme there wanted no preparacions or goodly furnytur, with vyaunds of the fynest sort that myght be provided for mony or frendshype ; such pleasyrs ware then devysed for the kyng's comfort & consolacion, as myght be invented or by man's wytt imagyned. The banketts ware set forthe with masks and mumreys in so gorgeous a sort and costly maner, that it was an hevyn to behold. Ther wanted no dames or damselles, meate or apte to daunce with the maskers, or to garnysshe the place for the tyme with other goodly disports. Than was ther all kynd of musyke and armonye set forthe with excellent voyces bothe of men and childerne. I have seen the kyng sodeynly come in thether in a maske with a dosyn of other maskers, all in garments lyke shepherds, made of fynne cloth of gold, and fyne crymosyn satten paned, and cappes of the same, with visors of good proporcion of visonamy ; ther heares and beards other of fynne gold wyer, or ells of sylver, and some beyng of blake sylke ; having xvi. torches berers, besids ther dromes, and other persons attendyng upon them with visors, & clothed all in satten of the same colours. And at his comyng, & byfore he came into the hall, ye shall understand that he came by water to the watergate, without any noyse, where, ayenst his coming, was layed charged many chambers : at whos londing they were all shot of, whiche made such a romble in the ayer that it was lyke thonder. It made all the noble men, ladyes, and gentilwomen to muse what it shold mean comyng so sodenly, they sitting quyetyly at a solemn bankett ; under this sort : first ye shall perceyve that the tables ware sett in the chamber of presence, bankettwyse covered ; my Lord Cardynall syttyng under the clothe of estat, and there havyng all his servyce all alone ; and than was there sett a lady and a noble man, or gentelman and a gentilwoman thorougheowt all the tables in the chamber on the oon side, which was made and joyned as it ware but oon table. All which order and device was don and devysed by the Lord Sands the Lord Chamberlayne, and also by Syr Henry Guyleford, Contrroller with the kyng. Than immediatly after this great shott of gones, the Cardynall desired the seyd Lord Chamberlayne and Contrroller to loke what this soden shot shold mean, as though he knewe nothyng of the matter. They theruppon loking owt of the wyndowe into Temes, retorned agayn, and showed hyme that it semed to them that there shold be some noble men and strayngers arrayved at his brygge, as ambassitors frome some forrayn prynce. With that, quoth the Cardynall, I shall desier yow because ye can speke frenche to take the paynnes to go down in to the hall to encounter and to receyve them according to ther estats and to conduct them to thys chamber, where they shall se us & all these noble personages syttyng merely at our bankett, desyryng them to sitt down with us and to take part of our fare & pastyme. They went incontynent down into the hall, where they receyved them with xx. newe torches, and conveyed them uppe in to the chamber, with suche a number of dromes and fyves as I have seldome seen together at oon tyme in any maske.

At ther arrayvall in to the chamber ii. and ii. together, they went directly byfore the Cardynall where he satt, salutyng hyme very reverently ; to whome the Lord Chamberlayn for them sayd, Syr, forasmyche as they be strayngers and can speke no Englysshe, they have desired me to declare unto your grace thus. They havyng understanding of thys your tryhumphant bankett, where was assembled suche number of excellent fayer dames, cowlde do no lesse under the supportacion of your good grace, but to repayer hether to view as were ther incomperable beawtie, or for to accompany them at mume chaunce, and than after to daunce with them and so to have of thaym acquayntaunce. And, Syr, they furthermore requyer of your grace's lycence to accomplesshe the cause of ther repayer. To whome the Cardynall answered, that he was very well contentyd they shold do so. Than the maskars went first & saluted all the dames as they satt, and than retorned to the most worthiest, and there opyned a cuppe full of gold, with crownes and other peces of coyne, to whome they sett dyvers pecys to cast at. Thus in this maner perusyng all the ladys and gentylwomen, and to some they lost and of some they won. And thus don, they retorned unto the Cardynall with great reverence, poryng down all the crownes in the cuppe, which was about ii. c. crownes. At all ! quoth the Cardynall, and so cast the dyse and wane them all at a cast, where at was great joy made. Than quod the Cardynall to my Lord Chamberlayne, I pray you, quod he, shew them that it semys me howe there shold be among theme some noble man, whome I suppose to be myche more worthy of honor to sitt & occupie this rome and place than I ; to whome I wold most gladly, yf I knewe hyme, surrender my place accordyng to my dewtie. Than spake my Lord Chamberlayne unto them in Frenche, declaryng my Lord Cardynall's mind ; and they roundyng hyme agayn in the eare, my Lord Chamberlayne said to my Lord Cardynall, Sir, they confesse, quod he, that among them there is suche a noble personage, among whome if your grace can appoynt hyme frome the other, he is contented to discloos hyme self, and to accepte your place most worthely. With that the Cardynall, takyng a good advysement among them, at the last, quod he, Me semys the gentelman with the blake beard shold be evyn he. And with that he arose out of hys chayer, and offered the same to the gentelman in the blake beard, with his cappe in his hand.

The person to whome he offered than his chayer was Syr Edward Neville, a comly knyght of a goodly personage, that myche more resembled the kyng's person in that maske than any other. The kyng, heryng and perceyvyng the Cardynall so disseyved in his estimacyon and choys, cold not forbear lawyng; but plucked down his visare, and Mayster Nevyl's, and dasht owt with suche a pleasaunt countenance and chere that all noble estats there assembled, seying the kyng to be there among them, rejoyced very myche. The Cardynall eftsones desired his highnes to take the place of estate, to whome the kyng answered, that he would goo first and shyfte his apparell; and so departed and went strait in to my lord's bed chamber, where was a great fier made and prepared for hyme, and there newe apparelled hyme with ryche and pryncely garments. And in the tyme of the kyng's absence, the disshes of the bankett were clean taken up, and the tables spred agayn with newe and swett perfumed clothes; every man syttyng untill the kyng and his maskers came in among theme agayn, every man beyng newly apparelled. Than the kyng toke his seate under the clothe of estate, commaundyng no man to remove, but sit still as they dyd byfore. Then in came a new bankett byfore the kyng's majestie, and to all the rest thorough the tables, wherin I suppose was served ii. c. disshes or above, of wondreouse costly meats and delyces, subtilly devysed. Thus passed they forthe the hole night with banketing, dauncing, and other tryumphant devyses, to the great comfort of the kyng, and pleasaunt regard of the nobylitie there assembled.

The story of Wolsey's death (1530) is memorable for the dramatic use made of it by Shakespeare in Henry VIII.—for doubtless Shakespeare had read Cavendish's MS.:

Than was he in confession the space of an hower. And whan he had endyd his confession, Mayster Kyngston bade hyme good morowe, for it was about vii. of the clocke in the mornynge, and asked hyme how he did. Sir, quod he, I tary but the wyll and pleasyr of God, to render unto hyme my symple sowlle in to his dyvyn hands. Not yet so, sir, quod Mayster Kyngston, with the grace of God, you shall lyve and do very well, if ye wyll be of good chere. Mayster Kyngston, my desease is suche that I cannot lyve; for I have had some experience in my desease and thus it is. . . . Nay, sir, in good fayth, quod Mayster Kyngston, ye be in such dolor and pensyvenes doughtyng that thyng that in dede ye nede not to fear, whiche makyth you myche wors than ye shold be. Well, well, Mayster Kyngston, quod he, I se the matter ayenst me, how it is framed; but if I had served God as dyligently as I have don the kyng, he wold not have gevyng me over in my gray heares. Howbeit thys is the just reward that I must receyve for my worldly dyligence and paynnes that I have had to do hyme servyce; not regarding my godly dewtie. Wherefore I pray you, with all my hart, to have me most humbly commendyd unto his royall majestie, bescechyng hyme in my behalf to call to his most gracious remembrance all matters procedyng between hyme and me frome the begynnyng of the world unto thys day, and the progresse of the same; and most cheafely in the waytie matter yet dependyng (meaning the matter newly begon bytween hyme and good Queen Katheryn) than shall his concyence declare whether I have offended hyme or no. He is suer a prynce of royall coorage, and hathe a pryncely hart; and rather than he wyll owther mysse or want any parte of his wyll or appetite he wyll put the losse of the oon halfe of his realme in daynger; for I assure you I have often kneled byfore hyme in his pryve chamber on my knes the space of an hower or too to perswade hyme frome hys wyll and appetite, but I cowlde never bryng to passe to diswade hyme ther froo. Therefore, Mayster Kyngston, if it chaunce hereafter you to be oon of hys pryve counsell, as for your wysdome and other qualites ye be mete so to be; I warne you to be well advysed and assured what matter ye put in his hed, for ye shall never putt it owt agayn.

And sey, furthermore, that I requyer his grace in godd's name, that he have a vigilant eye to depresse this newe pernicious sekte of the Lutarynnauncers that it do not encrease within hys domynyons thorough hys necligence, in suche a sort that he shal be fayn at lengthe to put harnoys uppon hyse bake to subdewe them: as the Kyng of Beame did, who had good game to se his rewde commyns than enfectod with Wycklyffe's heresies, to spoyell and murder the spirituall men and religious persons of his realme; the whiche fled to the kyng and his nobles for socour ayenst ther frantye rage. . . . Mayster Kyngston, farewell. I can no moore; but whyse all thyngs to have good successe. My tyme drawyth on fast. I may not tary with you. And forget not, I pray you, what I have seyde and charged you withall; for whan I ame deade, ye shall peradventure remember my words better. And evyn with these words he began to drawe his speche at lengthe, and his tong to fayle, his eyes beyng sett in his hed, whos sight faylled hyme. Then we began to put hyme in remembrance of Christ's passion, and sent for the abbott of the place to annele hyme; who came with all spede and mynestred unto hyme all the servyce to the same belongyng; and caused also the gard to stand by, bothe to here hyme talk byfore his deathe, & also to be wytnes of the same; and incontynent the clocke strake viii., at whiche tyme he gave uppe the gost, and thus departed he this present lyfe. And callyng to our remembrance his words the day byfore, howe he sayd that at viii. of the cloke we shold lose our mayster, oon of us loking uppon an other, supposyng that he profecied of hys departure.

Here is thend and fall of pryde and arrogauncye of suche men, exalted by fortune to honour and high dygnytes; for I assure you, in hys tyme of auctorytie and glory, he was the haullest man in all his procedyngs that then lyved, havyng more respect to the worldly honour of hys person than he had to his spirituall profession; wherin shold be all meknes, humylitie & charitie, the processe wherof I leave to theme that be learned and seen in the dyvyn lawes.

Singer's edition (1815) was republished by Professor Morley in his 'Universal Library' (1886).

Sir John Cheke (1514-1557) was professor of Greek at Cambridge, where he was born, and having embraced the Reformed faith, was one of the preceptors of the prince afterwards Edward VI.

He is chiefly distinguished for his exertions in promoting the study of the Greek language and literature in England. Having elaborated and introduced a new mode of pronouncing Greek (the few students of Greek in England having heretofore employed the Continental pronunciation, which Cheke thought wrong), he was violently assailed by Bishop Gardiner, then chancellor of the university; but, notwithstanding the fulminations against it, the system of Cheke prevailed, being, in fact, very much like that still in use in England. At Mary's accession he was stripped of everything and fled, but was treacherously seized in Belgium, brought back, and thrown into the Tower, where fear of the stake made him abjure Protestantism. At his death, believed to be occasioned by remorse for having recanted, he left several works in manuscript, amongst which was a translation of Matthew's Gospel in English, simplified by adhering mainly to words derived from Anglo-Saxon roots, and spelt on a phonetic plan. He edited homilies of Chrysostom, various Latin translations from Greek, Latin controversial works on theology, disquisitions on Greek pronunciation, and a Life of Bucer. His most notable work in English is a pamphlet, published in 1549, under the title of The Hurt of Sedition, how Grievous it is to a Commonwealth, designed to admonish the people who had risen under Ket the tanner. Having first dealt with 'religious Rebelles,' he proceeds then to address 'the other rable of Norfolke Rebelles':

Ye pretend a common welth. How amend ye it by killing of Gentlemen, by spoyling of Gentlemen, by imprisoning of Gentlemen? A maruelous tanned common welth. Why should ye thus hate them, for their riches or for their rule? Rule they never tooke so much in hand as ye do now. They neuer resisted the King, neuer withstood his counsaile, be faithfull at this day, when ye be faithlesse not only to the King, whose subjectes ye be, but also to your Lords, whose tenaunts ye be. Is this your true duty—in some of homage, in most of fealtie, in all of allegiance—to leaue your duties, go backe from your promises, fall from your faith, and, contrarye to lawe and truth, to make vnlawfull assemblies, vngodly companies, wicked and detestable campes, to disobey your betters and to obey your tanners, to chaunge your obedience from a King to a Ket, to submit your selues to Traytours, and breake your sayth to your true Kinge and Lordes?

If riches offende you, bicause ye woulde have the lyke, then thinke that to bee no common welth, but enuye to the common welth. Enuye it is to appayre [impair] another mans estate, without the amendement of your owne, and to have no Gentlemen, bicause ye be none your selues, is to bringe downe an estate, and to mend none. Would ye have all alike riche? That is the overthrowe of all labour and vtter decay of worke in this realme. For who will labour more, if, when he hath gotten more, the ydle shall by lust, without right, take what him list from him, under pretence of equalitie with him? This is the bringing in of ydleness, which destroyeth the common welth, and not the amendement of labour, that maintaineth the common welth. If there shoulde be such equalitie, then ye take all hope away from yours, to come to any better estate than you now leaue them. And as many meane mens children come honestly vp, and are great succour to all their stocke, so shoulde none be hereafter holpen by you. But because ye seeke equalitie, whereby all cannot be riche, ye would that belike, whereby euery man shuld be pore. And thinke beside, that riches and inheritance be gods prouidence, and giuen to whom of his wisdom he thinketh good.

The following letter from Cheke to his friend Peter Osborne, Remembrancer of the Exchequer in London, was printed from the autograph by the Camden Society (Letters of Eminent Literary Men, 1843), and brings us very near the sixteenth century bookman, of whom there is a Life by Strype (best ed. 1821):

I fele the caulme of quietnes, being tost afore with stormes, and have felt of ambitions bitter gal, poisoned with hope of hap. And therefore I can be meri on the bankes side without dangring myself on the sea. Yor sight is ful of gai things abrode, which I desire not as things sufficientli known and valedw. O what pleasure is it to lacke pleasures, and how honorable is it to fli from honors throws. Among other lacks I lack painted bucrum to lai betweyne bokes and bordes in mi studi, which I now have trimd. I have nede of xxx yardes. Chuse you the color. I prai yow bi me a reme of paper at London. Fare ye wel. With commendacons to yr Mother, Mr Lane and his wife, Mr and Mrs Saxon, with other. From Cambridge the xxx of Mai 1549.

Yrs known,

JOAN CHEKE.

To his loving Frende, Mr Peter Osborne.

Sir Thomas Wilson, born at Strubby in Lincolnshire about 1525, was a fellow of King's College, Cambridge, and tutor to two little Dukes of Suffolk who died on the same day. In exile during Mary's reign, he was tortured by the Inquisition at Rome; but under Elizabeth held various high employments, sat on commissions, was repeatedly ambassador to Portugal, Scotland, and the Netherlands, and after being Secretary of State with Walsingham, was, though a layman, made Dean of Durham. In 1551 he published The Rule of Reason, conteinyng the Arte of Logique; in 1553 The Arte of Rhetorique; and in 1572 A Discourse uppon Usurye. He died in 1581. His Rhetorique is partly Quintilian and the schoolmen, partly oracyons, epistles, and other model compositions by himself. His own style is rather clear and vigorous than graceful or sonorous. He strongly advocates simplicity of language, condemning those who 'powdered their talk with over-seas language.' Amongst the false styles he censures is alliteration, of which he gives the following caricatured example: 'Pitiful poverty prayeth for a penny, but puffed presumption passeth not a point, pampering his paunch with pestilent pleasure, procuring his passport to post it to hell-pit, there to be punished with pains perpetual.' The following is a passage from the Rhetorique (ed. of 1585):

Among other lessons this should first be learned, that wee neuer affect any straunge ynkehorne termes, but to speake as is commonly receiued ; neither seeking to be ouer fine, nor yet liuing ouer careless ; using our speeche as most men doe and ordering our wittes as ye fewest haue done. Some seeke so far for outlandish English, that they forget altogether their mothers language. And I dare sweare this, if some of their mothers were alive, thei were not able to tell what they say, and yet these fine English clerkes will say they speak in their mother tongue, if a man should charge them for counterfeiting the Kings English. Some farre journeyed gentlemen, at their returne home, like as they loue to go in forayne apparell, so thei wil powder their talke with ouer-sea language. He that commeth lately out of Fraunce will talke French-English, and neuer blush at the matter. And other chops in with English Italianated, and applieth the Italian phrase to our English speaking ; the which is as if an Oratour that professeth to vtter his minde in plaine Latine would needes speake poetrie, and farre fetched colours of straunge antiquitie. The Lawyer will store his stomacke with the prating of Pedlers. The Auditor in making his accompt and reckening, cometh in with sise sould and cater denere [six soulds or sols or sous ; quatre deniers] for 6s. and 4d. The fine Courtier will talke nothing but Chaucer. The mystical wiseman, and Poeticall Clerks, will speake nothing but quaint prouerbes and blinde allegories ; delighting much in their owne darkenesse especially when none can tell what they doe say. The vnlearned or foolish phantastical, that smelles but of learning (such fellows as haue seen learned men in their daies), will so Latin their tongues, that the simple can not but wonder at their talke and thinke surely they speake by some reuelation. I know them that thinke Rhetorique to stande wholie upon darke wordes ; and hee that can cathe an ynke horne terme by the taile him they cought to be a fine Englishman and a good Rhetorician.

The following are illustrative anecdotes from the same work, for which modern parallels might be found :

An English Phisition ryding by the way : and seeing a great companie of men gathered together, sent his man to know what the matter was, wherevpon his man vnderstanding that one there was appointed to suffer for killing a man : came riding backe in al poste haste, and cried to his maister long before he came at him : get you hence, sir ; get you hence for Gods loue. What meanest thou (quoth his maister). Mary (quoth the seruant) yonder man shall dye for killing of one man, and you, I dare saie, haue killed a hundred men in your daies : get you hence therefore for Gods loue if you loue your self. . . .

A man may by hearing a loud lye pretelie mocke the lye by reporting a greater lye. When one being of a lowe degree and his father of meane wealth had vaunted much of the good house that his father kept : of two Beefes spent weekly and half a score tunne of wine dronke in a yere, another good fellowe hearing him lye so shamefully : indeede (quoth he) Beefe is so plentifull at my maister your fathers house that an Oxe in one day is nothing, and as for Wine, Beggars that come to the doore are serued by whole gallands. And as I remember your father hath a spring of Wine in the middest of his Court, God continue his good house keeping.

Roger Ascham (1515-1568) was not only a typical literary Englishman, but a notable representative of the New Learning as it took root in England. Born at Kirby Wiske, near Thirsk in Yorkshire, he studied at St John's Colleege, Cambridge, where, in spite of his avowed leaning to the Reformed doctrines, he obtained a fellowship. His reputation as a classical scholar soon brought him numerous pupils ; and about 1538 he was appointed Greek reader at St John's. His leisure hours were devoted to music, penmanship (in which he excelled), and archery. In defence of the latter art, and to show how well he could handle Platonic dialogue, he published, in 1545, Toxophilus, which in style ranks among English classics. For this treatise, which was dedicated to Henry VIII., he received a pension of £10 ; in 1546 he was appointed university orator. He was tutor at Cheshunt to the Lady Elizabeth (1548-50), and as secretary to Sir Richard Morysin or Morison, ambassador to Charles V., spent three years (1550-53) on the Continent, at Augsburg chiefly, but with occasional visits to Vienna, the Tyrol, and Carinthia. On his return he became Latin secretary to Queen Mary. His caution seems to have preserved him from suffering in any way for his Protestantism ; and after Mary's death Elizabeth retained him at court as secretary and tutor, which offices he held till his death, 30th December 1568. He thought highly of cock-fighting as a pastime for gentlemen ; and though he inveighed against gambling, Camden says he was too fond of cards and dice. In his last illness he suffered much from sleeplessness, and fell on the strange device of having 'a cradle made for himself in which after the manner of infants he was rocked to and fro.' Unluckily we are not told how the remedy answered. The Scholemaster, his principal work, discusses the value of classical education, educational problems, and things in general. It was not published till 1570. His Report of Germany is a very interesting contemporary account of European haute politique at the critical time of the struggle between Charles V. and Maurice of Saxony. His two hundred and ninety-five letters, Latin and English, are partly official and partly personal, and range over a wide variety of subjects ; and in virtue of one of them quoted below, he may rank as one of the very earliest of 'picturesque tourists' on the Rhine. Ascham (who sometimes spelt his name Askham or Ascami) is an entertaining writer, but has not the charm of Sir Thomas More. His enthusiasm for Greek and letters was sincere, and his English style combines a sort of strained simplicity, which does not disdain alliteration's artful aid, with a pseudo-classical balancing of phrases.

In writing Toxophilus, Ascham meant not mereiy to commend the pastime of archery, but to show his countrymen that it was possible, though unusual, to write English as well as scholars were wont to write Latin :

And though to haue written it in an other tonge had bene bothe more profitable for my study, and also more honest for my name, yet I can thinke my labour wel bestowed, yf with a little hynderaunce of my profyt and same, maye come any fourtheraunce, to the pleasure or oommoditie of the gentlemen and yeomen of Englande, for whose sake I tooke this matter in hande. And as for ye Latin or greke tonge, euery thing is so excellently done in them, that none can do better: In the Englysh tonge contrary, euery thinge in a maner so meanly, bothe for the matter and handelynge, that no man can do worse. For therein the least learned for the moste parte, haue ben alwayes moost redye to wryte. And they whiche had least hope in latin, haue bene moste bould in englyshe: when surelye euery man that is moste ready to taulke, is not moost able to wryte.

The value of pastimes for students is thus set forth by Toxophilus to Philologus, who has argued that a student should stick to his books, and 'take hede how he spendeth his tyme in sporte and playe.' Toxophilus argues:

Far contrariwise I herd my selfe a good husbnde at his boke ones saye, that to omit studie somtime of the daye, and sometime of the yere, made as moche for the encrease of learning, as to let the land lye sometime falloe, maketh for the better encrease of corne. This we se, yf the lande be plowed euery yere, the corne commeth thinne vp, the eare is short, the grayne is small, and when it is brought into the barne and threshed, gyueth very euill faul [fall, crop]. So those which neuer leaue poring on their bokes, haue oftentimes as thinne inuention, as other poore men haue, and as smal wit and weight in it as in other mens. And thus youre husbandrie me thinke, is more like the life of a couetouse snudge that oft very euill preues [proves], then the labour of a good husband that knoweth wel what he doth. And surelie the best wittes to larning must nedes haue moche recreation and ceasing from their boke, or els they marre them selues, when base and dompysshe wittes can neuer be hurte with continuall studie, as ye se in luting, that a treble minikin string [a small gut-string] must alwayes be let down, but at suche time as when a man must nedes playe: when ye base and dull stryng nedeth neuer to be mowed out of his place. The same reason I finde true in two bowes that I haue, wherof the one is quicke of cast, tricke, and trimme both for pleasure and profyte: the other is a lugge slowe of cast, folowing the string, more sure for to last, then pleasaunt for to vse. . . . I wolde not saye thus moche afore yong men, for they wil take soone occasion to studie litle ynough. But I saye it therfore bicause I knowe, as litle studie getteth litle learninge or none at all, so the moost studie getteth not ye moost learning of all. For a mans witte sore occupied in earnest studie, must be as wel recreated with some honest pastime, as the body sore laboured, must be refreshed with slepe and quietnesse, or els it can not endure very longe, as the noble poete sayeth.

Further on lefull or lawful pastimes:

That earnest studie must be recreated with honest pastime sufficientlye I haue proued afore, both by reason and authoritie of the best learned men that euer wrote. Then seing pastymes be lefull, the moost fittest for learning is to be sought for. A pastyme, saith Aristotle, must be lyke a medicine. Medicines stande by contraries, therefore the nature of studying considered, the fittest pastyme shal soone appeare. In studie euery parte of the body is ydle, which thing causeth grosse and colde humours to gather togyther and vexe scholers verry moche, the mynde is altogythar bent and set on worke. A pastyme then must be had where euery parte of the bodye must be laboured to separate and lessen suche humours withal: the mind must be vn timer, to gather and fetche agayne his quicknesse withall. Thus pastymes for the mynde onelye, be nothing fit for studentes, because the body which is moost hurte by studie, shuld take away no profyte thereat. This knewe Erasmus verry well, when he was here in Cambrige: which when he had ben sore at his boke (as Garret our bookebynder hath verry ofte told me) for lacke of better exercise, wolde take his horse, and ryde about the markette hill, and come agayne. If a scholer shoulde vse bowles or tennies, the laboure is to vehement and vnequall, whiche is condempned of Galene: the example verry ill for other men, when by so manye actes they be made vn timer.

Running, leaping, and coyting be to vile for scholers, and so not fit by Aristotle his iudgement: walking alone into the felde, hath no token of courage in it, a pastyme lyke a simple man which is neither flesh nor fishe. Therfore if a man woulde haue a pastyme holesome and equall for euery parte of the bodye, pleasaunt and full of courage for the mynde, not vile and vn timer to gyue ill example to laye men, not kepte in gardynes and corners, not lurkyng on the nyght and in holes, but euermore in the face of men, either to rebuke it when it doeth ill, or els to testifie on it when it doeth well: let him seke chievely of all other for shotyng.

The advantage of bows over guns (as they then were!) in war is thus stated:

The nexte good poynt in a souldier, is to haue and to handle his weapon wel, whereof the one must be at the appoyntment of the captayne, the other lyeth in the courage and exercise of the souldier: yet of al weapons the best is, as Euripides doth say, wherwith with leest danger of our self we maye hurt our enemye moost. And that is (as I suppose) artillarie. Artillarie now a dayes is taken for ii. thinges: Gunnes and Bowes, which how moch they do in war, both dayly experience doeth teache, and also Peter Nannius a learned man of Louayn [Louvain], in a certayne dialoge doth very well set out, wherein this is most notable, that when he hath shewed exceeding commodities of both, and some discommodities of gunnes, as infinite cost and charge, combersome carriage: and yf they be greates, the vn timer leuelyng, the peryll of them that stand by them, the esyer auoydyng by them that stande far of: and yf they be lytle, the lesse both feare and ieoperdy is in them, besyde all contrary wether and wynde, whiche hyndereth them not a lytle: yet of all shotyng he cannot reherse one discommoditie.

Ascham was very angry at 'a certaine Frenchman called Textor' [Joannes Ravisius Textor or Tixier, 1480-1524], who absurdly wrote that 'the Scottes which dwell beyonde Englande be very excellent shoters, and the best bowmen in warre.' He thus confutes him, and expresses the aspirations of English Protestants for 'atonement' with Scotland, then a Roman Catholic nation:

Textor neded not to haue gone so puiushlye [peevishly] beyonde Englande for shooting, but myght very soone, eyen in the first towne of Kent, haue founde suche plentie of shotinge, as is not in al the realme of Scotland agayne. The Scottes surely be good men of warre in theyr owne feate [that in which they have skill] as can be: but as for shotinge, they neyther can vse it for any profyte, nor yet wil challenge it for any prayse, although master Textor of his gentleness wold gyue it them. Textor neaded not to haue fylled vppe his booke with suche lyes, if he hadde read the storye of Scotlande, whiche Joannes Maior doeth wryte: wherin he myghte haue learned, that when James Stewart fyrst kyng of that name, at the Parliament holden at Saynt Johnnes towne or Perth, commaunded vnder payne of a greate forfyte, that euery Scotte shoulde learne to shote: yet neyther the loue of theyr countrie, the feare of their enemies, the auoyding of punishment, nor the receyuinge of anye profyte that myght come by it, coulde make them to be good Archers: whiche be vnape and vnfyte therunto by Gods prouidence and nature.

Therefore the Scottes them selues proue Textor a lyer, bothe with authoritie and also daily experience, and by a certayne Prouerbe that they haue amonges them in theyr communication, wherby they gyue the whole prayse of shotynge honestlye to Englysshe men, saying thus: that euery Englysshe Archer beareth vnder hys gyrdle xliiii. Scottes.

But to lette Textor and the Scottes go: yet one thyng woulde I wysshe for the Scottes, and that is this, that seinge one God, one faythe, one compasse of the see, one lande and countrie, one tungue in speakynge, one maner and trade in luyng, lyke courage and stomake in war, lyke quicknesse of witte to learning, hath made Englande and Scotlande bothe one, they wolde suffre them no longer to be two: but cleane gyue ouer the Pope, which seketh none other thinge (as many a noble and wyse Scottish man doth knowe) but to fede vp dis-sention and parties betwixt them and vs, procuring that thyng to be two, which God, nature, and reason wold haue one.

Howe profytable suche an attonement were for Scotlande, both Iohannes Maior and Ector Boetius whiche wrote the Scottes Chronicles do tell, and also all the gentlemen of Scotlande with the poore commualtie, do wel knowe: So that there is nothing that stoppeth this matter, saue onely a fewe freers, and suche lyke, whiche with the dregges of our Englysh Papistrie lurkyng now amonges them, study nothing els but to brewe battell and stryfe betwixt both the people: Wherby onely they hope to maynetayne theyr Papisticall kyngdome, to the destruction of the noble blood of Scotlande, that then they maye with authoritie do that, whiche neither noble man nor poore man in Scotlande yet doeth knowe. And as for Scottishe men and Englishe men be not enemyes by nature, but by custome: not by our good wyll, but by theyr owne follye: whiche shoulde take more honour in being coupled to Englande, then we shulde take profite in being ioyned to Scotlande.

In the Scholemaster, the main contention is that 'loue is better than feare, ientleness better than beating to bring up a childe rightlie in learninge;' and after quoting Socrates to the effect that 'no learning ought to be learned with bondage' or compulsion, but as it were in playing, and so in a measure anticipating the kindergarden, he deals with fond or injudicious teachers:

Fonde scholemasters neither can vnderstand nor will folow this good counsell of Socrates, butt wise ryders

in their office can and will do both: which is the onelie cause that commonly the yong ientlemen of England go so vnwillinglie to schole, and run so fast to the stable: For in verie dede fond scholemasters by feare do beate into them the hatred of learning, and wise riders by ientle allurementes do breed vp in them the loue of riding. They finde feare and bondage in scholes, they feelee libertie and freedome in stables: which causeth them vtterlie to abhorre the one, and most gladlie to haunt the other. And I do not write this, that in exhorting to the one I would dissuade yong ientlemen from the other: yea I am sorie with all my harte that they be giuen no more to riding then they be: For of all outward qualities, to ride faire is most cumelie for him selfe, most necessarie for his contrey, and the greater he is in blood, the greater is his praise, the more he doth excede all other therein. It was one of the three excellent praises amongst the noble ientlemen, the old Persians, Alwise to say troth, to ride faire, and shote well.

And it is pittie, that commonlie more care is had, yea and that emonges verie wise men, to finde out rather a cunningge man for their horse, than a cunningng man for their children. They say nay in worde, but they do so in dede. For to the one they will gladlie giue a stipend of 200 Crounes by the yeare, and loath to offer to the other 200 shillings. God that sitteth in heauen laugheth their choice to skorne, and rewardeth their liberalitie as it should: for he suffereth them to haue tame and well ordered horse, but wilde and vnfortunate children: and therefore in the ende they finde more pleasure in their horse, than comforte in their children.

This is Ascham's most famous 'interview':

And one example, whether loue or feare doth worke more in a child for vertue and learning, I will gladlie report: which maie be heard with some pleasure, and folowed with more profit. Before I went into Germanie, I came to Brodegate in Leicestershire, to take my leaue of that noble Ladie Iane Grey, to whom I was exceeding moch beholdinge. Hir parentes, the Duke and Duches, with all the houshold, Gentlemen and Gentlewomen, were huntinge in the Parke: I founde her, in her Chamber, readinge Phadon Platonis in Greeke, and that with as moch delite, as som ientlemen wold read a merie tale in Bocace [Boccaccio]. After salutation, and dewtie done, with som other taulke, I asked hir, whie she wold leese [lose] soch pastime in the Parke? Smiling she answered me: I wisse, all their sporte in the Parke is but a shadoe to that pleasure that I find in Plato: Alas good folke, they neuer felt what trewe pleasure meant. And howe came you, Madame, quoth I, to this deepe knowledge of pleasure, and what did chieffie allure you vnto it: seinge not many women, but verie fewe men haue attained thereunto. I will tell you, quoth she, and tell you a troth, which perchance ye will meruell at. Ope of the greatest benefites that euer God gaue me, is, that he sent me so sharpe and seure parentes, and so ientle a scholemaster. For when I am in presence either of father or mother, whether I speake, kepe silence, sit, stand, or go, eate, drinke, be merie, or sad, be sowynge, playng, dauncing, or doing anie thing els, I must do it, as it were, in soch weight, mesure, and number, euen so perfitelie, as God made the world, or else I am so sharplie taunted, so cruelly threatened, yea presentlie some tymes with pinches, nippes, and bobbes, and other waies, which I will not name for the honor I beare them, so without measure misordered, that I thinke my selfe in hell, till tyme cum that I must go to M. Elmer, who teacheth me so ientlie, so pleasantlie, with soch faire allurementes to learning, that I thinke all the tyme nothing, whiles I am with him. And when I am called from him, I fall on weeping, because, what soeuer I do else but learning is ful of grief, trouble, feare, and whole misliking vnto me: And thus my booke hath bene so moch my pleasure, and bringeth dayly to me more pleasure and more, that in respect of it all other pleasures, in very deede, be but trifles and troubles vnto me. I remember this talke gladly, both bicause it is so worthy of memorie, and bicause also, it was the last talke that euer I had, and the last tyme that euer I saw that noble and worthie ladie.

He records a sad tale of a misguided infant :

This last somer, I was in a ientlemans house : where a yong childe, somewhat past fower yeare olde, cold in no wise frame his tonge to saie a litle shorte grace : and yet he could roundlie rap out so manie vyle othes, and those of the newest facion, as som good man of fourescore yeare olde hath neuer hard named before : and that which was most detestable of all, his father and mother wold laughe at it. I moche doubte what comforte an other daie this childe shall bring vnto them.

On the question whether he approved of sending young men to complete their education by a sojourn in Italy, Ascham writes :

Syr, quoth I, I take goyng thither and liuing there, for a yonge ientleman that doth not goe vnder the keepe and garde of such a man as both by wisdom can and authoritie dare rewle hym, to be meruelous dangerous. And whie I said so than, I will declare at large now : which I said than priuatelie, and write now openlie, not bicause I do contemne either the knowledge of strange and diuerse tonges, and namelie the Italian tonge, which next the Greeke and Latin tonge I like and loue aboue all other : or else bicause I do despise the learning that is gotten, or the experience that is gathered in strange contries : or for any priuate malice that I beare to Italie : which countrie, and in it, namelie Rome, I huae alwayes speciallie honored : bicause, tyme was whan Italie and Rome huae bene, to the greate good of vs that now liue, the best breeders and bringers vp of the worthiest men, not onelie for wise speakinge, but also for well doing, in all Ciuill affaires, that euer was in the worlde. But now that tyme is gone, and though the place remayne, yet the olde and present maners do differ as farre as blacke and white, as vertue and vice. Vertue once made that contrie mistres ouer all the worlde. Vice now maketh that contrie slaue to them, that before were glad to serue it. . . . If you thinke we iudge amisse, and write to sore against you, heare what the Italian sayth of the English man, what the master reporteth of the scholer ; who vttereth playnlie, what is taught by him, and what learned by you, saying, Englese Italianato, e vn diabolio incarnato, that is to say, you remaine men in shape and facion, but becum deuils in life and condition.

His criticism of the ethical significance of Morte D'Arthur is trenchant rather than sympathetic :

In our forefathers tyme, when Papistrie as a standyng poole couered and ouerflowed all England, fewe bookes were read in our tong, sayng certaine bookes of Cheualrie, as they sayd, for pastime and pleasure, which, as some say, were made in Monasteries by idle Monkes or wanton Chanons : as one for example, Morte Arthure : the whole pleasure of which booke standeth in two speciall poyntes, in open mans slaughter, and bold bawdrye : In which booke those be counted the noblest Knightes, that do kill most men without any quarrell, and commit fowlest aduouleries by sutlest shiftes : as Sir Launcelote, with the wife of king Arthure his master : Syr Tristram with the wife of king Marke his vncler : Syr Lamerocke with the wife of king Lote, that was his own aunte. This is good stuffe for wise men to laughe at, or honest men to take pleasure at.

A letter written by Ascham to his friend Raven at St John's, in Cambridge, describes a journey from England by Mechlin, Brussels, Louvain, Maestricht, Jülich, to Cologne [Colen] ; thence up the Rhine by Coblenz and Mainz to Speier ; then by Cannstadt, Esslingen, and Ulm to Augsburg, whence the letter was despatched. Ascham is an acute observer and an entertaining correspondent. As he rides from Maestricht into the Rhineland at Jülich he thus describes the country (we follow the standard edition—Giles's—of the Works, which is modernised in spelling) :

The country by the way may compare with Cambridge-shire for corn. . . . This know, there is no country here to be compared for all things with England. Beef is little, lean, tough, and dear, mutton likewise ; a rare thing to see a hundred sheep in a flock. Capons be lean and little ; pigeons naught ; partridge as ill, black, and tough ; corn enough everywhere, and most wheat. Here is never no dearth, except corn fail. The people generally be much like the old Persians that Xenophon describes, content to live with bread, roots, and water ; and for this matter, ye shall see round about the walls of every city, half a mile compass from the walls, gardens full of herbs and roots, whereby the cities most part do live. No herb is stolen, such justice is exercised. These countries be rich by labour and continuance of man, not by goodness of the soil. If only London would use, about the void places of the city, these gardens full of herbs, and if it were but to serve the strangers that would live with these herbs, beside a multitude which either need, covetousness, or temperance would in few years bring to the same, all England should have victuals better cheap. I think also there is more wine indeed drunken in England, where none grows, than even there, from whence it cometh. It is pity that London hath not one goodman to begin this husbandry and temperance. At Briges [Bruges], in Flanders, we had as fat, good, and great mutton, and fatter, better, and greater capons than ever I saw in Kent, but nowhere else.

At Cologne the reason is given why the Cathedral was still unfinished, and the relics of Ursula and the ten thousand virgins commented on, not without some suspicion of the story ; and this is the record of the three next stages of the journey :

We took a fair barge, with goodly glass windows, with seats of fir, as close as any house, we knew not whether it went or stood. Rhene is such a river that now I do not marvel that the poets make rivers gods. Rhene at Spire, having a farther course to rin into the ocean sea than is the space betwixt Dover and Barwick, is broader over a great deal than is Thames at Greenwich. . . . From Colen this day we went to Bonna, the bishop's town; the country about Rhene here is plain. . . . We were drawn up Rhene by horses. Little villages stand by Rhene side, and as the barge came by, six or seven children, some stone naked, some in their shirts, of the bigness of Peter Ailand, would run by us on the sands, singing psalms, and would rin and sing with us half a mile, whilst they had some money.

We came late to Bonna at eight of the clock: our men were come afore with our horse: we could not be let into the town, no more than they do at Calise, after an hour. We stood cold at the gate a whole hour. At last we were fain, lord and lady, to lie in our barge all night, where I sat in my lady's side-saddle, leaning my head to a malle [portmanteau], better lodged than a dozen of my fellows.

14 Octob. We sailed to Brousik [Breisig]: 15 miles afore we come to Bonna begin the vines and hills keeping in Rhene on both sides for the space of five or six days journey, as we made them, almost to Mayence; like the hills that compass Halifax about, but far branter [sheerer] up, as though the rocks did cover you like a pentence [pent-house]: on the Rhene side all this journey be pathways where horse and man go commonly a yard broad, so fair that no weather can make it foul: if you look upwards ye are afraid the rocks will fall on your head; if ye look downwards ye are afraid to tumble into Rhene, and if your horse founder it is not seven to six that ye shall miss falling into Rhene. There be many times stairs down into Rhene that men may come from their boat and walk on this bank, as we did every day four or five miles at once, plucking grapes not with our hands but with our mouths if we list.

The grapes grow on the brant rocks so wonderfully, that ye will marvel how men dare climb up to them, and yet so plentifully, that it is not only a marvel where men be found to labour it, but also almost where men dwell that drink it. Seven or eight days journey ye cannot cast your sight over the compass of vines. And surely this wine of Rhene is so good, so natural, so temperate, so ever like itself, as can be wished for man's use. I was afraid when I came out of England to miss beer; but I am more afraid when I shall come into England, that I cannot lack this wine.

It is wonder to see how many castles stand on the tops of these rocks unwinnable. The three bishops electors, Colen, Trevers, and Mayence, be the princes almost of whole Rhene. The lansgrave hath goodly castles upon Rhene which the emperor cannot get. The palatine of Rhene is also a great lord on this river, and hath his name of a castle standing in the midst of Rhene on a rock [the Pfalz]. There be also goodly isles in Rhene, so full of walnut trees that they cannot be spent with eating, but they make vile of them. In some of these isles stand fair abbeyes and nunneries wonderfully pleasant. The stones that hang so high over Rhene be very much of that stone that you use to write on in tables; every poor man's house there is covered with them.

15 Octob. From Brusik to Confluentia [Coblenz] xviii miles. Here Mosella comes into Rhene as fair as Trent. The bishop of Trevers hath here two fair castles of either side of Rhene up in high rocks, one bragging the other, and both threatening the town with many pieces of ordinance.

We quote last from the same Augsburg letter a contemporary glimpse from the great Emperor Charles V. at dinner:

I stood hard by the Emperor's table. He had four courses; he had sod beef very good, roast mutton, baked hare. . . . The Emperor hath a good face, a constant look: he fed well of a capon; I have had a better from mine hostess Barnes many times in my chambers. He and Ferdinando ate together very handsomely, carving themselves where they list, without any curiosity. The Emperor drank the best that ever I saw; he had his head in the glass five times as long as any of us, and never drank less than a good quart at once of Rhenish wine. His chapel sung wonderful cunningly all the dinner-while.

There have been many editions of Toxophilus and the Schoolmaster—of both by Arber, and of the latter by Mayor (1873; new ed. 1883). Collected editions of the English works were by Bennet (1771), Cochrane (1815), W. Aldis Wright (1905), and of the whole works (including the Latin letters, &c.) by Giles in 1864-65. There are Lives by Grant (Latin, 1576) and Katterfeld (German, 1879).

A somewhat sharp contrast to the serious and dignified writers from More to Ascham is presented by a contemporary, Andrew Boorde, or BORDE (1490-1549), who, born about 1490 at Boards (formerly Borde's) Hill, near Cuckfield in Sussex, was brought up a Carthusian; after 1527 studied medicine at Orleans, Toulouse, Montpellier, and Wittenberg; visited Rome and Compostella; and for Thomas Cromwell carried through a confidential mission in France and Spain. He practised medicine in Glasgow (1536), in spite of what he calls 'the deuyllsye dysposicion of a Scottyshe man not to loue or fauour an Englisheman.' He describes Ireland and the Irish, Wales, Cornwall, Flanders, Saxony, Denmark, Norway and Iceland, Naples and Sicily. His last and longest journey was by Antwerp, Cologne, Venice, and Rhodes to Jerusalem, and back by Naples, Rome, and the Alps. He lived for some time at Winchester, and having fallen into irregular ways, died in the Fleet prison in London. To the end he was a staunch Catholic. Boorde's chief works are his Dyetary and Boke of the Introduction of Knowledge, edited by Dr Furnivall in 1870. The latter is a kind of guide-book to Europe, 'the whych dothe teache a man to speake al maner of languages and to know the usage and fashion of all maner of countreys.' In virtue of the Dyetary he may be accounted the father of writing books of domestic medicine. The Breyary was also a medical work. The Boke of Berdes dissuades from beard-growing. He has been unreasonably called 'the original merry-andrew' because that word appears on the title of several works attributed to him without evidence, The Merie Tales of the mad men of Gotham, Scogins Jests, and The Mylner of Abynton. His own jocular title was 'Andreas Perforatus,' a pun on 'Bored.' His Itinerary of Europe has perished, but the Handbook of Europe survives, and the Itinerary of England or Peregrination of Doctor Boorde was printed by Hearne in 1735. The earliest known specimen of the Gypsy language occurs in the Introduction. His interspersed doggerel rhymes are sometimes more effective—as they are more uncouth—than his prose. He thinks well of the English as ‘more better in many thynges, specially in maners and manhod,’ than other peoples. But the Englishman is addicted to foppery in dress, running after new fashions. In the Boke there is a cut of an unclothed Englishman, holding tailors’ shears, and an autobiographical description :

I am an English man and naked I stand here,
Musyng in my mynd what rayment I shal were ;
For now I wyl were thys, and now I wyl were that ;
Now I wyl were I cannot tel what.
All new fashyons be plesaunt to me,
I will haue them whether I thryve or thee ;
Now I am a frysker, all men doth on me looke,
What should I do but set cocke on the hoope ?
What do I care yf all the world me fayle ? . . .
I will get a garment shal reche to my tayle.
Than am I a minion for I were the new gyse,
The next yere after this I trust to be wyse,
Not only in wering my gorgious aray,
For I wyl go to learning a hoole somers day.
I wyl learne Latine, Hebrew, Greeke, and Frenche,
And I wyl learn Douche sitting on my benche.
I do feare no man ; all men feryth me,
I ouercome my aduersaries by land and by see ;
I had no peere yf to myself I were trew,
Because I am not so, dyuers times do I rew.
Yet I lake nothing, I haue all thyng at wyll,
Yf I were wyse and wolde holde my self styll,
And medel with no matters not to me partayning,
But euer to be trew to God and to my Kynge.
But I haue suche matters rolling in my pate,
That I wyl speake and do I cannot tell what.
No man shall let me but I wyl haue my mynde,
And to father, mother, and freende I wyl be vnkynde.

This passage forms the text or the peroration of Borrow’s appendix ‘On Foreign Nonsense’ in the Romany Rye; and some have thought it was in Shakespeare’s mind when—to Nerissa—Portia criticises her English suitor in the Merchant of Venice.

Even more characteristic of the nation was the irrepressible tendency to profane swearing : ‘In all the worlde ther is no regyon nor countree that doth use more swearynge than is used in England, for a chylde that scarce can speake, a boy, a gyrll, a wenche now a dayes wyl swere as great othes as an olde knave and an olde drabbe.’

The Scotsman thus describes himself :

I am a Scotyshe man and trew I am to Fraunce,
In euery countrey myselfe I do auaunce,
I wyll boost myselfe, I wyll crake and face,
I loue to be exalted here and in euery place.
An Englyshe man I cannot naturally loue.

Even more uncomplimentarily he adds :

[I] haue dissymbled moche,
And in my promyse I haue not kept touche.

When he comes to describe Scotland in prose, all he has to say of the Lowlands is that ‘therein is plenty of fysh and fleshe and euell ale except Leth ale ; there is plenty of haver cakes, whiche is to say oten cakes ; this part is the hart and the best of the realme. The other part of Scotlande is a baryn and a waste countrey, full of mores lyke the lande of the wyld Ireshe. And the people of that parte of Scotlande be very rude and vnmanered and vntaught ; yet that part is somewhat better than the North parte, but yet the Sowth parte will gnaw a bone and cast it into the dish again. Theyr Fyshe and Fleshe, be it rosted or soden, is serued wyth a syrup or a sause in one disshe or platter : of all nacyons they do sethe theyr fysh moste beste. The borders of Scotland towards England . . . lyueth in much pouertie and penurye, hauynge no howses but suche as a man maye buylde wythin iij. or iiii. houres : he and his wyfe and his horse standeth all in one rome. In these partyes be many out-lawes and stronge theues, for much of theyr lyuyng standeth by stelyng and robbing. . . . The people of the countrey be hardy men and stronge men and well-fauored and good musycyons.’

The Irishman and the Welshman are as frankly treated as the Scotysman, and have even less reason to think the likeness flattered. Brief conversations, not unlike those still manufactured for tourists, are given in Lowland Scots, Irish, and Welsh, as also in base-Dutch, high-Dutch, Italian, modern Greek, and other tongues.

Henry VIII., who was born the year after Boorde, and died two years before him, was himself an accomplished and really learned writer—the Assertio Septem Sacramentorum against Luther, which earned for an English king the title of ‘Defender of the Faith,’ appears to have been mainly his own work ; and it seems certain that he wrote English songs and composed the music to them. One of the best authenticated is that called ‘The King’s Ballad’ in a manuscript in the British Museum dating from Henry’s own time. It is familiar in a modernised form. The older form is thus given by Chappell (new ed. 1893, vol. i. p. 42) :

Pastyme with good companye
I love & shall untill I dye ;
Gruche who lust but none denye, so God be plesyd thus leue wyll I.
For my pastance,
hunt syng & dance,
my hart is sett :
all goodly sport
for my comfort, who schall me let ?

Youthe must haue sum daliance,
off good or yll sum pastance :
Company me thynkes then best,
all thoughts and fansys to deiest :
ffor idillnes is chef mastres of vices all :

Then who can say but myrth and play
is best of all?

Company with honeste,
is vertu vices to ffile :
Company is good & ill,
but evry man hath hys fre wyll :
the best enswe,
the worst eschew,
my mynde schalbe :
Vertu to use,
vice to refuse,
thus schall I use me.

Sternhold and Hopkins deserve remembrance as joint-authors of by far the larger number of the metrical versions of the psalms formerly attached to the English Prayer Book. This was for two hundred years the standard translation, and it obtained currency in Scotland and Ireland also. Thomas Sternhold (1500-49), born near Blakeney in Gloucestershire, or, according to Fuller and Wood, in Hampshire, became Groom of the Robes to Henry VIII. and Edward VI., and essayed to do more perfectly what Coverdale in England and Marot in France had attempted—to supersede at court and amongst the people the current ‘obscene ballads.’ The first edition (undated, but probably in 1547) contains only nineteen psalms; the second (1549), thirty-seven. A third edition, by Whitchurch (1551), contains seven more by J. H. [John Hopkins], probably a native of Awre in Gloucestershire, who died rector of Great Waldingfield, Suffolk, in 1570. The complete book of psalms, which appeared in 1562, formed for nearly two centuries almost the whole hymnody of the Church of England, and was known as the ‘Old Version’ after the rival version of Tate and Brady (q.v.) appeared (1696). Forty psalms bore the name of Sternhold, and sixty that of Hopkins. The rest were the work of various authors. Sternhold chose the ballad metre of ‘Chevy Chace’ as the metre for all but a few of his psalms; and his choice made this the standard of common metre (C.M.) for most psalters down to the present day, greatly influenced hymn-writing also, and doubtless had no little effect in giving the uneducated their standard for verse and for poetry. Hopkins had four rhymes to Sternhold’s two. Fuller thought highly of the versions as poems, but admitted that their authors’ ‘piety was better than their poetry, and they had drunk more of Jordan than of Helicon.’ The wording is flat as well as homely, and wholly fails to render the majesty of the Hebrew psalms.

The first to versify the whole psalter in English was Robert Crowley or Crole (1518?-88), Arch-deacon of Hereford and Prebendary of St Paul’s, who was deprived and imprisoned for opposition to vestments as ‘the conjuring garments of popery.’ He was born in Gloucestershire and educated at Oxford, and was for some years a printer, issuing in that capacity three impressions of Piers Plow- man. He wrote much controversial divinity. His version of the Psalms is sufficiently uncouth; printed (1549) as it is in black letter, each pair of double long lines forming a verse, it is at times difficult to make out the lines and metre, though it is common metre. Thus run some verses of the Seventy-fourth Psalm :

O God howe longe shall thyne enmy do the dispyte and shame?
Wylt thou suffer him ever to blaspheme
thyne holy name?

Lord whye wythdrawest thou thy powre?
Why doeth thy right hand byd Styll in thy bosome? pulle it out and let thy foes be stryed.

The first half-line ends with ‘enmy,’ thus accented; and the third has to be read, ‘Wilt thou suffer’ him ever to.’ In the last line is a good old form of ‘destroyed.’

The same verses are a little more rhythmical—though finally more grotesque—in Sternhold and Hopkins :

When wilt thou Lord once end this shame and cease thine enemies strong?
Shall they alway blaspheme thy name,
and raile on thee so long?
Why dost Thou draw Thy hand abacke and hide it in Thy lap?
Oh plucke it out and be not slacke to giue thy foes a rap!

Development of the Secular Drama.

All but the latest of the plays at which we have hitherto looked were plainly intended to be acted on stages or platforms in the open air; but we gather that towards the close of the fifteenth century it had become customary for dramatic entertainments also to be held indoors, in the halls of large houses. The consequences of bringing the players from their ‘scaffolds high’ into a room in close proximity to the audience—and that audience of a more educated kind than would be gathered in the street—were very great. Amid the new surroundings the incongruities of the Scriptural drama would have been intolerable, and no new plays of this kind were written until Bishop Bale revived them in a totally different spirit. Scenic accessories and stage apparatus, again, were necessarily reduced to a minimum, and partly as a result of this the ‘action’ in the new plays is of the most restricted kind. Lastly, the plays, being no longer the sole business of a summer holiday, were greatly cut down in length; they began to be called interludes—that is, entertainments wherewith to while away the time after or before a banquet or other solemnity—and though they remained for the most part severely didactic, they now took a much greater variety of theme. Thus there are: (1) plays intended to draw men to heaven by good deeds, confession, and repentance; (2) plays denouncing vice and the temptations of youth; (3) controversial plays, advocating Protestant doctrines as against Catholicism; (4) plays on education, one of them with definite scientific instruction; (5) plays that are little more than pleasant arguments in verse; (6) plays for schoolboys or young undergraduates, with a good deal of rough merriment in them; and lastly (7) one or two plays that are satires, and come much nearer than their fellows to the modern drama, since they hardly make any pretence of having a moral at all. Of these seven groups the first forms the link between the larger moralities, such as the Castell of Perseverance, and the interludes proper. The finest example is 'the morall playe of Everyman,' of which the head-title reads, 'A treatyse how the hie fader of heven sendeth dethe to somon every creature to come and gyve accounte of theyr lyves in this worlde, and is in maner of a morall playe.' 'Here shall you see,' says the Messenger who speaks the Prologue, 'how Fellowship, Jollity, Strength, Pleasure, and Beauty will fade from thee as flower in May.' 'O to whom shall I make my mone?' sighs Everyman when the play is half through:

O to whom shall I make my mone
For to go with me in that hevye journey?
First Felawshyp said he wolde with me gone;
His wordes were very plesaunt and gay,
But afterwarde he left me alone.
Than spake I to my Kynnesmen all in dispayre,
And also they gave me wordes fayre;
They lacked no fayre spekyng,
But all forsoke me in the endinge.
Then went I to my Goodes, that I loved best,
In hope to have comforte, but there had I leest;
For my Goodes sharply dyd me tell
That he bryngeth many into Hell.
Than of my-selfe I was ashamed,
And so I am worthy to be blamed.
Thus may I well my-selfe hate.
Of whom shall I now counsell take?
I thinke that I shall never spede
Tyll that I go to my Good Dede.
But, alas, she is so weke
That she can nother go ne speke.
Yet will I venture on her now.
My Good Dedes, where be you?

Good Dedes. Here I lye, colde on the grounde,
Thy sinnes hath me sore bounde
That I can not sterve.

Everyman. O Good Dedes, I stande in great fere,
I must you pray of counsell,
For helpe now sholde come ryght well.

Up to this point the story follows the old Buddhist parable which came to Europe embedded in the legend of Barlaam and Josaphat. But here the dramatist interpolates orthodox teaching on the sacraments, Good Deeds taking Everyman to Knowledge, by whom he is guided to Confession, and shriven and houselled. But in the end the old parable is again followed, for Beauty, Strength, and Five Wits gradually fall away from man as he approaches the grave, and it is Good Deeds who abides with him and pronounces the prayer for the dying:

Shorte our ende and mynyshe our payne;
Let us go and never come agayne.

Under the name of Elckerlijck, a Dutch version of this play was written in the fifteenth century, probably by a certain Petrus Dorlandus. It is still a matter of controversy as to whether the Dutch playwright translated from the English or the English from the Dutch. (K. H. de Raaf in 1897 upheld the former alternative.)

Of the plays denouncing vice and the temptations of youth, the Enterlude of Hyckescorner, printed by Wynkyn de Worde, is probably one of the earliest. Hyckescorner, after whom it is named, is a travelled rogue, who plays but a small part in the action, the chief characters being Free-will and Imagination, whom Pity, Contemplation, and Perseverance endeavour to keep in the straight road. What life there is in the play is derived from its allusions to contemporary manners of the unedifying sort; but it was apparently popular, for it was not only reprinted at a later date, but borrowed from by the author of an Interlude of Youth, which probably belongs to the reign of Queen Mary.

In Lusty Juventus, which may have been written under Edward VI., we have a play of much the same sort, differentiated by controversial additions, Juventus being led astray from the Reformation principles in which he has been brought up till he falls from heresy into unclean living, from which he is rescued by Good Counsel and Knowledge. Though dull in itself, the play is noteworthy for two things. In the first place, it contains a charming song:

In a herber grene, a-slepe where as I laye,
The byrdes sang swete in the myddes of the daye:
I dreamed fast of myrth and play:
In youth is pleasure, in youth is pleasure.

Me thought I walked stil to and fro,
And from her company I could not go,
But when I waked it was not so:
In youth is pleasure, in youth is pleasure.

Therefore my harte is surely pyght
Of her alone to have a sight,
Whiche is my joy and hartes delyght:
In youth is pleasure, in youth is pleasure.

Its second distinction is that it was chosen towards the end of the century, by the author of a play on Sir Thomas More, to represent a typical interlude. It is recorded of More that in his young days, when plays were acted before Cardinal Morton, he used to step among the actors and improvise a part; and the unknown playwright introduces such an incident into his own work. More receives a message that the Lord Mayor of London, 'accompanied with his lady and her traine,' are coming to visit him. Hard on the messenger's heels arrive the Lord Cardinal's Players tendering their services. 'To have a play before the banquet will be excellent,' says More, and from seven which they offer him he chooses the Marriage of Witt and Wisdome, but is really served with a version of Lusty Juventus. When the play should begin, the fellow who is to play Wit has to run to the property-makers for a false beard, and though, at More's bidding, a start is made, after a while Inclination has to confess, 'Forsooth we can goe no further till our fellowe Luggins come; for he plays Good Councill, and now he should enter to admonishe Witt that this is Lady Vanite and not Lady Wisdome.' More himself supplies his place with a couple of improvised speeches, and then, though Luggins has arrived, dinner is ready, and the play is stopped.

It has been worth while to epitomise this incident because it sets so vividly before us the manner in which these interludes were played. Of course, where the paymaster was a strong Protestant, or a strong opponent of the Reformation, the playwright would give a controversial turn to his moralities, and so help to keep alive the religious feuds which the Tudor monarchs especially disliked. Such theological interludes are specifically forbidden in more than one royal proclamation; only a few of them have come down to us, the best being that of New Custom, in which Perverse Doctrine and Ignorance, dressed as Roman priests, are defeated by New Custom and Light of the Gospel, despite the help of Cruelty and Avarice.

With these moral interludes that aimed at the reformation of manners we must mention Skelton's play of Magnificence, printed about 1530—soon after the poet's death. Magnificence is shown discarding his good counsellors, Liberty, Felicity, and Measure, for the vices Fancy, Counterfeit Countenance, Clokyd Colusyon, &c., who impose on him by false names. He is ruined, buffeted by Adversity, and assailed by Poverty, Despair, and Mischief. Good Hope saves him from suicide, and Redress, Sad Circumspection, and Perseverance restore him to his former estate. The play has some passages of moderately good rhetoric, but it has been much overpraised, and ranks rather with the heavier than the more vivacious interludes.

Of the educational plays the extreme instance is the Interlude of the Nature of the Four Elements, probably written by John Rastell¹ about 1520, and printed by him some ten years later. The following paragraphs from its descriptive title-page suffice to indicate its character:

¹ John Rastell (died 1536) was Sir Thomas More's brother-in-law (he married Elizabeth More), John Heywood's father-in-law, and thereby great-grandfather of John Donne. Printer, lawyer, and dramatist, he wrote A Boke of Purgatory and The Pastyme of People in prose; printed (and may have composed) the plays Gentylnes and Nobylite and Calisto and Malebea, a comedy of romantic intrigue, adapted from the Spanish Celestina. He printed Medwall's Fulgens and Lucres (see p. 157). His son, William Rastell, printed John Heywood's plays and edited More's English works. See Reed's Early Tudor Drama (1927), and p. 162.

A new Interlude and a mery, of the nature of the iiii. Here folow the namys of the Pleyers.

The Messengere, Nature Naturæ, Humanyté, Studyous Desire, Sensuall Appetyte, the Taverner, Experyens, Ygnorance: also, yf ye lyst, ye may brynge in a Dysgysynge.

Here folow dyvers matters whiche be in this Interlude conteynynd.

Of the sytuacyon of the iiii. elementes, that is to sey, the Yerth, the Water, the Ayre, and Fyre, and of their qualytess and propertess, and of the generacyon and corrupcyon of thynges made of the commyxtion of them.

Of certeyn conclusions provyng that the yerth must nedes be rounde, and that it hengyth in the myddes of the fyrmament, and that it is in circumference above xxi.m. myle.

Of certeyn conclusions provyng that the see lyeth rounde upon the yerth.

The programme which we are obliged thus ruthlessly to cut short is faithfully carried out, despite the temporary success of Sensuall Appetyte in carrying away Humanyté from the lectures of Studyous Desire to frolic at a tavern. Other educational plays of a later date and less severe didacticism are John Redford's Wyt and Science (c. 1550), and 'a new and pleasant enterlude intituled the Marriage of Witte and Science,' licensed for printing in 1570, and very brightly and pleasantly written. The Disobedient Child and The Nice Wanton, both of them late interludes, with real characters in them, are designed chiefly to warn parents against sparing the rod. The other three plays we have mentioned may all have been acted at schools or colleges.

Of the purely argumentative interludes, John Heywood's Play of Love and the Dialogue of Gentylnes and Nobylite,¹ which has been attributed to him, though without evidence, are excellent examples. The former is diversified by one of the characters pretending (as an illustration of his argument) to set another on fire, and in Gentylnes and Nobylite there is some little laying about with whips, but practically each interlude is the working out of a theme for discussion. 'Our coming hither,' says the merchant, when the Plowman's whip interrupts his discussion with the knight as to which is the better gentleman—

Our commyng hyder, and our entent,
Ys not to fyght, but by way of argument;
Every man to shew hys oppinyon:
To see who coude shew the best reason
To prove hym-self noble and most gentyلمان.

The other characters take the same view of their functions, and the discussion goes happily forward.

Another play by John Heywood, The Play of the Wether, is almost equally argumentative, but has a good deal more stage bustle about it. Jupiter comes down to earth to hear petitions about the weather, engaging an amusing knave, Mery Report, to interview the petitioners. A hunt-loving gentleman, a forester, a water-miller, a wind-miller, a fashionable lady, a laundress, and a jolly school-boy, 'the least [i.e. smallest] that can play,' all come and ask for different kinds of weather, and wrangle with each other and with Mery Report. In the end Jupiter promises that they shall all have what they desire in turn (that is, as Mery Report foresees, English weather will go on much as before), and a bright little play ends in general contentment, and not without a moral as to the selfishness of human desires. This was probably a play for boys; and the same, we may be sure, was the case with an anonymous interlude, Thersites, which local allusions connect clearly with Oxford. Originally composed probably as a Christmas play, this was acted, in the form in which it was sent to press, during the rejoicings at the birth of Edward VI.—that is, in October 1537. The characters are only five—'Thersites a boster, Mulciber a smyth, Mater a mother, Miles a knyght, and Telemachus;' and the purport of the play is succinctly set forth in the head-title, 'Thys enterlude folowyng dothe declare howe that the greatest boesters are not the greatest doers.' Thersites, 'commeth in fyrste havinge a clubbe uppon his necke,' boasts plentifully, and then persuades Mulciber to make him a suit of armour; Mulciber's interpretation of his request for a sallet or helmet, as referring to a salad ('Woldest thou have a sallet, nowe all the herbes are dead?'), being, perhaps, the earliest English example of a stage pun. Provided with arms Thersites boasts so dreadfully that his mother becomes alarmed for his life, but a fine snail is his first antagonist (he has much ado in making it draw in its horns), and when the knight challenges him he flies to his mother for protection. Other scenes of the same kind follow, and both the boys who acted in the play and their fellows in the audience probably thought it excellent fun. The borrowing of the names Thersites and Telemachus from Homer, and the lineal descent of the cowardly braggart from the Miles Gloriosus of Plautus, are points to be noted.

We have already mentioned two plays by John Heywood, the Play of the Wether and the Play of Love; we have now to notice three others, which are distinguished from the other interludes at which we have been looking by their entire absence of any moral. Their author was probably born about 1497, and his name occurs in several entries in royal household books from 1515 onwards, showing that he was a singer and player of the virginals at Henry VIII.'s court, and was more especially attached to the service of the Princess Mary, from whom in 1538 he received a fee of forty shillings for playing an interlude 'with his children' (that is, some company of boy actors) before her. At Mary's coronation Heywood made her a Latin speech in St Paul's Churchyard; after her death he seems to have fled to Malines, whence he wrote to Burghley in 1575 asking for some pecuniary favour. Two years later, by which time he must have been eighty, he is once more mentioned among other Roman Catholic fugitives; from a Jesuit college at Antwerp he fled to Louvain, and seems to have died there in or about 1578. Besides his plays he wrote a Dyaloge of Wit and Folly; epigrams—six Centuries of Proverbs (that is, poems into which he worked all the proverbs he could think of); and a long and dull allegorical poem, The Spider and the Flie. His plays with which we are here concerned are certainly free from these faults; save the Play of Love they are all short and all witty, though too often extremely gross. Most of them were printed by William Rastell in 1533-34. A merry Plâÿ between the Pardoner and the Frere, the Curate and neybour Pratte, contains an allusion to Pope Leo X. (d. 1521), but need not therefore have been written during his pontificate. In it a Pardoner and a Friar—whose characters and even some of the speeches are taken from Chaucer's Prologue to the Canterbury Tales—invade a parish church, and both try to preach at the same time in order to gain money; they quarrel and fight, till in the end the Parson arrives. The rest of the play may be quoted in full:

Parson. No more of this wranglyng in my chyrch!

I shrewe your hartys bothe for this lurch!

Is ther any blood shed here between these knaves?

Thanked be God, they had no stavys,

Nor eggetoles, for than it had ben wronge! edge-tools

Well ye shall synge another songe!

Neybour Prat, com hether I you pray.

Prat. Why, what is this nyse fraye? foolish

Parson. I can not tell you. One knave dysdaynes another,

Wherefore take ye the tone and I shall take the other,

We shall bestow them there as is most conveyent

For suche a couple. I trow they shall repente

That ever they met in this chyrche here!

Neyboure, ye be constable, stande ye nere.

Take ye that laye knave and let me alone

With this gentylman. By God and by saynt John

I shall borowe upon presthode somewhat!

For I may say to the, neybour Prat,

It is a good dede to punysh such, to the ensample

Of suche other how that they shall mell meddle

In lyke facyon as these catyfes do. fashion

Prat. In good sayth, mayster parson, yf ye do so,

Ye do but well to teche them to be ware.

Pardon. Mayster Prat, I pray ye me to spare;

For I am sory for that that is done;

Wherefore I pray ye forgyve me sone

For that I have offendyd within your lybertye, district

And, by my trouthe, syr, ye may trust me,

I wyll never come hether more

Whyle I lyve, and God before.

Prat. Nay, I am ones charged with the,
 Wherefore, by saynt John, thou shalt not escape me,
 Tyll thou hast scouryd a pare of stokys. stocks
Parson. Tut, he weneth all is but mockes!
 Lay hande on hym, and com ye on, syr frere!
 Ye shall of me hardely have your hyre,
 Ye had none suche this vii yere,
 I swere by God and by our Lady dere.
Frere. Nay, mayster parson, for Goddys passyon,
 Intreate not me after that facyon.
 For, yf ye do, it wyll not be for your honesty.
Parson. Honesty or not, but thou shall se
 What I shall do by and by.
 Make no stroglynge! com forthe soberly!
 For it shall not avayle the, I say.
Frere. Mary, that shall we trye even strait-way.
 I defy the, churle preeste, and there be no mo than thou.
 I wyll not go with the, I make God a-vow!
 We shall se fyrst which is the stronger!
 God hath sente me bonys! I do the not fere!
Parson. Ye, by my fayth, wylt thou be there?
 Neybour Prat, brynge forthe that knave,
 And thou, syr frere, yf thou wylt alगतys rave—
Frere. Nay, chorle, I the defy!
 I shall trouble the fyrst,
 Thou shalt go to pryson by and by!
 Let me se now! Do thy worste!
Prat with the pardoner and the parson with the frere.
Parson. Helpe! helpe! Neybour Prat! Neybour Prat!
 In the worship of God, helpe me som-what!
Prat. Nay, deale as thou canst with that elfe,
 For-why I have inoughe to do my selfe! Since
 Alas! for payn I am almoste dede;
 The reede blood so ronnethe downe aboute my hede.
 Nay, and thou canst, I pray the, helpe me! An, if Parson. Nay, by the mas, felowe, it wyll not be!
 I have more tow on my dystaffe than I can well spyn!
 The cursed frere dothe the upper hand wyn!
Frere. Wyll ye leve than, and let us in peace departe?
Parson, Prat. Ye, by our Lady, even with all our harte!
Frere, Pard. Than adew, to the devyll, tyll we come agayn.
Parson, Prat. And a myschefe go with you bothe twayne.

That the rogues should thus have the best of the fray is quite in accordance with Heywood's humour. In The Foure PP.: a very mery enterlude of a Palmer, a Pardoner, a Potycary, a Pedler, the Pedlar acts as judge while the others contend which can tell the greatest lie, the prize being won by the Palmer with the remark, most innocently introduced, that in all his travels he never yet saw 'any one woman out of patience.' In A mery playe betwene Johan Johan the husbände, Tyb his wyfe, and Syr Jhān the preest, vice is again triumphant. Tyb and the priest have an intrigue, which the husband rightly suspects. At the opening of the play he is boasting of the drubbing he will give Tyb when she comes home, but she sends him to bid the priest sup with them on a pie. Johan's cowardice incites the worthy pair to an amazing effrontery, and he is set to mend a pail while they eat the pie; its final disappearance rouses him to a flash of courage, but the priest and Tyb run off together, and after a moment's triumph it occurs to Johan that he must follow to see what they are after—an edifying conclusion on which the curtain drops. It is evident that when such a play as this could be acted the secular drama had fully come into existence.

In addition to the medley of plays which we have already described, we must mention those of John Bale (b. 1495; d. 1563), Bishop of Ossory under Edward VI. To the controversies in which his virulence earned him the epithet 'bilious,' Bale contributed an attack on monasticism entitled The Actes of Englyshe Votaries, and also The Image of both Churches. His Illustrium Majoris Britanniae Scriptorum Summarium (1549), a useful though inaccurate account of five hundred British authors, has given him a better claim to remembrance. Of his twenty-two plays only five are extant—A Tragedy or interlude manifesting the chief promises of God unto man; The Three Lawes of Nature, Moses and Christ; a Life of John the Baptist; The Temptacyon of our Lorde; and his historical play, King John, in which the king is represented as the guardian of English freedom against papal aggression. The religious plays are formless productions, which certainly had no influence on the development of the drama. Perhaps the same should be said of King John, which seems to have been originally written about 1550 and revised in the reign of Elizabeth. The allegorical element from the old moralities is still present in it, for Simon of Swynsett, who poisons John, must needs call himself 'Monastycall Devocion,' and be called by Bale 'Dissimulation;' and we find among other characters 'Privat Welth' ('lyke a Cardynall'), 'Sedycyon,' and more notable than these a personification of England. But as a first attempt to dramatise history the play is not without interest, and there are some few dramatic touches, such as the poisoner's attempt to avoid sharing the draught, and his courageous acquiescence when he finds it the only way to secure his victim.

Bale's plays stand apart; the others here noticed have been arranged so as to exhibit the gradual triumph of the secular over the didactic interest in the drama, which can actually be traced, despite its intermittent progress and what seems to us the strange persistence of the didactic element. Of two points which remain to be noticed in the history of these interludes, one is that the plays which have been presented to us, diverse as they are, do not cover the whole ground. It is clear that there were popular performances of a much cruder character, which never attained the honour of print, for we find allusions by Ben Jonson and others to the parts played by the Devil and the Vice, of which only faint traces survive. The Vice (there is no doubt that the obvious etymology of the name is the right one) was dressed as a Jester, presented a humorous contrast to the stupider Devil, and at the end of the performance carried him off to hell on his back. In extant plays the Devil only appears once, while of the Vice we have no other traces than the attaching of his name to a humorous character, such as Mery Report in Heywood's Play of the Wether. Our second point is, that in Henry VIII.'s reign we begin to hear of companies of players of two kinds, boys and men. The boys were school-children, probably the choir-boys of royal chapels; the men were in the service of the king, or of some great nobleman, but probably took up acting as a profitable amusement rather than as their main employment. In a suit brought by John Rastell before 1530 against a costumier who had confiscated some dresses left in his keeping as a set-off against a bill for erecting a stage in Rastell's garden at Finsbury, the witnesses called to appraise the dresses are a tailor, a currier, a skinner, a plasterer, and others of the like condition. It is thus evident that the love of acting which the miracle-plays had fostered in the members of the Trade-Guilds was still alive, and that, as we might be sure without corroborative evidence, Bottom the weaver and Snug the joiner in the Midsummer Night's Dream are not mere absurdities, but the actual players of Shakespeare's boyhood amusingly caricatured.

Heywood's plays—Johan Johan, for instance—bear some resemblance to contemporary French farce; but, with that exception—and the possible Dutch origin of Everyman—there is little trace of foreign influence in the English plays at which we have been looking. But Terence in the sixteenth century was probably more read in schools than he is at the present day; many of these plays were produced amid scholastic surroundings, and by the middle of the century the influence of Latin comedy upon English at last becomes apparent. In Ralph Roister Doister, Gammer Gurton's Needle, and Jacob and Esau we have plots definitely worked out, and the earliest instances of division into acts and scenes. With the examination of these three plays and of the tragedy of Ferrex and Porrex, written under the influence of Seneca, this section of the history of the drama will come to a convenient halting-place. The first of these, which was quoted from in the third edition of Wilson's Art of Logique in 1553, was the work of Nicholas Udall (b. 1505; d. 1556), who was headmaster of Eton College from about 1534 till his dismissal for immorality in 1541, was employed in Protestant controversy under Edward VI., and yet remained in favour under Mary. During 1553 he acted as schoolmaster to the boys brought up in Bishop Gardiner's household, and from 1554 to a month before his death, in December 1556, as headmaster of Westminster school. On the ground of an allusion to a balladmonger (Jack Raker), also mentioned by Skelton, Udall's play has been referred to the period of his Eton headmastership—that is, before 1541; but the fact that it is not mentioned in the 1551 and 1552 editions of Wilson's Art of Logique suggests the year 1553, when he was acting as Bishop Gardiner's domestic schoolmaster, as a more likely date; and we may imagine, if so, that it was the success of the play which caused Queen Mary in 1554 to direct Udall to prepare dialogues and interludes for performance before her. In 1533 Udall had edited for scholastic use a selection of sentences entitled Floures for Latine spekyng selected and gathered out of Terence, and the same translated into Englysshe, which went through several editions; and this play, though essentially original, shows marked traces of his studies in Latin comedy. Ralph Roister Doister is a rich fool who believes that every woman loves him, a boaster and a coward (cf. the Miles Gloriosus). In Matthew Merygreeke, who gets money and good dinners on the score of imaginary services, while he mocks him behind his back, we have the typical 'parasite' of Greco-Latin comedy. Ralph insists on making love to Dame Custance, who is already affianced to Gawyn Goodlucke. Merygreeke, by changing the punctuation,¹ turns a love-letter written for Ralph by a scrivener into an open insult; and when the Dame remonstrates with him for helping Ralph to pester her, frankly gives his patron away. Ralph, attempting to carry off Dame Custance, is defeated by her and her wenches, and the play ends happily with the return of Goodlucke, the collapse of Ralph, and the reconciliation of Dame Custance and her lover. The scene in which, despite the Dame's loyalty, the suspicions of Goodlucke's messenger are aroused, may be quoted as one of the most human incidents in the play:

ACTUS IIIJ. SCÆNA IJJ.

CHRISTIAN CUSTANCE, SYM SURESBY, RALPH ROISTER, MATHEW MERYGREKE, TRUPENY.

C. C. What meane these lewde felowes thus to trouble me still?

Sym Suresby here perchance shal therof deme some yll,

And shall suspect in me some point of naughtinesse,
And they come hitherward. An, It

S. S. What is their businesse?

C. C. I have nought to them, nor they to me in sadnesse.

S. S. Let us hearken them; somewhat there is, I feare it.

R. R. I will speake out aloud best, that she may heare it.

M. M. Nay alas, ye may so feare hir out of hir wit.

R. R. By the crosse of my sworde, I will hurt hir no whit.

M. M. Will ye doe no harme in deede, shall I trust your worde?

A. R. By Roister Doisters fayth I will speake but in borde. jest

S. S. Let us hearken them, somewhat there is I feare it.

R. R. I will speake out aloud, I care not who heare it;

¹ For example, the opening lines are read as—

Swete maistresse, wheras I love you nothing at al,
Regarding your riches and substaunce chief of al,
For your personage, beaute, &c.;

whereas the stops should come, clumsily enough, after 'I love you,' and 'substaunce.' It is this passage that is quoted by Wilson as 'an example of soche doubtful writing, whiche by reason of pointing maie haue double sense, and contrarie meaning, taken out of an entrelude made by Nicolas Udal.'

Sirs, see that my harnesse, my tergat, and my shield,
Be made as bright now, as when I was laste in field,
As white as I shoulde to warre againe to morrowe;
For sicke shall I be, but I worke some folke sorow.
Therefore see that all shine as bright as saint George,
Or as doth a key newly come from the smith's forge.
I woulde have my sworde and harnesse to shine so bright,

That I might therwith dimme mine enimies sight;
I woulde have it cast beames as fast, I tell you playne,
As doth the glittryng grasse after a showre of raine.
And see that in case I shoulde neede to come to arming,
All things may be ready at a minutes warning;
For such chaunce may chaunce in an houre, do ye heare?

M. M. As perchance shall not chaunce againe in seven yeare.

R. R. Now draw we neare to hir, and here what shall be sayde.

M. M. But I woulde not have you make hir too muche afrayde.

R. R. Well founde! sweete wife (I trust) for al this your soure looke.

C. C. Wife, why cal ye me wife?

S. S. Wife? this gear goth acrook.

M. M. Nay, mistresse Custance, I warrant you our letter
Is not as we redde een now, but much better;
And where ye halfe stomaked this gentleman afore,
For this same letter, ye wyll love hym now therefore;
Nor it is not this letter, though ye were a queene,
That shoulde breake marriage betweene you twaine, I weene.

C. C. I did not refuse hym for the letters sake.

R. R. Then ye are content me for your husbände to take.

C. C. You for my husbände to take? nothing lesse truly.

R. R. Yea, say so, sweete spouse, afore straungers hardly.

M. M. And though I have here his letter of love with me,

Yet his ryng and tokens he sent, keepe safe with ye.

C. C. A mischiefe take his tokens, and him and thee too.
But what prate I with fooles? have I nought else to doo?

Come in with me Sym Suresby to take some repast.

S. S. I must, ere I drinke, by your leave, goe in all hast,
To a place or two, with earnest letters of his.

C. C. Then come drink here with me.

S. S. I thank you.

C. C. Do not misse.

You shall have a token to your maister with you.

S. S. No tokens this time, gramercies. God be with you.

[Exit.

C. C. Surely this fellowe misdeemeth some yll in me;
Which thing but God helpe, will go neere to spill me.

R. R. Yea, farewell fellow, and tell thy maister Goodlucke

That he commeth to late of thys blossome to plucke.

Let him keepe him there still, or at least wise make no hast,

As for his labour hither he shall spende in wast.

His betters be in place now.

M. M. As long as it will hold.

C. C. I will be even with thee, thou beast;
Thou mayest be bolde.

R. R. Will ye have us then?

C. C. I will never have thee.

R. R. Then will I have you?

C. C. No, the devill shal have thee.

I have gotten this houre more shame and harme by thee,
Then all thy life thou canst do me honestlie.

Of our other two comedies, the second, A newe, mery, and wittie Comedie or Interlude, treating upon the Historie of Jacob and Esau, has obtained less attention than it deserves, perhaps because of its Scriptural subject; it is, however, really a comedy, and a very pleasantly and brightly written one. Besides the Scriptural characters there are two neighbours, an old nurse, and three servants—Ragau, the unwilling attendant of Esau in his hunting; Mido, a boy who leads the blind Isaac; and Abra, 'a little wench, servant to Rebecca.' Mido, who practises walking with his eyes shut against the day when he may himself be blind, and offers to 'scud like a little elf' on a message, is a really delightful small boy; and Ragau is an admirable comic servant, his unkind treatment by Esau being skilfully emphasised to deprive the latter of the spectators' sympathy. The earliest extant edition of the play is dated 1568, but it was licensed in 1557–58, the probable date of its composition. Without any specific evidence it has been attributed to William Hunslet (1530?–1597), a minor poet who versified some psalms in 1549, and was entrusted with the charge of the children of the Chapel Royal by Queen Elizabeth, during whose reign he published several volumes of verse with pleasant titles, such as A Hivful of Honey, A Handful of Honeysuckles, &c.

Our third comedy, Gammer Gurton's Needle, comes still farther over the Elizabethan border, for it was played at Christ's College, Cambridge, in 1566, and this (despite the earlier licensing of a play called Dycon the Bedlam, a familiar character who appears in Gammer Gurton's Needle) was the probable date of composition. The earliest extant edition is one published in 1575, and in this it is said to have been 'made by Mr S. M[aste]r of Art.' This Mr S. was long identified with John Still, afterwards Bishop of Bath and Wells; but in an edition of the play in Gayley's Representative English Comedies (1903), Dr Henry Bradley showed that the real author was a certain William Stevenson, Fellow of Christ's College, Cambridge, hitherto unknown to fame. (Brett-Smith edited this comedy in the Percy Reprints series in 1920.) The play itself suffers sadly from its prolongation through the five acts, which had now apparently become the fashion. How Gammer Gurton lost her needle while mending her husband's breeches, and how every one in turn was suspected of the theft till the said husband, on sitting down, became painfully aware of its presence in the mended garment, offered an excellent subject for an interlude on the lines of those of John Heywood, but is rather a thin subject for a comedy. On the other hand, Gammer Gurton's Needle is well written and full of rustic humour, and is notable, moreover, for having preserved to us the old drinking-song :

I can not eate but lytle meate,
my stomache is not good ;
But sure I thinke that I can drynke, with him that weares a hood.
Thoughe I go bare, take ye no care,
I am nothinge a-colde,
I stuffe my skyn so full within of joly good Ale and olde.
Backe and syde, go bare, go bare ;
booth foote and hande go colde ;
But belly, god send the good ale inoughe,
whether it be new or olde.

From this convivial song, of which this one verse must suffice as a specimen, we turn to our first English tragedy. This was published in 1565 by William Griffith, under the title The Tragedie of Gorboduc, 'whereof three Actes were wrytten by Thomas Nortone, and the two last by Thomas Sackvyle. Set forthe as the same was shewed before the Quenes most excellent Majestie, in her highnes court of Whitehall, the xvij day of January Anno Domini, 1561. By the Gentlemen of th' ynner Temple in London.' Five years later another edition was issued by John Day, under the title of The Tragedie of Ferrex and Porrex. In the preface to this, William Griffith is scoffed at as 'one W. G. [who] getting a copie therof at some yong mans hand, that lacked a litle money and much discretion,' had taken advantage of the absence of the authors to 'put it forth exceedingly corrupted,' a statement which rather exaggerates the faults in the first issue.

'The argument of the Tragedie' is thus given :

Gorboduc, King of Brittain, divided his realme in his life time to his sonnes, Ferrex and Porrex. The sonnes fell to discention. The yonger killed the elder. The mother, that more dearly loved the elder, for revenge killed the yonger. The people, moved with the crueltie of the fact, rose in rebellion and slew both father and mother. The nobilitie assembled and most terribly destroyed the rebels. And afterwarde for want of issue of the prince whereby the succession of the crowne became uncertaine, they fell to civill warre, in which both they and many of their issues were slaine, and the land for a long time almost desolate and miserably wasted.

For once English literature had come under a foreign influence which, in appearance at least, was stifling and harmful. Even in this case the reality was far otherwise, for to receive the conception of the tragic drama in any form was a great gift, though we may well lament that it came from the Latin rhetorician Seneca, rather than from Æschylus, Sophocles, or Euripides. The latter, however, were but just beginning to be read, and Seneca to the men of the sixteenth century still stood out as the chief ancient tragedian, just as Plautus and Terence were chiefs in comedy, and his lifeless, unactable plays, with their long, declamatory speeches and their absence of action, were regarded, even twenty years later by so good a critic as Sir Philip Sidney, as the true models of the tragic drama. How this model was displaced belongs to the story of the Elizabethan drama. Here, meanwhile, is the beginning of Act v. in this first English tragedy :

Clotyn. Did ever age bring forth such tirants harts ?
The brother hath bereft the brothers life,
The mother she hath died her cruell handes
In bloud of her owne sonne, and now at last
The people loe, forgetting trouth and love,
Contemning quite both law and loyall hart,
Even they have slaine their soveraigne lord and queene.

Mandud. Shall this their traitorous crime unpunished rest ?
Even yet they cease not—caryed on with rage
In their rebellious routes—to threaten still
A new bloudshed unto the princes kinne ;
To slay them all and to uproote the race
Both of the king and queene, so are they moved
With Porrex death ; wherin they falsely charge
The giltlesse king, without desert at all ;
And traitorously have murdered him therefore,
And eke the queene.

Tragedy, be it noted, has brought with it its appropriate metre, blank verse ; but to account for this we must now take up the history of English poetry as distinct from the drama.

Denying that interludes are derived from spiritual plays, Brandl urges that the Germans had interludiums in the thirteenth century of quite different origin. Creizenach agrees with E. K. Chambers that 'interludium is not a ludus in the interval of something else, but a ludus carried on between (inter) two or more performers.' Short farces, he maintains, were highly popular in mediæval England (as in France and Germany), although but one—and that fragmentary—viz. Interludium de Clerico et Puella (apparently early fourteenth century), has come down to us. Recent research tends to show that, in its beginnings, English drama was by no means free from foreign influence.

At the sale of the Mostyn Plays in 1919 there came to light (and passed into American hands for £3400) a long-lost play called Fulgens and Lucres (printed c. 1530; facsimile ed. 1921), by Henry Medwall. This is our earliest extant interlude, and one of the best of its kind. Medwall was a chaplain in Morton's household, and the play doubtless dates from before the archbishop's death in 1500. The source of the plot has been traced to Bonaccorso's De Vera Nobilitate, an English version of a French translation of which was published by Caxton in a Cicero volume in 1481. This drama, in which two wooers, one of high birth and wealth, one of real virtue, plead their cause before Lucres, has a comic underplot, and has been hailed as the first English Romantic play. In a paper (printed 1922) on 'The Beginnings of the English Secular and Romantic Drama,' which he read before the Shakespeare Association, A. W. Reed argued that in Fulgens and Lucres and other plays printed by the Rastells we have 'a body of early secular drama informed by a new spirit,' which may be traced to the household of Morton. 'It was the spirit of liberation, romance, and variety, looking abroad for new dramatic material, and finding it in Italy, France, and Spain. Of this new school Medwall appears to be the head. Rastell was Medwall's disciple as well as printer, but in Rastell's own work there is displayed an almost ill-balanced eagerness to assume the rôle of the philosophical guide. No such charge can be brought against his son-in-law, John Heywood, whose satire is at all times tempered by the spirit of laughter.' Reed associates Sir Thomas More himself with the Parlourer and Frere and Johan Johan, and concludes that this new drama was 'checked by political circumstances before it had quite freed itself from the trammels of the moral interlude, but it pointed the way to the Romantic Drama of Shakespeare much more definitely than any body of work that followed it for the next fifty years.' See Reed's Early Tudor Drama for the More Circle, and Bibliography, p. 162.

Wyatt and Surrey.

Here, with Wyatt and Surrey, we come again to the really living poetry which we quitted at Chaucer's death, and these two writers, in a far truer sense than Lydgate and Hoccleve, are his immediate successors, owing something to his own example, and much to the Italian influences to which he himself was so greatly indebted.

Like Chaucer himself—and the point is of some importance—Wyatt and Surrey were no needy clerics, bound to a professional didacticism, but were connected, only much more highly, with the court, and lived interesting and crowded lives. The elder of the two, Thomas Wyatt, was the son of a Sir Henry Wyatt who stood well in the favour of Henry VII. He was born in 1503 at his father's castle at Allington, in Kent, and entered St John's College, Cambridge, at the age of twelve. In 1520 he took his master's degree, and married Elizabeth, daughter of Thomas Brooke, Lord Cobham. His service at court seems to have begun as an esquire of the body to the king, a dignity to which Chaucer rose through preliminary stages. In 1527 he enjoyed another of Chaucer's experiences, attaching himself to the suite of Sir John Russell in a mission to Italy, in the course of which he visited Venice, Ferrara, Bologna, Florence, and Rome. In 1528–32 he was Marshal at Calais, and in 1533 was Chief Ewer at the coronation of Anne Boleyn, his youthful attachment to whom was nipped in the bud by the king, and afterwards turned to scandal by the malicious. Knighted in March 1536, in May–June he was imprisoned in the Tower, having quarrelled with the Duke of Suffolk at the time of the queen's downfall. In October he was employed against the rebels in Lincolnshire, and in 1537 was sent, against his will, on an embassy to the Emperor Charles V., not completed till May 1539. After he had been home but a short time he was sent on another mission to the emperor; but in July 1540, shortly after his second return, came the execution of Thomas Cromwell, the head of the Protestant party, to which Wyatt belonged, and he was promptly accused by one of his late colleagues of treachery and unseemly behaviour during his Spanish embassy, and again imprisoned in the Tower. A lively and straightforward defence procured his acquittal, but his connection with Spain cost him his life after all, for in October 1542 he caught a chill in riding hastily to Falmouth to escort a Spanish ambassador to London, and died of fever at Sherborne, in Dorsetshire.

The career of Wyatt's younger contemporary, Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey (a title of courtesy), was even more eventful. His grandfather, Thomas, Earl of Surrey, had fought against Henry VII. at Bosworth field, but was pardoned and subsequently created Duke of Norfolk for his victory at Flodden. On the death of that duke, in 1524, the poet's father, another Thomas Howard, became Duke of Norfolk, and he himself, then a boy of seven or eight (he was probably born in 1516 or the following year), enjoyed the second title of Earl of Surrey. His youth was passed between Tendring Hall in Suffolk and Kenninghall in Norfolk, and he was fortunate in having as his tutor John Clerke, an Oxford scholar, who had travelled in Italy, and knew and wrote both French and Italian as well as Latin. From 1529, or earlier, Surrey was much in the company of the king's illegitimate son, the Duke of Richmond and Somerset, who in November 1533 was married to his sister, Lady Mary Howard, a union abruptly ended by the bridegroom's death in 1536. In October 1536 Surrey was knighted, and commanded a force sent against the Lincolnshire rebels. In 1537 he suffered a polite imprisonment at Windsor for a blow given within the precincts of the court, and wrote two of his happiest poems, one recalling an earlier stay there with the Duke of Richmond, the other in honour of the nine-year-old Elizabeth Fitzgerald, daughter of the Earl of Kildare, who had died a prisoner in the Tower in 1534. The poor little maid was now a pet at the English court, and Surrey wrote this sonnet, which has come down to us with the title, 'Description and praise of his love Geraldine':

From Tuskane¹ came my ladie's worthy race:
Fair Florence was sometime her auncient seate:
The Western yle, whose pleasaunt shore doth face
Wilde Camber's² cliffs, did geve her lively heate:
Fostered she was with milke of Irishe brest:
Her sire an Erle: her dame³ of princes' blood.
From tender yeres in Britain she doth rest,
With kinges child,⁴ where she tasteth costly food.

Honsdon did first present her to mine eyne :
 Bright is her hewe, and Geraldine she hight.
 Hampton me taught to wishe her first for mine :
 And Windsor, alas, doth chase me from her sight.
 Her beauty of kind, her vertues from above—
 Happy is he that can obtaine her love.

² Cambria—i.e. Wales. ³ Elizabeth Grey, granddaughter of Elizabeth Woodville, wife of Edward IV. ⁴ The Princess Mary.

In other headings to his poems as first published Surrey is spoken of as 'the lover,' and there is mention of 'his love' and 'his lady,' but this is the only explicit reference to Elizabeth Fitzgerald. Drayton, however, in his Heroical Epistles, inserts an imaginary letter from 'Geraldine' to Surrey, and in Nash's Jack Wilton (see below at page 332) Surrey is represented as touring Italy (where he never set foot) as a knight-errant in her service. Working on these hints, in editing Surrey's poems in 1815, Dr G. F. Nott invented fancy headings, into which 'the Fair Geraldine' is dragged on every possible occasion, without any real justification, and the legend is not yet quite dead.

In May 1541 Surrey was created a Knight of the Garter; in July 1542 he suffered a short imprisonment in the Fleet for challenging one John à Leigh, and next January took part in a foolish frolic in which stones were shot from cross-bows at the windows of London citizens, and also at the houses of ill-fame on the south side of the river. The Mayor complained to the Privy Council, and on 1st April Surrey was again committed to the Fleet. Here he wrote 'A Satire against the Citizens of London,' beginning (in Nott's edition):

London! hast thou accused me
 Of breach of laws? the root of strife!
 Within whose breast did burn to see
 So fervent hot thy dissolute life,
 That even the hate of sins, that grow
 Within thy wicked walls so rife,
 For to break forth did covet so,
 That terror could it not repress.

Before the Privy Council Surrey had simply confessed that, 'touching the stone-bows, he could not deny but he had very evil doings therein,' and there seems no reason for taking this satire as seriously meant. In the autumn he joined the English force attacking Landrecies, afterwards visiting the Emperor Charles V. at Valenciennes. On his return he was appointed the king's cup-bearer, and about this time began the building of a mansion at St Leonard, near Norwich, over which he exhausted his means. In 1544 he was present at the capture of Boulogne and at the unsuccessful siege of Montreuil. In August 1545 he was appointed governor of Boulogne, then attacked by the French, and held his position there amid great difficulties till his recall in March 1546. At the end of this year the imminence of the king's death brought the strife between the Howards and the Seymours to a crisis. On 2nd December Surrey was cited before the Privy Council, and on the 12th both he and his father were arrested and sent to the Tower. A charge of making pretensions to the crown by using the arms of Edward Confessor, to which his family had a right, was trumped up against Surrey. He was condemned by a packed jury on 13th January 1547, and beheaded six days later.

Round Wyatt and Surrey, whose varied lives brought English poetry into a new atmosphere, sprang up, as Puttenham tells us in The Arte of English Poesie (see infra, page 266), 'a new company of courtly makers,' of whom Thomas Lord Vaux (1511-62), Sir Francis Bryan (d. 1549), Nicholas Grimald (1519-62), and Thomas Churchyard (1520?-1604) are known to us by name. With no patrons to please, it was characteristic of the 'courtly makers' for more than a century to let their poetry be passed round only among their friends, and it was thus not until June 1557 that (from the press of Richard Tottel, whence its familiar name of 'Tottel's Miscellany') there appeared a thin volume entitled Songes and Sonettes written by the right honorable Lorde Henry Howard, late Earle of Surrey, Sir T. Wyate the Elder, and other. This was reprinted, with alterations, the next month; went through six other editions (1559, 1565, 1567, 1574, 1585, and 1587); and formed a kind of 'Golden Treasury' on which the Elizabethans were brought up (ed. Rollins, 1928-29). The first edition contained forty poems by Surrey, ninety by Wyatt, forty by Grimald, and ninety-five of 'Uncertain Auctours'; the second edition omitted thirty of Grimald's, and added six of Wyatt's and many of uncertain authorship.

In addition to any defects due to posthumous editing, we must remember that Wyatt, in leading English poetry into fresh fields, had to contend with many difficulties. The printed editions of Chaucer were so corrupt as to obscure his melody; Wyatt was probably hardly a good enough Italian scholar to catch the secret of that of Petrarch, while English poetical diction had to be rescued from its dreadful polysyllables and built up anew. It is, therefore, not surprising to find that Wyatt sometimes halts between what he took to be a Chaucerian pronunciation and that of his own day; that, in introducing the sonnet into English, he neither followed Petrarch correctly nor hit on the modification of three quatrains and a couplet, invented by Surrey, and so gloriously handled by Shakespeare; and that his more formal versé is frequently slow of movement and sometimes impossible to scan. As chance would have it, the first sonnet of his writing in 'Tottel's Miscellany' exhibits all his faults at their worst, and has more than once been singled out for unkind quotation. If the reader will remember the Chaucerian spellings 'resoun,' 'sesoun,' 'condicioun,' 'facyoun,' Wyatt will be seen to better advantage in this, entitled 'Of Change in Mind':

Eche man me tell'th I change most my devise :
 And on my faith, me think it good resoun

To change purpose, like after the season.
 For in ech case to kepé still one guise
 Is mete for them, that would be taken wise.
 And I am not of such condición,
 But treated after a divers fashion :
 And therupon my diversnesse doth rise.
 But you, this diversnesse that blamen most,
 Change you no more, but still after one rate
 Treat you me well : and kepe you in that state,
 And while with me doth dwell this weried gost,
 My word nor I shall not be variable,
 But alwaies one, your owne, both firm and stable.

But though it is part of Wyatt's glory to have introduced the sonnet into English, it is not by his imitations of Petrarch, or his own essays on the same lines, that his contribution to our literature may most fairly be judged. His real innovation was the revival of that lyrical mood which had produced some charming snatches of English verse in the thirteenth century and had then died away, even Chaucer having but a faint touch of it. In Wyatt it is predominant, and to illustrate it a few quotations are worth much disquisition. Here, from Nott's edition of Surrey and Wyatt (1816), which contains many poems not in 'Tottel's Miscellany,' is one of the most often quoted of Wyatt's lyrics :

Forget not yet the tried intent
 Of such a truth as I have meant ;
 My great travail so gladly spent,
 Forget not yet !

Forget not yet when first began
 The weary life ye know, since whan
 The suit, the service none tell can ;
 Forget not yet !

Forget not yet the great assays,
 The cruel wrong, the scornful ways,
 The painful patience in delays,
 Forget not yet !

Forget not, oh forget not this,
 How long ago hath been, and is
 The mind that never meant amiss.
 Forget not yet !

Forget not then thine own approv'd,
 The which so long hath thee so lov'd,
 Whose steadfast faith yet never mov'd :
 Forget not this !

Scarcely less well known than this is the stout-hearted poem, 'To a ladie to answere directly with yea or nay,' for which we have the advantage of Mr Arber's reprint of Tottel's Miscellany (1870) :

Madame, withouten many wordes,
 Once I am sure, you will or no.
 And if you will, ther leave your boordes, jests
 And use your wit, and shew it so :
 For with a beck you shall me call.
 And if of one, that burns alway,
 Ye have pity or ruth at all,
 Answer him fayer with Yea, or Nay.
 If it be Yea, I shall be faine.
 If it be Nay, frends as before.
 You shall another man obtain,
 And I mine owne and yours no more.

Another poem, entitled 'The lover praieth not to be disdained, refused, mistrusted, nor forsaken,' is a good example of the cumulative effect which Wyatt sometimes attains :

Disdaine me not without desert,
 Nor leave me not so sodenly,
 Sins well ye wot that in my hert
 I meane ye not but honestly.

Refuse me not, without cause why,
 Nor thinke me not to be unjust,
 Sins that by lotte of fantasy,
 This carefull knot neades knit I must.

Mistrust me not, though some there be
 That fain would spot my steadfastnesse :
 Beleve them not, sins that ye se
 The proosse is not as they expresse.

Forsake me not, till I deserve :
 Nor hate me not, tyll I offend.
 Destroy me not, tyll that I swerve,
 But sins ye know what I intend,

Disdaine me not, that am your owne :
 Refuse me not, that am so true :
 Mistrust me not, till all be knowne :
 Forsake me not, ne for no new.

There is a touch of another kind in the poem beginning, 'They flee from me that sometime did me seke ;' and lyrics which contain such stanzas as—

Blame not my Lute ! for he must sound
 Of this or that as liketh me ;
 For lack of wit the Lute is bound
 To give such tunes as pleaseth me ;
 Though my songs be somewhat strange
 And speak such words as touch thy change, Blame not my Lute ;

or,

And wilt thou leave me thus
 That hath lov'd thee so long
 In wealth and woe among ?
 And is thy heart so strong
 As for to leave me thus ?
 Say nay ! say nay !—

in their feeling, their melody, and their simplicity of phrase break away altogether from the wordy rhetoric of Wyatt's predecessors, and are a worthy prelude to the best Elizabethan verse.

Besides his sonnets and lyrics, Wyatt versified the Penitential Psalms, not very happily, and also wrote some satires, which may be illustrated by a few lines from that entitled 'Of the Courtiers Life, written to John Poyns' :

My Poyns, I can not frame my tune to fayne,
 To cloke the truth for prayse, without desert,
 Of them that list all vice for to retaine. . . .
 I am not he such eloquence to bost,
 To make the crow in singyng as the swanne ;
 Nor call the lyon of coward beastes the most,
 That can not take a mouse as the cat can :
 And he that dieth for honger of the golde,
 Call him Alexander, and say that Pan
 Passeth Appollo in musike manifold,

Midar

Praise Sir Topas for a noble tale,
 And scorne the story that the knight tolde.
 Prayse him for counsell that is dronke of ale,
 Grinne when he laughs that beareth all the sway,
 Frowne when he frownes and grone when he is pale,
 On others lust to hang both night and day.
 None of these poyntes would ever frame in me,
 My wit is nought, I can not learne the way.

The satiric note of indignation rings true in these lines, carelessly written as some of them are. For such careless lines Wyatt has suffered much in critical esteem, but he had the root of the matter in him as no English poet had had since Chaucer, and deserves, for what he did as well as for when he did it, a higher place among English poets than is usually assigned him.

In turning from Wyatt to Surrey it is usual to contrast the smoothness and finish of the younger poet with the crabbedness of the elder. If we look only to their sonnets the contrast is obvious enough, for Surrey had the wit to invent the spurious but effective sonnet form of three quatrains and a couplet—a metre in which smoothness is lightly attained—and easily surpasses Wyatt in these poems. His sonnet to Geraldine has already been given; for another we may take his farewell to his squire, Clere, who saved his life at the cost of his own in a skirmish outside Montreuil:

Norfolk sprung thee, Lambeth holds thee dead,
 Clere of the county of De Cleremont hight; called
 Within the womb of Ormond's race thou 'rt bred,
 And sawst thy cousin crowned in thy sight. Anne Boleyn
 Shelton for love, Surrey for lord thou chase;
 (Ay me! while life did last that league was tender)
 Tracing whose steps thou sawest Kelsal blaze,
 Landrecy burnt and batter'd Boulogne render.
 At Montreuil gates, hopeless of all recure, recovery
 Thine Earl, half dead, gave in thy hand his will;
 Which cause did thee this pining death procure,
 Ere summers four times seven thou couldst fulfill.
 Ah! Clere! if love had bootied, care, or cost,
 Heaven had not won, nor earth so timely lost.

The allusiveness of this closely packed sonnet no doubt hinders its popularity, but not many finer have been written, and the warm personal feeling which runs through it is not often found in Surrey's poetry. It appears in a lighter vein in the poem written during his imprisonment in Windsor:

So cruell prison how coulede betide, alas,
 As proude Windsor? where I in lust & joye,
 With a kinges sonne, my childishe yeres did passe,
 In greater feast than Priams sonnes of Troy:
 Where eche swete place returns a taste full sower,
 The large grene courtes, where we were wont to hove, hover
 With eyes cast up into the maydeas tower,
 And easie sighes, such as folke drawe in love:
 The stately seates, the ladies bright of hewe:
 The daunces shorte, long tales of great delight:
 With wordes and lokes, that tygers coulede but rewe,
 When eche of us did pleade the other's right:
 The palme play, where, dispoyled for the game, stripped
 With dazed eyes oft we by gleames of love,

Have mist the ball, and got sight of our dame,
 To baite her eyes, whiche kept the leads above. . . .
 O place of blisse, renuer of my woes,
 Geve me accompt, where is my noble fere: comrade
 Whom in thy walles thou doest eche night enclose.
 To other leefe, but unto me most dere.
 Eccho, alas, that dothe my sorow rewe,
 Returns therto a hollow sounde of playnte.
 Thus I alone, where all my fredome grewe,
 In prison pyne, with bondage and restraite,
 And with remembrance of the greater greefe
 To banish the lesse, I find my chief releefe.

Surrey's lyrics are both fewer and less striking than those of Wyatt, but in 'A praise of his Love':

HENRY HOWARD, EARL OF SURREY.

From the Picture in the National Portrait Gallery.

wherin he reproveth them that compare their Ladies with his, he is seen at his best:

Geve place ye lovers, here before
 That spent your bostes & bragges in vaine,
 My Ladie's beawtie passeth more
 The best of yours I dare well sayen,
 Than doth the sonne the candle light,
 Or brightest day the darkest night.

And thereto hath a trothe as just
 As had Penelope the fayre.
 For what she saith ye may it trust,
 As it by writing sealed were.
 And vertues hath she many moe,
 Than I with pen have skill to showe.

I could rehearse, if that I wolde,
 The whole effect of Nature's plaint,
 When she had lost the perfit mold,
 The like to whom she could not paint.
 With wringyng handes howe she dyd cry,
 And what she said, I know it, I.

I knowe, she swore with ragyng mynd:
 Her kingdom onely set apart,
 There was no losse, by lawe of kind,

That could have gone so nere her hart.
And this was chiefly all her payne,
She could not make the lyke agayne.

Sith Nature thus gave her the prayse,
To be the chiefest worke she wrought:
In faith, me thinke, some better waies
On your behalfe might well be sought,
Than to compare (as ye have done)
To matche the candle with the sonne.

Our last extract—part of Æneas's tale of the sack of Troy—is from Surrey's translation of the second and fourth books of Virgil's Æneid, published, after his death, in 1557, the same year as the Songes and Sonettes. This book has a double importance, first as our earliest English example of verse translation from a classical author as opposed to adaptation, and secondly and chiefly as written in the blank verse, the invention of which will always preserve Surrey's name in the history of English poetry:

Whom when I saw assembled in such wise,
So desperately the battail to desire:
Then furthermore thus sayd I unto them,
O ye yong men of courage stout, in vaine
For nought ye strive to save the burning town.
What cruel fortune hath betid: ye see
The Gods out of the temples all ar fled,
Through whoes might long this empire was mainteind;
Their altares eke are left both wast and voyd.
But if your will be bent with me to prove
That uttermost that now may us befall,
Then let us dye, and runne amid our foes:
To vanquisht folk despeir is only hope.
With this the yong men's courage did encrease,
And through the dark, like to the ravening wolves,
Whom raging furie of their empty mawes
Drives from their den, leaving with hungry throtes
Their whelpes behinde, among our foes we ran
Upon their swerdes, unto apparant death,
Holding alway the chiefe strete of the town,
Coverd with the close shadowes of the night.
Who can expresse the slaughter of that night,
Or tell the number of the corpses slaine,
Or can in teres bewaile them worthely?
The auncient, famous citie falleth down,
That many yeres did hold such seignorie.

The blank verse halts at times, but to have established the use of the metre in English poetry was a great achievement, bearing out the chief claim that may be made for both Surrey and Wyatt, that they opened new fields, foreshadowed new possibilities, for our literature. Without Wyatt and Surrey as forerunners the Elizabethans had never entered into their kingdom, and from them our modern poetry takes its beginning. The stretches of green pasture and fair flowers in the long journey we have taken since Layamon's Brut have been too many and too fair (at least to a lover of old things) to compare them to oases in a wilderness, travelling through which we have at last reached a Mount Pisgah and the sight of a fairer land. But in both poetry and the drama, and to a less extent in prose, the reign of Elizabeth, despite its dull beginnings, marks a new epoch in English literature, and brings to a close the epoch of the Middle Ages and Early Renaissance.

Skeat edited the various texts (1866-86); there are modern English versions by Skeat (1907) and K. M. Warren (1913).

SCOTTISH LITERATURE.

IN building up the great fabric of English literature Scottish writers have had no unimportant share. One of the very oldest extant documents in the English tongue is the inscription on the Ruthwell Cross; and more than once in our history Scotsmen have been our foremost writers. When we now speak of Scottish writers and Scottish literature, we think almost solely of the Teutonic tongue of the Scottish Lowlands. But at the beginnings of English speaking and writing, the words Scot, Scottish, and their derivatives meant something widely different. Scoti—a Latin formation, possibly from a Cymric or Welsh word—is first used of some of the inhabitants of Ireland by Ammianus Marcellinus, in describing the recent inroads of the Scots and Picts into Roman Britain in 360 A.D. When Bede was writing at Jarrow on the Tyne early in the eighth century, and for two hundred years later, Scotia meant Ireland, and Ireland only. Scoti from this Irish mother-country had, indeed, established themselves in Argyll, and in the ninth century united themselves with the Picts to form the kingdom of Alba. But it is not till well on in the eleventh century (about 1034) that Scotia is used for any part of North Britain, and then only for Alba, the country north of the firths of Forth and Clyde—excluding, however, Argyll, the first headquarters of the Scots, as that region was now overrun by Norsemen. Scotia was a Latin form; but in like manner Scottaland or Scotland, an English word entirely foreign to the Celtic peoples and their speech, was the term used by Anglians and Saxons for Ireland at first, and afterwards for the northernmost kingdom of Britain. Picts as well as Scots now spoke a Celtic tongue of the Goidelic, Gaelic, or Irish type. But the blood of the Picts, much the most numerous people in the north, was probably in the main not Celtic at all. The Picts had been Celticised by invaders from the south; probably the bulk of them were descendants of one of the swarthy savage races—sometimes called Ivernian—who occupied Britain and Ireland before the first Celtic immigrants came hither from the Continent.

The history of the country south of the firths—by far the most important part of what we now call Scotland—is wholly distinct. Possibly the descendants of the neolithic man survived through all comings and goings; a wave of Goidelic invasion had no doubt flooded the south of Scotland, and only partly passed on; but during the Roman occupation of Britain it was a British or Cymric country, and in the fifth and following centuries it was overrun and occupied by invading Angles. How far the new-comers exterminated or expelled the Welsh or other natives, and how far they absorbed them, is not known; but it seems certain that Lothian and the Merse became at least as English or Teutonic as the most English part of England. Early in the seventh century Lothian and Berwickshire formed an integral part of the dominions of the most powerful English kings of the age. They were included in Bernicia, the northern, as Deira was the southern, of the Northumbrian kingdoms. Edwin, or Eadwine, was king of Northumbria (617–633), and overlord of most of the rest of England; his sway was undisputed from Humber to Forth, and from sea to sea; Edinburgh, founded or refounded by him, is still a monument to the great Northumbrian; and the specifically English name of the Scottish capital—Edwinesburch or Edwinesburg in early twelfth-century documents—testifies to the fact that the original burch or fortress stood on old English ground.

Strathclyde, bordering on Lothian, was a Welsh kingdom; Galloway was a distinct Pictish-Gaelic principality. Edinburgh, Lothian, and the Merse had for centuries no connection with the Scots save through their missionary enterprise. Strathclyde and the south of Scotland seem to have been partially Christianised before the coming of the Angles; the Irish Columba was at work among the Picts in the sixth century. Not till 627 did Northumbria welcome the gospel at the hands of Paulinus, the Roman missionary from Kent. The permanent conversion was, however, really begun in 635 by Irish missionaries from Iona, who, after thirty years' labour, were expelled as schismatics on the triumph of Roman over Celtic forms. After that revolution a Northumbrian bishopric was founded at Abercorn in West Lothian in 681; and by 730 Ninian's foundation at Whithorn was an Anglian see.

In the tenth century Northumbria had fallen on evil times: the kingdom was at an end, and great part of it was held by the heathen Danes. The kings of Alba, now coming to be called Scotia, made inroads and assaults; the harassed Northumbrian Earls could hardly resist; and in 1018, when Earl Eadulf was defeated in a bloody battle at Carham, Northumbria benorth the Tweed was formally ceded to the Celtic but Christian kings of Scots, whom doubtless the Angles preferred to pagan Danish masters. But it was on condition that Lothian should retain its Anglian laws and customs; of its Anglian speech there never was question. The great Danish king Cnut, now firmly established on the throne of England, did not disturb this arrangement, which is the chief turning-point in the history of the northern kingdom. The last addition to its population, the alien Anglian people, were soon to become the dominant element in the north; to substitute their North-English or Anglian speech for the various Celtic tongues spoken in Alba, Strathclyde, and Galloway; to give Scotland their laws and usages; and to make Scottish civilisation what it has been. The monarchy identified itself with its new Anglian subjects, and became gradually alienated from the original Celtic polity. To speak of the Lowlands as Scotland is really a misnomer, unless it be remembered that the name denotes a political alliance only: in blood and tongue and temper the people of the Lowlands, though no doubt a very mixed race, especially in the west, are English rather than Scottish, and even in the west are as English as the people of Lancashire or Cumberland. They are English in a sense that the southern English are not—Anglian and not Saxon. The Lowlanders of Scotland are Scottish very much as the people of Brandenburg are Prussian. The Brandenburgers, though they were long subjects of the Prussian monarchy, are in no wise Prussian in blood, and are not even akin to the Prussians proper, the Slavonic or Lithuanian inhabitants of the eastern parts of the old kingdom. The cession of Lothian in the eleventh century did not make it Scottish save in its political connection. Contrariwise, it was the Anglian Lowlander who became the 'typical Scot,' the very antithesis of the Celt. According to the authorities the Celt is amiable, winsome, impressionable, changeable and easily discouraged, voluble in speech, witty and humorous, instinct with poetry and the love of art—'Titanic' even; whereas, we are told, the Englishman is hard, matter-of-fact, repellent, pragmatic, unsympathetic, dull in perceptions. Yet on the same showing the Englishman is a very Celt—courteous, debonair, chattering, laughing, and effusive—as compared with the 'typical Scot,' who is described as dogged, dour, unimpressionable, undemonstrative, obtuse to wit and sprightliness, slow and uncouth of speech, persistent, self-assertive, and cautious and 'practical' to a pitch undreamt of in England, though (in the heroes and heroines of novels especially!) possessed of certain surprising and contradictory saving graces. Verily the Lowland Scots are Anglis ipsis Angliores; and the actual Highlander himself more closely resembles the typical Scot than he does the theoretical Celt.

After the cession of Lothian, as before, it was Northumbrian English that was the speech of the people there. Until the cession, Lothian was part of an English kingdom; and Edinburgh was well within the limits of the country in whose tongue the first great writers of English spoke and wrote. Cædmon and Bæda, Cynewulf and Alcuin, spoke the tongue common to York and Edinburgh, not the tongue of London, Winchester, and Canterbury; and the great school or university of York, founded by Ecgberht, had grown to its highest fame ere Lothian ceased to be English territory in the fullest sense of the word. And it was a Lothian saint—St Cuthbert—who spoke in a vision to Ælfred in his dark days at Athelney, and encouraged him to make the stand that saved Britain from becoming Danish.

In the eleventh century Scotland had nearly attained its permanent limits, although Orkney, Shetland, the Western Isles, and Argyll remained Norwegian; and although Strathclyde and Galloway were not fully incorporated till after 1125. Scotland was not yet a nation in the twelfth century, but it was well on the way. It was in the eleventh century that the names Scotia and Scotland were applied to part of North Britain: the Lothians were from the twelfth century recognised as part of the kingdom the Angles (not the Celtic Scots) called Scotland; but not for long after this did the Angles of Lothian dream of calling themselves or their language Scottis. The Scottis tongue meant till the sixteenth century the Celtic or Gaelic language of the Highlanders. The kings of Scotland in the thirteenth century issued writs Scotis, Anglis, et Francis—to their Gaelic, Anglian, and Norman-French subjects. Fordun says his countrymen spoke some of them Scotic and some Teutonic; the earlier Lowland writers called the tongue they used Inglis or English—Barbour, Wyntoun, Blind Harry, Dunbar, all professed to be writing Inglis. Dunbar not merely professed to write Inglis himself, but regards his own as essentially the same language with Chaucer's; Chaucer is the flower 'of oure tong,' 'of oure Inglisch all the lycht.' It was 'in Inglis tong' that Kennedy, sneered at by Dunbar as a Carrick Highlander, undertook to instruct his ignorant countrymen. Gourlay, vicar of Dollar, burnt as a heretic in 1534, was charged with teaching his congregation to pray to God 'in Englishe;' and he admitted that, as his parishioners were rude and knew no Latin, it was forced on his conscience to teach them the ten commands 'in Englishe,' and the Lord's Prayer likewise 'in thair awin mother tounge.' Lyndsay wrote in Inglisch, and praised Douglas as 'of our Inglis rethorike the rose.' Gavin Douglas, writing in the very year Flodden was fought, and the author of the Complaynt of Scotlande, in the year after Pinkie—both at a time of special embitterment against the 'auld enemy' in the south—are the first Lowland writers who profess to write in Scottis. But the long wars between England and Scotland had bred in the northern kingdom such an increasing antipathy to the southern foes that the northerners more and more disliked to be in any way mixed up with the English name. And from the middle of the sixteenth century Scottis—later contracted to Scots, or in the English form Scottish and Scotch—superseded Inglis as the regular name for the Teutonic speech of southern Scotland; the form Scots now frequently used even by English writers not being properly a southern English word at all, but a foreign and borrowed form. Scots stands to Scottis much in the same relation as Scotch does to Scottish; the first two being the northern, the latter two the southern forms.

For centuries before and after the Conquest the Northumbrian from the Humber to the Forth was essentially the same tongue. But before, and especially during and after, the wars that led to the assertion of Scottish national independence at the beginning of the fourteenth century divergences became more and more marked. 'South of the Tweed and the Cheviots,' as Sir J. A. H. Murray has said (see 'Scotland' in Chambers's Encyclopædia), 'the Northumbrian sank from the rank of a literary language used by poets, preachers, and chroniclers, to that of a local dialect, or group of patois, overshadowed by the king's English of London, and more and more depressed under its influence. After 1400, or at least after the fifteenth century, it disappears from the view of the student. But north of the Tweed and Solway the Northumbrian remained the language of a court and a nation; it spread westward and northward over districts formerly occupied by British and Gaelic (or it may be Pictish) populations, from which it sustained modifications phonetic and structural; it received literary culture, and especially contracted alliances with French and Latin on its own account; so as to acquire by the close of the fifteenth century distinctive and strongly-marked features of its own not found in the cognate dialects in the north of England. From the close of the fourteenth to the beginning of the seventeenth century it was the vehicle of an extensive and in many respects brilliant literature, it was the medium of legislation and justice, and fulfilled every function of a national language. But a serious shock to its independent development was given by the Reformation, in consequence of the close relations between the leaders of that movement and the English Protestants, and the use of English books, especially of the English version of the Geneva Bible, printed at Edinburgh in 1576-79. Then followed the accession of James VI. to the crown of England, the transference of the seat of government to London, and the consequent disuse of the "Scottis toung" by the court and by the nobility, who found it desirable to speak the king's English, and gradually grew ashamed of their Scots. After this, few works were written in the native tongue, except such as were intended for merely local use. It became obsolete in public legal use at the time of the Commonwealth, and though retained a little longer in the local records of remote burghs and kirk-sessions, it disappeared from these also by 1707. But though it thus became obsolete in official and literary use, so that Scotsmen thenceforth wrote in English tinged more or less with Scotticisms, or words, phrases, and idioms derived from their native speech, it still continued, in several dialectal varieties, to be the vernacular of the people, and after a period of neglect it bloomed forth anew as the vehicle of ballad and lyric poetry, in Lady Wardlaw, Allan Ramsay, Burns, and their numerous fellow-singers.' But the modern Scots, as well as that used in the dialogue of novels by Sir Walter and his successors and imitators, is, as we shall see, a very different tongue from the old literary Scots, and is, indeed, very largely modern English written or pronounced in the Scottish manner.

The early literature of the Gael in Scotland—Columba and Adamnan, author, about 700, of the famous Vita Columba, were both Irish-born—can hardly be disentangled from that of Ireland. In the Middle Ages, though Scotsmen became familiar and prominent at foreign universities, Scotland produced few great thinkers or writers. Yet the Borders have a good (though not undisputed) claim to two of the most conspicuous European scholars of their time—Michael Scott in the earlier and Duns Scotus in the later years of the thirteenth century. Michael Scott, Aristotelian and philosopher, was even more eminent as astrologer and magician, and played a large part at the learned court of the Emperor Frederick II. Duns Scotus, the 'Doctor Subtilis' of the Franciscans, renowned alike for his learning and his originality, divided the allegiance of the Schoolmen with the Dominican Thomas Aquinas, and for centuries gave the name of Scotists to half the medieval theologians of Christendom. Their works, in Latin, deal with matters beyond our province.

Murray describes as Early Scottish all verse and prose down to about 1475—corresponding in time to the Middle English Period in England. Middle Scots comes down—not, of course, unaltered—to about 1650, when from a national speech the tongue had sunk to a dialect, and corresponds to early modern English. The most outstanding fact about the early Scottish language is that it is identical with contemporary north English, insomuch that we cannot from the language alone say on which side of the Border a book was written (see pages 43, 51). The similarity will be easily seen on comparing the specimens of the Scottish work of this period with the extracts from English Northumbrian books given above, such as the Cursor Mundi (page 47) or the writings of Richard of Hampole. The reader will find a specimen of northern English (not Scots) as it sounded to Chaucer's ears at page 72, and will recognise many characteristic northern forms still current in modern Scots—banes, atanes, rae for roe, bathe for both, gas (i.e. gaes) for goes. Even in Chaucer's southern English are many forms or pronunciations now preserved only in northern dialect, though not in origin peculiarly northern. Thus in our Chaucerian selections the northerner will note with interest such words or spellings as eyen, wood for mad, make for mate, souke for suck, &c.

Thomas the Rhymer, a famous but somewhat elusive personage, used to rank as the foremost name in early Scottish literature, in virtue of the authorship of Tristrem. But, as we have seen, there is no sufficient ground for holding that this poem was written north of the Border (page 44). The romance about his own adventures at the Elf-Queen's court was written long after his time, probably in England; and the prophecies for which he was famous can none of them be definitely traced to the thirteenth-century seer, or be quoted as rhymes dating from his age at all. The best-known Scottish authors of this early period are Barbour, a patriot whose fervour sometimes lifts his rugged lines to the level of poetry, and Wyntoun, who seldom rises above the doggerel of the rhyming chronicler. But along with and even above these should be ranked Huchown (see page 171), who has only recently come to his rights as a true and accomplished poet.

In date the author of the Kingis Quair no doubt falls within Murray's first period, but in most essentials belongs to the second great group of Scottish authors; whereas Blind Harry, though his work was most probably written after 1475, has affinity rather with the earlier company. For Chaucer fixes an epoch in Scottish not less markedly than in English literature, though his influence, marked in England in his own lifetime, was most conspicuous in Scotland well on in the next century; the first really artistic Scottish poets were disciples of Chaucer, and as poets outshone their English contemporaries. From Chaucer to the advent of Wyatt and Surrey and the greater Elizabethans—when Scottish poesy 'tholed eclipse'—the northerners had the best of it; they are much less monotonous and tedious than Gower, Lydgate, or Hoccleve; more attractive and less uncouth than Skelton. Lowell, their most grudging critic, admits that they have 'more meat' and substance in them than the southerners. The author of the Kingis Quair, and, two generations later, Henryson, Douglas, and Dunbar, studied Chaucer diligently, were influenced by him, made him to some extent their model. In so far they were Chaucerians; but they were Chaucerians with a difference. Neither the Kingis Quair, nor Henryson, nor Douglas approaches Chaucer in breadth of vision or catholicity of temper; Dunbar, satirical, vehement, caustic, is in temperament the least like Chaucer, and in his own way goes beyond him. With all of them it is easier to see the contrasts than the similarities to the master they revered. Dunbar more than Henryson or Douglas partakes of the new spirit of the fifteenth century; Douglas is not fairly to be called a representative of the Renaissance; Dunbar least of all of them finds his natural expression in allegory. The alliterative verse of Scotland, though some of it is later in date, belongs to the older world. Blind Harry is partly a reversion to the pre-Chaucerian type, although, as has been pointed out by Professor Skeat, he also shows frequently, both in rhymes and phrases, the inevitable influence of the master-poet of the preceding century. Lyndsay, whose rude but effective satires were enormously popular in Scotland, was rather a facetious 'Piers Plowman' than a Chaucerian, but borrowed phrases and ideas like the rest; both he and Montgomerie belong to the second or middle period. Scottish sixteenth-century prose writers were a large and various company; here we need name as representatives of the prose of the second or middle period only two men of the foremost rank—Knox, the first really powerful writer of contemporary history in the English tongue; and Buchanan, who wrote very little in the Scottish vernacular, but as humanist and Latin poet took amongst the learned of Europe a place that had as yet been conceded to no writer of British birth.

During the second period of Scots writing, the language had undergone a double series of changes. On the one hand it had altered from its old self and become less like Middle English in several ways. The Scots vernacular always remained more Anglo-Saxon and less Norman-French than southern English—contrary to what is often said or assumed. But the spelling was modified in various ways, and the professional authors had adopted large numbers of words direct from French and Latin—an 'aureate' style—which never formed part of the vernacular speech, and were soon dropped even by writers. Just so French sixteenth-century writers manufactured masses of words from Latin and Greek that never belonged to the spoken language, but remained factitious. Yet 'Ciceronianism' had one good result in Scotland as in France: it helped to produce a rhythmical sonorous prose, in dignified and well-built periods. Now, as in the earlier period, the practice of translation from the French powerfully influenced literary style. On the other hand Scottish authors were being more and more directly influenced by southern literary English. The result became very conspicuous after the Reformation: Knox was taunted by his Catholic opponents with an unpatriotic tendency to Anglicise in his literary style as well as in his doctrine. The Catholic writers, including the compiler of the Complaynt of Scotlande, strove to write what they thought their national tongue without English admixture, with a leaning to a French vocabulary. But the Anglicising process had begun and become ineradicable long before. The Scottish Chaucerians, from the earliest of them onwards, show very marked traces of their master's influence on their style as well as on their thought. One of the points that makes for James I.'s authorship of the Kingis Quair is that it is not written in Scots, but in such a mixed dialect as might have become natural to a Scotsman long resident in England—'not true Northumbrian,' Professor Skeat says, 'but a singular and quite artificial language not ill adapted for literary purposes, with southern forms and even Kentish rhymes.' Chaucer's and other English influences are patent in Henryson. Gavin Douglas expressly admits that he cannot get on without southern words, and he uses many quite needless southern forms. Alexander Barclay (see page 116), educated and settled in England, became an English author. Dunbar, who in his youth had tramped and begged in England, wrote at least one of his poems in almost perfectly pure southern English, and in his Scots ones constantly uses southern as well as northern forms—go as well as ga, two as well as twa and tway, alone and alane, stone and stane, goist and gaist, and with old, told, gold, and behold rhyming as in English. It must not be assumed, however, that an old Scots writer is Anglicising when he uses forms the modern Scotsman treats as southern. Thus Dunbar regularly has eris for men's ears, and lug only once and then derisively. Ear was originally common to north and south, though modern Scots has dropped it for lug. It is significant that Allan Ramsay felt bound in a single one of Dunbar's poems printed by him, The Devil's Inquest, to alter the word devill into de'il no less than fourteen times, evir to e'ir, and nevir to ne'ir, besides making here as elsewhere other changes in spelling and wording (go, fro, roe, &c., regularly to gae, frae, rae, &c.), in order to make Dunbar more 'Scottish,' apparently; or to bring him into accordance with the—decayed and vulgarised—Edinburgh Scots of 1724.

Nothing is more instructive for the history of the national tongue after the middle of the sixteenth century than the contrast already noted between the writings of the Roman Catholics of Scotland and their Protestant opponents. Dr T. Graves Law puts the case thus in the following paragraph:

'The writings of the Roman Catholics of Scotland during the later half of the sixteenth century deserve some notice; for, while Catholics came less directly under the influence of English literature, if only out of opposition to their adversaries, they clung the more tenaciously to the native idiom. The contrast between the language of Ninian Winyet (see below at page 230) and that of John Knox is most marked. Winyet even affected not to understand the Reformer, and wrote to him in 1573: "Gif you throw curiositie of novations hes foryet our auld plane Scottis quhilk your mother lerit you; in tymes cuming I sall wryte to you my mynd in Latin; for I am not acquainted with your Southeroun" (Buke of Four Scoir Questions). The policy was suicidal, for the number of Latin works of controversy published by Scottish exiles on the Continent can have had little or no influence on their countrymen at home. During the ascendancy of the Catholic

Duke of Lennox, however, in 1579–1582, when there seemed hope of converting the young king, a more serious attempt was made to appeal to the people in their own language. Mary Stuart had begged for Scottish missionaries on the ground that English priests were not sufficiently understood. John Hay, a Jesuit expelled from Scotland in 1579, wrote urgently to his General of the need of books "written in the Scottish language," and early in the following year he printed at Paris his Certaines Demandes. Father Parsons, who had just successfully introduced his secret printing-press into England, also wrote to the General (September 1581), "Scotland is to be won, if at all, within the next two years;" and he announced the preparations he was making for sending into the north Catholic books in the vernacular "such as have hitherto been never or rarely seen in Scotland." Nicol Burne had published his Disputation concerning the Controversie Headdis of Religion in 1580; and John Hamilton, another secular priest, followed early in the next year with Ane Catholike and Facile Traictise. A Scottish Catholic Catechism (Barberini MSS., Rome; transcript in Signet Library, Edinburgh) which was prepared in answer to Craig's Short Summe (1581), though left unprinted, is another indication of the controversial efforts of the time. Meanwhile, with the view of counteracting the new movement, John Craig had drawn up the famous King's Confession or Negative Confession, the first of the National Covenants signed by the king and his household, January 28, 1581. Its apparent Anglicising tendency provoked the taunts of Hamilton: "Giff King James the fyft," he wrote, "var alyve, quha, hering ane of his subjectis knap suddrone, declarit him ane traiteur, quidder vald he declare you triple traitoris, quha not onlie knappis suddrone in your negative confession, but also hes causit it to be imprentit at London in contempt of our native language." Although at a later date a few other Catholic books appeared in the vernacular, they were far less distinctively Scottish. The crisis of 1579–82 may be said to form a landmark in the history of the national literature; and it may be taken as significant also of the now still closer approximation of north and south on the side of the Protestants, that a catechetical treatise of John Craig on the "Lord's Supper," printed by Henry Charteris in Edinburgh in 1581, was issued simultaneously, with comparatively slight alterations, by Thomas Marsh in London, for the English Puritans.'

Just about this date occurs such a marked decline in Scottish productivity as to form well-nigh a break in the literary history of the nation. The theological and political struggles and distractions consequent on the Reformation seemed so to have absorbed the energies of the nation that literature almost vanishes from view. About 1580, also, Professor Masson, looking at the question from another point of view, fixes the end of the first great literary period and the beginning of a woe-ful change. Even in religion or theology Scotland produced little of note; and ere long it borrowed its Puritan theology largely from England, whence it had taken its Bible, its Confession of Faith, its Catechism, and its Psalm-book. On the whole it is more remarkable that in the early sixteenth century Scotland had poets more than equal to England's best than that in the later sixteenth and early seventeenth the little land should prove singularly barren, just when the glory of English letters was at its brightest. Therefore to this point we bring down this first great series of Scottish writers and their works.

The romantic ballads, a bright jewel in Scotland's literary crown, may some of them have taken shape as early as the fourteenth or fifteenth century. But though refrains, phrases, perhaps the substance of verses, may have come down from that remote time and still survive in the ballads we know, still it is safe to say that the ballads as we know them can none of them be proved older than the sixteenth century. Many are demonstrably of the seventeenth, some even of the eighteenth. Hence it will be convenient to treat them all, together with the English ballads, in the next main division of this work.

When we comment on Scotland's small production in verse and prose at this time, it should be remembered that the country was not merely pitifully distracted, but was incredibly poor, and was less populous than England in a degree not sufficiently remembered. To England's 5,000,000 at the end of the sixteenth century, Scotland had probably 500,000 inhabitants in all; and for perhaps nearly half of that number Lowland Scots and English were alike foreign languages, Gaelic being still their mother-tongue.

Whatever of Celtic legends or poems was extant—such as those contained in 'the Dean of Lismore's Book' (1512–30)—was no part of the national literature of Scotland; till the end of this period the Highlanders, though nominally part of the nation, were almost wholly outside the current of the national life. The Highland devotion to the royal line of Scotland rose to fervour only after the Lowlands had abjured their allegiance. The average Scot knows about as much Gaelic as he does Finnish, and hears for the first time the names of the Gaelic poets Rob Donn and Duncan ban MacIntyre when, as a tourist in the Highlands, he stumbles on the monuments erected to their memory. Till the time of Ossian Macpherson no nameworthy influence of Gaelic work is traceable on Scottish literature. Nor, considering the claims made for the Celt, have men of Celtic lineage taken any conspicuous share in the literature of the predominant part of the kingdom. The Scottish writers were Lowlanders, and their work is on the whole very Teutonic and quite un-Celtic in character. Dubious attempts have been made to trace a Celtic love of nature in the poems of Douglas, who was a Lothian man. The weirdness of Dunbar was not a Celtic weirdness, but, like Burns's diablerie, combined the comic and satiric with the realistic; and 'the feeling of mystery, of overshadowing fate and melancholy yearning,' which distinguishes the Scottish ballads from the contemporary or later English ballads is found in Beowulf and purely English poetry, and might be called Scandinavian in tone.

As the typical Scot is more English and less Celtic in temperament—however Celtic in blood—than the Englishman; as Lowland Scots is Anglian: so Scottish literature is Sassenach and un-Celtic on the whole, a literature of solid common-sense from the beginning rather than of ethereal fantasy and unearthly glamour. Its brightest and best is lumen siccum, its humour, too, of the driest; its philosophy is logical, cautious, sceptical, rather than a thing of instinct and of vision; its theology didactic and practical, and averse to mysticism; its romance grim and stern, the tenderness of it disguised under a harsh husk; its very melancholy convinced and methodical, not of the vague, haunting Celtic kind; the emotions reflected, deep and true, are those of 'the kindly Scot,' of human nature, of Lowland rather than of Celtic or half-Celtic nature. The warm-hearted Celt has no monopoly of the emotions and affections, of hope and tenderness, of fear and wrath; by no race has the tragedy of death been unfelt, or the comedy of life and love. And it was a Borderer of Anglian stock, our Wizard of the North, who in the nineteenth century revealed to his Lowland countrymen the romance and poetry of Highland character and Highland history.

Early Fragments.

Among the scattered Anglian-speakers north of the Tweed, the amount of literary production in the earlier centuries was of course infinitesimally small, and the fragments that have been preserved have accordingly a disproportionate interest.

If Sir J. A. H. Murray is right, the oldest scrap of the Anglian of Scotland, still surviving in a corrupted form, is the refrain of the local slogan or historic song of the townsmen of Hawick, sung on public occasions and commemorative anniversaries. 'Tyr-ibus ye Tyr ye Odin,' which Murray holds is simply Tyr hæb us, 3e Tyr 3e Odin (i.e. 'Tyr keep us, both Tyr and Odin'), would therefore be part of a veritable litany to the ancient heathen deities of the land before Anglian war-gods 'had yielded to the pale god of the Christians.'

The most ancient Anglian document extant in this northern area is the inscription in runes on the Ruthwell Cross in Dumfriesshire. Since 1887, after many vicissitudes, preserved within the church. The cross has on it also sculptures, described in as many short Latin sentences. The runic inscriptions, mainly on the narrow sides of the shaft, long defied interpretation, and were in 1823 strangely misinterpreted, on the hypothesis that the runes were Scandinavian. Not till after Kemble had rightly deciphered them as runes of the Anglo-Saxon type in 1840 was it found, definitely and certainly, that the poem in Northumbrian, part of which they contained, existed also in a West Saxon version in the Vercelli Book (see above, pages 15, 30); it is indeed one of the Cædmonian poems. Stephens, in a full monograph on the subject (1866), thought the cross with its inscriptions dated from A.D. 680; about 675 is Baldwin Brown's conclusion (Arts in Early England, vol. v. 1921—with philological chapters on the Cross by Blyth Webster); leading French archæologists likewise incline to the seventh century; some German experts assign it to the tenth century; certain Italian and American authorities even argue for the twelfth century. But among all these conflicting hypotheses, there is no doubt that the famous inscription is part of a poem in old Northumbrian on the rood of Christ, corresponding to that in the Vercelli Book. The first lines are thus transcribed:

... geredæ hinæ god almehttig
þa he walde on galgu gistiga
(m)odig f men.

The inscription throughout shows markedly northern forms, such as walde for wolde; the poem has been ascribed to Cædmon and to Cynewulf (see pages 10 and 15).

The first contribution to our common literature made by the Anglian inhabitants of what we call Scotland may be earlier and much more noteworthy than is commonly recognised. Falling just within the seventh century, it comes not from the Borders, not from Lothian, where the Northumbrian colonists first made themselves at home, but from comparatively remote North Ayrshire. The story of Drythelm as recorded by Bede is in substance a very early type of those Visions of Judgment—of Purgatory, Hell, and Heaven—which had such a fascination for the medieval mind; it anticipates the voyage of the Irish St Brendan in the eleventh century 'to the mysterious land far from human ken,' and the descent of the Welsh knight Owen into Patrick's Purgatory in the twelfth century. Dante's Divina Commedia is the culmination of such visions of the invisible, and

Paradise Lost has not a little in common with them. Bede tells us he had the story of Drythelm from Drythelm's most intimate confidant, then still living, and Bede's graphic Latin, professedly an abridged version of Drythelm's own account of the matter, no doubt gives us truly what the Cunningham laird declared he saw in the other world, in phrases that are a direct echo of his own across the intervening twelve centuries. Skene thinks the incuneningum of the MSS. is (through misreading the MS. t for c) really for Tynningham in East Lothian. But even if it be impossible to say certainly where Drythelm's home was, his story reflects the views on the future life cherished by the northern Northumbrians a century after Christianity had first been preached in the north. And though the original Northumbrian words are lost to us, the narrative shows too vividly what people in the Scottish Lowlands were at that time thinking and talking about to be passed over in a work like the present.

The twelfth chapter of the fifth book of Bede's History is wholly devoted to the story of a mortal 'who rose from the dead, and related many things which he had seen, some terrible and others delightful.' Drythelm, Drycthelm, or Drithelm—such was his very Anglian name—was head of a household 'in that district of the Northumbrians which is called In-cuneningum,' and led a Christian life, as did all his house. He sickened, and by-and-by he died at evening; 'but in the morning early, he suddenly came to life again and sat up, upon which all those that sat about the body weeping fled away in great terror; and only his wife, who loved him best, remained with him, though in great consternation and trembling.' He comforted her, assuring her he was really alive, but warned her he must leave her and enter upon the monastic life. He now divided his property into three parts (one for his wife, one for his children, and one for the poor), repaired to the monastery of (Old) Melrose, received the tonsure, and lived in great austerity and universal admiration till his second and final death. When in winter he stood up to the neck in the Tweed, with bits of ice floating against him, and his fellows wondered how he could endure such a sore ordeal, he only said; 'I have seen greater cold'—as well he might!

He was not wont to relate to everybody what befell him in that dread night of 696 or thereby, but told it frankly to such as were likely to profit by the narration, and most precisely and frequently to his friend and fellow-monk, Hæmgils, from whom Bede had it; also to the pious and learned King Aldfrith of Northumbria, who, 'when he happened to be in those parts, very often went to see him.' This was Drythelm's story:

'He that led me,' said he, 'had a shining countenance and a bright garment, and we went on silently, as I thought, towards the north-east. Walking onwards, we came to a valley of great breadth and depth, and of infinite length ; on the left it seemed full of scorching flames ; the other side was no less intolerable by reason of thrashing hail and icy snow flying and drifting all about. Both places were full of men's souls, which seemed by turns to be tossed from side to side as by a violent storm ; for when the wretched creatures could no longer endure the fierceness of the awful heat, they leaped into the midst of the cutting cold ; and there too finding no rest, they leapt back again to be burnt in the midst of the unquenchable flames. And as an innumerable multitude of misshapen spirits were being tormented by these cruel shiftings to and fro, without, so far as I could see, any moment of relief, I began to think that this perhaps might be hell, of whose intolerable torments I had often heard tell. My guide, who went before me, answered my thought by saying, "Believe not so, for this is not the hell you think."

'When by degrees he had conducted me, much terrified with that appalling sight, to the further end, of a sudden I saw the place begin to grow dusk and to be wholly filled with darkness. When we came into it, the darkness by degrees grew so thick that I could see nothing besides it and the figure and garment of him that led me. As we went on through the shades of night, of a sudden there appeared before us frequent globes of fierce flames, rising as it were out of a great pit, and falling back again into the same. When I had been brought thither, my leader suddenly vanished, and left me alone in the midst of darkness and this horrible vision, whilst ceaselessly those same globes of fire were now shot up, and now fell back into the bottom of the abyss ; and I observed that the tops of all the flames were full of human souls, which, like sparks flying up with smoke, were sometimes hurled aloft, and again, when the fuming of the fire ceased, dropped back into the depth below. Moreover, an insufferable stench boiled up along with the fumes, and filled all those dark places. Having stood there a long time in sore dread, not knowing what to do, which way to turn, or what end I might expect, of a sudden I heard behind me the noise of a most prodigious and doleful lamentation, and at the same time a loud laughing, as of a rude rabble insulting captured enemies. When that noise, growing plainer, came up to me, I observed a crowd of evil spirits dragging the lamenting and wailing souls of five human beings into the midst of the darkness, whilst they themselves laughed and rejoiced ; amongst which five, as I could discern, there was one shaven like a clerk, one a layman, and one a woman. The evil spirits that dragged them went down into the midst of that burning pit ; and so it happened that, as they went down deeper, I could no longer clearly distinguish between the weeping of the men and the laughing of the devils, but still had a confused sound in my ears. Meantime some of the dark spirits ascended from that flaming abyss, and running forward, beset me on all sides, and put me in an agony with their glaring eyes and the stinking fire which issued from their mouths and nostrils ; and threatened to lay hold on me with the burning tongs they held in their hands ; yet they durst not touch me, though they terrified me. Being thus on all sides enclosed with enemies and blinding darkness, when I looked about on every side to see if any help might arrive to deliver me, there appeared behind me, on the way I had come, as it were the brightness of a star shining amidst the darkness ; which increased by degrees, and came swiftly towards me : and when it drew near, all those evil spirits that tried to drag me away with their tongs scattered and fled.

'But he whose approach had put them to flight was the same who before had led me ; who, turning towards the path on the right, began to lead me, as it were, towards the south-east, and having soon taken me out of the darkness, brought me into an atmosphere of clear light. While he thus led me in open day, I saw a vast wall before us, whose length both ways and height seemed altogether boundless. I began to wonder why we should go up to the wall, seeing no door, nor window, nor stair in it. But when we came to the wall, we were forthwith, I know not how, on the top of it ; and within it was a vast and delightful meadow, so full of fragrant flowers that the odour of its extraordinary sweetness immediately dispelled all the stink of the dark furnace, which had beset me. So great a light filled all this place that it seemed to exceed the brightness of the day, or the sun in its meridian height. In this meadow were innumerable groups of men clothed in white, and many companies seated together rejoicing. As he led me through the midst of those happy inhabitants, I began to think that this might, perhaps, be the kingdom of heaven, of which I had so often heard in sermons. He answered my thought, saying "This is not the kingdom of heaven, as you imagine."

'When in our progress we had passed those mansions of blessed spirits, I discovered before us a much more beautiful light, and therein also heard the sweetest voices of persons singing, and so wonderful a fragrance issued from the place, that the odour of the other, which I had before thought most delicious, now seemed to me quite ordinary ; even as also that extraordinary brilliancy of the flowery meadow, compared with this, seemed mean and poor. When I began to hope we should enter that delightful place, my guide on a sudden stood still ; and then turning round, led me back by the way by which we had come.'

The mysterious guide—prominent in so many of these Visions, and essential for pointing the moral—finding on their return, as might be expected, that his companion had but a very confused apprehension of the mysteries he had seen, seized the opportunity of expounding their significance ; holding out to his auditor a hope of ultimate and permanent admission to the glorious company of the blest. 'When he had said this to me I much abhorred returning to my body, being delighted with the sweetness and beauty of the place I beheld, and with the company of those I saw in it. Yet I durst not ask my guide any questions ; but on a sudden, I knew not how, I found myself alive among men.' And so the vision ended.

In this and others of these stories, as Dean Plumptre says, the reader can detect parallelisms sufficient to make certain the assumption that Dante must have been acquainted with some of them and influenced by them. Drythelm's story was so much appreciated in the Middle Ages that one often finds MSS. in which it is given wholly apart from the history in which it is embedded. And for our purpose it is worth detaching this one chapter from the great wealth of Northumbrian lore and litera-

Chiefly through the shrewd judgment of Sir Frederick Madden, the 'gret Gest' has been unanimously identified with the alliterative poem the Morte Arthure; the 'Awntyre of Gawane,' equated by M. Amours (in his fine study of the Scottish Alliterative Poems) with the 'Awntyrs of Arthure,' has by others been identified with 'Gawane and the Grene Knight' (see p. 52), or 'Golagros and Gawane' (see p. 174); while the 'Pystyll,' a rendering of the story of Susanna and the elders, has descended to us under its own name.

The identity of the poet has excited the more discussion as, in spite of the personal references to him being confined to Scotland, his treatment of his themes is completely devoid of national or un-English indications, and the tests of language for his period are indubitably vague. Wyntoun does not say he was a Scot, but his allusion is scarcely compatible with anything else, and savours of familiar knowledge of a personage of the Scottish court. Nearly half a century before Wyntoun, John Barbour almost certainly quotes him; and more than half a century after Wyntoun, William Dunbar, in the Lament for the Makaris, mourns among his poetic predecessors

The gude Syr Hew of Eglyntoun.

There are thus excellent grounds for claiming—that is no longer disputed—that Huchown was from the north. Wyntoun's epithet of the Awle Reale (Hall Royal) and the surname given by Dunbar were long ago combined and held to indicate Sir Hugh of Eglinton, an Ayrshire nobleman, brother-in-law of King Robert II., and holding various important offices under David II. and Robert II. The chief objection taken to this identification is, that 'Huchown' is a familiar diminutive associated with servants or others of inferior grade, and never applied to persons of rank. This, however, is an error, as the earliest vernacular instance of the name in Scotland hitherto pointed out occurs in a marriage contract of 1416, wherein the bridegroom is designated as 'Huchon Fraser, lord of the Lowat' (Lovat). It is thus to be surmised that Huchown was a standard vernacular form of the name at that time. An objection has also been stated that the high religious tone of all Huchown's work was out of keeping with his being a layman; against this it is urged that happily the loftiest piety and purity are no monopoly of cleric or monk.

The argument against Sir Hugh apparently fails; and unless the chronology or other features of the poems themselves should some day be proved inconsistent with the claim made for him, he will be likely to hold the field.

Sir Hugh was born probably between 1300 and 1320, as he held public offices before the middle of the century. He was Chamberlain of Cunningham and of Irvine, then the chief seaport of western Scotland; he was also Justiciar of Lothian and Commissioner for the Borders. On the accession of the Stewarts to the throne he is found, along with Barbour, as an Auditor of Exchequer. He was himself a financier from whom the Stewart king was a borrower. His death took place about the time when Barbour's Bruce was being finished—in the spring of 1376. Sir Hugh, a kinsman of royalty, who was thus courtier, lawyer, treasurer of a leading seaport, and colleague of Barbour, made repeated journeys into England really or ostensibly on pilgrimage. Under David II. (at whose court Sir Hugh held dignified place, and in whose company he at least once, but perhaps frequently, visited the English capital) the patriotic party had reason to be apprehensive of the much too friendly relationship established, after 1346, between their monarch and the English king. David's repeated visits to England had been of ill-omen for the cause of Scottish independence; but we cannot be sure that the very causes bringing the two courts into sympathy did not tend to produce certain of those Arthurian poems attributed to Huchown, which betray no traces of patriotic Scottish feeling, and might, but for other evidences, be deemed English. Besides, Arthur was a world-theme of chivalry, and chivalry was nearing its height before Richard II., its most luckless patron, succeeded to the English crown; accordingly there is little room for surprise at Scottish romance expositions of cosmopolitan chivalry.

A modern theory of Huchown's poetical evolution turns largely upon a parchment manuscript in the Hunterian Museum at Glasgow, comprehending several Latin texts, among which are the Destructio Troje of Guido de Columpna (or delle Colonne), a work usually styled De Preliis Alexandri, the Charlemagne Itinerarium of the pseudo-Turpin, and the travels of Sir John Mandeville. This manuscript was certainly not written until after 1356, and the theory is that the good Sir Hugh in his poetic career made from it the alliterative translation of Guido known as the Destruction of Troy, as well as the similar rendering of the De Preliis, the Wars of Alexander. These translations (both published by the E.E.T.S.) show many unique or exceedingly remarkable agreements with certain exceptional features of the Hunterian MS., and from these it has been contended that it most probably was the actual codex employed (Athenæum, 12th May and 16th June 1900). The Destruction had previously been claimed for Huchown on æ-count of its many affinities to the Morte Arthure: this conclusion the later argument repeats, while reckoning the Wars and still other works as products of the same industrious pen. Although the volume of literature thus attributed to one man is certainly large, it is to be remembered that the output of Barbour was most extensive, and that the entire series of alliterative works so accredited to Huchown would not amount to so much as the acknowledged achievement of either Chaucer or Gower. The various pieces are brought very near each other by the same recurrent alliterations, by vocabularies which, when allowance is made for differences of theme, are much alike, and most of all by a power of expressive language, rising clear above the artificialities of alliteration, in vigorous narrative and description and earnest utterance of refined thought. Throughout, the sustained dignity of tone is even more remarkable than the fervently religious attitude of mind. Assuredly the author of these poems was a great master of expression, to whom the alliterative system presented no more restraint than did blank verse to Milton. These translations show the unwearied student acquiring an easy familiarity with the technique of the alliterative music of words, while engaged upon the task of learning all that the Latin and French literature of the period had to teach him of the great cycles of romance—of Troy and Alexander, of Arthur and Charlemagne, and of others of the Nine Worthies whose praises he perhaps celebrated, as if by way of summary of his life's work, in the piece called the Parlement of the Thre Ages (Roxburgh Club), partly translated from the French poems the Fuerre de Gadres and the Vaux du Paon, the latter of which dates from the first decade of the fourteenth century. Masses were long said for the soul of Huchown, at least of Sir Hugh, in the Abbey of Kilwinning, where no doubt his ashes lie. In this Ayrshire bard four centuries before Burns there are, as Wyntoun said, 'plesans and delyte,' a plenitude of mediæval literature and an unsurpassed grandeur of style, albeit difficult at first—for his poems bristle with archaisms which distinguish him from Barbour, just as in the south they marked off Piers the Plowman from the Canterbury Tales.

In the Morte Arthure, which tells of the king's campaign with and victory over Lucius the 'Emperour,' there are many chivalric episodes, amongst them being Arthur's combat on St Michael's Mount with the giant, five fathom long, flat-mouthed as a fluke, and shovel-footed with unshapely shanks!

When Arthur returns from France to resume his own, and punish the false and rebellious Mordred, a great sea-fight against Mordred's Danish allies is necessary off Sandwich before Arthur's army can effect a landing. This is described with a degree of technicality proving that the Chamberlain of Irvine knew right well the tackle of a ship:

So stowtly the forsterne one the stam hyttis
That strokes of the stere-burde strykkys in peces.
Be thane cogge appone cogge krayers and other
Castys crepers one crosse als to the crafte langes:
Thane was hede-rapys hewene that helde upe the mastes;
Thare was conteke fulle kene and crachynge of chippys!
Gret cogges of kampe crassches in sondyre,
Mony kabane clevede cabilles destroyede,
Knyghtes and kene menne killide the braynes!
Kidd castelles were corvene with all their kene wapene,
Castelles fulle comliche that coloured ware faire!
Upcynes eghelynge thay ochene thare aftyre,
With the swynge of the swerde sweys the mastys;
Ovyre fallys in the firste frekis and othire
Frekke in the forchipe fey es bylevede.

Forsterne, midships; stam, ship's prow; stere-burde, starboard; cog, ship; krayers, small ship; crepers, grappels; hede-rapys, hewene, upper ropes cut; conteke, strife; chippys, ships; cogges of kampe, ships of war; kidd, famous; upcynes, turrets (?); eghelynge, edgewise; ochene, break; frehis, men; frekke, quickly; fey, dead; bylevede, left.

And so the battle goes on with Titanic fury, and the 'Archers of Inglande' shoot through the 'hard steel' of the enemy

Tille alle the Danes ware dede and in the depe throwene.

The collected Early English Alliterative Poems, edited by Dr Morris, including the beautiful rhymed alliterative Pearl (see page 54), a veritable gem of the Middle Ages, have been claimed as Huchown's. The sea-pieces in the poems of that collection called Cleanness and Patience are peculiarly characteristic of his manner. Here is part of the account of the voyage of Noah, from the former of those poems :

Noe had oft nevened the name of oure lorde,
Hym aȝtsum in that ark as athel God lyked,
Ther alle ledez in lome lenged druye
The arc houen watz on hyȝe with hurlande gotez ;
Keste to kythez uncouth the cloudez ful nere.
Hit waltered on the wylde flod, went as hit lyste,
Drof upon the depe dam, in daunger hit semed,
Withouten mast other myke other myry bawelyne,
Kable other capstan to clyppe to her ankrez,
Hurrok other handehelme haspede on rother,
Other any sweand sayl to seche after haven,
Bot flote forthe with the flyt of the felle wyndez,
Whederwarde so the water wafte hit rebounde.
Ofte hit roled on rounde and rerede on ende ;
Nyf oure lorde hade ben her lodezmon hem had lumpen harde.

Nevened, named ; aȝtsum, a company of eight, viz. Noah, his wife, his three sons, and their wives ; athel, noble ; ledez, people ; lome, the ark ; druye, dry ; houen, heaved ; hurlande gotez, rushing waters ; kythez, regions ; uncouth, unknown ; waltered, weltered ; myke, crutches ; bawelyne, bowline ; hurrok, oar ; rother, rudder ; sweand, swaying ; nyf, unless ; lodezmon, pilot ; lumpen, befallen.

Surely the ark's voyage has seldom been described with more of nautical sympathy ; while the picture it presents of that unique craft rudderless, mastless, and without sail or cable, but with God as pilot, is a poetic creation of a high order.

See Sir F. Madden's Syr Gawayne (Bannatyne Club, 1839) ; M. M. Banks's Morte Arthure (1900) ; also Sir Gawayne (1864), Morte Arthure (1865, 1871), Destruction of Troy (1869-74), Early English Alliterative Poems (1864), Wars of Alexander (1886), all publications of the Early English Text Society. Dr Moritz Trautmann in Anglia (1878) discussed the problems of authorship in a paper, Der Dichter Huchown und seine Werke. Gollancz edited The Parlement of the Thre Ages (Roxburgh Club, 1897). An excellent general statement on authorship, &c., is given in M. Amours' Scottish Alliterative Poems (S.T.S., 1897). Dr Bradley's suggestion that Awle Ryale was Oriel College, Oxford, and Huchown thus an Englishman (perhaps from Cumberland), was debated in Athenaeum (22nd December 1900 to 23rd February 1901). Neilson elaborated in Huchown of the Awle Ryale (1902) the claims summarised above ; but these have been held exorbitant by most critics. See W. Geddie's Bibliography of Middle Scots Poets (S.T.S., 1912).

Other Alliterative Poems.—A number of early northern poems are written in a complicated rhyming stanza of thirteen lines, with systematic alliteration besides in the rhyming syllables. A characteristic form of the strophe has eight long lines rhyming alternately, followed by one other long line (called by Guest the bob-line) rhyming with the last of four short ones (these five are called the wheel). As we have seen (page 51), it is not easy to say of some of these whether they belong to Scotland or the north-west of England. Mons. Amours, in his collection for the Scottish Text Society (1892-97), attributes The Awntyrs of Arthure to Huchown. The Awntyrs of Arthure contains the apparition of her mother's prophetic ghost to Queen Gaynour (Guinevere), and a contest between Gawain and Sir Galeron of Galloway. It in part adapts the Trental of St Gregory. The first verse will serve to illustrate both the language and the rhythm—Tarn Wadling being a small lakelet in the heart of Cumberland :

In Kyng Arthure tyme ane awntir by-tyde,
By the Terne Wahethelyne, als the buke tellis,
Als he to Carelele was commene, that conqueroure kyde,
Withe dukes, and with ducheperes, that with that dere duellys,

For to hunnte at the herdys, that lange hase bene hyde ;
And one a daye thay tham dighte to the depe dellis,
To felle of the Femmales, in the Foreste wele Frythede,
Faire in the fermysone tyme, by frythis and fellis.
Thus to the wode arc thay wente, the wlonkeste in wedys,
Bothe the kynge and the qwene,
And alle the doghety by-dene,
Syr Gawane, gayeste one grene,
Dame Gayenoure he ledis.

Ane awntir by-tyde, an adventure befell ; kyde, kythed, made known, famous ; ducheperes, douze pairs, the twelve paladins or knights ; to hunnte . . . hyde, to hunt the herds that had long been hid, or undisturbed ; thay tham dighte, they directed themselves ; wele Frythede, well enclosed ; fermysone, close time ; wlonkeste in wedys, gayest in raiment ; by-dene, together.

The Knightly Tale of Golagros and Gawane is referred to Clerk of Tranent, named in Dunbar's Lament for the Makaris, who seems to have died about the end of the fifteenth century. There is at most a presumption that it may have been by him. The tale carries Arthur and his knights through many adventures towards the Holy Land, to which a very brief visit seems to have been paid. Most of the story befalls in France, and concerns a combat between Gawane and Sir Golagros, a knight of marvellous prowess who dwelt by the Rhone, and, vanquished by Gawane, ultimately did homage to Arthur. Sir Walter Scott presumed it was based on 'Celtic tradition.' Sir F. Madden proved the story to be derived from the Perceval of Chretien of Troyes. It is no mere translation ; the author uses considerable freedom with the story ; and the complicated stanzas, combining alliteration and rhyme, are very unlike the French original.

Later Poems.—Here we may briefly deal with one or two alliterative poems of considerably later date. The Buke of the Howlat, a poem in a similar stanza, seems to have been written by Richard Holland or de Holande, secretary to Archibald Douglas, Earl of Moray, a priest of the diocese of Moray and rector of Halkirk parish in Caithness. The poem, written just before 1452, is an elaborate apologue (largely a panegyric of the exploits of the Douglasses), in which pheasants, cranes, swans, and the like represent patriarchs, cardinals, bishops, and other ecclesiastics ; and the eagles, falcons, hawks, and so on represent the emperor, dukes, knights, and civilians generally. The Howlat or Owl, ashamed of its mean appearance, appeals to the Peacock, the pope of birds. Crows, wrens, cushats, moorfowl, the robin redbreast, the solan goose, and many more bear a part in the proceedings, the plan of which may have been suggested by Chaucer's Parliament of Fowls. Especially interesting is the form here given to the tale of Douglas's famous expedition to Palestine with the heart of the Bruce. After the Bruce's death the good Sir James Douglas—about whom is first found in this poem the noble apostrophe :

O Dowglas, O Dowglas,
Tender and trewe—

enclosed the heart in a silver casket, according to his promise to the dead king, and bore it with him in pilgrimage to the Holy Land. The historical accounts make Douglas die in Spain, fighting with the Saracens, the actual command given him by Bruce having been to carry it 'against the enemies of God.' Holland, for the greater glory of the hero, makes him reach the Holy Sepulchre, consecrate the heart there, and afterwards die in battle with the Saracens at some place not specified :

The hert costlye he couth clos in a cler cace,
And held all hale the behest he hecht to the king :
Come to the haly graf, throw Goddis gret grace,
With offerandis and vrisons, and all uthar thing ;
Our Saluatouris sepultur, and the samyn place,
Quhar he raiss, as we reid, richtuiss to ryng ;
With all the relykis raith, that in that rovme was,
He gart hallowe the hart, and syne couth it hyng,
About his hals full hende, and on his awne hart.
Oft wald he kiss it, and cry :
'O flour of all chawalry !
Quhy leif I, allace ! quhy ?
And thow deid art !

'My deir,' quoth the Dowglass, 'art thow deid dicht !
My singular souerane, of Saxonis the wand !
Now bot I semble for thi saull with Sarazenis mycht,
Sall I never sene be into Scotland !'
Thus in defence of the faith he fure to the fecht,
With knychtis of Christindome to kepe his command.
And quhen the batallis so brym, brathly and bricht,
War joyned thrally in thrang, mony thousand,
Amang the hethin men the hert hardely he slang,
Said : 'Wend on as thou was wont,
Throw the batell in bront,
Ay formast in the front,
Thy fays amang.

'And I sall followe the in faith, or feye to be fellit ;
As thi lege man leile, my lyking thow art.'
Thar with on Mahownis men manly he mellit,
Braid throw the battallis in bront, and bur thaim backward.

Couth clos, did enclose ; behest he hecht, the promise he made ; vrisons, orisons ; raiss . . . richtuiss to ryng, rose to reign in righteousness ; raith, soon ; gart, caused ; syne couth it hyng, then did it hang ; About his hals full hende, about his neck full reverently ; leif, live ; deid dicht, given up to death ; singular, unique ; Saxonis the wand, rod of the English, their scourge ; bot I semble, unless I contend ; fure, fared ; brym, brathly and bricht, fierce, impetuous, and glorious ; thrally, bravely ; slang, slung, hurled ; fays, foes ; feye to be fellit, fated to be slain ; thi lege man leile, thy liegeman loyal ; lyking, love, darling ; Mahownis, Mahomet's ; mellit, joined in battle.

The Douglas episodes recounted in the above-quoted stanzas possess a double interest from the fact that they are, with some freedom of poetic handling, taken from Barbour's Bruce, which is in two passages (Howlat, lines 395, 507) expressly cited as 'the writ of thar werk'—that is, the writ of the deeds not of Bruce only, but of Bruce and Douglas. Barbour himself (Bruce, i. 33) had similarly stated it to be his literary purpose to extol the prowess both of the Scottish king and of his gallant colleague, the good Sir

James. Thus in every sense the Howlat is, as it declares itself to be, a continuation of that earlier poetic tradition which in the Bruce found its classical expression. Although every attempt to prove the poem a political allegory has failed, its laudation of the great house which rivalled the Stewart dynasty raises much more than a suspicion of a partisan object. In like manner, the relation of its author to the Douglasses while still in the ascendant, and his exile after their fall, tend to invest the Howlat with the piquancy of a document directly or indirectly satirical and fundamentally political.

To the touch of doubt the most obvious fact becomes two-edged. The authenticity of part of the Bruce's-heart passage quoted in the Howlat has been questioned in spite of the Howlat's testimony of borrowing from the Bruce. Critics are found to maintain that the Bruce passage in question, found only in Hart's printed edition of the Bruce, is an after-insertion, and copied from the Howlat. It is fair to say, however, that not until 1899 was there pointed out the clearness of the quotation by the Howlat of the passage from the Bruce.

Rauf Coilsear, telling how the charcoal-burner entertained Charlemagne and was knighted, after prowess shown in a fight with Magog, a Saracen, seems to have been written about 1470, since it is referred to as well known by Gavin Douglas in 1503, and is named by Dunbar and in the Complaynt of Scotlande. Sir Roland, Sir Oliver, and the subjects are foreign ; no French original for the story or poem is known ; the setting is wholly northern. The poem is a picture of the life and manners of Scotland under James III. and James IV.

The writing of alliterative verse did not die out with Holland : long after Chaucer's influence was markedly felt in Scotland we have occasionally alliterative stanzas in Henryson and Douglas ; Dunbar wrote the Tua Mariit Wemen and the Wedo in regular alliterative measures, without rhymes or stanzas, but with a superfluous prodigality of alliterating words ; and Kynd Kyttok is in a stanza closely resembling that above described. So is the Gyre Carling (page 109). No doubt some of the hardly-known poets commemorated in the Lament for the Makaris (see page 196) wrote knightly romances in similar measures.

John Barbour.—Conspicuous among early Scottish writers is the venerable figure of the Archdeacon of Aberdeen. The precise date and place of his birth are not known ; but he may have been born near Aberdeen about 1316, so that he was an elder contemporary of Gower, and though born perhaps a quarter of a century before Chaucer, he seems to have died not long before him. He was Archdeacon of Aberdeen in 1357, when, as again in 1364, he went with young scholars to Oxford ; and he was chosen by the Bishop of Aberdeen to act as his commissioner at Edinburgh when the ransom of David II. was debated. In 1365 he obtained a passport to 'travel through England with six companions on horseback towards St Denis and other sacred places ;' and in 1368 he again received permission to travel through England towards France with two servants. At home he enjoyed royal favour. In 1373 he was clerk of audit of the household of King Robert II., and one of the auditors of Exchequer. In 1375 his epic poem,

The Bruce, was more than half finished; and in 1377 a sum of ten pounds was paid by the king's command, apparently as a first recognition of the work. This gift was followed in a few months by a royal grant of a perpetual annuity of twenty shillings. For another poem on the Troy legend (of which fragments have been preserved) he received a pension for life of ten pounds a year, payable half-yearly. The authorship of The Legends of the Saints is on strong grounds ascribed to him; and Wyntoun speaks of his having written a history of the Stewart family, 'The Stewartis Oryginale.' The last payment which Barbour received was at Martinmas 1394, and entries in the chartulary of Aberdeen Cathedral prove that his death took place on 13th March 1395. Barbour's anniversary continued to be celebrated on that day in the cathedral church of St Machar at Aberdeen until the Reformation—the expense of the service being defrayed from the perpetual annuity granted to the Archdeacon by the first of the Stewart kings in 1378, 'pro compilacione Libri de Gestis illustrissimi principis quondam Domini Regis Roberti de Brus.'

Barbour's poem of The Bruce is in some 14,000 octosyllabic lines, which by no means rhyme smoothly, are sometimes little more than the sheer doggerel of the chronicler, and but rarely rise to the level of real poetry. To call Barbour 'the father of Scottish poetry' is accordingly misleading, though his work is lacking neither in interest nor attraction, and in some respects is really poetic. If he is not altogether a poet, neither is he a mere chronicler; and, as is pointed out below, he drew extensively on French romances for his representation of Scottish events, deeds, and speeches. As Professor Skeat has insisted, Barbour, though he professes to give us substantially 'soothfast story,' expressly calls his work romance; consciously or unconsciously he would embellish facts. But we must not ascribe to that cause Barbour's most startling departure from historical fact—he confounds Bruce, competitor for the crown and grandfather, with Bruce the liberator and grandson; for this confusion is common to him with many other early histories of this period. He makes his hero reject the crown said to have been offered to him by Edward, and so the same Norman noble whose claims had been finally rejected by Edward triumphs at Bannockburn; and the poet-chronicler omits the fact that the grandson had sworn fealty to Edward and done homage to Baliol. He sought to present in Bruce a true hero and patriot, throwing off the yoke of oppression, and all that could weaken the heroic picture was excluded. With Bruce, Douglas is specially honoured. Almost all the personal traits and adventures of Bruce—all that gives individuality, life, and colour to his history—will be found in the pages of Barbour. The rhyming narrative of the wanderings, trials, sufferings, and fortitude of the monarch; the homely touches of tenderness and domestic feeling interspersed, as well as the knightly courtesy and royal intrepid bearing, tended greatly to endear and perpetuate the name of the Scottish sovereign. Bruce comforts his men by telling how Rome was brought low by Hannibal, but rose triumphant from her humiliation; and when he was himself in very evil case, retreating across Loch Lomond, he entertained them with tales of French chivalry:

The Kyng the quhilis merily
Red to thaim that was him by Romanys of worthi Ferambrace,
That worthily our-commyn was Throw the rycht doughty Olywer;
And how the duk-peris wer douze-pairs
Assegyt in-till Egrymor.

The characters and exploits of Bruce's brave associates, Randolph and Douglas, are also admirably drawn. Strange to say, Barbour makes no mention of Wallace, obviously for the reason already given—Wallace's presentment would have diminished the glory of the hero. He is perhaps at his best in telling a good story, a picturesque episode or anecdote. He has a singular gift for vivid description of the pomp and circumstance of war, and shows great skill in contrasting the magnificence of the English knights with the poor and hardy Scottish countrymen. Amongst really poetic flights are Barbour's description of May, his account of the friendship between Bruce and Douglas, his tale of Bruce and the poor washerwoman, and the burst on freedom. Dignity rarely fails him; he can always infuse true tenderness into his work; and in his fervid patriotism he strikes the note repeated all down the course of Scottish history to Burns and Scott—Scott, indeed, has repeatedly followed Barbour closely. Of humour Barbour has traces. His poem begins with the story of the Bruce, and ends with the burial of his heart at Melrose. It is an invaluable monument of the early language of the Lowlands, which Barbour, like the rest, calls Inglis.

The first book contains the exultant burst in praise of freedom (225–240):

A! fredome is a nobill thing!
Fredome mayss man to haiff liking! makes—joy
Fredome all solace to man giffis:
He levys at ess that frely levys! ease
A noble hart may haiff nane ess,
Na ellys nocht that may him pless,
Gyff fredome failzhe: for fre liking
Is zharnyt our all othir thing yearned for—over
Na he, that ay hass levyt fre,
May nocht knaw weill the propyrte, special condition

Bot gyff he had assayit it, tried
Than all perquer he suld it wyt; thoroughly (gar cair)
And suld think fredome mar to pryss more to prize
Than all the gold in warld that is.

The preparations for the battle of Bannockburn are thus described in Book xi.:

[The Bulk of Alexander and other Works attributed to Barbour.—Entirely fresh light was in 1900 cast on Barbour's Bruce, explaining some of its peculiarities and furnishing an admirable key to its construction as a poem. As history it remains what it has always been, a prime document the veracity of which in essential substance and detail has been many times unexpectedly corroborated. As a poem, however, and to a restricted degree as history also, it was unquestionably influenced by the French Roman d'Alexandre, especially the Fuerre de Gaderis and the Vœux du Paon, both of which, as we had occasion to notice, are believed to have been in the repertory of the mysterious 'Huchown.' Barbour in the Bruce refers to the 'Forrayours' in 'Gadyris' (iii. 75), and the speech he assigns to Bruce at Bannockburn is in part a faithful rendering of the address of Alexander the Great at the battle of 'Effesoun' in the Vœux du Paon. Besides, Barbour's citations include one passage from that part of the French Roman d'Alexandre which is known as the Assaut de Tyr, and which was not, like the Fuerre and the Vœux, rendered into vigorous Scottish in The Buik of the most noble and vailzeand Conquerour Alexander the Great, written—according to the disputed colophon—in 1438, printed about 1580, and reprinted for the Bannatyne Club in 1831. Attention having at last been called to the quite phenomenal relation between this poem and the Bruce, it is now contended that such overwhelming resemblances of so many lines through and through both poems—sometimes in matters of relative specialty, oftenest in mere commonplace phrases—are only explicable on the basis of the colophon being an error—perhaps for 1378—and of Barbour having himself written the translation. Possibly, according to this view, the Scottish Alexander was in hand before the Bruce was written, and when the latter work was undertaken the poet's mind was saturated with reminiscences of his other task. At any rate, the amount of material common to both poems is truly extraordinary. Historians as well as poets have ever exercised the right of making speeches for their kings and warriors, and Barbour did not go far amiss in heroically supplying for the Scottish monarch at Bannockburn a battle-speech equally poetical in its origin borrowed from Alexander the Great.

The Scottish Alexander is a vivid, energetic, well-rounded poem in precisely the metre, style, and diction of the Bruce, using the same rhymes and the same mannerisms repeated again and again. Some of these have been found so characteristic as to admit of classification as idiosyncrasies of translation. The Alexander, however, although a capital and most interesting piece in itself, derives its chief importance from the unique character of its connection with the Bruce. The battle of Bannockburn as described in the latter is simply studded with lines identical with others in the Alexander. The reader will best appreciate this from a few examples, which may be compared with the Bannockburn lines in the Bruce printed above:

There are some hundreds of analogous parallels, and as the lines thus owned in common by the Bruce and the Alexander are seldom such as any author would be likely to plagiarise, although often far from being mere commonplaces of the period, the inference has been drawn that nobody but Barbour himself could have made the Scottish translation. This conclusion has received ample corroboration from rhyme tests, and from comparison of methods of translation disclosed by Barbour's other works of that order. It assumes that the colophon date—1438—must have been merely scribal or an error of the press.¹ No doubt this fact presents a slight difficulty, but it is the only one which exists; and scribal errors and intentional changes were far from uncommon. On the other hand, the date 1438 can only be accepted on the extravagant supposition that the translator was so imbued with Barbour's technique as to enable him to copy even his distinguishing error of rhyme, that of occasionally equating yng with yne. Not only so: it would require us to believe that Barbour and the anonymous translator both had recourse to Huchown when they wished to describe the month of May. Huchown, translating Guido, had written in the Destruction of Troy (line 12,969):

Hit was the moneth of May when mirthes begyn,
The Sun turnyt into Tauro taried there under;
Medos and mountains mynget with floures, mingled
Greves wex grene and the ground swete; Groves
Nichtgalis with notes newit there songe,
And shene briddes in shawes shrieked full lowde. bright—woods

The Alexander has two descriptions of May especially noteworthy, because they differ from the rest of the poem in respect that seventeen lines out of twenty-three combine rhyme and alliteration. The Bruce also has two descriptions of May (that of Were or Ver being truly of the summer month) likewise remarkable for the quite exceptional and systematic alliterations they contain in thirteen lines out of twenty-two.

¹ Dr Albert Herrmann, a German scholar, had in his Untersuchungen über das schottische Alexanderbuch (1893) suggested that the translator of the Alexander in 1438 had learned the Bruce by heart, and thus came to imitate it so frequently and closely. Mr J. T. Brown in The Wallace and the Bruce Restudied (Bonner Beiträge zur Anglistik, Heft vi.; Bonn, 1900) argued that the Bruce was rewritten towards the close of the fifteenth century by a scribe who 'edited' it by the insertion of romance embellishments, including the numerous passages from the Alexander. The ascription to Barbour of the Alexander was first made by the present writer in a paper on 'John Barbour, Poet and Translator,' read to the Philological Society in London on 22nd June 1900.

No inconsiderable proportion of the alliterations in those four May pieces occur in Huchown's May descriptions, one of which is above quoted: these are found in the Bruce as well as in the Alexander, and Huchown's own indubitable familiarity with the French Alexandre lends countenance to the suggestion that through these descriptions of May, which have a music of their own, we can hear the echo of the romance culture of the fourteenth century, and recognise in Barbour this evident trace of Huchown's intellectual ascendancy over him. As we have seen, they were colleagues at the Exchequer, and it is pleasant to have grounds so solid for the belief that their leisure talk may have turned to the Nine Worthies, to Arthur, or to 'Sir Hector of Troy.' The last-named theme had probably enlisted Barbour's poetical sympathies early in his career, for no really tenable objection has been stated to the ascription to Barbour by a fifteenth-century scribe of portions of a rhymed translation of Guido. These Troy Fragments (edited in Barbour's Legendensammlung by Professor C. Horstmann) contain not a few of the specialties of Barbour's methods of translation, and though they do not heighten his reputation as a poet, they show us once more what we have seen in the career of Huchown, how great a power in Scottish literature Guido was, and how the translation of his Troy book was the schoolroom of our mediæval poets. The work of Barbour during his old age, it has been supposed—and there are many evidences in favour of that opinion—included the writing of the Legends of the Saints, a performance of unequal merit, for the most part rather tedious, but frequently breaking out into attractive fragments of narrative, in which the hand of the author of the Bruce seems to burst its hagiological bonds and dash once more into the martial fray. For example, in the legend of St Ninian, the minstrel of battle reappears to tell the story of Jak Trumpoure—who has been identified as historical in the Great Seal Register of Scotland, and even as resident in Barbour's own city (Scottish Antiquary, xi. 103; Jamieson's Bruce, preface, p. iv.). Sir Fergus (or Dougal) M'Dowall, waylaid in Galloway by Englishmen, is warned in a vision by Ninian, the great saint of these parts:

He hade na mane vith hyme that tyde
 That ves gadderit set hyme til,
 Bot twenty mene gud and ill.

The story of Jak (afterwards Carrick Herald) is told so much in the Archdeacon's manner as to form a remarkable connecting-link between the chivalry of the Bruce and the Alexander and the biographical piety of the Legends.

GEO. NEILSON.]

There are two principal MSS. of the Bruce, both 15th century. The poem, printed in 1571 and 1616, was edited by Jamieson (1820), Cosmo Innes (1856), Skeat (E.E.T.S. 1870–77; S.T.S. 1894), and W. M. Mackenzie (1909). The Legends of the Saints and the Troy Fragments, discovered by Bradshaw in the Cambridge University Library (see Bradshaw's Life by Prothero, 1889), were edited as Barbour's by Horstmann in 1881–82. These attributions were at first accepted, but Köppel (Engl. Studien, x. 373) and Buss (Anglia, ix. 493) disputed them. Similarly Professor Skeat, followed by Dr Metcalfe (Scot. Text Soc. 1896), denied Barbour's claim. The argument for Barbour was renewed by Geo. Neilson (Scot. Antiquary, 1897, and Athenæum, 27th Feb. 1897). The critical views expressed in the present article are set forth in Geo. Neilson's 'John Barbour, Poet and Translator' (1900). J. T. T. Brown's The Wallace and the Bruce Restudied (Bonn, 1900) denied the genuineness of the text of Bruce, and ascribed many of its best passages to John Ramsay, a late 15th-century scribe, who was thus credited not only with collaborating in the composition of the Wallace of Blind Harry, but also with redacting and embroidering the Bruce, as written by Barbour. This bold study in sceptical and reconstructive literary criticism was at once attacked by Neilson from the historical base, and a keen controversy ensued in the Athenæum from 17th Nov. 1900 to 23rd Feb. 1901. Professor R. L. Graeme Ritchie edited (4 vols. 1921-29) for the Scottish Text Society The Buth of Alexander with the French text (Vaux du Paon and Fuerre de Gaderis) for purposes of comparison. With critics generally the authorship of the Alexander remains an open question, and the discussion is by no means ended.

Andrew of Wyntoun.—Androwe of Wyntowne, one of the canons regular of St Andrews, who became prior of the Inch in Lochleven, did 'at the instans of a larde,' Schyr Jhone of Wemis, resolve to draw up chronicles out 'off Latyne in tyll Ynglys sawe' (which he calls 'owre langage'). And inasmuch as his Chronicle is to expound the beginning of angels and men, he wills that it be called 'orygynale.' The angels are briefly dealt with, and he proceeds to 'Adame owre orygynale,' the Creation, the Fall (without specifying Satan's share), the 'spate of Noe,' and the Scripture history briefly; followed by some 'account of Egypt, Assyria, Rome, emperors and popes, till he comes to 'Ynglis and Scottis story.' That he has little regard to the relative importance of events may be seen from the chief incident recorded under the papacy of Siricius (384-398), when—according to his authorities—St Jerome translated the Bible out of Hebrew, and St Austin received Christendom, and St Ambrose was making 'antemys and wersyklys & ymnys' (anthems, versicles, and hymns); at this time there was born a remarkable two-headed 'barne,' which, in addition to two heads ('hevydys'), four eyes, four ears, two mouths, two noses, four hands, four feet, twenty fingers and twenty 'tays,' had an inconveniently 'dowbyll wyt'—

For quhen the ta hevyd oysyd to slepe the one head used
The tothir than wald waik or wepe,
And quhen the tane wald tak the mete
Than wald the tothir nevyr etc.

The Orygynale Cronykil is in general merely a rhyming chronicle without poetical merit save a certain rude vigour and homely simplicity, though at times it rises to the level of poetry, and as a piece of literature it is greatly inferior to Barbour. It contains the usual proportion of fables, but fewer than Fordun (see page 182), and makes no mention of the forty-four fabulous kings before Fergus, though the early chronology of Scotland is chaotic. The Cronykil is of no small historical value, especially for some periods of the national life; about the bishopric of St Andrews, for example, Wyntoun gives us more information than anybody else. Andrew, who must have known a good deal of law, and often uses legal phraseology, became prior of St Serf's island monastery about 1395, and brings down his record (written here, no doubt) to 1406. On doubtful grounds, he is sometimes said to have written the last lines in 1424. The date of his death is not known. 'In honowre of the ordrys nyne of haly angelys,' he divided his work into nine books, of which five deal with sacred and universal history, and only the last four with Scottish story. It is not known what Wyntoun gave Andrew birth—there is one on the Haddingtonshire Tyne—or to what family of Wintons he belonged.

The Flood is described with some force :

The meeting of Macbeth with the Weird Sisters (compare Bellenden, page 216) is thus described :

At the siege of Berwick in 1296 the Scots defeated the first attacks of the English and burnt their ships; the 'mökkyshe ryme' made by the Scots on this occasion has been given above at page 171. Wyntoun describes with malicious joy the rage and disgust of Edward 'with the lang schankis' on hearing of the disaster, and tells how he writhed with wrath and led a new host in person against the troublesome town; how, foiled again in an open assault, he had recourse to 'dissymbelatyoun,' and pretended to withdraw his armies; and how, having disguised them as Scots, with false-painted banners, he returned again to the gates:

The last two lines show what was the language of this very 'English' King Edward I., and of his commanders and camp. But though Edward and his nobles and gentry habitually spoke French (lasses is, of course, laissez), as doubtless Bruce, Baliol, and the Scottish nobles also did, Edward knew English, and is recorded to have sometimes spoken English.

The story of the defence by Black Agnes of her castle of Dunbar in 1339 against the English besiegers is told with spirit and with much detail, including a famous episode:

The part of Wyntoun's Chronicle concerning Scotland was printed by Macpherson in 1795; a complete edition was prepared by David Laing for the 'Historians of Scotland' series (3 vols. 1872-79). The historical importance of Wyntoun is recognised by the numerous early MSS. of the Cronykil still in existence. F. J. Amours edited Wyntoun's Chronicle from the Cottonian and Wemyss MSS. with variants from other texts (S.T.S., 6 vols. 1903-14).

More than half a century before Wyntoun invited his Chronicle in the priory at Lochleven, a secular priest, John Fordun, canon of Aberdeen Cathedral, was gathering and recording the annals of Scotland in Latin. Fordun is represented as having travelled far and wide throughout Britain and Ireland, with his MS. in his breast, gathering materials; his labours having been vastly increased by the vandalism of the tyrant Edward, who had carried off the national records. And Fordun gathered a good deal of the material that later, in Boece's hands, blossomed out into the mythical history of early Scotland, for which only recent research has substituted authentic fact. He brought his Scotichronicon down to the death of David I. in 1153, but had collected materials extending to the year 1385, about which time he is supposed to have died. His History was then taken up and continued (also in Latin) to the death of James I. (1437) by Walter Bower, or BOW-MAKER, abbot of the monastery of Austin Canons on Inchcolm, in the Firth of Forth, who died in 1449. Bower and others made interpolations throughout and alterations; but as it is, the Scotichronicon is the principal authority for the history of Scotland before the fifteenth century. On early Scottish history-writing Skene thus sums up: Before Fordun there were 'only short chronicles and lists of kings. The germs of much that was fabulous were to be found among them, intermingled with fragments of true history, but nothing like the spurious and fictitious history of after-times then existed. In the Scotichronicon these fables are found digested into something like a chronological system, which formed the basis of the fictitious superstructure invented by historians of the school of Hector Boece (see page 212); but the narrative of the Scotichronicon becomes more valuable during what may be called the historic period of Scottish history. In that of the twelfth and thirteenth it forms the indispensable groundwork of our annals; while in the fourteenth century it becomes a contemporary authority; but this is only true in so far as it is the work of John Fordun. The additions of his continuators are not of the same value' until they in turn become contemporary historians; Bower's account of his own time is certainly important.

Skene's edition of Fordun (2 vols. 1871-72, with translation) does not contain Bower's continuation. The Scotichronicon as completed by Bower was edited by Goodall in 1759.

The Kingis Quair and James I.—The lustre that surrounded the name of James I. of Scotland has of recent years been somewhat shorn of its brightness. With the real facts of his reign before us, it is now impossible to regard him as a king after the model of an Alfred or a St Louis, pursuing with undivided aim the happiness and well-being of all classes of his people. His claims also to be regarded as a poet have of late been debated. Yet, after every abatement has been made, James must ever remain one of the most interesting figures in the history of his country. His long exile and imprisonment, his undoubted personal accomplishments, and, above all, his early and tragic death, must continue to give him a place apart in the succession of Scottish kings.

As the result of the latest research, much must be rejected or modified in the traditional accounts of James's life. Born in 1394, he was the third son of Robert III., that amiable though feeble king whose difficulties with his unruly barons are so vividly set forth in the Fair Maid of Perth. James's early education was entrusted to Bishop Wardlaw, one of the most enlightened Scots of his day, and subsequently the founder of the University of St Andrews. At this period it was to France that the studious youth of Scotland flocked for the completion of their studies; and as Scotland and France were then in the strictest bonds of political amity, there were at once public and private reasons for sending the heir of the Scottish crown to that friendly country. That James was sent to escape personal danger there is no evidence to show. In view of his future career it would be hard to say whether the miscarriage of his guardians' purpose was of good or evil fortune. In the spring of 1406 James sailed for France, but was captured by the English off Flamborough Head. For eighteen years he remained a prisoner, and, though strictly guarded throughout the whole period, he received an education which, alike for his future as a poet and as a king, was probably of greater value than what even France could have afforded him. He made that sympathetic study of Chaucer which he turned to such profit in the Kingis Quair, and he acquired that knowledge of the English constitution which enlarged his views of his function as a king of Scots. The traditional account which associates his exile so closely with Windsor Castle must now be set aside. If he is to be thought of in connection with one spot more than another, it is with the Tower of London rather than Windsor Castle; for it was in that prison and asylum of princes that his longest abodes were made. In point of fact, however, his changes of residence were frequent throughout the whole term of his detention; and there are on record at least two visits to France, each of some months' duration.

The death of Henry V. in 1422 opened a way for the restoration of James to his native country; yet his return was delayed for other two years. At length, in 1424, on the pledge of a ransom of £40,000, to be paid in six instalments, the Scots received back their king. With him James took as his wife Lady Joan Beaufort, daughter of John, Earl of Somerset, grandson of Edward III. Of the relations of James and his wife before their marriage we cannot speak with certainty; for, whatever view we take of the authorship of the Kingis Quair—the 'King's Quire or Book'—the very nature of that poem precludes us from taking its statements as matters of fact. Yet their union may have been one of love as well as policy. Their married life was happy; and if we may measure Joan's attachment to her husband by the ferocity of her revenge on his assassins, that attachment must have been great indeed.

During his actual reign of thirteen years it would seem as if James were pursued by a sense of the years he had lost in his long exile. His well-known saying, 'I will make the key keep the castle, and the bracken-bush the cow', expresses at least the general aim of his policy. Of his energy and capacity as a ruler even the meagre record of his actions that has been preserved affords conclusive proof. Yet the course and conclusion of his reign leave us in little doubt that his energy was not directed by tact and prudence, and that the aggrandisement of the Crown lay as near his heart as the general good of his people. By his violent and illegal confiscations he alienated the majority of his nobles, and by rash impositions he made himself unpopular with his subjects at large. His assassination (1437) in the Blackfriars' Convent at Perth was the issue of personal revenge; but even the circumstances of his end, so fitted to touch the heart of a people, gave him no place in the memory of his countrymen such as was held by his descendants James IV. and James V.

It is strange to turn from the picture of the king, energetic, hard, and even unscrupulous, to that of the poet who idealised his love in such a poem as the Kingis Quair. Yet, independently of the evidence of his poetry, we know that James was keenly susceptible to the lighter graces of life. He was an adept in all manly sports, he sang and he played several instruments, and he took delight in drawing and painting and gardening. Of all the learning of the time, and specially of the art of poetry, he was an ardent student; and it was doubtless this reputation which led to his being accredited with the authorship of several poems now dissociated from his name. The Kingis Quair and A Ballad of Good Counsel—of all the poems that have been attributed to him these are the only two that his most competent editor, Professor Skeat, accepts as indisputably the work of James. The Song on Absence, Pebbles to the Play, Chrystis Kirk of the Grene, cannot, according to Professor Skeat, be ascribed to him 'with any show of reason'—a conclusion contested by Mr Henderson in his Scottish Vernacular Literature (1898). But scepticism has not stopped short even here, and it has lately been maintained that we have no certainty that the Kingis Quair itself is from the hand of James. The case against James may be briefly stated: the copyist of the only manuscript which exists errs in assigning certain poems to Chaucer, and he may also err in the case of James; the references of the early Scottish historians to James's poetry are so vague that they leave the question open; in lists of Scottish poets by Dunbar and Sir David Lyndsay respectively there is no mention of James I.; in the poem itself there are errors of fact regarding James's life which could not have been made had James himself been its author; and, lastly, the poem is an imitation, both in language and structure, of the pseudo-Chaucerian Court of Love, which, though it was first printed as Chaucer's in 1561, and was long believed to be his, was certainly not written before 1450. This is not the place to discuss a question which perhaps only a combination of literary, philological, and historical experts could adequately handle; but it may be said that the majority of critics continue to declare in favour of the authenticity of the poem.

One fact, heretofore overlooked, may here be noted as not without significance: James's household seems to have been a veritable nest of royal singing birds. In an age when women were not usually conspicuous in letters, no less than three of James's six daughters attained literary fame on the Continent. The unhappy Marguérite d'Écosse, married to the Dauphin who became Louis XI., sought in poetry consolation for her husband's neglect, and was not merely the friend and patron of poets, but spent many a sleepless night in writing rondeaux. Her next sister, Isabel, Duchess of Bretagne, was credited with a touching poem (in French) on Marguérite's early death. The fourth daughter of the house, Eleanor, was the wife of Sigismund, Archduke of Austria; and she took high rank amongst the vernacular German writers of the fifteenth century by her translation of an old French romance, long a model for German authors.

Since the day when the Kingis Quair was given to the world, it has always been regarded as an exceptionally interesting poem. Washington Irving only expresses the opinions of successive generations of readers when he speaks of its 'delightful artlessness and urbanity,' and 'its refinement and exquisite delicacy, . . . banishing every gross thought or immodest expression.' Regarded as an artistic whole, indeed, the poem has serious defects. The six different sections of which it is composed are not fused by the unconscious logic of passion and imagination, and appear to have been prompted merely by the conventional models of the time. In this regard, the Court of Love, with which it challenges comparison, has a distinct superiority; but, on the other hand, in the natural and beautiful expression of the sentiment of rapturous love which is the theme of both, there can be no hesitation in choosing between the two poems. In the Court of Love a certain hardness and commonness of tone repels us in its most highly-wrought passages; but the poet of the Kingis Quair is the ideal lover throughout. It is this impression we receive from the poem of a nature inherently formed for love that, together with its pure poetic quality, has ensured to the Kingis Quair its peculiar place in the species of imaginative literature to which it belongs.

A Ballad of Good Counsel.

Sen throu vertew encreasis dignite, Since—increases
And vertew flour and rut is of noblay, root—nobility
Of ony weill or quhat estat thou be,

Quhare as in straye ward and in strong prisoun,
So fer-forth, of my lyf the heuy lyne,
Without confort, in sorowe abandoun, The second of
The secunde sistere lukit hath to twyne, the Fates
Nere by the space of zeris twise nyne;
Till Iupiter his merci list aduert,
And send confort in relesche of my smert.

Quhare as in ward full oft I wold bewaillie
My dedely lyf, full of peyne and penance,
Saing ryght thus, quhat haue I gilt to faille
My fredome in this ward and my plesance?
Sen euery wight has thereof suffisance,
That I behold, and I a creature
Put from all this—hard is myn auenture!

The bird, the beste, the fisch eke in the see,
They lyve in fredome euerich in his kynd;
And I a man, and lakkith libertee;
Quhat schall I seyne, quhat resoun may I fynd, say
That fortune suld do so? thus in my mynd
My folk I wold argewe, bot all for noght; attendants
Was non that myght, that on my peynes rought. recked

Than wold I say, 'gif god me had deusit
To lyve my lyf in thraldome thus and pyne,
Quhat was the cause that he me more comprisit
Than othir folk to lyve in suich ruyne?
I suffer allone amang the figuris nyne, t
Ane wofull wrecche that to no wight may spede,
And zit of euery lyvis help hath nede.'

The longë dayes and the nyghtis eke
 I wold bewaille my fortune in this wise,
 For quhich, agane distresse confort to seke,
 My custum was on mornis for to ryse
 Airly as day; o happy exercise!
 By the come I to ioye out of turment.
 Bot now to purpose of my first entent :—

Bewailing in my chamber thus allone,
 Despeired of all ioye and remedye,
 For-tirit of my thought, and wo begone,
 Unto the wyndow gan I walk in hye,
 To se the warld and folk that went forby;
 As for the tyme, though I of mirthis fude
 Myght haue no more, to luke it did me gude.

Now was there maid fast by the touris wall
 A gardyn faire, and in the corneris set
 Ane herbere grene, with wandis long and small Railit about; and so with treis set
 Was all the place, and hawthorn hegis knet,
 Thot lyf was non walking there forby,
 That myght within scarce ony wight aspye.

So thik the bewis and the leues grene
 Beschadit all the aleyes that there were,
 And myddis euery herbere myght be sene
 The scharpë grenë suetë ienepere,
 Growing so faire with branchis here and there,
 That, as it semyt to a lyf without,
 The bewis spred the herbere all about;

And on the smallë grenë twistis sat
 The lytill suetë nyghtingale, and song
 So loud and clere, the ymynis consecrat
 Off lufis vse, now soft, now lowd among,
 That all the gadyng and the wallis rong
 Ryght of thaire song, and on the copill next
 Off thaire suete armony, and lo the text :

Cantus.

'Worschippë, ze that loue bene, this may,
 For of 3our blisse the kalendis are begonne,
 And sing with vs, away, winter, away!
 Cum, somer, cum, the suete sesoun and sonne!
 Awake for schame! that haue 3our hevynnis wonne,
 And amorously lift vp 3our hedis all,
 Thank lufe that list 3ou to his merci call.'

Quhen thai this song had song a lytill thrawe,
 Thai stent a quhile, and therewith vnafraid,
 As I beheld and kest myn eyne a-lawe,
 From beugh to beugh thay hippit and thai plaid, hopped
 And freschly in thaire birdis kynd arraid
 Thaire fetheris new, and fret thame in the sonne,
 And thankit lufe, that had thaire makis wonne.

This was the planë ditee of thaire note,
 And there-with-all vnto my-self I thocht,
 'Quhat lyf is this, that makis birdis dote?
 Quhat may this be, how cummyth it of ought?
 Quhat nedith it to be so dere ybought?
 It is nothing, trowe I, bot feynit chere,
 And that men list to counterfeten chere.'

Eft wald I think; 'o lord, quhat may this be?
 That lufe is of so noble myght and kynde,
 Lufing his folk, and suich prosperitee

Is it of him, as we in bukis fynd?
 May he oure hertes setten and vnbynd?
 Hath he vpon oure hertis suich maistrie?
 Or all this is bot feynyt fantasie!

(Stanzas 25-37.)

Quhen I a lytill thrawe had maid my moon, moan
 Bewailling myn infortune and my chance,
 Vnknawin how or quhat was best to doon,
 So ferre I-fallyng into lufis dance,
 That sodeynly my wit, my contenance,
 My hert, my will, my nature, and my mynd,
 Was changit clene ryght in an-othir kynd.

Off hir array the form gif I sall write,
 Toward hir goldin haire and rich atyre
 In fret-wise couchit was with perllis quhite
 And gretë balas lemyng as the fyre, rubies—gleaming
 With mony ane emeraut and faire saphire;
 And on hir hede a chaplet fresch of hewe,
 Off plumys partit rede, and quhite, and blewe;

Full of quaking spangis bryght as gold, spangles
 Forgit of schap like to the amorettis, love-knots
 So new, so fresch, so plesant to behold,
 The plumys eke like to the floure-Ionettis, St John's wort
 And othir of schap like to the round crokettis, curls
 And, aboue all this, there was, wele I wote,
 Beautee eneuch to mak a world to dote.

About hir nek, quhite as the fyre amaille, enamel
 A gudely cheyne of smale orfeuerie, goldsmith's work
 Quhareby there hang a ruby, without faille,
 Lyke to ane hertë schapin verily,
 That, as a sperk of lowe, so wantonly fire
 Semyt birnyng vpon hir quhytë throte;
 Now gif there was gud partye, god it wote!

And forto walk that freschë mayes morowe,
 An huke sche had vpon hir tissew quhite, dress
 That gudeliare had nought bene sene toforowe,
 As I suppose; and girt sche was a lyte;
 Thus haflyng louse for haste, to suich delyte half-loose
 It was to see hir 3outh in gudelihede,
 That for rudenes to speke thereof I drede.

In hir was 3outh, beautee, with humble apert, bearing
 Bountee, riches, and wommanly facture, shape
 God better wote than my pen can report:
 Wisedome, largesse, estate, and connyng sure
 In euery poynt so guydit hir mesure,
 In word, in dede, in schap, in contenance,
 That nature myght no more hir childe auance.

Lawson's edition of the Kingis Quair and the Quare of Jelusy (1910). See also Henderson, Scottish Vernacular Literature (1898); Jusserand, The Romance of a King's Life (1896); J. T. T. Brown, The Authorship of the Kingis Quair: a New Criticism (1896); R. S. Rait, The Kingis Quair and the New Criticism (1898). The question of the authenticity of the Kingis Quair is discussed in the Athenæum for July and August 1896, and for December 1899; by M. Jusserand in the Revue Historique for 1897 (reprinted); and by Skeat, Chaucerian and other Pieces, 1897 (p. lxxv.). In the Athenæum, 22nd July 1899, p. 130, Skeat holds it probable that the author of the Kingis Quair was also author of Fragment B of the Romannt of the Rose—the continuation of Chaucer's part. The Kingis Quair is not written in true Northum-brian, but in a purely artificial language, with southern and even Kentish forms and peculiarities; and so is B. For the identification of the scribe of the Kingis Quair, see Mr Geo. Neilson in the Athenaeum of 16th December 1899, and Mr A. H. Millar in that of 21st December. Rossetti's ballad, The King's Tragedy (1881), on James's fate is as admirable as Galt's novel The Spaewife is poor.

P. HUME BROWN.

Blind Harry, or HENRY THE MINSTREL, is hus spoken of by John Major in his Latin History of Greater Britain (translated for the Scottish History Society by Constable, 1892): 'There was one Henry, blind from his birth, who in the time of my childhood fabricated a whole book about William Wallace, and therein he wrote down in our native rhymes—and this was a kind of composition in which he had much skill—all that passed current amongst the people in his day. I, however, can give but a partial credence to such writings as these. This Henry used to recite his tales in the households of the nobles, and thereby got the food and clothing that he earned.' Major was born in 1469, and Blind Harry may be said to have 'flourished' on a modest scale about 1470. But it is hardly credible that Major can have had authority for saying the Minstrel was blind from birth; and his work proves that he was by no means so unlettered as is commonly assumed. Payments made to him by the king's command cease—presumably at his death—in 1492. In his Wallace Harry claims that it was founded on a narrative of the life of Wallace, written in Latin by Arnold Blair, chaplain to the Scottish hero; but the chief materials have evidently been the traditionary stories told about Wallace in the minstrel's own time, more than a century and a half after Wallace—the Wallace is even less of a historical document than Barbour's Bruce. Perhaps too much has been made of the Minstrel's patriotic hatred of the English, in contrast to Barbour's less marked partisanship, and of his fierce thirst for revenge on his own and his country's oppressors. But Harry's Wallace is a merciless champion, for ever hewing down the English with his strong arm and terrible sword, and rejoicing in the sufferings of his enemies. Both with Barbour and Blind Harry it is fatal to measure literary value by historical accuracy.

Some of the incidents in Harry's narrative are so palpably absurd (such as the siege of York; the visit of the Queen of England, when queen there was none, to Wallace's camp with an offer of £3000 in gold; and the combats of Wallace with the French champions and the lion) that they could hardly have been intended to be accepted as history. The only manuscript of the work which exists is dated 1488, and was written by that careful scribe, John Ramsay of Lochmalonie, in Kilmany, who also transcribed Barbour's Bruce. The blind Minstrel was therefore alive four years after the date of Ramsay's manuscript, as we know from the treasurer's books of the reign of James IV.; and Ramsay had doubtless the author's help—perhaps took it down from his own recitation. Few copies would be made of a poem extending to 11,858 lines. In 1897 Professor Skeat drew attention to the fact that Blind Harry in some score of cases betrays the influence of Chaucer in his rhythms, in expressions, in occasional half-lines, and even in his grammatical forms; and Dr Craigie has pointed out that the peroration or epilogue at the end of the Wallace contains part of the substance of the prologue to the Franklin's tale. Blind Harry writes:

Go nobil buk, fulfillyt of gud sentens
Suppos thou baran be of eloquens . . .
I yow besek, off your beneuolence,
Quha will nocht low, lak nocht my eloquence; love—
It is weill knawin I am a burel man, blame
For her is said as gudly as I can: unlearned
My spreit felis na termis asperans. knows—inspired

Chaucer's Franklin had made a similar apology:

But sires by-cause I am a burel man
At my bigynnyng first I yow biseche,
Have me excused of my rudé speche. . . .
My spirit feeleth noght of swich mateere.

The Wallace is in ten-syllable lines of heroic verse, and is pithy and graphic rather than poetical. It is usual to place Harry far below Barbour as a poet; but Dr Craigie has sought to reverse this historic verdict by insisting on Harry's conciseness in contrast to Barbour's undisputed prolixity, his greater variety of incident, his more vivid descriptions and more pregnant single lines, his keener passion for liberty, and his avoidance of a kind of padding not unusual in the Bruce. A paraphrase of the Wallace into English doggerel, by William Hamilton of Gilbertfield (1722; see Vol. II. p. 309), was long a favourite in Scotland; of it, and of a rhymed chap-book on Hannibal, Burns said: 'They were the first books I read in private, and gave me more pleasure than any two books I ever read since. . . . The story of Wallace poured a Scottish prejudice into my veins, which will boil along there till the floodgates of life shut in eternal rest'—a notable testimony to Harry's influence on Scottish thought and literature.

The poem opens thus:

The Wallace was printed in 1570, and no old Scottish work was so often reprinted down to the eighteenth century. Dr Jamieson's was the first critical edition (1820); the best text is that edited by Moir (S.T.S. 1883-86). See Skeat on 'Chaucer and Blind Harry' in The Modern Language Quarterly, Nov. 1897; Craigie's 'Barbour and Blind Harry as Literature' in the Scottish Review, July 1893; J. T. T. Brown's Wallace and the Bruce Restudied (1900); Neilson's Blind Harry's Wallace (1910); and Mythical Bards and the Life of Wm. Wallace (Harvard, 1920), by Prof. Schofield, who thinks 'Blind Harry' a mere mythical pseudonym.

Scottish Fifteenth-Century Prose.—

Scottish prose literature, vigorous in the sixteenth century, had hardly made a beginning in the fifteenth. There had been preserved Aus Schort Memoriale of the Scottis Croniklis from the reigns of James II. and James III., dating from about 1460 (printed 1820). About 1450-90 Sir Gilbert of the Haye translated the Buke of the Law of Armys (or Buke of Bataillis) and Buke of Knycht- hede from the French, the Buke of the Govern-aunce of Princis from the Latin, and the lengthy Buke of the Conqueror Alexander the Great from the French. Laing edited the second-named —also translated by Caxton—in 1847; J. H.

 Stevenson edited the first three (S.T.S. 1900-14.)
 And The Craft of Dying and other religious pieces printed for the Early English Text Society (1870) seem to belong to the end of the century. There is a Scots letter or grant dated 1412, and written by James I. while he was a prisoner in England,
 From the end of the previous century we have one of the very oldest and most interesting Low-land Scots letters extant—that from the Earl of March to Henry IV. of England announcing his grievances at the hands of the unhappy Duke of Rothesay, counting kin with the king after a highly Scottish fashion, and pleading for Henry's support. It must have been written before Rothesay's marriage with the daughter of Douglas (February 1400), and represents the 'Englis' current north of the Tweed at that date; the writer's style is as clear as he wished his 'entent' to be,
 and the fact is interesting that at this date Norman French was not necessarily familiar to the higher nobility of Scotland. The Earl of March rebelled against Robert III., threw himself into the arms of Henry IV., served him with distinction at the battle of Shrewsbury, and even took part in English raids into Scotland. The letter is reproduced in facsimile in vol. ii. of the National Manuscripts of Scotland (1870):

Robert Henryson (1425?–1506?) has been called by Henley 'Chaucer's aptest and brightest scholar,' and was doubtless the most Chaucerian of the Scottish Chaucerians; not a mere imitator, but with a rich and varied poetic gift of his own. He has keen observation, humour, singular skill in rhyme and rhythm, and an artistic feeling and culture which prove that the spirit of the early Renaissance had at least one accomplished representative in the fierce, faction-torn Scotland of the reign of James III. Even his allegories have a marked flavour of realism. Henryson seems to have been born about 1425, and was doubtless educated at some foreign university. He was schoolmaster of Dunfermline, apparently in clerical orders—perhaps, as Lord Hailes suggests, preceptor in the Benedictine convent there—and he was admitted a member of the University of Glasgow in 1462, being described as the 'Venerable Master Robert Henrysone, licentiate in arts, and bachelor in decrees.' He also practised as a notary public, and may have lived into the early years of the sixteenth century. The principal works of Henryson are Moral Fables of Æsop, thirteen in number, with two prologues; Orpheus and Eurydice, describing the experiences of Orpheus in Hades, and his futile efforts to bring thence his wife; The Testament of Cresseide, a sequel to Chaucer's Troilus and Cressida, which contains some admirable descriptive writing, and is in general both vigorous and poetic in feeling; and Robene and Makyne, which is not merely the first pastoral in the Scottish vernacular, but is really the earliest pastoral in the English tongue.

The conjunct names of Robin and May may have been suggested by some of the forms of the Robin Hood and Maid Marian, commonly played in Scotland, or by the celebrated pastoral, Robin et Marion, of the great French trouvère, Adam de la Halle of Arras (c.1220–88). Li Gieus de Robin et de Marion takes a conspicuous place in the history of comedy and of opera; but though hero and heroine are shepherd and shepherdess, and there is some allusion to sheep, the plan is totally different from Henryson's pastoral. In the French one the course of true love, ultimately triumphant, is deferred by the importunate lovemaking of chevaliers, to which Marion (or Mariotte) turns a deaf ear, preferring coarse cheese with Robin to a palfrey and luxurious living elsewhere. The king appears, and there are numerous interlocutors. Henryson's poem is a love dialogue between a shepherd and shepherdess. The stock properties—the pipe and crook, the hanging grapes, spreading beech, and celestial purity of the golden age—find no place in the northern pastoral. Henryson's Robin is ungallantly insensible to the advances of Makyne:

Robene fat on gud grene hill,
Kepand a flock of fe :
Mirry Makyne said him till,
'Robene, thow rew on me ;
I haif thee luvit lowd and fill,
Thir yeiris two or thre ;
My dule in dern bot gif thow dill,
Doutlefs but dreid I de.'

Makyne explained and pleaded, but her plea failed to move the obdurate shepherd:

The tables are soon turned. Robin grew sick as Makyne grew well, and then she had the malicious satisfaction of rejecting him. This is the old story with the old moral, which, though the fashion in pastoral and other poetry has changed, never becomes obsolete.

The Garmond of Gude Ladeis is a clever series of conceits in ballad rhyme, with copious alliteration, such as is found in many of Henryson's poems :

Wald my gude lady lufe me best
And wirk eftir my will,
I fuld ane garmond gudlieft garment
Gar mak hir body till.

Her hood, gown, kirtle, are all symbolical, and so

Her belt fuld be of benignitie
About hir middill meit ;
Hir mantill of humilitie
To thole baith wind and weit. endure

Hir slevis fuld be of eferance,
To keip hir fra dispair ;
Hir gluis of gud govornance,
To hyd hir fyngearis fair.

The Bludy Serk is a ballad of a knight who rescued a king's daughter from the dungeon of a foul and loathly giant, but, wounded to death in the encounter, bequeathed to the lady the garment wet with his life's blood. According to the 'moralitas,' this is to be understood of the human soul, Lucifer, and the Redeemer.

The Prais of Aige proves that 'the moyr of aige the' nerar hevynnis bliss ;' though in Aige and Yowth, Youth defends a contrary thesis.

The introduction to The Testament of Cresseid is ingenious and entertaining.

Ane doolie fefoun to ane cairfull dyte doleful season
Suld correspond,

he says, and so chose to write on a bitter cold, clear night, in time of frost, with winds 'quhisling loud and schill' from the Arctic Pole ; so that he was driven from the windows of his study to the fireside, where he seems to have made himself most comfortable before beginning to write his melancholy tale :

I mend the fyre and beikit me about, warmed
Than tuik ane drink my spreitis to comfort,
And armit me weil fra the cauld thairout.
To cut the winter nicht and mak it schort,
I tuik ane quair and left all other sport, book
Writtin be worthie Chaucer glorious
Of fair Cresseid and lustie Troylus.

Henryson's fables are bright, entertaining, witty, and dramatic. Even the extracts will show how much liker the Freir, Wait-skaith the Wolf, and Lowrie the Tod (Laurence the Fox) are to the animals in Reynard the Fox (some of the early French recensions of which Henryson may have seen) than to the talking beasts of the Greek fabulist. Witty and satirical comment on potentates, courts, lawyers, and functionaries, on sensuality, falsehood, and other human weaknesses in the guise of the animals, is the substratum of the whole, and the dramatic presentation is equal to Reynard at its best.

Of Henryson's two Prologues to the fables, the second begins thus :

In middis of June, that joly sweit seafoun,
Quhen that fair Phebus, with his bemis bricht,

Had dryit up the dew fra daill and doun,
And all the land maid with his lemis licht ; gleams

The Uplandis Mous and the Burges Mous, to which editors have thought Sir Thomas Wyatt may have been indebted for the idea of one of his satires, tells the tale of two sister mice, of whom the elder lived a luxurious life in a town—'a Burrowis toun ;' while the younger, the 'rurall' sister, in winter 'had hunger, cauld, and tholit great distres.' The town mouse, wishing to hear of her sister's welfare, resolved to pay her a visit, and fared forth as a pilgrim, barefoot, with pikestaff in hand :

Furth mony wilsum wayis can scho walk, wild, lonely—did
Throw mosse and muir, throw bankis, busk and breir
Scho ranne cryand quhill scho cam till ane balk : 1
'Cum furth to me, my awin sifter deir ;
Cry "Peip" anis : ' With that the mous could heir, did hear
And knew her voce as kinnifman will do,
Be verray kind, and furth scho cum hir to.

The country mouse welcomes her sister warmly into her 'chalmers'—

As I hard say, it was ane sober wane, dwelling
Of fog and fairn full fellie weis maid, moose and fern Ane fillie scheill under ane steidfast stane— poor shelter and gives her of her best. This the luxurious town mouse could hardly accept with becoming gratitude ; she nibbles feebly at the 'rude dyet,' but frankly explains that she is accustomed to much better living :

'Till tender meit my stomok is ay ufit ;
Thir widdir peis and nuttis or thai be bord ere—bored
Will brek my teith and mak my wame full sklender Quhilk wes befor ufit to meittis tender ;'

and winds up with an invitation to her house in town—an invitation cheerfully accepted by the country mouse. They straightway set out, and, after some alarming adventures, arrive, and are comfortably established at table in the town house :

With fair tretie yit scho gart hir upryfe, 1, 2
And to the burde thay went and togidder sat, board, table

The mouse dislikes the look of the frog, and has serious misgivings, but ultimately accepts the offer of the frog to ferry her across. The paddock basely tries to drown the mouse, but a glad or kite intervenes, clutches and eats them both. There is a long 'moralitas' explaining the significance of the fable.

Single poems of Henryson were printed as early as 1508. The first collected edition was Laing's (1865). Professor Gregory Smith edited the Poems for the S.T.S. (3 vols. 1906-14); another edition is Wood's (1933). In Henryson's poems we have retained the long f.

William Dunbar was indisputably the most noteworthy of the Scottish disciples of Chaucer; he is generally reputed the greatest and most gifted of the old Scottish poets. It is surmised that he was connected with the house of which the Earl of March was head, and he was born, probably in East Lothian, about 1460. Having graduated at St Andrews University in 1479, he became a Franciscan, and, as he himself records, in the habit of that order made good cheer in every flourishing town in England betwixt Berwick and Calais, preaching as such from the pulpit at Canterbury and elsewhere, and, still a Greyfriar, crossing to Picardy. Under what circumstances he threw off the habit and was permitted to withdraw from his vows is not known. He appears to have been secretary to some of James IV.'s numerous embassies to foreign courts—one of them to Paris. In 1500 he obtained from the king a pension of £10, afterwards increased to £20, then to £80. In 1501 he visited England; in attendance on the ambassadors sent to arrange the king's marriage, seems to have dined with the Mayor of London; and as the 'Rhymer of Scotland' to have written his poem on London, and to have received a gift from Henry VII. In honour of the marriage he wrote his famous poem, The Thrissill and the Rois. In 1504 he took priest's orders, and the king made an offering at his first mass; his life seems hardly to have been in accordance with his clerical vocation, and he now lived chiefly about court, writing occasional poems, and sustaining himself with the vain hope of Church preferment. In 1508 Chepman printed in small separate sheets seven of his poems, among the very earliest specimens of Scottish typography. Amongst the seven are not merely the Goldyn Targe and the Lament, but the Flying, the Wemen and the Wedo, and Kynd Kyttok—among the least likely, one would think, to recommend him to pious patrons at a time when Elphinstone, most admirable of all the prelates of the old Scottish Church, was the foremost friend of learning in Scotland. He visited the north of Scotland in May 1511, in the train of Queen Margaret, and his name disappears altogether after Flodden. If he fell there, the Orisone (1517), usually ascribed to Dunbar, was the work of another poet.

Essentially a courtier and a court poet, Dunbar, unlike Lyndsay, did not write for the people also; he was not moved by sympathy for the people, was never a popular poet, and seems to have speedily passed out of general remembrance. He is named with appreciation by Douglas in his own time, and by Lyndsay in the next generation; thenceforward for nearly two hundred years he is hardly mentioned. Allan Ramsay revived his memory by printing in more or less modernised form twenty-five of his poems in The Evergreen in 1724; and Langhorne (died 1779) venturously affirmed that even in England—

In nervous strains Dunbar's bold music flows,
And Time yet spares the Thistle and the Rose.

Lord Hailes, Pinkerton, and Sibbald included Dunbar's poems in their collections (1770, 1786, and 1802)—the last upwards of forty of them. But it was not till Laing's edition (1824) that Dunbar's works, as far as preserved in the MSS., were put before the world. Sir Walter Scott (in his Memoir of Bannatyne for the Bannatyne Club) somewhat too enthusiastically said: 'This darling of the Scottish muses has been justly raised to a level with Chaucer by every judge of poetry to whom his obsolete language has not rendered him unintelligible.' Like unduly partial and patriotic judgments have been perhaps too often repeated by Scottish critics. And it was reserved for a very famous transatlantic Chaucerian to adopt, apparently with right goodwill, the part of Advocatus Diaboli. Lowell (in his essay on 'Spenser') very pointedly declined to thank Laing for 'disinter-ring' Dunbar; and, with an unusually unkind reference to Dunbar's most famous poem and to patriotic Scotsmen's clannish prejudices, added,

'Whoso is national enough to like thistles may browse there to his heart's content.' Save a few verses of The Merle and the Nightingale, Lowell found little in Dunbar's serious verses that was not tedious and pedantic. His humour he thought the dullest vulgarity; his satire 'becomes a mere offence in the nostrils.' But most critics have recognised Dunbar's real and original genius, and, though some have accounted Douglas his superior as a descriptive poet, or credited Henryson with more originality in serious verse, agree in describing him, with Professor Nichol, as 'on the whole the most considerable poet of our island between Chaucer and Spenser.'

Of extant poems attributed to Dunbar, upwards of ninety are pretty certainly his, and a dozen or more are almost certainly not by him. Several that are his we could wish were not. Some are merely skits on persons unknown, more or less cleverly put; some of those described as 'precatory' are short, rhymed begging letters, in several cases so happily turned as (like Buchanan's in Latin) thoroughly to deserve the rank of 'poems.' Variety is one of Dunbar's strong points, and his poems have usually been printed in an absolutely chaotic order, the rhymes of the ribald priest and the lucubrations of the court-moralist immediately succeeding one another with startling incongruity. Various editors have suggested classifications. Professor Schipper alone has rearranged the poems in twelve groups, and (somewhat arbitrarily) assumed that the most indecorous were written in early life, and the most devout or religious in his last years, mainly after the king's death. We may hope that this was the sequence. But it is impossible to draw sharp lines between the groups; and we do not know for certain the date of any one poem.

The most famous poem on the whole, that with which Dunbar's name is most frequently associated, is The Thrissill and the Rois, which has been extravagantly praised as the happiest political allegory in the English tongue. Though obviously connected with the marriage of James IV. and Margaret Tudor, it was not one of the poems distinguished by being printed during the poet's life; it has been preserved in only one MS., and could hardly have become public property till Allan Ramsay printed his version of it in 1724. It is certainly very unlike a serious and regular allegorical epithalamium. The beginning, a playful adaptation of the noble opening of the Prologue to the Canterbury Tales, leads up to a serious impeachment of the weather of May in Edinburgh, as ushered in by 'ane orient blast' (a happy euphemism for the snell east wind!) and ruled over by Æolus (not, as in Chaucer, Zephyrus). The unpleasantness of a Scottish May the poet alleges in justification for his freely admitted unwillingness to fulfil his duty as laureate, and for the difficulties Aurora and May had in persuading him to get out of bed at all:

Quhen Merché wes with variand windis past, varying
 And Appryll had with her siluer schouris (pron. Ap-e-ryll)
 Tane leif at nature with ane orient blast,
 And lusty May, that Muddir is of flouris, mother
 Had maid the birdis to begin thair houris
 Among the tender odouris reid and quhyt
 Quhois armony to heir it wes delyt.

As the dreamer lies sleeping, Aurora, 'with her crystall ene,' looks in at morn and embraces him
 'with visage pale and grene,' bidding lovers awake, but in vain. Then May stood by his bed 'in brycht attair of flouris forgit [forged] new,' and reproaches him sharply :

'Slugird,' scho said, 'awalk annone for schame, awake
 And in my honour sum thing thow go wryt :
 The lark hes done the mirry day proclame
 To raise up luvaris with confort and delyte,
 Zit nocht inaccessis thi curage to indyt
 Quhois hairt sum tyme hes glaid and blisfull bene
 Sangis to mak undir the levis grene !'

'Quhairto,' quod I, 'sall I vpryss at morrow ? uprise
 For in this May few birdis herd I sing,
 Thai haif moir causs to weip and plane thair sorrow,
 Thy air it is not holsum nor benyng ; benign
 Lord Eolus does in thy sessone ring, reign
 So busteous are the blastis of his horne violent
 Among thy bewis to walk I haif forborne.' boughs

For a poet of May this is certainly frank speech !
 And surely laureate never more honestly admitted the irksomeness and superfluosness of his official duties. But May, though very forbearing, insists :

With that this lady sobirly did smyll
 And said, 'Vpryss and do thy observance ;
 Thow did promyt in Mayis lusty quhyle promise
 For to discryve the Roiss of most plesance. describe—
 Go se the birdis how thay sing and dance rose Illuminit our with orient skyis brycht over Anamyllit richely with new asur lycht. Enamelled

Quhen this wes said departit scho this quene,
 And enterit in a lusty gairding gent ; gentle, sweet
 And than, methocht, full hestely becene hastily attired
 In serk and mantill eftir hir I went
 In to this garth most dulce and redole
 Of herb and flour and tendir plantis sueit
 And grené levis doing of dew down fleit. 1

¹ Causing dew down to drip.

Hereupon May disappears from the poem, but the dream—from which the dreamer awakes finally only in the last verse—goes on. As might be expected from his dream-like attire, the bard still has serious misgivings about May weather in these regions till—

Dame Nature galf ane inhibitioun thair
 To feras Neptunus and Eolus the bawld fierce
 Nocht to perturb the wattir nor the air,
 And that no schouris scharp nor blastis cawld
 Effray should flouris nor fowlis on the fold ;
 Scho bad eik Juno, goddess of the sky,
 That scho the hevin suld keip amene and dry. pleasant

Under these exceptional weather conditions, Dame Nature sends out the roe-deer to summon all the animals to her presence, the swallow to assemble the birds, and the yarrow (milfoil) plant to gather all flowers before her. First she crowns the Lion of the Scottish royal arms—'reid of his cullour . . . on feild of gold he stude full mychtely' —to be king of beasts, and commanded him to administer the laws fairly. Next she crowns the Eagle king of the birds (for the sake of logical symmetry, apparently) :

Than callit scho all flouris that grew on feild, she Discernyng all thair fassionis and effeiris ; fashions and Vpone the awfull Thrissill scho behelde, properties
 And saw him kept with a busche of speiris ;
 Concedring him so able for the weiris ; Considering—wars
 A radius croun of rubeis scho him gaif, radiant—gave
 And said, 'In feild go furth, and fend the laif ; defend the rest

And, sen thow art a king, thow be discreit ;
 Herb without vertew thow hald nocht of sic pryce
 As herb of vertew and of odor sueit ;
 And lat no nettill vyle, and full of vyce,
 Hir fallow to the gudly flour delyce ; Match herself—
 Nor latt no wyld weid, full of churlicheness, fleur-de-lis
 Compair hir till the lilleis nobilness.

Nor hald non vdir flour in sic denty other—esteem
 As the fresche Ross, of cullour reid and quhyt.' . . .

Finally Dame Nature, turning to the Rose, crowns her as of royal rank, illustrious of lineage above the Lily (of France), and as renowned for beauty also.
 The flowers, which had made no sign when the Thistle was crowned, burst forth in exuberant laudation of the empress of herbs, and the birds also in solo and chorus accept the Rose as their queen.

Than all the birdis song with sic a schout
 That I annone awoilk quhair that I lay :

turned about 'to see this court, but all were went away ;' and 'leaning up,' half in affray, the heavy-headed dreamer wrote down the story.

In Chaucer's Parliament of Foules also it is the 'noble goddess Nature' that superintends the mating of the birds and gives them good advice.

And with the shouting whan the song was do
 The foules maden at hir flight away
 I wook and other bokes took me to—are Chaucer's words. So that, as the Thrissill began with an adaptation of a Chaucer opening, it ends with an obvious imitation of a Chaucer ending.

The Thistle, recognised as already a king, does not seem to be crowned to so high a rank as the Lion and the Eagle ; there is no reference to any union between the Thistle and the Rose except what may be inferred from their being two of the four crowned heads of the piece ; the main function of the Thistle seems to be to keep 'churlish weeds' away from the Lily or the Rose. The poem is not, as is assumed, a simple self-consistent allegory turning on the mating of the English rose with the Scottish thistle. It seems as if the poet, fearing lest such a union should, in spite of his skill, seem a mesalliance, had deliberately confused and complicated the plot by making the Scottish monarch also a lion—not to speak of the eagle simile. The thistle seems to have been quite unknown as the emblem of Scotland or of its king till the negotiations for the marriage of James and Margaret (advancing in 1500), though we know that James IV. inherited from his dead father, amongst a vast number of things, crosses, jewels in the forms of swans, fleur-de-lis, cocks, pigeons, cockle-shells, and one purple covering embroidered with 'thistles and a unicorn.' Why James selected or used this badge has not been explained. Pinkerton even thought it was this poem that gave the thistle its proud pre-eminence in Scotland; and possibly the court-poet was making fun of the king, as he obviously was of conventional May-poets. This epithalamium was written in May, presumably of 1502 or 1503; Margaret left home in June 1503, and arrived at Holyrood to be married in August 1503. It is noticeable that in his other poems, where Margaret, 'a rose red and white,' is explicitly welcomed as Scotland's queen, Dunbar avoids all mention of thistles; nor does he elsewhere allude to the supposed national emblem, save once where he ruefully calls the king

The Thrissill,

Quhois pykis throw me so reutheles ran;

and plaintively wishes the rose would soften his hard heart towards the poor poet. Lyndsay, chief of the Heralds' College of Scotland in the next reign, who of all men should have been an authority on the subject, seems to have known nothing about thistles as conspicuous in Scottish heraldry or symbolism.

The Golden Targe is also rather a jeu d'esprit than a sustained allegory. It begins again with the praise of May, this time without any qualification; skies, flowers, and birds are all at their best. The following is one of the most noteworthy verses:

For mirth of May, wyth skippis and wyth hoppis,
The birdis sang vpon the tender croppis,	shoots
With curiouse note, as Venus chapell clerkis;
The rosis yong, new spreding of thair knoppis,	buds
War powderit brycht with hevynly beriall droppis,	beryl
Throu bemes rede, birnyng as ruby sperkis;
The skyes rang for schoutyng of the larkis,
The purpur hevyn our scallit in silvir sloppis	1, 2
Ourgilt the treis, branchis, lefis and barkis.	Overgilded

1 Scaled over (with clouds).

2 Slopes.

Drawn to a 'rosy garth,' the dreamer sleeps on Flora's mantle, and sees a noble ship land in the verdant meads a company of a hundred beauteous ladies, including Nature, Dame Venus, the Lady Flora, Juno, Diana, Fair Having, Fine Portraiture, Pleasance, Lusty Cheer, Will, Wantonness, and the rest, who are named merely and not described. The poet, as an intruder, is to be done to death by a detachment of fair ladies armed with bows and arrows; but is defended by Reason with a golden Targe or shield, until Presence throws a powder into Reason's eyes that blinds him, when his protégé is wounded nearly to death, made prisoner, and left in charge of Heaviness. The poem has been explained either as a fanciful account of a court masque after the event, or a poetical draft or plan for a possible court masque. It was notorious that the Princess Margaret was fond of archery; the Somerset Herald who accompanied her to Scotland has recorded that she shot a buck with an arrow in Alnwick Park on her way north; and from Pitscottie we know that after the marriage there were such banquets, plays, and farces as had never before been heard of in Scotland. The poet's suggestion that only Homer or Tullius (!) could have described the paradise where this adventure took place is apparently a serio-comic touch, like the mock-heroic apostrophe to reverend Chaucer, moral Gower, and Lydgate laureate at the end.

The Golden Targe has obviously much in common with the Parliament of Fowles on the one hand, and the Romaunt of the Rose on the other, if indeed it be not based on them. The machinery—vision, garden, May, flowers, birds singing, Cupid, Venus, &c.—is common to all three. The somewhat incongruous grouping of personages, including Priapus and Bacchus with Pleasance and Patience, comes into the Targe no doubt from the Parliament; so does Cupid and his two kinds of arrows (pointed and quarrel-headed)—in the Targe, 'dredeful arrows, grundyn sharp and square;' in the Parliament, 'some for to slee and some to wound and kerve.' The shooting at the intruding dreamer or poet, and the wounding of him by the golden arrow called Beauty, in the Romaunt of the Rose, is in the Targe represented by an arrow shot by one of Beauty's contingent of ladies; in both Reason plays a conspicuous though different part. And the strong Castle, its defence and assault, in the Romaunt are apparently partly reproduced in Dunbar's Lady's Prisoner. Many things barely intelligible as they stand in the Targe become more significant when studied in the full light of the Parliament and the Romaunt.

It is the more necessary to insist on this, as editors have ignored or unduly minimised Dunbar's debt to Chaucer and the pseudo-Chaucerian poems, to Gower and Lydgate. Thus one editor recognises the direct influence of Chaucer in only two of Dunbar's poems—the Wedo and the poem to the purse. Really it is unmistakable in the Thrissill and the Golden Targe; it is obvious in very many more—sometimes in the plan; sometimes in a leading idea; sometimes in stanzas, rhythms, rhymes, lines, and notable words. In Chaucer's Complaynte to his Lady we have the old, old story of the cruel but beloved mistress; Dunbar's To a Lady has the same inevitable argument, with some of the inevitable words, and many that were not inevitable—pitee, mercy, grace, rewthe, womankheid, &c. Chaucer says:

Where is now al your wommanly pitee?

And Dunbar repeats :

Allace ! quhair is ȝour womanlie petie ?

Dunbar begins the poem :

My hartis tresure and swete assured fo.

But Chaucer had said :

My derè hert and best beloved fo ;

and Dunbar's 'ladie bricht' is Chaucer's 'lady bright.' Dunbar begins another poem, Of the Warldis Instabilitie, thus :

This waverand warldis wretchidnesse ;

whereas Chaucer had begun his Fortune with :

This wrecched worldès transmutacioun.

So in Lyndsay we have in one verse of the Dreme a complaint 'of this fals warldis instabilitie,' and 'of this warldis wracheit variatioun.' Dunbar, On the Changes of Lyfe, has the first verse :

I seek abowte this warld unstable
To find a sentence convenient,
But I can not in all my witt
So trew a sentence find of it,
As say it is dissavable.

We can safely guess where he found this apt and noteworthy word when we see that Chaucer's 'balade' on Lak of Stedfastnesse commenced :

Som tyme this world was so stedfast and stable
That mannes word was obligacioun,
But now it is so fals and deceivable, &c.

The second, third, and fourth of the four verses, on the other hand, are the development of a motive, not from Chaucer, but from the Prologue to Gower's Confessio Amantis. Dunbar has :

ȝisterday fair sprang the flowris,
This day thai ar all slane with schouris ;

So nixt to symmer wyntir bene,
Nixt efter confort cairis kene ;
Nixt efter mydnycht myrthful morrow,
Nixt efter joy ay cumis sorrow.

Working out the same idea, Gower had written :

Now be there lusty somer floures,
Now be there stormy winter shoures ;
Now be the daies, now the nightes,
So stant there no thing al uprightes,
Now it is light, now it is derke. . . .

Dunbar evidently had a large measure of the skill Burns possessed of adapting to his own purposes poetic material, wherever found, lying ready to his hand.

At least equally unmistakable is the connection when we find Chaucer, in another of the Fortune 'balades,' amusing himself by making four out of eight lines in each of the three stanzas rhyme to suffisaunce—thus, gouvernaunce, countenaunce, plesaunce, &c.; and Dunbar making six such rhymes in each of three eight-line stanzas of another pattern—chance, countenance, dissimulance, gouvirnance, plesance, &c. But Lydgate had already, in a satire On the Times, yoked to the chariot no less than twenty-four different words of the same rhyme, including further attendaunce, Fraunce, demonstraunce, &c. Thus Dunbar sometimes played at bouts rimés with his deceased predecessors, the 'Makars' he lamented.

Lydgate's Dance of Death, the translation of the old French Danse Machabre, in which Death summons successively pope, emperor, prince, canon, friar, minstrel, &c., may at least have suggested the idea for the first and best stanzas of the Lament for the Makaris. And it is fair to remember, in connection with Dunbar's Sevin Deidly Sins, in which the treatment is entirely his own, that Gower's Confessio Amantis is composed of tales illustrating the same Seven Deadly Sins ; that the Parson's Tale expounds and illustrates them at tedious length ; and that the Romaunt of the Rose, with which the Scottish poet was so familiar, describes near the beginning a series of pictures of Hate, Felonye, Vilanye, Coveitise, Avarice, Envye, Sorwe, Poverté, and other unamiable characters. Both the older poems are in just such rhyming octosyllabics as are used, with the interruption of short lines once in three, in Dunbar's little Inferno.

More seriously allegorical and didactic than the Thrissill or the Targe is The Merle and the Nightingale; the allegory is a very simple one this time :

In May as that Aurora did vpspring,
With cristall ene chasing the cluddis sable, eyes
I hard a merle with mirry notis sing

Lowell, severest and unfairer of Dunbar's critics, confessed that the fourth of the stanzas quoted above had always seemed to him exquisite.

The moralising poem most frequently referred to is the Lament for the Makaris, written by Dunbar in his most subdued tone when he was apparently very sick, each verse ending with the awkwardly accented, rhyming Latin refrain, 'Timor mortis conturbat me.' He bewails the shortness of life, the changeableness of all mortal things ; and gives a goodly list of deceased poets, all but three of them Scotsmen, and mostly now unknown or forgotten. The real note of pathos is unmistakably here :

Our plesance heir is all vane glory,
This fals world is bot transitory,
The flesche is brukle, the Fend is sle, brittle—Fiend
Timor mortis conturbat me. —sly

The stait of man dois change and vary,
Now sound, now seik, now blyth, now sary, sorry,
Now dansand merry, now like to dee, feeble
Timor mortis conturbat me.

As with the wynd wavis the wickir, willow
So waveris this world's vanité,
Timor mortis conturbat me.

Onto the ded gois all Estatis,

Baith riche and pure of all degré, poor
Timor mortis conturbat me.

He takis the knychtis into feild
Anarmit under helm and scheild ;
Wictour he is at all mellé,
Timor mortis conturbat me.

That strang unmercifull tyrand
Takis on the moderis breist sowkand sucking
The bab full of beniginité,
Timor mortis conturbat me.

He takis the campioun in the stour,
The capitane closit in the tour,
The lady in bour full of bewté,
Timor mortis conturbat me.

He spairis no lord for his piscence, puissance
Na clerk for his intelligence ;
His awfull strak may no man fle, straik, stroke
Timor mortis conturbat me.

Art, magicianis, astrologgis,
Rethoris, logicianis, theologgis,

are next named ; then physicians and surgeons ;
and last the poets, with the list so often referred to, followed by the poet's prayer for himself.

It is by his humorous and satirical works, his realistic and graphic pictures of contemporary life and manners, that Dunbar establishes his claim to be ranked as the greatest of Scottish vernacular poets before and after Burns ; and for variety, vigour, and satiric point Burns has in this department neither predecessor nor successor who comes so near to being a rival. Dunbar's imagination and conception are audacious, his humour is at times ghastly, his satire at times mere abuse. The Dance of the Sevin Deidly Synnis is probably the most remarkable of his poems, and has usually been reckoned his masterpiece—a triumph of terse and realistic word-painting, equal to the work of Callot's pencil at its best, as has been said. The Dance describes a procession of the sins personified before the Devil in hell, and is vividly and powerfully conceived and expressed. The character-painting is graphic, the satire apt and stinging. The treatment of this serious subject is neither solemn nor solemnising, even the satire being highly comic in tone. Both before and after the Reformation (Burns is another striking example) audacities of this kind seem to have commended a witty poet to the esteem of his grave and decorous Lowland countrymen. It has been hinted, but not proved, that Dunbar has here borrowed from some of the miracle-plays, or clerk-plays, as they were called in Scotland; or from some actual representation he had seen :

Off Februar the fyftene nycht,
Full lang befor the dayis lycht,
I lay in till a trance ;
And then I saw baith hevin and hell :

His abhorrence of all things Highland, Irish, or Gaelic, thus effectively expressed, occurs again and again in Dunbar's verses, and must have been by no means peculiar to himself.

The Turnament between a thievish tailor and a cowardly souter or cobbler takes place in the same region and in the same presence, is somewhat in the same vein, but is even less edifying and more ultra-Rabelaisian in treatment. In the Amendis souters and tailors are promised a place in heaven next to God and above the saints for their skill in concealing the 'defects of men 'misfashioned' by the Creator. Fools who put away merriness, embarrass themselves with marriage, and eat dry bread 'while there is good wine to sell,' Dunbar consigns, in another set of verses, to 'the Devil of Hell.'

The Tua Mariit Wemen and the Wedo was no doubt suggested by the Wife of Bath's Tale. But here the poet, through a gap in a hedge, plays eavesdropper during a strictly confidential conversation between three ladies who discuss the demerits of their husbands and their little schemes for getting their own ends served. Their language is such as perhaps the Wife of Bath might have permitted herself had she been speaking to intimates only. The verse is wholly alliterative, with a superfluity of alliterating words and no rhymes.

Kynd Kytlok is a short poem in a stanza closely resembling the alliterating poems mentioned at page 174. It tells how an alewife, at once a drunkard and worse—her name bewrays her—got into heaven when the guardian of the celestial gate was looking another way, whereat God laughed His heart sore !—

God lukit and saw her lattin in and leuch his hert sair.

She was accordingly appointed to a post of trust and emolument as 'Our Lady's henwife,' and lived decently till, finding the ale of heaven sour, she was tempted to an alehouse just outside, came back tipsy, and on her return was hit by St Peter with his club, badly hurt on the head, and carried out ; so that she is back again keeping the alehouse. It should be added that the writer represents this amiable lady as his grandmother, and begs for her hostelry the patronage of his friends. The poem was doubtless a veiled attack on some person quite other than the alewife.

The Dirge is a comic parody of the solemn services of the Church, in which the 'glorious Trinite,' the Virgin Mary, the patriarchs and apostles, are blasphemously petitioned with scraps of the Lord's Prayer, the Latin psalms, amens, responses, and other sacred liturgical forms to induce the king to leave the thin ale and bad cookery of Stirling for the good Rhine wine and claret within sound of St Giles's bells, the playing, singing, and dancing of Edinburgh. It is highly probable that some of Dunbar's least admirable poems were, like some of Burns's, never meant for publication, but only for the entertainment of a few boon-companions, royal and other.

The following, from the conclusion of the Tua Wemen, will show how Dunbar handled alliterative verse :

Thus draif thai our that deir nicht with danceis full noble

Qhill that the day did vp daw and dew doukit the flouris ;

The morrow myld was and meik, the mavis did sing,
And all remuffit the myst and the meid smellit ; removed Siluer schouris doune schuke as the schene cristall,
And berdis schoutit in schaw with their schill notis,
The goldin glitterand gleme so gladit their hertis
They made a glerius gle among the grene bewis ;
The soft souch of the swyr and sounne of the stremis, glen
The sueit sawour of the sward and singing of foulis,
Myght confort ony creature of the kyn of Adam.

With the first line one cannot help comparing 'The night drave on wi' sang and clatter' in 'Tam o' Shanter.' 'The petition of the Gray Horse, Auld Dunbar,' to the king at Christmas has something—if only a little—in common with Burns's 'Auld Farmer's New-Year Morning Salutation to his Auld Mare' (also gray), and the earlier poem may have partly suggested the tone of the later one, though Dunbar's is an (obvious) allegory. And Burns took over Dunbar's phrase 'sturt and strife.'

The poem called in one of the MSS. the Devill's Inquest might have given Coleridge a hint for the Devil's Thoughts. It deals with oaths more stringently than might be expected from the author of the Dirge, especially with such as run 'Devil take me if——' The Devil took the priest, the courtier, the merchant, at their word, and startled them with 'Renunce thy God and cum to me.'

Ane goldsmith said, 'The gold is sa fyne
That all the workmanship I tyne ; lose
The Feind ressaif me gif I le ;' receive 'Think on,' quod the Devill, 'that thow art myne,
Renunce thy God and cum to me.'

Ane tailzour said, 'In all the toun
Be thair ane bettir weilmaid gown,
I gif me to the Feynd all fre ;'
'Gramercy, tailzour,' said Mahoun,
'Renunce thy God and cum to me.'

Ane souttar said, 'In gud effek

Gif bettir butis of ledder ma be : ' boots of leather

'Fy,' quod the Feynd, 'thow sairis of blek ;' 1

Go clenge the clene and cum to me.' cleanse

The baxter, the flesher, the taverner, the maltman, the brewster, the smith, the minstrel, the thief, the fishwives, and 'the rest of the crafts' all fall into the trap and are successively welcomed by Mahoun (Mohammed was thus unhesitatingly identified with Satan). The dangers of saying 'Devil take me,' brought home to heart and conscience in many a folk-tale, is also a central idea of Chaucer's Friar's Tale.

Tidings from the Sessioun bears rather severely on weak points in the character of Scottish metropolitan society in the reign when Holyrood Abbey was overshadowed by the royal palace now being built beside it :

Ane mvrlendis man of vplandis mak 1, 2
At hame thus to his nychtbour spak,
'Quhat tydingis gossep, peax or weir ?' peace or war

As he goes on to allege that

Religious men of divers placis
Cumis thair to wow and see fair facis, woo and makes similar but worse charges against Carmelites, Cordeliers, and young monks, it is obvious that he is not thinking so much of any particular law-court (the present Court of Session was not founded till 1532, long after Dunbar's death), but of the crowd that flocked to Edinburgh 'in the season,' as it were, when the courts were sitting. Obviously a law-court is the last place even an unholy friar would visit to woo and see fair faces.

Another satire on Edinburgh begins :

Quhy will ye, merchantis of renoun,
Lat Edinburgh your nobill toun
For laik of reformatioun
The commone proffeitt tyne and fame? lose
Think ye nocht schame
That onie uther regioun
Sall with dishonour hurt your name?

And the satirist makes a series of painful strictures on Edinburgh ways, on some of which travellers from 'other regions' continued to insist—the dirt, disorder, and ill smells of the High Street; the loud quarrellings and fightings there; the swarms of beggars and cripples not provided for; the blocking of the windows of St Giles's by mean buildings; the dearth of the Edinburgh shops and the extortionate charges of the Edinburgh inns, which he more than hints are likely to frighten away both 'strangers and lieges.'

How Dunbar was desired to be a Friar by the Devil in the disguise of St Francis gives him a chance of saying stinging things against the hypocrisy of friars, drawn from his experience as a Franciscan. The Feigned Friar of Tungland is an attack on an Italian alchemist, Damian, whom the king had made abbot of the Abbey of Tongland in Kirkcudbrightshire, and who came to grief in attempting to anticipate our flying-machine men. The Testament of Andro Kennedy is a skit on somebody made to behave in the hour of death as a highly impenitent drunkard. The 'Testament' is in alternate rhyming lines of Latin and Scots :

Nunc condo testamentum meum
I leiff my saul for evirmair,
Per omnipotentem Deum
Into my lordis wyne cellair,
Semper ad ibi remanendum
Quhile domisday without dissever,
Bonum vinum ad bibendum
With sueit St Cuthbert that luffit me never.

In this poem Jusserand finds 'manifest influence' of Villon, whose works had just been printed (1489) when Dunbar was in Paris.

It is not easy to say how far the Flying between Dunbar and Walter Kennedy (see page 200) implied mutual dislike, and how far it was a mere amœbean exchange of abuse, a scolding match in response to a challenge to this extraordinary exercise, not peculiar to these two. Skelton's invectives against Gurnesche are very similar in scurrility of method and in choice of words and phrases. Dunbar has indeed a good deal in common with his English contemporary (see page 113). But whereas Skelton, though he sometimes wrote regular verse (his religious verse is some of it very like Dunbar's in the same vein), permitted himself the most ragged of rhymes, Dunbar's rudest verses show him an artistic master of clever rhymes and elaborate rhythms. He handles with equal facility rhymeless alliterative verse, heroic couplets, and a great variety of complicated rhyming stanzas, some English, some rather French, and some partly his own invention. Even when reviling Kennedy in such abusive phrases as

Muttoun dryvar, girnall ryvar [with worse names], foull fall thé; thee

Herretyk, lunatyk, purspyk, carlingis pet, Rottin crok, dirtin dok, cry cok or I shall quell the,

he puts in some of the eight-line stanzas no less than thirty-two rhymes, internal and external, several of them dissyllabic.

He truly had, as Lyndsay complimentarily said, 'language at large'! His command of vocabulary is almost as remarkable as his variety of rhythm. Like his contemporaries, he is too fond at times of the 'aureate' style, which rejoiced in such words as matutine, præclare, mansuetude, pulcritude; his Address to London, 'London thou art of townes A per se' (a non-such), is in contemporary Southern English; but in his realistic work his vocabulary is the homeliest vernacular.

Though much of his verse is comparatively plain sailing, much of it is to the uneducated Scotsman, accustomed to speak or read modern 'broad Scotch,' perfectly unintelligible; very few educated Scotsmen can read him without constant reference to the glossary; some words are found only in Dunbar; the old vernacular of his raciest poems is a dead language—were it not so, ordinary decorum would hardly allow some of them to be printed nowadays; and Chaucer, on the whole, is easier even for Scotsmen.

Dunbar seems almost equally at home in a pedantic conventional style and in the shortest, sharpest realism. And it is obvious that for him the transition in thought is equally easy from a meditation on the joys of heaven to merriment of the roughest kind. It cannot be regarded as certain that the indecorous poems are all early, the pious ones all late; more likely Dunbar illustrates and reflects the contrasts and contradictions so strangely coexisting in human nature, perhaps specially inherent in Scottish temperaments and conspicuous in Scottish history—grimness and gloom in the prospect of death and judgment chequered by devil-may-care jollity, orthodox religion by audacious irreverence.

It must be admitted that Dunbar's piety has a somewhat professional flavour, and suggests rather the expectant Churchman; his moralisings on the instability of earthly things betray rather the disappointed courtier and sated epicurean than the devout philosopher. The solemn confession, 'I cry thee mercy, and lasar to repent,' is hardly like the outpouring of a contrite soul; the penitent seems, like Topsy, anxious to confess all possible sins at once, and is careful to recite them logically in the order of a theological manual. Even Dunbar's satire, it will be noticed, is seldomer the sæva indignatio of a moral censor wholly in earnest than the more than half-cynical amusement of a very tolerant man of the world, who sees through the pettiness and self-deception of kings, nobles, judges, priests, friars, fools, upstarts, high and low, mankind and womankind generally. He throws his satire about rather indiscriminately, and is obviously more anxious to amuse than to reform.

Some of his religious poems were merely ingenious or fantastical exertations in rhymes and rhythms on theological commonplaces. A Ballad of our Lady begins thus, and so continues :

Haile sterne superne ! Haile in eterne
In Godis sicht to schyne !
Lucerne in derne for to discerne, Lamp—darkness
Be glory and grace devyne
Hodiern modern sempitern
Angelicall regyne !

The difficulties of the rhyme in such cases he diminished by taking over such Latin words as, when modified, suited his purpose, and thus gilding the gold of the 'aureate' style. The most important of the poems attributed to him without sufficient reason is that called the Freiris of Berwick—the adventure of two White Friars detecting Friar John, superior of the Gray Friars, in an intrigue with a farmer's wife. The plot is a folk-tale of wide distribution, and is found in Grimm and in Hans Andersen's 'Great Claus and Little Claus.' Here it is put in an eminently Scottish setting ; and the narrative of the detection and punishment of the evil-doer is told with great spirit, much humour, and not a little coarseness. Allan Ramsay vulgarised the tale in his Monk and the Miller's Wife.

Dunbar shows constant reminiscences of Chaucer, and some of Lydgate and Gower, as we have seen ; but the examples given will show how utterly unlike Chaucer his natural bent and temper are. He has not Chaucer's genial views of life, Chaucer's broad humanity ; a certain grimness and terseness, again, is all his own. Chaucer's humour was kindly, Dunbar's caustic and cynical. We nowhere find in Dunbar the indefinable charm of Chaucer. A comparison with Skelton, on the other hand, redounds wholly to Dunbar's glory. Of his contemporaries, we feel that Dunbar was the most modern in spirit ; and though he was a court poet and not a people's poet, he may fairly be regarded as a precursor of Burns—though not of the whole Burns. It is the Burns of 'The Jolly Beggars,' 'Holy Willie,' and 'Tam o' Shanter,' and the Burns of the somewhat tame moral and religious verses—and even that is much ; but it is not the best-beloved Burns, the Burns of the songs. There are in Dunbar poems about love in plenty, sometimes of the noblest, sometimes of the ignoblest kind, but there are no singable love lyrics. And one rarely distinguishes the note of outspoken patriotism so frequent in Burns and other Scottish poets. There is much in Dunbar to repel all readers who do not make large allowances for a rude age, a ruder country, a dissolute court, and a Rabelaisian humour. Professor Courthope complains that Dunbar rarely touches the chords of human sympathy ; even Sir Walter Scott admitted that in pathos Dunbar could not compare with 'the Bard of Woodstock.' Trifler, moralist, ribald joker, and scolding and scalding satirist by turns, he was always a literary craftsman, almost always a poet. He gives us a startlingly graphic picture of his own moods, of his time and his surroundings. He had a very marked individuality of his own, unusual versatility, and a command of his materials in apt words, in metre, in rhyme, unparalleled amongst contemporaries. And in spite of Lowell, we may confidently say of Dunbar, and with more truth, what Lowell said of Skelton, as of a genuine poet : 'He had vivacity, fancy, humour, and originality. Gleams of the truest poetical sensibility alternate in him with an almost brutal coarseness. He was truly Rabelaisian before Rabelais. But there is a freedom and hilarity in much of his writing that gives it a singular attraction.'

See, besides Laing's edition (2 vols. 1834-65), those of the Scottish Text Society (by Small, Mackay, Gregor, and MacNeill, 3 vols. 1884-93), Schipper (Vienna, 1891-95), Baildon (1907), and Mackenzie (1933); the Poems printed by Chepman and Myllar in 1508, ed. for the S.T.S. by Stevenson, 1918; the Maitland MSS., ed. for the S.T.S. by Dr Craigie (3 vols. 1919-27); the Life in German by Schipper (Vienna, 1884); O. Smeaton's study (1898); theses in French by Kaufmann (Bonn, 1873) and C. Steinberger (Dublin, 1908); and Prof. Gregory Smith's Transition Period (1900).

Walter Kennedy (born about 1460; died probably before 1508), Dunbar's antagonist in the Flyting, is called by him an 'Ersch brybour baird' (Irish-speaking beggar poetaster), and is charged—extravagantly—with being unable to speak passable Inglis. Another charge—that his tongue had a 'Heland strynd,' or Highland strain—is likely enough. For the Galloway Gaelic was in use in Carrick into the eighteenth century, as we now know, and was even heard in the pulpit in the seventeenth; and the local tone of the Carrick country-folks still sufficiently distinguishes them from their neighbours of Kyle, once Welsh-speaking. Walter Kennedy was the son of Lord Kennedy, head of the great Carrick sept; graduated at Glasgow University; acted as examiner there; and later was Bailie-Depute of his native district. He charges Dunbar with Lollardy—a most unlikely story, if one may judge by his poems—and he was himself nothing if not orthodox on the Church question. The poems by him that have been preserved are mostly moral, devout, and edifying, save his part in the Flyting, which is as ribald as Dunbar's, but less masterly in its Billingsgate and complex rhythms. Laing in his edition of Dunbar printed Kennedy's poems, the Praise of Aige, Ane Agit Man's Inveective against his own youthful dissipations, Ane Ballat in Praise of our Lady, and parts of a poem On the Passioun of Christ. Most of his work is probably lost. Schipper edited his Poems (1902).

In the Praise of Aige Kennedy is more paradoxical than Henryson on the same theme, and does not hint that an elderly person who, like Kennedy, seems to have sown wild oats is apt not to be unbiassed on that head. In view of the temptations and weakness of youth, he protests that old age is decidedly to be preferred to youth :

Grene yowth, to aige thow mon obey and bow,
Thy foly leftis skant ane May ; foly lasts
That than wes witt, is naturall foly now,
As warldly honour, riches, or fresche array,
Deffy the divill, dreid God and domifday.
For all fall be accufit, as thow knawis ;
Bliffit be God, my yowth-heid is away ;
Honour with aige to every vertew drawis.

O bittir yowth ! that feimis so delicious ;
O haly aige ! that fumtymes femit soure,
O refless yowth ! hie, hait, and vicious ; hot
O honest aige ! fulfillit with honoure ;
O frawart yowth ! fruitless and sedand flour, froward
Contrair to conscience, baith to God and lawis,
Of all vane gloir the lamp and the mirroure : glory
Honour with aige till every vertew drawis.

This warld is sett for to dissaive us evin,
Pryde is the nett, and cuvatece is the trane ; bait
For na reward, except the joy of hevin,
Wald I be yung in to this warld agane.
The schip of faith, tempestuous wind and rane
Dryvis in the see of Lollerdy that blawis ;
My yowth is gane, and I am glaid and fane, fain
Honour with aige to every vertew drawis.

Laing is quite unduly harsh in his judgment of the Invective as 'beneath criticism;' it was printed by Ramsay in The Evergreen. The Ballad in Praise of our Lady has some happy thoughts, though each stanza rather artificially winds up with a detached fragment of the 'Ave Mary' or other Latin formula. The fourth verse runs thus :

The modir fé, fludis, lochis, and wellis, mother sea
War all thir ynke, and quyk and deid couth wryte,
The hevnyne stellat, montanis, planetis, and fellis,
War fair perchiament, and all as Virgillis dyte, poems
And plefand pennis for to report perfyte
War woddis, forestis, treis, gardingis, and gravis, groves
Couth nocht discryve thy honouris infinit !
Speciosa facta es, et fuavis.

Some phrases are memorable. 'Blist be thy wame . . . that made us sib to Christ' is sound Catholic theology, and in homely terseness of speech is worthy of a Covenanting preacher ; by taking on human nature in the Virgin's womb Christ became akin or sib (a word used both by Chaucer and Piers Plowman) to all mankind. In Pious Counsalle to a discarded sweetheart, 'Leiff luiff, my luiff, no langer I it lyk' ('Leave off loving, my love, I no longer like it'), is surely rather a one-sided argument, even when fortified by the hint, 'And knaw in hell there is eternall pane.'

In the Passioun of Christ he tells us :

Throu helpe of Him quhilck deit on the tre,
In Inglis tounge I think to mak remembrance
How God maid man : how man fell throu myschance ;

how through Christ's death man has come into a state of grace, and may finally hope for glory—a complete Roman Catholic Fourfold State in verse, as Scriptural as Boston's. Man after the Fall is 'put to the horn, exilit fra Goddis face'—again a sentence Boston might have used ; 'put to the horn' being a Scots law phrase for 'outlawed.' In comparison with this solemn subject all books and studies are worthless, if men could only see it :

Bot now, allace ! men ar mair studyus
To reid the Seige of the toun of Tyre,
The life of Turfalem, or Hector, or Troylus,
The vanité of Alexanderis empire ;
Bot quhen the warld fall all birn in a fire, burn
Than vane storyis fall mak na remeid,
Bot all thair helpe mon cum throu Cristis deid.

The tidings of salvation and the tidings of damnation were neither of them first preached in Ayrshire by Burns's contemporary ministers. 'Tursalem' is a monstrosity. Oddly enough Douce, followed by David Laing, says 'unquestionably' we should read 'the Siege of Jerusalem,' though they do not tell us how to scan the line in that case. Is not 'Tursalem' rather a copyist's blunder for 'Tristrem' ?

In the tolbut then Pilot enterit in,
Callit on Crift and sperit, Gif he wes King ?

introduces the colloquy from the Gospels paraphrased.

In the account of Christ's sufferings Kennedy keeps pretty close to the Gospel story, but goes beyond it to tell how the persecutors 'twyn his banis' and 'depart the tender lithis [joints] of his back.' Death, personified, not merely expresses profound regret, but is made to explain to the dying Saviour (!) the Father's scheme of Redemption and the necessity for his own sacrifice :

Quhen Deid enterit within the breift of blis,
His nobill hert he graipit in his hand, groped, clutched
Sayand, O King, thoct ye have done no myfs, x
For your pepill ye mon bow till our wand ; must—rod
For your Fader hes gart us understand,
That be your deid Man is restorit to grace ;
Bot yow, faikles, I dred to fla, allace !

The poet himself 'flites' with Death in terms very different from those of that other Flying, and thus states some of the signal results of Christ's death by the 'subtill working of the Haly Gaist :

He garris the occourar leif his gud in haift, makes—usurer
And him follow in gret powerté ; poverty
Ane hird, a king, a propheit makis he.

Off ane perfewar he makis a protectour ;
And of a cownt, quhilck denyit his name
Thris for ane word or runyn wes ane hour, ere run
He garris contempne all erdly pane ; and thane then Aganis knyghtis and princis him allane
Stand constantly, and Cristis faith defend ;
Leif as ane postill, fyne as a marter end. apostle—afterwards

Another Ayrshire poet of Kennedy's name, possibly of his kin, was named by Knox with such unusual tenderness that one regrets all trace of his precocious and early extinguished genius has been lost. Thomas Kennedy, a young man of Ayr, 'not passing xviii yeares of aige,' was, Knox tells us, 'of excellent injyne in Scottish poesy,' but, convicted of Lollardy before the Archbishop, was burnt at the stake in Glasgow in 1539.

Gavin Douglas, Bishop of Dunkeld and poet, was born at Tantallon Castle about 1474, third son of Archibald, Earl of Angus, famous as 'Bell the Cat,' and was educated for the Church at St Andrews, and perhaps at Paris. He had a living at Prestonkirk, near Dunbar, and in 1501 was appointed Provost of St Giles's in Edinburgh. After Flodden he was nominated abbot of Arbroath, and was promised the archbishopric of St Andrews. But hostile influences triumphed, and he was not allowed to enter in 1515 even into possession of the see of Dunkeld without unpleasantness. Albany, returning to Scotland and to power, imprisoned the Bishop for nearly a year; and when the Douglas party was wholly overthrown at Cleanse-the-Causeway in 1520, Gavin fled to England, to the court of Henry VIII. He was proscribed as a traitor, and the revenues of his bishopric of Dunkeld sequestered; but he did not live long to regret his loss: he was stricken with the plague, and died in London in 1522. He was a man of great gifts, sound learning, and amiable character; but family connections and the currents of the time led him to become a political intriguer—not over-scrupulous, it would seem. Douglas wrote two original poetical works, both apparently in his youth. The Palice of Honour (1501) is an apologue showing the triumph of virtue over difficulty, with special reference to a good king, and addressed to James IV. The poet sees in a vision a large company travelling towards the Palace of Honour, joins them, and tells the story of the pilgrimage, not without reminiscences of Chaucer and Piers Plowman. The singular company includes heathen goddesses, Scriptural and classical personages, virtues and vices, poets and patriots. King Hart is also an allegorical view of human life. The human heart is personified as a king in his castle, with the five senses around him; he is attacked by Dame Pleasance, who has conquered many a king, from Solomon downwards, but at length Age and Experience come to the rescue, and King Hart is set free. There is also a small moral poem on Conscience. But Douglas's best-known work is his complete translation of the Æneid (1513) in the Scottish language, being the first version of a great Latin poet in any form of English. (Caxton printed a translation of Cicero De Senectute in 1481. Phaer's incomplete translation of Virgil was made in 1555–58.) The translation is in the heroic couplet, of ten syllables to the line. As a translation it is by no means accurate, but the translator shows a true and poetic appreciation of Virgil's beauties, and makes no unworthy effort to reproduce them for his unlettered countrymen, in verse none too smooth or flowing. There is poetry in the translation, but much is only prosy rhyme. The introductions to the seventh and twelfth books—describing winter and May—have been praised even by Lowell, most grudging critic of the old Scottish poets; and here, too, he takes exception to the 'item kind of description.' In the famous passage of the descent of Æneas to the infernal regions, we read in Douglas:

It is rycht facill and eith gait, I the tell, easy path
For to discend and pas on doun to hell,
The blak zettis of Pluto and that dirk way gates
Standis evir opyne and patent nycht and day;
But tharfra to return agane on hycht,
And heir abuse recovir this airis lycht,
That is difficill werk—thar laubour lyes.

In regard to his temper and his relation to the Renaissance, Mr Courthope surely exaggerates when he says that 'no poet, not even Dante himself, ever drank more deeply of the spirit of Virgil than Gavin Douglas;' compared with Dunbar he is mediæval in spirit. Though later in point of time than Henryson and Dunbar, Douglas is much less easily read. He was, like Spenser, fond of archaisms, and he resolved, he said, to write wholly in the vernacular of Scotland, which he was the first notable writer to call Scottis (see page 165). His language is, however, far from being pure Lowland Scots, and this he himself admits; as Professor Skeat says, his style is 'much affected by Anglicisms,' and he seems to have manufactured new words from Latin at will. This is what he himself says:

And zit, forsuith, I set my besy pane
As that I suld, to mak it braid and plane,
Kepand na sudroun bot our awin langage, 1
And speikis as I lernit quhen I was page.
Nor zit sa clene all sudroun I refuse,
Bot sum word I pronounce as nychtbour doise; 2
Lyk as in Latyne bene Grew termes sum, Greek
So me behuivit quhilum, or than be dum,
Sum bastard Latyne, Frensch, or Inglis oiss, use
Quhar scant war Scottis I had na wther choiss. choice

1 Southron, English of the south. 2 As our neighbours [of England] do.

Douglas disapproved strongly of Caxton's translation of Virgil—really of a French romance on the subject—as an insult to the great poet's name:

Adherand to my protestatioun,
Thocht Williame Caxtoun, of Inglis natioun,
In pross hes prent ane buik of Inglis gros, prose
Clepend it Virgill in Eneados,
Quhilk that he sais of Frensch he did translait,
It hes na thing ado therwith, God wait,
Nor na mair like than the devill and Sanct Austyne;
Haue he na thank therfor, bot lost his pyne, pain
So schamfully that storye did pervert;
I red his werk with harmes at my hert, sorrows
That sic ane buik, but sentence or engyne, sense or ability
Suld be intitillit efter the poet divyne;

His ornait goldin versis mair than gilt,
I spittit for despyt to see sua spilt so spoiled
With sic a wycht, quhilk treulie be myne entent,
Knew neuer thre wowrdis of all that Virgill ment.

The following verses—with their double or triple internal rhymes—are part of an apostrophe in praise of Honour at the end of the Palice of Honour:

O hie Honour, sweit heuinlie flour degest ! gracious
Gem verteous, maist precious, gudliest,
For hie renoun thou art guerdon condign, condign
Of worschip kend the glorious end and rest,

¹ O fair [one whom] I mean, none can endure thy ill-will. But, four times, means 'without.'

Much of the translation is very pedestrian—hardly more poetic than the doggerel of the chroniclers. The bishop cannot be accounted happy in his rendering of the beginning of the first book of the Aeneid:

The batellis and the man I will describe,
Fra Troys boundis first that fugitive,

The most poetic parts of Douglas's work are the Prologues to the several books of the Aeneid, which are free creations, absolutely without any parallel in the original, and breathe the air of sixteenth-century Scotland, not of ancient Italy at all. This, for example, is a Scottish winter, though added as Prologue to the seventh book of the Aeneid:

Quhen brym blastis of the northyne art 1, 2
Ourquhelmit had Neptunus in his cart, Overwhelmed—car
And all to schaik the levis of the treis, 3
The rageand storm ourwalterand wally seis ; 4

The two following passages, both from the Prologue to the twelfth book, represent a Scottish May-day in somewhat rosy colours:

The Palice of Honour seems to have been first printed in 1553, the same year as the Aeneid. Ruddiman's edition of the Aeneid is notable as having had a glossary of Scots words which served as a basis for Jamieson's Dictionary. The next edition was that of the Bannatyne Club (1839). The first collected edition was Small's (4 vols. 1874). See also the Maitland MSS. (S.T.S. 1919-27).

Sir David Lyndsay, Lyon King of Arms and satirist, was born in or before 1486, either at The Mount, in the parish of Monimail in Fife, or at his father's other house of Garmylton (now Garleton), near Haddington. He was educated probably at Cupar or Haddington, then at the University of St Andrews, was early employed at the court of James IV., and in 1512 was appointed usher to the new-born prince. About the same time he took part in a play performed before the king and queen at Holyrood. He was in attendance on the king at the church of St Michael, Linlithgow, when an apparition warned the monarch against passing to England on his fatal project of invasion—an incident graphically delineated in Scott's Marmion. Lyndsay became practically the companion and senior playfellow of the young James V. :

As ane chapman beris his pak,
I bure thy Grace upon my bak ;
And sumtymes strydlngis on my nek,
Dansand with mony bend and bek.
The first syllabis that thou did mure

Was PA, DA LYN. Play, David Lyndsay.

He may have been appointed Lyon King of Arms (chief of the Scottish Herald's College) in 1538, and he appears to have been knighted by 1542. He was employed on missions to the court of the Emperor Charles V. at Brussels, as well as to Denmark, France, and England, and on various royal messages and embassies, besides possibly representing Cupar in Parliament in 1540-46. From the beginning he sympathised with the people rather than with the nobles, and with the Reforming party as against the Churchmen. In his later days he retired to The Mount, where he died in 1555. The antique phrasing, prolixity, and frequent coarseness of Lyndsay's writings have thrown them into the shade ; but they abound in racy pictures of the times, in humorous and burlesque description, and in keen and cutting satire, and not seldom show poetical fancy, warm sympathies, and kindly feeling. He wrote for the king and court, but obviously meant to appeal to a wider audience—the nation at large. He attained at once to very great popularity, and for two centuries was what, down to Burns, nobody else had been in the same degree—the poet of the Scottish people. His breadth and license in description and satire doubtless did much to cherish a delighted tolerance for 'frankness' and 'realism' of a kind hardly consistent with the puritan temper—characteristic rather of Scottish theology and religion than of Scottish life and character. Lyndsay was apparently thoroughly in earnest with his satire ; he was the Langland of Scotland, with a large element of coarser humour superadded. He lashed the vices of the clergy with boldness, and from his public position and the openness of his satire and invective, he must materially have advanced the Reforming temper, if not the Reformed doctrines. He was one of the influential Reformers who in 1547 urged Knox to become a preacher ; yet he did not join the Reformed congregation, and, dying before the triumph of that cause, remained nominally at least a Catholic to the end. He escaped the vengeance of the Church throughout ; and James overlooked the shafts of Lyndsay directed against his own 'pleasant vices' and defects. With the bulk of his countrymen Davie Lyndsay was singularly popular. His sarcastic lines and shrewd sayings passed into proverbs, and are not yet wholly forgotten.

Lyndsay's first poem, The Dreame, was written about the year 1528, when he was accordingly a man of thirty-seven. The prologue to the Dreame is the most poetical of his pieces ; while the dream itself is a rather methodical and tedious survey of hell, where clerics from popes down to humblest friars, heretics, kings, and nobles 'fry furiously' in the fire ; of purgatory ; of heaven, where—

Of that tryumphand court celestiall
St Peter was lufetenand general ; of the earth, especially of Scotland, where, spite of the bounty of nature, ruinously bad government had induced dire poverty, 'John the Com-moun Weill' being driven to quit the country. This was followed by The Complaynt to the King (1529), on the king's escape from the tutelage of the Douglas faction ; and The Testament and Com-playnt of our Soverane Lordis Papyngo [Parrot] in 1530. All three works consist largely of criticisms of the state of the kingdom during two of its dismal minority governments. The Papyngo has a specially hard word for the monks and friars—ravens and kites—who, with the most plausible pretexts, are eager to be in at the death for the sake of the death-dues. The other principal works of Lyndsay, besides his heraldic Register of Scottish Arms, are An Answer to the Kingis Flyting (1536), The Deploation of the Death of Queen Magdalene (1537) ; Ane Supplication directit to the Kingis Grace, in contemptioun of Syde Taillis (1538), a vehement denunciation of the fashionable long skirts of the ladies ; Kitties Confessioun (1541), a satire on auricular confession ; The Tragedie of the Cardinall (1546), on the death of Beaton ; The Historie and Testament of Squyer William Meldrum (about 1550) ; Ane Dialog betuix Experience and ane Courteour, of the miserabyll estait of the World (1553), otherwise called the Monarchie ; and his most notable work, Ane Pleasant Satyre of the Thrie Estaitis. This last work is a rude dramatic composition, a satire upon the three estates of the realm—clergy, nobles, and merchants—full of humour and grossness, and curiously illustrative of the taste of the times. Spite of its pungency, its attacks on bishops and Church abuses, and its frequent indecencies, the satiric drama of the Thrie Estaitis was acted in presence of the court at Linlithgow, Cupar, and Edinburgh, the stage being in the open air. The performance at Linlithgow took place at the Feast of Epiphany, January 6, 1539-40, in the presence of the king, queen, the ladies of the court, the bishops, and a great concourse of people of all ranks. When Lyndsay called his play a 'Satyre,' he meant the word to include something of the ancient sense of 'medley;' it has for us a curious interest as the only specimen of the old vernacular Scottish play—for Buchanan's Latin plays, so important in their influence on vernacular play-writing in Germany, belong to another category. We have a bit of an interlude from Dunbar, and we have innumerable allusions in books (Knox, James Melville, Calderwood), biographies, and kirk-session records to show that from early in the sixteenth century at least, or about the seventeenth century, plays in some connections—as at the grammar schools—were either directly sanctioned or encouraged by the authorities; and when the presbyteries intervened, they did so on account of the 'much bawdry and banning' which seem a separable accident of the plays. Lyndsay's is a cross between the old morality, the interlude as managed in England by Heywood and Bale, the modern play, and explicit and systematic satire. Sensualitie, Wantonness, Flatterie, Falset [Falsehood], Dissait [Deceit], are characters who have too much authority with Spiritualitie, Temporalitie, and Merchand (the three estates); John the Common Weill has many and bitter complaints to make; and by help of Gude Counsall and Correction things are to be put on a better footing, in spite of the recalcitrancy of Spiritualitie. The satire is indeed keen and scathing, particularly of the abuses of the Church and of Churchmen; in the interludes the allegory gives way to very realistic buffoonery; and the picture of contemporary manners of Scotland is amazingly vivid. The Historie of Squyer Meldrum is perhaps the most entertaining of all Lyndsay's works, rough but lively and full of verve. A belated specimen of a metrical romance, it is founded on the actual adventures of a well-known Fife laird, William Meldrum, of Cleish and Binns, who served in France during the war in 1513, and on his return to Scotland was noted for his gallantry and for his tragic fate.

The Dreme, addressed to the still young King James V., thus begins:

Quhen thow wes young, I bure thee in myne arme
 Full tenderlie, tyll thow begouth to gang; began
 And in thy bed oft happit thee full warme, covered
 With lute in hand syne sweetlie to thee sang:
 Sumtyme in dansing feiralie I flang; nimble

 And flemit Flora frome every bank and bus, chased Throuch supporte of the austere Eolus.

The works and stories named may be regarded as Sir David's notion of the 'best books for young people.' Guy of Warwick, as we know it, has no grisly ghost; Red Etin and the Gyre-Carling (see page 209) are still extant, though the latter's cannibal giant would hardly be a pleasant acquaintance for youth. The prophecies of Thomas the Rhymer and of Merlin were very famous; for that attributed to the Venerable Bede (about the overthrow of England), see the Scottish Antiquary, xiv. 72.

The Sewer was the court officer who presided over the serving of meals; the Coppare is the cup-bearer; the Cubicular took charge of the sleeping-chambers.

Of Lyndsay's freedom in satirising blunders in State-policy we may judge from a passage in the Complaynt to the King, on the Scottish revolution in 1524, when—the king being twelve years of age—the Douglasses gained the ascendancy:

Imprudentie, lyk wytyles failis,
 Thay tuke that young Prince frome the scullis,

Quhare he, under obedience,
 Was lernand vertew and science,
 And haistelic platt in his hand placed
 The governance of all Scotland ;
 As quho wald, in ane stormye blast,
 Quhen marinaris bene all agast
 Throw dainger of the seis raige,
 Wald tak ane chylde of tender aige,
 Quhilk never had bene on the sey,
 And to his biddying all obey,
 Gevyng hym haill the governall whole, all
 Of schip, marchand, and marinall,
 For dreid of rockis and foreland,
 To put the ruther in his hand :
 Without Goddis grace is no refuge :
 Geve thare be dainger, ye may juge. If
 I gyf thame to the Devyll of hell,
 Quhilk first devysit that counsell,
 I wyll nocht say that it was treassoun ;
 Bot I dar sweir it was no reassoun.
 I pray God, lat me never se ryng reign
 In to this realme so young ane Kyng.

Much of Lyndsay's work is hardly smoother or more melodious than Wyntoun's Chronicle; a part of it is in the same rhyming octosyllabics, the lines made up with 'as I heard tell,' 'as I you tell,' 'without sudgeorne' [sojourn, delay], and the like needless phrases. English spellings and rhymes were adopted when he thought fit (see below, where he has bone and none, instead of bane and nane, as elsewhere); and his Scripture history and tales of the Assyrian kings are not, as a rule, more truly poetical than Zachary Boyd's Bible renderings. Yet it is often interesting for other reasons—for the insight it gives us into contemporary notions of geography and history among the educated, of religious and political thought among all classes; for its shrewd and often sage remarks on men and things; for its humour, and even sometimes for its lack of humour. The Satyre of the Thrie Estaitis seems like a curious and uncouth jumble of Piers Plowman, Bishop Bale, and Goethe's Faust. With Lyndsay allegory was not adopted for the love of it, but as a literary expedient for providing varied satirical effects. Lyndsay, like his predecessors, revered Chaucer; and unlike as their tempers were, there are in Lyndsay many direct traces of Chaucer's influence.

The creation of woman is thus recorded in the Monarchie (an elaborate compendium of events in sacred and profane history, in some parts based on Melancthon's Daniel, but taken partly direct from Scripture and from a series of authors duly specified, from Orosius to Polydore Vergil):

God putt Adam in sic sapour sopor, drowsiness
 That for to sleip he tuke pleasour,
 And laid hym doun apone the grounde ;
 And quhen Adam was slepand sounde
 He tuke ane rib furth of his syde,
 Syne fyld it up with flesche and hyde,
 And maid ane woman of that bone
 Fairar of form wes never none.

Than tyll Adam incontinent
 That fair Ladye he did present.

The Fall is described in an equally unimpressive manner, and tells how, being ashamed, 'thai maid thame breikis of levis grene' (nearly as the Geneva Bible of 1560 has it, and as Wyclif's translators rendered it long before).

The Flood is much more vigorously described :

Quhen wynd and rane began to ryis ;
 The roikis with rerd began to ryve, rocks—noise
 Quhen ugle cluddis did ouerdryve,
 And dirkynnet so the Hevinnis brycht darkened
 That Sonne nor Mone mycht schaw no lycht ;
 The terrabyll trymlyng of erthquaik
 Gart biggyngis bow and cieteis schaik : buildings
 The thounder raif the cluddis sabyll, rived, tore
 With horrabyll sound appoventable ; terrific
 The fyre flauchtis flew ouerthorte the fellis ; 1, 2
 Then wes thare nocht bot yowtis and yellis.

He has keen sympathy for the poor animals' dismay :

The fysches thoct thame euyll begyld
 Quhen thay swame through the woddis wyld ;
 Quhalis tumbland amang the treis, Whales
 Wyld beistes swomand in the seis. swimming
 Birdis with mony pietuous pew
 Affeiritley in the air they flew
 Sa lang as thay had strenth to flee,
 Syne swalterit doun into the sea.

There are few of his poems in which he does not find occasion for a few shrewd strokes at abounding corruption in Church and State; and when he does directly address himself to denounce the unholy lives of bishops, priests, and friars, he is appallingly frank. Many a man has been burnt for less; for, though he did not attack theological mysteries, and said nothing about the mass, he demanded most that the martyrs asked. He insisted on the use of the vulgar tongue in prayers, protested against the mumbling of prayers in half-understood Latin, and jeered in the freest manner at pilgrimages, processions, images, relics, and pardons. Rutebeuf and the mediæval satirists used the same freedom in an age of stricter orthodoxy: the amusement they gave to all classes, including those satirised, covered a multitude of sins; the court-minstrel and the court-fool were, in fact, permitted the same liberties. The very broad humour (not seldom indecent) mixed up with Lyndsay's satire would have made a solemn prosecution for heresy ridiculous; and no doubt, as with Rabelais, this ingenious but indecorous expedient was deliberately adopted to embarrass clerical interference. Lyndsay, who was, besides, till James's death in 1542, the king's old and faithful and intimate friend, seems to carry the freedom of his address to bishops and princes into his appeals to the Almighty, whom he thus invokes :

Gett up ! thow slepist all too lang, O Lord ;
 And mak one haistie reformatioun
 On thame quhilk doeth tramp doun thy gracious Worde.

And probably there are few prologues more insistent, even in works more directly theological, or in which the author more plainly indicates where the blame will lie if the book fail of effect, than in that to the Monarchie, the last verse of which runs thus :

Therefor, O Lorde, I pray thy Majestie
As thow did schaw thy heych power Divyne,
First planely in the Cane of Galelee,
Quhare thow convertit could watter in wyne,
Convoye my mater tyll ane fructuous syne, fruitful effect
And save my sayingis baith frome schame and syn :—
Tak tent, for now I purpose to begyn. Give heed

Thus thay postponit me twa yeir, with thair traine,

And than thir ruiks thay roupit wonder fast, croaked
For sentence silver thay cryit at the last.
Of Pronunciandum thay maid me wonder faine ;
Bot I got never my gude gray meir againe.

There are editions of Lyndsay by G. Chalmers (3 vols. 1806) and David Laing (3 vols. 1879); his poems were edited for the Early English Text Society by Small, Hall, and Sir J. Murray (1865-71), and for the Scottish Text Society by D. Hamer (4 vols. 1931-36). Some thirty recorded Scottish editions (up to 1777) attest his great popularity.

Early Minor Poets and Anonymous Pieces.—The writing of books was not largely practised in early Scotland, though probably much that was actually produced in the way of verse has been utterly lost. In his Lament for the Makaris Dunbar names along with Chaucer, Lydgate, and Gower no less than a score of Scotsmen. We need not suppose that he meant thus to rank them with or near Chaucer; but he presumably held them fairly entitled to the style and credit of poets. It is noticeable that he does not name James I. The works of only six of them are certainly known to us—Barbour, Wyntoun, Blind Harry, Henryson, Holland, and Kennedy. Sir Hew of Eglinton, or Huchown, and Clerk of Tranent have been discussed above at pages 171-175. The Cursing of Sir Johne Rowllis against the Steilaris of his Fowlis, a profane and playful parody of a solemn excommunication still extant, will hardly establish the claim of either of the Roulls named by Dunbar to be considered poets. For the rest, only guesswork can identify them with persons bearing like names in exchequer rolls and court archives; and there is but the slenderest ground for accepting the doubtful attribution to them of otherwise anonymous poems in MS. or in print. An orthodox Christian, such as Dunbar professed to be, forgives his enemies; a dying poet may be expected to be in the least critical humour in speaking even of his professional brethren. It is difficult to be enthusiastic over what 'great Kennedie' has left us, or to grieve much for what of his and his still less known colleagues has wholly perished. Wyntoun could only be accounted a poet at a time when the term was generously interpreted.

We may here mention summarily a few early pieces not yet dealt with, some of them referred to by Douglas, Dunbar, and Lyndsay, and in The Complaynt of Scotlande (see also page 214).

Elegy on the Princess Margaret.—The unfortunate Princess Margaret, daughter of James I., was married to the Dauphin, afterwards Louis XI. of France, in 1436, when she was about eleven years old. Louis, an unnatural and disloyal son, proved a heartless and callous husband; and the princess sought solace for her husband's neglect in books and in poetry—she spent many a sleepless night writing rondeaux, we are told. At her early death in 1445 many pens lamented her loss, including, it appears, that of her sister Isabel, Duchess of Brittany; and in the Book of Pluscarden, based on the Fordun-Bower Scotichronicon, there is a poem on her death in Scots, by one of her attendants. It is described as having been translated 'in lingua Scotticana' from the epitaph on her tomb 'in lingua Gallicana.' But as there seem to have been thirty-six complex stanzas of ten lines each, the elegy in Scots must have been considerably extended! It is obviously an original poem, not a translation. George Buchanan, who was acquainted with it, calls it an 'epitaphial poem.' Skene, who edited the Book of Pluscarden (1877-80), gives reasons for believing that the chronicler and poet was Maurice Buchanan, a cleric who was treasurer to the Dauphiness, and spent his later years as a monk in the priory of Pluscarden. The eleventh book, containing the poem, was separately published by Father Stevenson for the Maitland Club in 1837. The—somewhat conventional—lament for the princess is put in the mouth of the reprobate husband, who calls upon the Creator to

Ger all the cloudis of the hevin habound
And souk up all thir watteris hale and sounde Baith of salt sey, of burne, well and revere, that they may descend in tears; air and winds are to become 'sobbyng and sichyng soore;' song-birds are to lament; and 'myrth, musik and glew [glee]' are to be turned into mourning. After five stanzas of this the copyist, shrewd in his criticism and anxious to improve the occasion, adds: 'But nochtwithstandyng thaire is maire of this lamentacioun (xviiij coupill and the ansuere of Resoun als mekill) this may suffice, for the complant is bot fenzeit thing; bot be caus the tother part, quhilk is the Ansuere of Resoun, is verray suthfastnesse, me think it gud to put mare of it, quhilk followis thus efterwarte.' And he accordingly copies the whole eighteen stanzas of the answer. Reason points out sensibly, piously, and not without a touch of poetry here and there, that men and even princes are but mortal at best; the beloved princess is in no way profited by excessive sorrow, which is merely harmful to her friends; she herself does not wish such grieving:

Scho thankis nane to be lamentable;
Scho is in joy as be oure saythe trast we
The lang lyff is nocht profitable heire,
Quhill we be went our will is ever in weire, Till—war
And syne the passage is rycht peralous.
We have bot bale quhill we be brocht on beire; bier

He suld have in his lyffing langaruss, languorous
Never till have joy till he war deide agayn.

Sene we have heire na cete permanente, Since
Our saule quhilk is in our body lent

Thai do nocht bot throu soverayn ordinance.

Death, fate, nor fortune, as the elegist says, are not to be blamed; the princess's perfections should be allegiance to sorrow for her death:

Let be thi mane and murne for hir no mare,
Thou suld mak joy quhare now thou makis care,
Sen scho decest with all the sacramentis.
Quhen scho was borne men wyst scho suld cum thaire;
Thaire is na thying that ma lest evir mare, may last

Bot double hir joy eftir the jugimentis,
Weill war the wy that weill ma cum therto! wight

Take gud comfurte and leife in hop of grace,
And think how scho throw vertu and gudnasse,
Baith luffit and lovit with God and men has beyn,
And think how that XM. zeire that wasse a thousand years
Quhen it is gane semys bot ane houre of spasse,

Gar haly kirk have mind on hir and meyn,
Think on thi self and all thi myss amend, shortcomings
And pray to Mary moder, virgyn cleyn,
That for hir grace scho bring ws to gud end.

Amen.

This poem is interesting alike for the pathos of the event it celebrates, the period of the language it illustrates, and the matter and manner. At the end of the same eleventh book is another poem, a Moralitas, apparently by the same author, 'exhibiting the state of the kingdom of Scotland under the figure of a harp'—then the Scottish national instrument of music—in some forty seven-line stanzas, opening thus:

Rycht as all stryngis are rewlyt in a harpe ruled, tuned
In ane accord and turnyt all be ane uth, key (?)
Quhilk is as kyng, than curiously thai carpe; 1
The sang is sueit quhen that the sound is suth; 2
Bot quhen thai ar discordand, fals, and muth muted
Thaire wil na man tak plesance in that play,
Thai mycht weill thole the menstrale war away. 3

1 Exquisitely they play. 2 Sooth, true. 3 Well endure, be glad.

The poet gives a poor account of the administration of justice and of the state of the kingdom generally, and the poem is an exhortation to the king, presumably James II. In one verse he hints pretty broadly that they do these things better in France, oddly suggesting that the French Parliament would not be so complaisant to the powers as the Scottish one:

War it in France men wald mak cession hale
In parliament, and nocht bow to thi croune,
Quhill thou had maid them a reformacioun.

Cockilbies Sow is a curious medley, partly a boisterous burlesque ruder in form than Skelton's rudest, partly a sort of fable, and partly a tale of knightly prowess and true love exalted to rank and power. It has not been noted that in 1483

Sir John ye Ros, King's Advocate and one of Dunbar's 'makars,' had to defend his title, as laird of Montgreenan in Kilwinning, to the lands of Cockilbie or Cokylby in the adjoining parish of Kilmaurs. The Wowing of Jok and Jynny is very rude love-making; the Gyre-Carling, on the adventures of the Mother Witch of Scottish superstition, is much coarser if not more uncouth; King Berdok is a fragmentary caricature of chivalrous romance; The Wife of Auchtermuchty is a homely Scottish but distinctly amusing version of a widespread folk-tale of rivalry between husband and wife; Symmie and his Bruther is a satire, not without point, against pardoners or begging friars. The Hermit of Alareit—Loretto, near Musselburgh—is a rude but pithy satire on the Grey Friars, and is quoted by Knox in his History. The work of the fifth Earl of Glencairn, a strenuous Reformer, who died in 1574, it is much later in date than most of the pieces just named. Grey Steill is a modernised version of a really old but poor romance. Clariondus is another Middle Scots romance, based on a French original, and first published for the Maitland Club in 1830. Modern researches, including those of Dr Curtis on its rimes and phonology (Anglia, 1894-95), and of Dr Bülbring, who edited it for the E.E.T.S., tend to show that it belongs to the first half of the sixteenth century. Roswall and Lillian exists only in a modernised shape, and is probably English in origin (see Englische Studien, vol. xvi.). Philotus, first printed in 1603, is a comedy, in vernacular verse, of the inconveniences of a marriage between age and youth; it was reprinted by the Bannatyne Club in 1835.

The Thre Prestis of Peebles (edited in 1920 for the S.T.S. by T. D. Robb, who dates it c. 1484) is more notable; the tales told by three Churchmen, in a hostelry in Peebles, while the capons were roasting, are in many ways interesting and readable. Maister Johne tells how a king summoned the Three Estates of the realm, and asked first the Burgesses,

Quhy Burges bairns thryves not to the thrid air, heir
why the wealth of merchant-princes is squandered before the third generation—a question quite easily answered, with many side-lights on Scottish mercantile and domestic ways. His Lords he asks,

Quhairfair and quhy and quhat is the cais cause
Sa worthie Lords war in mine elderis dayis
Sa full of fredome, worship, and honour,
Hardie in hart to stand in every stour,
And how in yow I find the hail contrair, and why they are so perpetually at feud with one another—a question the answer to which involved more self-examination. The question addressed to the Clergy or Prelates was:

That is to say, Quhairfair and quhy
In auld times, and days of ancestry,
Sa monie Bishops war, and men of kirk,
Sa grit wil had ay gude warkes to wirk.

And throw thair prayers, maid to God of micht,
 The dum men spak ; the blind men gat their sicht ;
 The deif men heiring ; the cruikit gat thair feit ;
 War nane in bail bot weill they culd them beit.
 To seik folks, or in sairnes syne, illness
 Til al thay wald be mendis and medecyne. healing
 And quhairfoir now in your tyme ye warie ;
 As thay did than quhairfoir sa may not ye ;
 Quhairfoir may not ye as thay did than ?
 Declair me now this questioun, gif ye can—perhaps the sorest home-thrust of the three. Warying or excommunication is represented both by satirists and reformers as the main occupation of the Scottish clergy in the sixteenth century. There are parallels to this poem in that strange mosaic, The Complaynt of Scotlande, and in more than one of Lyndsay's works ; the satire is not so bitter as in Lyndsay, and the priests evidently meant to amuse as well as edify one another and the readers. And there are Chaucerian touches in thought as well as in word. Thus the iterations of Quhairfoir & quhy and quhat is the cais ?

 are quite like those of

Good Sir, tell me all hoolly
 In what wise, how, why, and wherefore, in Blaunche the Duchesse.

The ballad Tayls Bank, referred to the reign of James IV., combines a comparatively modern ballad rhythm with superabundant alliteration, and in spite of much over-ornate and artificial phrasing, has some happy touches. It may have been written to the old tune Tuysbank, mentioned in Colkelbie, and seems meant to celebrate the praises of Margaret Drummond, a favourite mistress of James IV., who died of poison :

Quhen 'Tayis bonk wes blumyt brycht, and when
 Wod winter with his wallowand wind Wild
 But weir away wes went, Without doubt
 Brasit about with wyld woodbynd Embracei
 Wer bewis on the bent. boughs

On Tayside, where, as on the banks and braes of bonnie Doon, rose-bushes or 'roseris raiss on raw,' was to be met—

This myld meik mensuete Mergrite, gentle
 This perle polist most quhyt,
 Dame Natouris deir dochter discreit,
 The dyamant of delyt.

Never was made 'a figour more perfyte,' and by her beauty and 'womanly vertew' she was well fitted to rejoice the heart of king and knight :

Hir cullour cleir, hir countenance,
 Hir cumly cristall ene,
 Hir portratour of most plesance
 All pictour did prevene.
 Off every vertew to avance
 Quhen ladeis praisit bene,
 Rychtest in my remembrance
 That rose is rutit grene.

The poet seems to have become confused between the beauty of the landscape, the flowers, the birds, the weather, and the lady's charms ; the story does not progress, and ends abruptly, without anything happening except the birds 'schowtting.'

Peblis to the Play and Chrystis Kirk of the Grene are old poems of which the authorship has been much debated and is still debatable. They have much in common, and might have been the work of one author, though Chrystis Kirk, which refers to Peblis expressly, must be the later of the two, and is of more vigorous workmanship than the other. In 1521 John Major credited King James I. with a poem beginning At Bellayne, and Peblis so begins, though there is nothing else to prove them identical. The Bannatyne MS. Collection (1568) attributes Chrystis Kirk also to James I., and a later tradition—perhaps based on a misprint of 'Fift' for 'First'—refers it to James V. (to whom, with as little ground, The Gaberlunzie Man and The Jolly Beggar have also been attributed). The tradition is at best rather vague and confused, and most authorities, including Professor Skeat, unhesitatingly refuse to admit that James I. had anything to do with either of the poems in question. It is certainly difficult to associate the peculiar and characteristic humour of these poems with the author of the Kingis Quair, and it is not easy to believe that either of them was written before 1437. The tendency of criticism is to refer both to some time in the sixteenth century, probably near the beginning of it. Professor Skeat argued against the theory of James I.'s authorship in his introduction to the Kingis Quair; but T. F. Henderson defended it in his Scottish Vernacular Literature, crediting the comic poems as well as the Quair to James I.

Peblis and Chrystis Kirk are the first full-fledged examples of a genre which was to be very conspicuous in Scottish literature—descriptions in rattling stanzas of popular amusements, giving full play to any contretemps and comic incidents that might arise. There are analogies in Cockelbies Sow and in several of Lyndsay's poems ; Robert Sempill's Piper of Kilbarchan and Francis Sempill's (?) Blythsome Bridal and Hallow Fair are in the same vein ; Allan Ramsay continued Chrystis Kirk by adding a second series of very similar, but coarser, adventures ; and the same kind of humour appears again in Fergusson's Leith Races and Hallow Fair, in several of Burns's, Holy Fair, Jolly Beggars, Halloween, and other characteristic poems, and in Tennant's Anster Fair. In the earlier poems the incidents are rude and the fun not very humorous, though the go and spirit are undeniable. Peblis makes more of the dancing and lovemaking, Chrystis Kirk of the quarrelling and fighting with fists, cudgels, and even more deadly weapons. Peblis in some of its twenty-six stanzas, and Chrystis Kirk in many of its twenty-three, add copious and effective but unsystematic alliteration.

Peblis thus begins :

At Beltayne quhen ilk bodie bownis each—betakes
To Peblis to the Play him
To hear the singin and the soundis,
The solace, suth to say ;
Be firth and forrest furth they found ; went
Thay graithit them full gay— arrayed
God wait that wald they do that stound, wot—hour
For it was thair feist day

Thay said,
Of Peblis to the Play.

All the wenchis of the west
War up or the cok crew ;
For reiling thair nicht na man rest, racket
For garray and for glew ; hurry—glee, mirth
Ane said : My curches ar nocht prest ; kerchiefs
Than answerit Meg full blew, anxious
To get ane hude I hald it best,
Be Goddis saull that is true,

Quod scho,
Of Peblis to the Play.

By the time the twenty-third stanza is reached—

The pyper said : Now I begin
To tire for playing to ;
Bot yit I have gottin nathing
For all my pypping to you ;
Thre happenis for half ane day
And that will nocht undo you ;
And gif ye will gif me richt nocht
The meikill devill gang wi you,
Quod he,

Of Peblis to the Play.

The whole winds up, like so many folk-lore tales, with :

Had thair bein mair made of this sang
Mair suld I to yow say ;

and the superfluous repetition :

At Beltane ilka bodie bownd
To Peblis to the Play.

Pinkerton published the poem in 1783 from a transcript by Bishop Percy from the MS. at Cambridge ; the S.T.S. edition is direct from the MS. We follow Pinkerton, only modifying his punctuation a little for sense's sake. 'Play,' like 'ploy' in modern Scots, means festivity. It is noticeable that the last line or refrain of the stanza does not as a rule connect in sense with the words preceding. The stanzas are usually printed (as by Pinkerton) with a short line of two syllables between the eighth and last lines. The Bannatyne MS., however (printed for the Scottish Text Society), tacks this short line on to the eighth in the quite similar stanza of Chrystis Kirk—of which the following are the first four stanzas :

Was nevir in Scotland hard nor sene
Sic dansing nor deray disturbance
Nowthir at Falkland on the grene
Nor Peblis at the play
As wes of wowaris as I wene woovers
At Chryst Kirk on ane day ;
Thair come our kittels weschine clene sweethearts—
In thair kirtillis of gray, full gay washen
At Chrystis kirk of the grene.

To dans thir damysellis thame dicht, dressed
Thir lassis licht of laitiss, gay of manners
Thair gluviss wes of the raffel rycht, doeskin
Thair schone wes of the straitis ; kersey
Thair kirtillis wer of lynkome licht, Lincoln green
Weill prest with mony plaitis.
They wer so nyss quhen men thame nicht coy—nighed
They squelit lyk ony gaitis, so lowd, goats
At Chrystis kirk of the grene that day.

Of all thir madynis myld as meid meadow

At Chrystis kirk of the grene. distaffs

In a rage 'ane bent a bow' and 'chesit a flame'
—chose an arrow ; and 'when the toder said Dirdum dardum' to insult him, he let fly, determining to pierce him through the cheeks or inflict other serious injury :

Bot be an akerbraid it come nocht neir him ;
I can nocht tell quhat mard him, thair marred
At Chrystis kirk of the grene.

With that a freynd of his cryd Fy !
And vp ane arrow drew ;
He forgit it so fowriously drew it so furiously
The bow in flenders flew. fragments
Sa wes the will of God, trow I,
For had the tre bene trew,
Men said that kend his archery
That he had slane anew, that day,
At Chrystis kirk of the grene.

Finally there was a general mêlée, bloody faces,
cudgels in use, 'hiddous yells' from the women ;
the common bell rang so rudely that the steeple
'rokkit,' and many of the merry-makers are left on the green faint and 'forfochin' or in a state of collapse. The scene of this Scottish Donnybrook may have been the village still called Christ's Kirk or Rathmuriel, near Inch, in Aberdeenshire.

If the bob-wheel of the third stanza (especially) be dropped, the resemblance in rhythm to 'Sally in our Alley' is very marked. The rule is the red or ruddy part of the skin—here the cheeks ; the lyre the part naturally white.

The Scottish ballads are treated at pages 520–541.

son, Scottish Vernacular Literature (1898); to many of the publications of the Bannatyne and Maitland Clubs, and of the Scottish Text Society; as also to the Bannatyne MS., as published in full by the Hunterian Club of Glasgow (8 parts, 1874-87).

John Major was one of two contemporary Scottish authors who wrote only in Latin, and deserve mention for their eminence and for their influence on the thought of the nation: one is conspicuously, yet not wholly, a mediævalist, the other in literary style at least a representative of the Renaissance. Major—or Mair—born near North Berwick in 1469, studied at Oxford, Cambridge, and Paris, and at Paris became one of the most distinguished lecturers on scholastic logic and philosophy. He also wrote voluminous commentaries on Peter Lombard and numerous other works in theology and philosophy, and in 1521 printed at Paris his famous Historia Majoris Britanniae, a history of England and Scotland. From 1518 he was teaching in the college of Glasgow, where he had a John Knox among his pupils; at St Andrews (1523-25) he had Patrick Hamilton and George Buchanan. In 1525 Major returned to Paris, where he remained till about 1530, admired and honoured by all who still held out against the new light of the Renaissance, and acclaimed as head of the scholastic philosophy and prince of the divines of Paris. In 1533 he became provost of St Salvator's College, St Andrews, an office which he held till his death in 1550. Mair's Latin is crabbed school Latin, and he was a stout defender of mediæval philosophy and theological orthodoxy, although—a Gallican and not an ultramontane—he recognised and protested against many ecclesiastical abuses. In some things he was more modern in spirit than Boece. He was distinctly sceptical about many of the marvels Boece swallowed wholesale; he abstained from pushing the genealogy of the Scottish kings into an indefinite antiquity; he was not unwilling to admit the superiority of England to Scotland in many matters, and was in favour of a union of the kingdoms. But most chiefly he was a strong Liberal in politics, and taught that the power of kings came from the people. In this respect Buchanan was a faithful if not very grateful pupil. Knox inherited this part of his teaching, which has never lacked supporters in Major's native land. The History has been admirably translated by Constable (Scottish History Society, 1891). In the appendix Dr Law gives a bibliography of works by Major's countrymen in Paris who were also his disciples in scholasticism—David Cranstoun, George Lokert [Lockhart], William Manderston, and Robert Caubraith [Galbraith].

Hector Boece was the principal redactor of that extraordinary tissue of preposterous fable and serious fact which till the days of Father Innes (1729) was usually accepted as the history of Scotland. He was born at Dundee about 1465, and studied at Paris, where from about 1492 to 1498 he was a professor of philosophy and a friend of Erasmus. Thence he was called by Bishop Elphinstone to preside over his newly-founded university of Aberdeen, and became canon of the Cathedral. In 1522 he published his Lives, in Latin, of the Bishops of Mortlach and Aberdeen (Bannatyne Club, 1825; trans. by Moir for New Spalding Club, 1895); in 1527, also in Latin, his famous History of Scotland. He based largely on Bower's Fordun (see above, page 182), partly on Wyntoun, and partly on some more doubtful authorities—a certain Veremundus, a Spaniard, and one John Campbell, whose MSS. he says came to him from Iona. It may be that he had seen such MSS., though he was long suspected of having invented them as well as the tales he took from them. Certainly the fabulous reached its culmination in his work, written in Latin so comparatively elegant as to justify us in calling him a humanist, in contrast with the scholastic yet more critical Major. Buchanan was also much more discreet, though he followed Boece in the main. The patriotic mania for believing and proving the incomparable antiquity and dignity of the Scottish monarchy, as compared with that of England, must have moved either Boece or some of his predecessors to the deliberate invention of utterly baseless facts, which, patriotically invented, were patriotically believed in long after their baselessness was pretty obvious. The king rewarded him with a pension, and he was promoted to a benefice a year or two before his death in 1536. (See page 256.)

The Scots Wyclifite New Testament.—

It has often been remarked with surprise that the Scots had made no attempt to render the Scriptures into their own vernacular, but were content to import English versions, which must have been with difficulty understood by the mass of the people. The statement can, however, no longer be made so absolutely. In 1895 Lord Amherst of Hackney became the fortunate possessor of a manuscript, which from the handwriting is ascribed to the first decade of the sixteenth century, containing a Scottish version of Purvey's revision of Wyclif's New Testament (see above, page 87), with certain lessons from the Old Testament. The author's name is unknown, but the work probably proceeded from the Lollards of Ayrshire; and the manuscript was for many generations in the possession of the Nisbèt family. The vocabulary of this interesting version is not so distinctly Scottish as it would have been if it had been made directly from the Vulgate; for, though the grammar and spelling are purely Scottish, the reviser has followed Purvey closely in his vocabulary, making alterations only where the English would have been unintelligible or unfamiliar north of the Tweed. Thus Purvey writes, 'Suffre ye litte children to come to me, and forbede ye hem not.' The Scots version similarly, 'Suffir ye litil childire to cum to me, and forbid ye thame nocht ;' while in Archbishop Hamilton's Catechism (1552) we have, 'Thoile young barnis to cum.' But the list of Middle English words and phrases for which the Scottish reviser was constrained to find for his readers more familiar expressions is a large one, and it is this which gives to his version for students of the language an almost unique philological value.

In the Scots New Testament the last eight verses of the first chapter of Matthew's gospel are thus worded :

Bot the generatioun of Crist was thus : Quhen Marie the Moder of Jesu was spousit to Joseph, before thai com togeddir, scho was fundin hauyng of the Haligast in wambe. And Joseph hir husband, for he was richtiuse, and wald not publice hir, he wald priuelie haue left hir. Bot quhile he thouchte this thingis, Lo the angel of the Lord apperit to him in slepe, and said, Josephe, the sonn of Daud, wil thou nocht drede to tak Marie thin wif : for that that is born of hir is of the Haligast. And scho sal bere a sonn, and thou sal cal his name Jesus : for he sal mak his pepele saif fra thar synnis : Forsuth al this was done that it suld be fullillit that was said of the Lorde be a prophet, sayand, Lo a virgine sal haue in wambe, and scho sal bere a sonn, and thai sal cal his name Emmanuel, that is to say, God with vs. And Joseph raise fra slepe and did as the angel of the Lord comandit him, and tuke Marie his spous : and he knew hir nocht til scho had born hir first begettin sonn : and callit his name Jesus.

How closely this follows the English rendering from which it was adapted will be seen on comparing Purvey's version of the same passage as given in Dr Skeat's Wyclifite New Testament, reprinted from Forshall and Madden (Clarendon Press, 1879):

But the generacioun of Crist was thus. Whanne Marie, the modir of Jhesu, was spousid to Joseph, bifore thei camen togidere, she was foundun hauynge of the Hooli Goost in the wombe. And Joseph, hire hosebonde, for he was rightful and wold not puplisch hir, he wolde pruieli haue left hir. But while he thoughte these thingis, lo ! the aungel of the Lord apperide in sleep to hym, and seide, Joseph the sone of Daud, nyl thou drede to take Marie, thi wijf ; for that thing that is borun in hir is of the Hooli Goost. And she shal bere a sone, and thou shalt clepe his name Jhesus ; for he schal make his puple saaf fro her synnes. For al this thing was don, that it schuld be fullillid that was seid of the Lord bi a prophete, seiyng, Lo ! a virgyn shal haue in wombe, and she schal bere a sone and thei schulen clepe his name Emanuel, that is to seie, God with vs. And Joseph roos fro sleepe and dide as the aungel of the Lord comaundide hym, and took Marie his wijf ; and he knew her not, til she hadde borun her firste bigete sone, and clepide his name Jhesus.

The Parable of the Virgins begins thus in the Scots, in direct agreement with the English :

Than the kingdome of heuinis salbe like to ten virginis, the quhilk tuke thare lampis and went out aganes the spouse and the spouses. And v of thame war fules, and v prudent. Bot the v fules tuke thare lampis, and tuke nocht oile with thame : Bot the v prudent tuke oile in thare veschels with thare lampis. And while the spouse tariet al thai nappit and slepit. Bot at midnycht a crie was made, Lo the spouse cummis : ga ye out to meet him. Than al the virginis raise vp and arayit thare lampis. And the fules said to the wise, Gefe ye to vs of your oile : for our lampis ar sloknyt [Engl. 'ben quenchid']. The prudent ansuerde and saide, Or per-aventure it suffice nocht to vs and you : ga ye rather to men that sellis and by to you. And quhile thai went for to by, the spouse com ; and thai that war reddy enteret with him to the weddingis : and the yet was closet.

[This Scots New Testament, interesting from so many points of view, was in 1899-1904 edited for the Scottish Text Society by Dr Thomas Graves Law, to whom we owe the above account of the work, as well as the extracts from it.

The close dependence of the Scots version on Purvey's English wording is conspicuous in every verse, the usual difference being merely that Scots spellings or forms are put—word for word—in place of the corresponding English or southern ones—ga and gais for go and goith ; fra for for ; kirk for chirche ; quhat, quhen, quham for what, when, whome ; 'thou knawis' for 'thou knowist' ; 'quhy brekis thy disciplis' for 'whi breken thi disciplis' ; and so on. Sometimes, of course, a distinct northern word is used—'biggit his hous on a staan' for 'bildid his hous on a stoon'. Rarely the changes seem needless and arbitrary ; but mirk and mirknesse are regularly substituted for derk and darkness, though derk is a common Scots word. Not seldom, as might be expected from the date and other circumstances, the Scottish version is nearer the modern English than the old English ; rarely, but occasionally, more archaic. In Matthew's gospel there are only two or three passages in which the Scottish scribe either deliberately chooses a slightly different rendering, or perhaps follows a copy with readings different from those of the printed editions of Purvey ; thus in 'All 3e that trauailes and ben chargid, come to me, and Y schal fullille you,' the Scots makes it, 'Al ye that trauales and ar chargit, cum to me, and I sal refresch you,' where the older Wyclifite version has 'fulfille or refresch' ; and in the phrase 'schal not quenche a smok-yng flax,' the Scots has 'slokin a smewkand brand.' Almost the only word that need seriously puzzle a Scotsman who knows modern Scots is in the phrase 'a flok of mony swyne lesewand'—lesewand, unusual in Scots, being an adapted Scottish spelling of the standard old English lesewyng, 'pasturing,' which is Purvey's word. The Scots has peple for the English people (people), paralasis for palestine, except for outtakun, adultris for adulteris, thaim and their for hem and her (in the sense of them and their), abide and abidis for abiden and abidith, realme for reume, liand for liggyng, call for clepe, follow for sue, seuche for diche—'gif a blindman leid a blindman bathe falle down into the seuche.' The English toon and tothir are not represented in Scots by tane and tother, but by that and that vther. English taris is Scots (with gloss) dornells (or weidis) ; sour douz becomes sour dauche (or laven) ; buschel is buschel (or furlot) ; eris of corn are ehiris (Burns's ichers) ; strongere becomes starker ; pathis, roddis ; gessen, wene ; greten, salus ; repen, scheris ; herying, louyng ; mesis, lepermen. In the parable of the talents we have besaunt (Engl.) and besand respectively, 'pupplians' and hooris and 'pupplianis and hures.' In 'synagogis or corneris of stretis' the Scotsman rejects the French word corneris (Fr. cornière) and prefers the Anglo-Saxon neukis. Chandelar is one of the very few cases where the Scots prefers a French form for the English candlestick. Describing Christ's boat 'schoggid with wawis' (so Purvey), the Scotsman puts 'catchet with waivis' ; and for 'hildid with wawes,' 'keuerit with waivis' (i.e. covered). The 'reed wawed with the wynd' becomes, less solemnly, 'waggit with wind.' 'Nouthir cast ye your margaritis befor swyne' is the Scots respelling of 'nethir caste 3e 3our margaritis befor swyne' ; and Purvey's description of Matthew 'sittyng in a tolbothe' (i.e. in the custom-house) is faithfully reproduced in the Scots 'sittand in a tolbuthe.' The Scots simply repeats the English mutatis mutandis in 'draw on breed thar philateries and magnifies hemmis' ; 'that teendis mynt' is an obvious alteration ; less so 'clengeand a myge bot suelland a camele' for 'clensing a gnatte bot swolewyng a camele.' 'Eddris and eddris birdis' is almost literatim (=vipers and generation of vipers) ; and so is 'abhominioun of discomfort' (A.V. 'desolation'). The Scots has 'tolbuthe' again where the English has 'moot halle' for the hall in the governor's house where Christ was crowned with thorns. 'Pilate of Pounce' in both oddly represents Pontius Pilate ; and 'Symount' or 'Symont,' the usual form in the English, is in the Scots 'Symon.'—ED.]

The Complaynt of Scotlande is a puzzling book, and many of the opinions in regard to it cherished by the most competent scholars have since 1890 been completely overthrown. The work was originally published soon after the disastrous battle of Pinkie, when internal factions and foreign intrigues had reduced the country's credit and prosperity to the lowest pass. The author was a strong upholder of the French alliance, and the aim of the book was to denounce and render impossible any rapprochement to England. The original issue, printed apparently in Paris in 1549, is extremely scarce: only four copies have come down to modern times. Dr John Leyden edited and reprinted it in 1801, and Sir J. A. H. Murray, with much scholarly learning, in 1872, under the auspices of the Early English Text Society. But neither editor had any suspicion the work was not original; that it was mainly unacknowledged translation or plagiarism. Murray agrees with Leyden that 'the Complaynt is well written and fraught with great learning; the style of remark is shrewd and forcible, though frequently quaint and affected; and the arrangement, though sometimes careless, is not devoid of method.' And Professor Masson treated the work as the most notable book of impassioned prose that had till then been produced in either England or Scotland. But, alas! the learning is almost wholly second-hand, the plan and arrangement mainly that of a famous old French poet's work, and much of the most impassioned and effective prose in it a direct translation from the French. Mr Neilson has proved that the plan of the whole is mutatis mutandis that of the Quadrilogue Invecitif of Alain Chartier (1386-1458), an appeal to all ranks and conditions of the French nation to unite against the English invaders and tyrants; and long passages of the Complaynt are mere translations, with occasional adaptations. Plagiarisms from other sources have also been pointed out.

The Scottish translator-adaptor follows his model in exhorting the three estates to be vigilant for the commonweal, and in ransacking Hebrew, Greek, and Roman history and literature for examples of the curse attending on discord, self-seeking, indolence, and other public and private crimes. Fatigued by his argument, he seeks rest in the wholesome air of the country, beneath verdant trees and by beryl streams, sleeps, and has a vision (as in so many poems of that and preceding ages), in this case of Dame Scotia and her three sons—Nobility, Spirituality, and Commons or labourers. Then the argument begins anew, the dramatic form being little heeded. The 'affligit lady' reasons with her sons, hears their mutual recriminations, and reprimands and warns them sharply, with much more exhortation, to concord and union against the public enemy. The 'Monologue Recreative' or 'Monolog of the Actor' thrust into the middle of the argument is a very odd but interesting interruption, and bears evidence of having been much extended after the first draft. For not only does it describe with extraordinary particularity the sounds and voices of a great variety of beasts and birds, but adds an account of a sea-fight with the names of the tackle and the shouts of the seamen. Then an exposition of the excellence of the shepherd's life leads to an exposition of the cosmogony, and a page or two on meteorology; with a long list of tales then current in Scotland (as told by the highly intelligent shepherds, their sons and daughters, to one another), with the songs they sang and the tunes they danced to; together with a catalogue of medicinal herbs! The list of popular stories and romances (The Well of the World's End, The Red Etin, Lancelot du Lac, Arthur Knight, Wallace, The Bruce, &c.) and the songs (Pastance with good Company, Under the Leavis Green, The Frog cam to the Mill Door, The Battle of Harlaw, The Hunt of Cheviot, The Sang of Gilquhiskar, &c.) is much more interesting than the political disquisitions. Some parts of this 'Monologue Recreative' are, we may be confident, translations or adaptations also; some must surely be original, such as, for example, this description of a Scottish shepherd's al-fresco breakfast after the naval battle:

[The noise of the engagement was 'hiddeus;'] 'and the stink of the gun puldir fylit ale the ayr, maist lyke as plutois paleis had been birmand in ane bald fyir, quhilk genrit sik mirknes and myst that I culd nocht see my lyntht about me. Quhar for I rais and returnit to the fresche feildis that I cam fra, quhar I beheld mony hudit hirdis blawand ther buc hornis and ther cornepipis, calland and convoyand mony fat floc to be fed on the feildis. Than the scheiphirdis pat ther scheip on bankis and brais and on dry hillis to get ther pastour. Than I beheld the scheiphirdis wyvis and ther childir that brocht ther morning brakfast to the scheiphirdis. Than the scheiphirdis wyvis cuttit raschis and seggis, and gadrit mony fragrant grene meduart, witht the quhilkis tha covvrit the end of ane leye rig, and syne sat doune al togyddir to tak there refectione, quhar they maid grit cheir of evyrie sort of mylk, baytht of ky mylk and zoue mylk, sueit mylk and suir mylk, curdis and quhaye, sourkittis, fresche buttir and salt buttir, reyme, flot quhaye, grene cheis, kym mylk. Everie scheiphird hed ane horne spune in the lug of there bonet: thai had na breid bot ry caikis and fustean skonnis maid of flour. Than after there disjune, tha began to talk of grit myrrines that was rycht plesand to be hard.

Bald fyir, bale-fire, bonfire; raschis and seggis, rushes and sedges; meduart, meadwort, meadow-sweet (in modern Scots, 'queen-of-the-meadow'); sourkittis, clouted cream; flot quhaye, boiled whey; fustean skonnis, homely scones; disjune, déjeuner.

The language is Scottish of the middle period and of the southern type, but is a literary or 'Ciceronian' style, full of Latin and French words utterly unknown to shepherds or plain vernacular Scotsmen at any date.

The book, early known as 'Wedderburn's Complaynt,' has been attributed (as by Leyden) to

Sir David Lyndsay; (as by Laing) to Robert Wedderburn, vicar of Dundee, one of the same family to which we owe the Gude and Godlie Ballatis (pages 216–17); to Sir James Inglis, abbot of Culross (died in 1531); and to Sir James Inglis, chaplain of Cambuskenneth Abbey—in no case on conclusive evidence. Thus Leyden, having remarked on imitations of Gavin Douglas in the Complaynt, insisted that the coincidences in detached thoughts, arguments, illustrations, and words between the Complaynt and Sir David Lyndsay's works were sufficient to justify the attribution of the Complaynt to the Lyon King (four of whose acknowledged works are called Complaynt). Dr Craigie's discovery that the author of the Complaynt plagiarised from an unprinted translation of Ovid, by Octavien de St Gelais, Bishop of Angoulême—possibly from the same MS. now in the Bibliothèque de l'Arsenal—makes it almost certain that the work was written as well as printed in Paris, and probable that the author was in attendance on the young Queen of Scotland. Robert Wedderburn was also, it should be noted, in Paris in 1534–49.

The following is another portion of this odd miscellany, the 'Monologue':

There eftir I herd the rumour of rammusche foulis ande of beystis that made grite beir, quhilk past besyde burnis and boggis on green bankis to seik ther sustentatione. Their brutal sound did redond to the hie skyis, quhil the deepe hou cauernis of cleuchis and rotche craggis ansuert vitht ane high not of that samyn sound as thay beystis hed blauen. It aperit be presumyng and presuposing that blaberand Eccho had been hid in ane hou hole, cryand hyr half ansueir, quhen Narcissus rycht sorye socht for his saruandis, quhen he vas in ane forrest, far fra ony folkis, and there eftir for loue of Eccho he drounit in ane drau vel. Rammusche (Fr. ramassée), collected; beir, birr, noise; cleughs, dells; rotche (Fr. roche), rock; blaberand, whispering; nolt, neat-cattle; gled, kite; crans, cranes; goul mau, gull maw; cuschet, cushat-dove; titlene, hedge-sparrow; goilk, gowk, cuckoo; dou, dove; maneis, thrush; merle, blackbird; lauerok, lark; tuechitis, pee-wits, lapwings; piet, magpie; stirlene, starling; lyntquhit, linnet; oszil, ousel; grene serene, greenfinch; gold spynek, goldfinch; oxee, ox-eye tomtit; quhapis, whaupis, curlews; fleyitnes, frightenedness.

The odd list of beast and bird cries has a noteworthy resemblance to the seventy-one given by Urquhart in translating from Rabelais, Book iii. chap. 13, though only a few of Urquhart's quite correspond (e.g. kekyl instead of cackle; rammasche and ramage are used differently). Rabelais had but nine cries, the rest being Urquhart's additions. Not merely the sudden and incongruous transitions of the 'Monologue,' but its method of giving detailed and preposterous lists of odd or unusual words and names is in the Rabelaisian manner; and Pantagruel's voyage in Book iv.—if we were sure that it was by Rabelais and was known before the Complaynt in its first form was issued—might almost be held to have suggested several things in the 'Monologue'—the nautical words of command, shipmen's chanties, the list of culverins and other guns, and the confounding noise of the gunnery in the naval battle. Thus it is difficult to believe, for example, that the odd cry holabar is other than the haul la barre shouted in the storm in Rabelais. The third book was doubtless the book of the season at Paris in 1546; and the fourth, like the third, may have been read in MS. before it was printed or published.

See the editions of Leyden and Murray, above mentioned; for the dependence on Alain Chartier, see Mr W. A. Neilson, in the Journal of Germanic Philology, No. 4 (1898); for the plagiarism from St Gelais, Dr Craigie in the Modern Quarterly of Language and Literature, No. 4 (1899).

John Bellenden was born towards the close of the fifteenth century, and in 1508 matriculated at St Andrews as 'of the Lothian nation.' He completed his education at Paris, where he took the degree of D.D. at the Sorbonne. He was attached to the court of James V., had some charge of the young king's studies, and for him executed his famous translation of Boece's Historia Gentis Scotorum. This and his version of the first five books of Livy (both done in 1533) are interesting as early specimens of Scottish prose. On the strength of his metrical 'Prohemes,' or prologues, the Dictionary of National Biography has described him as a poet. The Croniklis of Scotland is a very free rendering, and contains so many passages not to be found in Boece that it is in some places almost an original work—though not an original authority. Bellenden enjoyed great favour at the court of James V., at whose request he executed the translations. As a reward he received considerable grants from the Treasury, and afterwards was made archdeacon of Moray and canon of Ross. Becoming involved, however, in ecclesiastical controversy, he went to Rome, where he died about 1550, or as late as 1587. The History was printed at Edinburgh in 1536, and edited in 1821 by Thomas Maitland (afterwards Lord Dundrennan), who first published in 1822 the 'traduction' of Livy (re-edited for the S.T.S. by Dr Craigie in 1900-3). The pithy yet not unpolished vernacular of Bellenden (whose family name is also spelt Ballantyne) is in sharp contrast to the artificial or Ciceronian style of the Complaynt of Scotlande.

Part of the Story of Macbeth.

Nocht lang eftir, hapnit ane uncouth and wondrous thing, be quhilk followit sone ane gret alteration in the realme. Be aventure, Makbeth and Banquo wer pass-and to Fores, quhair King Duncane hapnit to be for the time, and met be the gait thre women, clothit in elrage and uncouth weid. Thay wer jugit be the pepill to be weird sisteris. The first of thaim said to Makbeth: 'Hale, Thane of Glamis!' the secound said: 'Hale, Thane of Cawder!' and the thrid said: 'Hale, King of Scotland!' Than said Banquo: 'Quhat women be ye, sa unmercifull to me, and sa favourabil to my companyeon? For ye gaif to him nocht onlie landis and gret rentis, bot gret lordschippis and kingdoms; and gevis me nocht.' To this answerit the first of thir weird sisteris: 'We schaw more felice appering to thee than to him; for thought he happin to be ane king, his empire sall end unhappellie, and nane of his blude sall efter him succed; be contrar, thow sall never be king, bot of the sal cum mony kingis, quhilkis with lang progressioun sall rejoice the croun of Scotland.' Als sone as thir wourdis wer said, they suddanlie evanist out of sight. This prophecy and divinatioun was haldin mony dayis in derision to Banquo and Makbeth. For sum time, Banquo wald call Makbeth King of Scottis, for derisioun; and he, on the samin maner, wald call Banquo the fader of mony kingis. Yit becaus al thingis succedit as thir women devinit, the pepill traistit and jugit thaim to be weird sisteris. Not long eftir, it hapnit that the Thane of Cawder was disherist and forfeitit of his landis, for certane crimes of lese majeste; and his landis wer gevin be King Duncane to Makbeth. It hapnit in the next nicht, that Banquo and Makbeth wer sportand togidder at thair supper. Than said Banquo: 'Thow hes gottin all that the first two weird sisteris hecht. Restis nocht bot the croun, quhilk wes hecht be the thrid sister.' Makbeth, revolving all thingis as thay wer said be thir weird sisteris, began to covat the croun; and yit he concludit to abide quhil he saw the time ganand thairto, fermelie beleving that the thrid weird suld cum, as the first two did afore.

In the mene time, King Duncane maid his son Malcolm Prince of Cumbir, to signify that he suld regne eftir him. Quhilk wes gret displeisur to Makbeth; for it maid plane derogatioun to the thrid weird, promittit afore to him be thir weird sisteris. Nochtles he thocht, gif Duncane wer slane, he had maist richt to the croun, becaus he wes nerest of blud thairto, be tennour of the auld lawis maid eftir the deith of King Fergus, 'Quhen young children wer unabil to govern the croun, the nerrest of thair blude sall regne.' Als, the respons of thir weird sisteris put him in beleif, that the thrid weird suld cum als weil as the first two. Attour, his wife, impacient of lang tary, as al women ar, specially quhare thay ar desirus of ony purpos, gaif him gret artation to persew the thrid weird, that scho might be ane quene; calland him oft timis febil cownt, and nocht desirus of honouris; sen he durst not assailie the thing with manheid and curage, quhilk is offerit to him be benivolence of fortoun; howbeit sindry otheris hes assailieit sic thingis afore, with maist terribil jeopardyis, quhen thay had not sic sickernes to succed in the end of thair laubouris as he had.

Makbeth be persuasion of his wife gaderit his freindis to ane counsall at Innernes, quhare King Duncane happinnit to be for the time. And becaus he fand sufficient oportunitie, be support of Banquo and otheris his freindis, he slew King Duncane, the vii yeir of his regne. His body was buryit in Elgin, and eftir tane up and brocht to Colmekill, quhare it remanis yit, amang the sepulturis of uthir kingis; fra our redemption, MXLVI yeris.

The weird sisters are not 'weird-looking,' but cunning or powerful in weirds—destinies, prophecies, fates; Gray calls them 'Fatal Sisters.' Etrage weid, eldritch, weird-looking raiment; rejoice, enjoy; hecht, promised; quhil, till; ganand, appropriate, belonging; Cumbir, Cumberland; als, also; attour, 'out-over,' furthermore; artation, incitement, pressure (a Low-Latin word); sickernes, security; Colmekill, Iona.

The Gude and Godlie Ballatis is the name that has long been the popular one for a collection of oddly mixed devotional and satirical poems in vernacular Scots, more formally calling itself Ane Compendious Buik of Godlie Psalmes and Spirituall Sangis, which seems in a rudimentary shape to have been published before 1546. These rude but pithy poems became immensely popular in Scotland, were committed to memory, circulated and sung, and often reprinted. They had a marked influence in promoting the Reformation in Scotland, and provoked a corresponding hostility on the part of the Church. The bulk of the book seems to be due to three brothers, James, John, and Robert Wedderburne, sons of a wealthy and respected burgh family of Dundee, who entered St Andrews University in 1514, 1525, and 1526 respectively. They had all to flee the country as heretics or as suspected by Cardinal Beaton. James became a merchant at Dieppe, John lived long in Germany, at Wittenberg and elsewhere, till the Reformation triumphed in Scotland; Robert, who succeeded his uncle as Vicar of Dundee, returned to Scotland after the death of Beaton. James wrote both tragedies and comedies, some of which were acted, though none have been preserved. The Complaynt of Scotlande (page 214) has been by many attributed to Robert; John had most to do with the Ballatis, to which the Lord's Prayer, the Creed, a short Catechism in prose and another in verse, with graces &c., are prefixed. Then follow sixteen Spirituall Sangis, mostly translations, some freer and some closer, from the German Lutheran hymns. The second main division, The Psalmes of David with other new plesand Ballatis, contains again translations mainly direct from German versions. But to each part are added a number of miscellaneous pieces, some probably quite original, some possibly from English sources. More of them are religious, either devotional or controversial ; many of them are profane songs spiritualised, such as those that still retain the old first lines Quho is at my windo, quho ; Johnne, cum kis me now ; Hay now the da dawis. One, Welcum, Fortoun, was as obviously a song of worldly love, which, proscribed by the General Assembly of 1568, was unknown till Dr Mitchell printed it in 1896 ; one not in the oldest editions—The Pape, that Pagane full of pryde—and not from Wedderburne's pen, was not proscribed, has survived to be perhaps the best known, and yet is, in its reprobation of the ways of priests, monks, and nuns, in places so scurrilous that Dr Mitchell, editing a standard text for a learned society, has thought it advisable to suppress some of the lines. Several of those from the German were originally done into German from old Latin hymns ; one, In dulci Jubilo, is originally a macaronic of Latin and German, Scotch taking the place of the German in the Dundee version, and the Latin being left untranslated. Of the collection Dr Julian, supreme authority on hymns, says : ' Some of the pieces, though rude, have a wonderful pathos, and even beauty.' It should be noted that at the same date the English people had no popular collection of anything that could be called hymns. Sternhold and Hopkins in the various issues contained only versions of the psalms. Coverdale's Psalms and Spirituall Songs, which are much tamer than the Ballatis, never took hold on the popular mind. Coverdale's were largely translated from the same sources, and four of them very closely agree with four of the Ballatis, so that it has been alleged that Coverdale's four were simply done by Wedderburne into Scots. But Dr Mitchell inclines to think the Scots version the older. The attempt to utilise for sacred purposes popular profane tunes, and to supersede unholy songs by pious ones, was nothing new ; it had been practised in France and Germany long before the Reformation ; and Bardesanes, the Syrian Gnostic, and his son Harmodius, in the third century, were amongst the number of those who, as John Wesley put it, refused to let the devil have all the good tunes.

The first verse only of the following is an adaptation of the old English song usually printed :

The hunt is up, the hunt is up,
And it is well-nigh day,
And Harry our king is gone hunting
To bring the deer to bay.

The spiritualised version runs thus :

With huntis vp, with huntis vp,
It is now perfite day,
Jefus, our King, is gane in hunting,
Quha lykis to speid thay may.

Ane curfit fox lay hid in rox rocks
This lang and mony ane day,
Deuouring scheip, quhill he nicht creip,
Nane nicht him schaip away. escape

It did him gude to laip the blude
Of zounge and tender lammis ; young
Nane culd he mis, for all was his,
The zounge anis with thair dammis.

The hunter is Christ that huntis in haist,
The hundis ar Peter and Paull,
The Paip is the fox, Rome is the rox,
That rubbis vs on the gall.

The Paip.

The Paip, that pagane full of pryde,
 He hes vs blindit lang ;
 For quhair the blind the blind dois gyde,
 Na wonder thay ga wrang :
 Lyke prince and king he led the ring
 Of all iniquitie :
 Hay trix, tryme go trix,
 Vnder the grene-wod tree.

Bot his abomina^{ti}oun
The Lord hes brocht to licht ;
His Popische pryde, and thrinfal^dde crowne, threefold
Almaist hes loist thair micht ;
His plak pardounis ar bot lardounis deceits
Of new found vanitie :

His Cardinallis hes caus to murne,
His Bischoppis borne aback :
His Abbottis gat ane vncouth turne,
Ouhen schauelingis went to sack. . . .

As no German original is known for the following, it may both be a spiritualised form of the song with the same name mentioned in The Complaynt of Scotlande :

Rycht sorelie musyng in my mynde,
 For pietie sore my hart is pynde
 Quhen I remember on Christ sa kynde,
 That savit me :
 Nane culd me saif from thyne till ynde here to India
 Bot onlie he.

He is the way, trothe, lyfe and lycht,
The varray port till heaven full rycht.
Quha enteris nocht be his greit mycht
Ane theif is he
That wald presume be his awin mycht
Saut to be.

I grant that I haif faultit sore, have committed faults
To stok and stane geuand his glore giving his glory
And heipand warkis into store
For my remeid :
War nocht his mercy is the more

Thow lytill bill, thy wayis thou wend
And schaw my mynde fra end to end
Till thame that will repent and mend
Thow schaw thame till Beleue in Christ, quhom God hes send
And wirk his will.

In dulci Jubilo, printed both by Laing and Mitchell in four lines, thus begins :

In dulci jubilo now let us sing with mirth and jo,
Our hartis consolatioun

And schynis as the Sone,
Matris in gremio.

In 1878 Dr David Laing edited the Gude and Godlie Ballatis (1868), from the edition of 1578; Professor Mitchell, in his elaborate edition for the Scottish Text Society (1897), had also for comparison a copy of the older edition of 1567, one copy of which he had heard of first in 1866.

Archbishop Hamilton's Catechism.—The Catechism known as Archbishop Hamilton's because it was issued by his authority after being examined and approved by the Provincial Council over which he presided in Edinburgh, January 26, 1551–2, is a masterpiece of its kind. It was very carefully prepared for its purpose as a popular exposition of Roman Catholic doctrine to be read by the parish priest from the pulpit in lieu of a sermon. Dignified in style, free from colloquialisms or any affectation of foreign phraseology, it is one of the best standards of the literary Scots of the period (see page 167).

The Catechism thus expounds the ninth sin against the first command—the first in the Catholic reckoning including what most Protestants divide into first and second. Witchcraft, it will be seen, was as real a trouble to the Catholic Kirk in Scotland as it was afterwards to the Church of the Reformation :

The nynt, thai brek this Command, quhasaevir usis Wichecraft, Nicromansie, Enchantment, Juglarie or trastis in thame, or seikis thair help, quhasa lippinnis to werdis or dremis, quhasa lippinnis to defend thair self, or thair beistis, or geir aganis fyre, watter, swerd, noysum beistis, with certene takinnis or writingis superstitiously.

And gyf any man or woman wald say : Oft tymis we se, that thingis cummis to passe, quhilc divinaris sais. Oft tymes men and beistis ar helpit be wytchis charmis. Oft tymes geir, tynt or stowin, is gettin agane be cowngerars, and sa apperandly, it is nocht evil done to seike for siclike help. O thou wretchit and blind man or woman, that thinkis or says siclike wordis, know thow weil and understand, that quhen saevir thow speris or seikis for any help, counsel, remede, consolation or defence at any wytche, socerar, cowngerar or siclike dissaveris, thow dois greit injure to thi Lord God, because that thow takis the honour and service quhilc aucht to be gevin to God allanerly, and giffis it to the devil, quhilc is deidly enemy to thi saul. For without dout, all Wytches, Nigromanceris and siclike, workis be operatioun of the devil under a paction, condition, band or obligation of service and honour to be made to him. Mairour thow sa doand, condemnis thi awn saule to panis eternal, because that thow forsakis utterly thi Lord God quhilc hais creat the to his awin ymage and liknes, and redemit the with na lesse price than with the precious blud of his awin natural sone our salviour Jesus Christ. Attour thow brekis thi condition and band, of service made to him in the sacrament of Baptyme. Finally thou art made as ane Pagan, Saracene or Infidele and sall perische for evirmair, except thou amend thy lyfe be trew, scharp, and lang penance. Quhat is deidly syn, bot wilfull transgressioun of the command of God? Than, how can thow that is ane wytche, or giffis credite to be helpit be Wytchcraft, excuse the fra deidly syn and endles damnation, seand that God almychty expresly in his haly law forbiddis al kindis of wytchecraft and siclike devilrie saiant thus : Non augurabimini, nec observabitis somnia. Use na kynd of wytchecraft, and tak na tent to dremis. And a little efter hend : Non declinetis ad Magos, nec ab ariolis aliquid sciscitemini ut polluamini per eos, ego dominus deus vester. Gang nocht to witchis for any help or confort, nother seik for counsell at ony socerar, for sa doand, ye are fylt in your saulis be thame, for I am your Lord God. And to mak an answer to thi argument. The devil sumtyme in smal matters schawis to the the verite, bot to that effect, that finally he may cause the gif credit to his lesingis and black falsit, in maters of greit wecht concerning thi saul. Sumtyme he will help the to get agane the guddis of this world, bot his intent is, that finally he may cause the tyne the guddis of the world to cum. Sumtyme he wil help the to recover the helth of thi body, bot to that effect, that finally he may bring the to eternal dede of thi saul. Quharfor all trew christin men and wemen, suld nocht only be the command of God use na kind of witchcraft, bot alsua suld seik for na help at witchis, because that all siclike doing is injurius to God, and damnable to mans saul.

Nother can thai excuse thame self fra transgression of the first command, that superstitiously observis ane day mair than ane other, as certane craftis men, quhilc will nocht begin thair warke on the saterdag, certane schipmen or marinars will nocht begin to sail on the saterdag, certane travelers will nocht begin thair jorney on the sattarday, quhilc is plane superstition, because that God almychty made the saterdag as well as he made all other dayis of the wouke. Quharfor all lesum warkis may be begon als wel on the Saterdag as ony other day of the wouke, quhilc is nocht commandit haly day. Siclik supersticion is amang thame, that will nocht berisch or erde the bodis of thair freindis on the North part of the kirk yard, trowand that thair is mair halynes or vertew on the South syde than on the North. It is nocht unknowin to us, that mony and sundry uther sinfull and damnable kindis of witchecraftis and superstitionis ar usit amang sum men and wemen, quhilc at this tyme we can nocht reherse and reprove in special, thairfor according to our dewtie we require yow forbeir thame all, because thai ar all damnable to your saulis.

Trastis, trusts; werdis, weirds, predictions; lippin, trust; takinnis, tokens; speris, asks; dissaveris, deceivers; lesing, lying; tyne, lose; dede, death; wouke, week; lesum, lawful.

[The Catechism was edited by Dr Thomas Graves Law for the Clarendon Press in 1884; the extract follows that edition.—Ed.]

John Knox.—Though in the first place and pre-eminently a man of action, it is by undoubted right that John Knox claims a place in the history of English literature. His published writings fill six thick volumes, and two at least out of the six, alike by their literary quality and the importance of the themes with which they deal, may fairly be ranked among the great books of the language.

What was said of Julius Cæsar may be said with perfect truth of Knox—he wrote with the same force with which he fought.

Knox received a learned education, and, as far as incessant and absorbing public cares would permit, he was a student to the end of his life. Born at or near Haddington, probably in 1513 or 1514, it is likely that he attended the burgh school of that town. He studied possibly at Glasgow University, more likely at St Andrews, and for a time had as one of his teachers the famous schoolman, John Major, by whom he would be initiated into all the intricacies of the scholastic theology. Whatever may have been his debt to Major, it is certain that the theological writings of Knox are essentially scholastic, alike by the abstractness of their subjects and the method and spirit with which they are handled. For a period of some eighteen years Knox passes almost completely out of sight. When he reappears he is in official connection with the Church of Rome, but is on the verge of that turning-point in his career which divides his life in twain. According to Knox's own testimony, it was his intercourse with George Wishart, begun in December 1545, which led to his embracing that form of faith to which he was henceforth to devote himself with such memorable results for the future of Scotland. The immediate consequences of his change of faith were disastrous for himself. The burning of Wishart and the murder of Cardinal Beaton directly bore on his own personal safety. His abode in the Castle of St Andrews, his nineteen months in the French galleys, his twelve years' exile, were the immediate results of his association with Wishart; and his changed purposes in life determined the entire aim and scope of his literary production. There is but one theme and one object in all his six volumes—the furtherance of the Protestant form of faith and the extinction of the doctrines of Rome. So all-absorbing is his purpose that it would be hard to find a page in all his writings (including his familiar letters) that does not bear more or less directly on the mission to which he had given himself.

From 1549 to 1554 Knox spent his exile in various parts of England. The results of his sojourn in that country—his success in spreading the new religious opinions at Berwick-on-Tweed, Newcastle, and elsewhere; the modifications he succeeded in effecting in the formularies of the Church of England—are a notable chapter in the religious history of Britain. As far as literary effort is concerned, however, these years in England were not fruitful. It is with his flight to the Continent shortly after the accession of Mary Tudor (1553) that he began that long series of occasional writings which were to make him a voluminous author. Some months spent at Dieppe, about a year (1554-5) at Frankfort-on-the-Main, and about four in Geneva (with an intervening visit to Scotland) completed the period of Knox's exile. Hortatory letters to the Protestants in Scotland and England and expository theological treatises make up the bulk of his literary production throughout these years. By the place it holds in the history of political opinion, one of his many pamphlets deserves at least a passing notice—his famous First Blast of the Trumpet against the Monstrous Regiment of Women. The pamphlet had a resounding notoriety at the time of its appearance, and may still be read with interest at once as a specimen of the controversial literature of the period and as the expression of opinions which were shared by Jean Bodin, the greatest political thinker of the sixteenth century. As far as literary quality is concerned, however, the Blast by no means shows Knox at his best. It is essentially an ill-considered performance, as he himself, indeed, came to admit—undigested and ill-reasoned, violent without being powerful, and with few of those great strokes which abound in the work on which his reputation as a writer must mainly rest.

It was the singular fortune of Knox to be at once the chief actor in a national revolution and its pre-eminent interpreter and historian. It was in the beginning of May 1559 that he finally returned to Scotland. He found the country in the throes of the struggle which was to end in the overthrow of the ancient Church and in the establishment of Protestantism; and till his death in 1572 it was to these ends that he devoted himself with that intensity of purpose and those extraordinary gifts of mind and character which have given him his supreme place in the memory of his countrymen. It was at once by word and deed that Knox advanced the cause on which he had set his heart; for, unlike men of the type of Savonarola, he combined the passionate self-abandonment of the popular orator with the prudence of the practical politician. 'I assure you,' wrote Randolph, the English agent in Scotland, to Cecil, the great Minister of Elizabeth—'I assure you the voice of one man is able in one hour to put more life in us than five hundred trumpets continually blustering in our ears.' If his power of speech was thus so formidable, the course of events conclusively proved that none of the Protestant lords, professed politicians though they were, saw so clearly and comprehensively the conditions of the eventual triumph of the new faith and the new national policy. With the details of the great struggle we are not here directly concerned; but it is to be noted that it is precisely those qualities which he displayed in his public action—the combination of enthusiasm and shrewd sense—which gives its distinctive character to his monumental Historie of the Reformatioun in Scotland.

As originally conceived, Knox's Historie was to have been limited to the period between 1558 and August of 1561—the date of the return of Queen Mary to Scotland; and its main object was to be the justification of the Protestant party in its proceedings against the Crown. Fortunately both for literature and history, the work grew on his hands till it attained a scope which fully justifies the title by which it came to be known. Of the five books of which it consists, the first relates the growth of Protestant opinion till the year 1558, the second and third deal with the revolution which ended in the Treaty of Leith and the establishment of Protestantism as the national religion, the fourth is in large degree autobiography, and the fifth continues the narrative from 1564 to 1567. With the exception of the last, which did not receive the author's final touch, each of the books possesses a specific character and value of its own. As a rapid and vivid survey of the gradual breach of Scotland with Rome the first is equally striking from the point of view of literature and history. Such passages as those which describe the martyrdom of Patrick Hamilton, the rout of Solway Moss, the murder of Cardinal

Beaton, and the battle of Pinkie are historical paintings which are engraved on the national mind. The second and fourth books deserve the high praise that by the substantiation of facts by abundant original documents they satisfy the criterion of modern historical criticism. But it is the fourth book of his Historie that reveals in their strength and weakness all the powers of Knox as a man and as a writer. His theme is the conflict of the old and the new religions; but here we are far from the abstract disquisitions which make unreadable the bulk of his other productions. Mary Stuart as the embodiment of error, and himself as the vehicle of truth—it is on these two figures that, as in some spiritual drama, he fixes our eyes with all the passion and skill of a great unconscious artist. His reports of his four successive interviews with Mary are ineffaceable photographs, which by their truth and vivacity would alone be the adequate proof of his special literary gift. But, in truth, Knox was endowed in abundance with all the equipment of the so-called picturesque historian. He had the keenest of eyes for all the details of life, and from his varied experience in court and camp and deliberative assembly, he had enjoyed the most ample opportunities of exercising his gift. Of battles he writes with a gusto that suggests the doughty man-at-arms rather than the apostle of the religion of peace. We have called him an unconscious artist, but this description must be taken with certain reserves. Owing perhaps to his residence in England and his intercourse with English exiles abroad, he was led, in his Historie especially, to employ a style so much more English than the vernacular Scots of the period as to draw down on him the reprobation of Catholic controversialists for his unpatriotic preference for the southern form of speech. We have it on his own word that he deliberately introduced the lighter play of mind into the conduct of the most serious affairs. 'Melancholious reasons,' he said, 'would have some mirth intermixed.' Even in his phraseology it would seem that, at least on occasion, he consciously employed a certain literary artifice. Such an expression as 'The foolish fantasy of facile flesh' attests a conscious aim at literary effect. Nevertheless the general impression produced by the work of Knox is that of a great natural force manifesting itself in literature as in life with the various and overpowering energies of an original mind and character, which under no circumstances could have been determined by conventional trammels, whether of art or life.

Such are the high qualities that are generally conceded to Knox as a writer of history; yet in exact proportion are the defects that belong to them. In adversaries he sees no virtue; in opinions that collide with his own he sees only wilful and pernicious error. Large and sane views of human affairs, comprehensive grasp and luminous development of his subject as a whole—of these historical virtues Knox is totally void. As in his actions so in his writings, it is precisely that lack of repose combined with force, of dignity and weight of thought conjoined with intensity of feeling, which place him beneath the first rank equally of men of action and men of letters.

An English Invasion.

Thus ceased nott Sathan, by all meanes, to manteane his kingdome of darkness, and to suppress the light of Christis Evangell. But potent is he against whome thei faught; for when thay wicked war in greatast securitie, then begane God to schaw his anger. For the thirde day of Maij, in the year of God Jm. Vc. xliiij yearis, without knowledge of any man in Scotland, (we meane of such as should haif had the care of the realme,) was seene a great navye of schippis arryving towardis the Firth. The postis came to the Governour and Cardinall, (who boith war in Edinburgh,) what multitud of schippis ware sene, and what course thei took. This was upoun the Setterday befor nune. Questionn was had, what should thei meane? Some said, 'It is no doubt but thei ar Englis-men, and we fear that thei shall land.' The Cardinall scripped [mocked] and said, 'It is but the Island flote [fleet]: thei ar come to mak a schaw, and to putt us in feare. I shall lodge all the men-of-ware into my eae [eye], that shall land in Scotland.' Still sittis the Cardinall at his dennare, eavin as that thare had bene no danger appearing. Men convenis to gase upoun the schippis, some to the Castell Hill, some to the Craiggis, and other places eminent. But thare was no questionn, 'With what forces shall we resist, yf we be invadit?' Sone after sax houris at nycht, war arryved and had casten anker in the Read [Roads] of Leyth, mo then two hundreth sailles. Schortlie thare after the Admirall schot a flote boite, which, frome Grantoun craigis till be east Leyth, sounded the deipec, and so returned to hir schippe. Heirow war diverse opinionis. Men of judgement foresaw what it ment. But no credite was geavin to any that wold say, 'Thei mynd to land.' And so past all man to his rest, as yf thei schippis had bene a gard for thare defence.

Upone the poynt of day, upon Sounday, the fourt of Maij, addressed thei for landing, and ordered thei thare schippis so that a galay or two lade thare snowttis to the craiggis. The small schippis called pinaces, and light horsmen approached als neir as thei could. The great schippis discharged thare souldiouris in the smallare veschellis, and thei by bottis, sett upon dry land befor ten houris ten thousand men, as was judged, and mo. The Governour and Cardinall seing then the thing that thei could nott, or att least thei wold nott beleve befor, after that thei had maid a brag to fecht, fled as fast as horse wold cary them; so that after, thei approached nott within twenty myllis of the danger. The Erle of Anguss and George Dowglas war that nycht freed of ward, (thei war in Blakness.) The said Schir George in merynes said, 'I thank King Hary and my gentill Maisteris of England.'

The Engliss army betuix twelf and one hour entered in Leyth, fand the tables covered, the dennaris prepared, such abundance of wyne and victuallis, besydis the other substance, that the lyik riches within the lyik boundis was nott to be found, neyther in Scotland nor England. Upone the Mononday, the fyft of Maij, came to thame from Berwik and the Bordour, two thowsand horsmen, who being somewhat reposed, the army, upoun the Wednesday, marched towardis the Toune of Edinburgh, spoyle and brynt the same, and so did thei the Palice of Halyrud-house. The horsmen took the House of Cragmyllare, and gatt great spoyle tharein; for it being judged the strongast house near the Toune, other then the Castell of Edinburgh, all man sowght to saif thare movables thairin. But the stoutness of the Larde gave it over without schote of hackque-boote, and for his reward was caused to merch upoun his foote to Londoun. He is now Capitane of Dumber and Provost of Edinburgh.

An Interview of Knox and Mary.

The Queyn looked about to some of the reoportaris, and said, 'Your wourdis ar scharpe yneuch as ye have spoken thame; but yitt thei war tald to me in ane uther maner. I know (said sche) that my Uncles and ye ar nott of ane religioun, and thairfoir I can nott blame you albeit you have no good opinioun of thame. But yf ye hear any thing of my self that myslyikis you, come to my self and tell me, and I shall hear you.'

'Madam,' quod he, 'I am assured that your Uncles ar enemyes to God, and unto his Sone Jesus Christ; and that for mantenance of thair awin pompe and worldlie glorie, that thei spair not to spill the bloode of many innocents; and thairfoir I am assured that thair interpryses shall have no better successe then otheris haif had that befor thame have done that thei do now. But as to your awin personage, Madam, I wold be glade to do all that I could to your Graces contentment, provided that I exceed nott the boundis of my vocation. I am called, Madam, to ane publict function within the Kirk of God, and am appointed by God to rebuk the synnes and vices of all. I am not appointed to come to everie man in particular to schaw him his offense; for that laubour war infinite. Yf your Grace please to frequent the publict sermonis, then doubt I nott but that ye shall fullie understand boyth what I like and myslike, als weall in your Majestie as in all otheris. Or yf your Grace will assigne unto me a certane day and hour when it will please you to hear the forme and substance of doctrin whiche is proponed in publict to the Churches of this Realme, I will most gladlie await upoun your Grace's pleaur, tyme, and place. But to waitt upoun your chalmer-dooere, or ellis whair, and then to have no farther libertie but to whisper my mynd in your Grace's eare, or to tell to you what otheris think and speak of you, neather will my conscience nor the vocation whairto God hath called me suffer it. For albeit at your Grace's commandment I am heare now, yitt can not I tell what other men shall judge of me, that at this tyme of day am absent from my book and wayting upoun the Courte.'

'You will not alwayis,' said sche, 'be at your book,' and so turned hir back. And the said Johne Knox departed with a reasonable meary countenance; whairat some Papistis offended said, 'He is not effrayed.' Which heard of him, he answered, 'Why should the pleasing face of a gentill woman effray me? I have looked in the faces of many angrie men, and yit have nott bene effrayed above measure.' And so left he the Queene and the Courte for that tyme.

(From Book iv.)

Knox and Mary's Ladies-in-Waiting.

Heirwith was the Queene more offended, and commanded the said Johne to pass furth of the cabinet, and to abyde farther of hir pleaur in the chalmer. The Laird of Dun taryed, and Lord Johne of Coldinghame cam into the cabinet, and so thei boyth remaned with hyr neyr the space of ane houre. The said Johne stood in the chalmer, as one whom men had never sein, (so war all effrayed,) except that the Lord Ochiltre bayre him companie: and thairfoir began he to forge talking of the ladies who war thair sitting in all thair gorgiose apparell; whiche espyed, he mearelie said, 'O fayre Ladyes, how pleasing war this lyeff of youris, yf it should ever abyde, and then in the end that we myght passe to heavin with all this gay gear. But fye upoun that knave Death, that will come whither we will or not! And when he hes laid on his areist, the foull wormes wilbe busye with this flesche, be it never so fayr and so tender; and the seally sowll, I fear, shalbe so feable, that it can neather cary with it gold, garnassing, targatting [tasseling], pearle, nor pretious stanes.' And by suche meanes procured he the cumpany of women; and so past the tyme till that the Laird of Dun willed him to departe to his house quhill new advertisement.

George Buchanan.—As far as his contribution to English or Scottish literature is concerned, George Buchanan would call but for the most cursory notice in the present work. Of the two folio volumes which make up his published writings, some twelve pages contain all that he wrote in the vernacular—the rest being in classical Latin, prose and verse. Yet for learned Scots, from his own day till this, Buchanan has been one of the most interesting and important figures in the literary history of their country. His Latin paraphrase of the Psalms has been for three centuries the delight of cultivated Scottish readers, and the same book, studied in Scottish schools for at least two centuries, formed the taste and ministered to the faith of the successive generations of Scottish youth. By his History of Scotland also—hailed at the time of its appearance as the most successful reproduction of classical models—he made the annals of his native country known to educated Europe. Moreover, the inspiration of his name and example, as of the greatest scholar whom Scotland has produced, has been of the most potent efficacy in determining a special line of culture followed by his countrymen; for to Buchanan it is mainly due that the study of Latin came to hold its peculiar place in the higher education of Scotland. 'No man,' says Calderwood, writing of Buchanan in the seventeenth century—'no man did merit better of his nation for learning, nor thereby did bring it to more glory;' and Hill Burton, in the nineteenth, could still write that 'there are not, perhaps, above three or four names holding so proud a place in the homage of his countrymen as Buchanan's.' Such being the acknowledged name and influence of Buchanan, it would seem that in the reckoning of the literary achievements of his country he must command an interest peculiarly his own.

The life of Buchanan is a typical chapter from the history of the Revival of Letters. The scholars of the Renaissance were the veritable knights-errant of their time, and few of them had a more varied and adventurous career than Buchanan. Born in February 1506, at Killearn in Stirlingshire, he received the elements of his education in various schools of his native country. In his fourteenth year he was sent to the University of Paris through the good offices of his maternal uncle, James Heriot. Paris had for centuries been the dream of the studious youth of Scotland; and at the date (1520) of Buchanan's first sojourn there the university was passing through a critical period of its history. A double conflict was engaging the best minds in its schools. The teaching of Luther was clashing with the religion of Rome; and the study of Latin and Greek in the new spirit of the Italian Renaissance was asserting itself in opposition to the traditional curriculum of the Middle Ages. It was doubtless during the two years he now spent in Paris that Buchanan acquired that special bent of mind and of intellectual interest which gave him his distinctive character as a typical personality of his age. Henceforward the study of the classics, and specially of Latin, became the engrossing aim of his life, and he pursued it with such natural aptitude and such industry as finally won for him the admiration of learned Europe and the first place among the scholars of his age. Ill-health and the failure of means through the death of his uncle forced Buchanan to return to Scotland after some two years' sojourn in Paris. When next we hear of him, it is as a volunteer in an expedition led by the Regent Albany against England. The result of his experience in soldiering was not encouraging, as in consequence of his hardships he was bedridden for the ensuing winter. Apparently convinced that the career of scholar was his true vocation, he resumed his studies, but on this occasion at the University of St Andrews, where he had for his principal teacher the most famous literary Scotsman of his generation, John Major, the author of a History of Great Britain and of several folios of scholastic theology. It was the meeting of the old world and the new. Buchanan, who had in Paris been initiated into the intellectual ideals of the new generation, found in the highest degree congenial mere logical subtleties which in the later Middle Age had become so barren and unprofitable. After a session at the feet of Major, therefore, Buchanan, on taking his degree of Bachelor of Arts, returned (1526) to Paris, where he was to make his home for the next ten years.

The Scots College in Paris, founded in 1326 by the Bishop of Moray, was his first home, and thence he graduated M.A. in 1528. Being thus qualified to act as regent or tutor, Buchanan chose the profession of teaching as the means of earning his bread, and to the close of his career he remained faithful to his choice. With his notable gifts he might easily have assured himself a far more luxurious existence had he chosen to enter the Church; but, as his future was to show, Buchanan was a born man of letters whose chief gratification was the untrammelled expression of opinion on all the questions which were then agitating men's minds.

As far as Buchanan's literary ambitions were concerned, his ideals now lay clearly before him; with the rest of his career, therefore, we may deal somewhat more briefly. After some years spent in the College of Ste Barbe in Paris he became tutor to the young Earl of Cassillis, whom he accompanied to Scotland in 1536. It is a proof of the distinction he had already won as a scholar that he was now charged with the education of Lord James Stewart, a natural son of James V. (not the Lord James, it should be said, known in Scottish history as the Earl of Moray). A series of incidents now befell

Buchanan which, according to his own testimony, determined his whole future. At the request of the king he wrote a satire (Franciscanus) against the great Order of the Franciscans, which made Scotland too hot for him and drove him to seek refuge in England. Even in England, where, in his own words, he found Henry VIII. 'burning Protestant and Catholic alike on the same day and in the same fire,' Buchanan was not safe, and after a stay of six months he once more sought a refuge in France (1540). Here for the next three years we find him acting as a master in a large school recently founded at Bordeaux, where, it is worthy of note, he had among his pupils the great essayist, Montaigne. Again his sarcastic humour seems to have brought him into trouble. A satirical dialogue on monasteries created some sensation in the city, and, as the Franciscans of Scotland had never lost sight of him, he found it advisable to follow his fortunes elsewhere. For some years, during which he suffered much from ill-health, he resided in various parts of France; but in 1547 he received an offer which led to the most notable experience in his varied career. This was to make one of a band of scholars chosen to act as professors in the University of Coimbra in Portugal. On the way to his destination he passed a few days at Salamanca, famous for its great university. It was the season of Lent; the only fish to be had were conger eels; the bread of the town was detestable; and Buchanan's digestion, as we know, was of the feeblest. In an evil hour for himself he ate meat in the sacred season. The sin was discovered, and was not forgotten. Within little more than a year Buchanan found himself in the dungeons of the Inquisition at Coimbra on a general charge of heresy, and specially of eating meat in Lent. After a trial which was protracted through a year and a half, he was confined in a monastery by way of penance for his past unsatisfactory conduct as a true son of the Church; and it was during his enforced seclusion that he mainly accomplished his famous Latin paraphrase of the Psalms. On his release (1552) he again, after a brief visit to England, settled in France; for, though he had spoken so freely regarding the doctrines of the Church and the morals of the clergy, he was still at heart a Catholic. His last years in France were spent in the capacity of tutor to the son of the Maréchal de Brissac; and on the expiry of this engagement there were special reasons for his seeking a final home in his native country (1561). By further study of the questions at issue between Protestantism and Rome he had become convinced that the truth lay with the former, and by the date when he saw fit to change his religion Protestantism had triumphed in Scotland.

Though Buchanan was in his fifty-sixth year at the date of his return, and though his health, never robust, disabled him from playing a great part in public affairs, the various offices he successively filled prove the esteem in which he was held as the most famous literary Scotsman of his day. He read Livy with Queen Mary, he took a prominent part in the business of successive General Assemblies of the new religion, and he acted for a time as Principal of the College of St Leonard's in St Andrews. The part he played in the arraignment of Queen Mary for the murder of Darnley belongs to his history of the time, and is embodied in his terrible indictment known as the Detectio. On the dethronement of Mary he was entrusted with the education of her son, afterwards James VI.; and during the regency of Lennox he filled successively the offices of Director of Chancery and Keeper of the Privy Seal. His last years were occupied in the writing of his History of Scotland, which was published the year after his death on 28th September 1582. The circumstances of his end are memorable in the history of letters; he died so poor that his means were insufficient to defray the expenses of his funeral.

With Buchanan's two Latin folios before us the question inevitably suggests itself—What would have been his literary achievement had he chosen Scots or English as his vehicle of expression? That his work would have been memorable there can be no manner of doubt. In the range and variety and quality of his gifts—displayed, it is to be remembered, through the hampering medium of a foreign tongue—he is indubitably superior to the most distinguished of the early Scottish vernacular writers—Dunbar, or Douglas, or Henryson, or Lyndsay. He has passion, wit, humour, and playful fancy; and in such productions as his Epithalamium (on the marriage of Mary Stuart with the Dauphin of France), as well as in many of his Psalms, he rises to the heights of pure imaginative feeling. As to his genius he added the most varied experience of life and all the accomplishments of his time, he would have approached his themes with advantages far beyond those of any early Scottish writer. As it is, the few pages in the Scots tongue which he has written only prove that, had he chosen to use it, he had the perfect command of all its capacities. Even from the two brief letters here quoted it will be seen that he handles the language with a deftness and precision which is unequalled in any specimens of early Scots that have been preserved; while the extract from the Admonitioun proves that on higher themes he could produce a harmony and symmetry in the old Scots tongue which recalls the periods of Cicero or Livy.

To his singular freynd M. Randolph, maister of postis to the Queinis Grace of Ingland.

I resavit twa pair of lettres of you sens my latter wryting to you. Wyth the fyrst I resavit Marinus [sic] Scotus, of quhyllk I thank you greatly, and specialy that your inglessmen ar fund liars in their cronicles allegyng on hym sic thyngs as he never said. I haif beyne vexit wyth seiknes al the tyme sens, and geif I had decessit ye suld haif lesit [lost] bath thankis and recompens. Now I most neid thank you, bot geif wear [war] brekks vp of thys foly laitylly done on the border, than I wyl hald the recompense as Inglis geir, bot gif peace followis and nother ye die seik of mariage or of the twa symptomes following on mariage quhyllks ar jalozie and cuccaldry, and the gut [gout] cary not me away, I most other find sum way to pay or cease kyndnes or ellis geifing vp kyndnes pay yow with evil wordis; and geif thys fasson of dealing pleisit me I haif reddy occasion to be angry with you that haif wissit me to be ane kentys man, quylk in a maner is ane centaure, half man, half beast.¹ And yit for ane certaine consideration I wyl pas over that iniury, imputyng it erar [rather] to your new foly, than to ald wysdome. For geif ye had beine in your rycht wyt, ye being anis escapit the tempestuous stormes and naufrage of mariage had never enterit agane in the samyn dangeris. For I can not tak you for ane Stoik philosopher, havinge ane head inexpugnable with the frenetyk-tormentis of Jalozie or ane cairless hart that taks cuccaldris as thyng indifferent. In thys cause I most neidis preffer the rude Scottis wyt of capitane Cocburne to your inglis solomonical sapience, quhyllk wery of ane wyfe deliuerit hir to the queyne againe; bot you deliuerit of ane wyfe castis your self in the samyn nette, et ferre potes dominam saluis tot restibus ulla. The vernacular writings of Buchanan, as far as is known, consist of the two letters given above; The Chameleon, a satirical allegory on the career of Maitland of Lethington; and the Admonition to the True Lords, a political pamphlet addressed to the Protestant nobles of Scotland. The Scots translation of the Detectio is probably by another hand. The most satisfactory edition of Buchanan's Latin works is that of Ruddiman (1715). His vernacular writings were edited by Professor Hume Brown for the Scottish Text Society (1892). See Irving's Life of George Buchanan (2nd ed. 1817), Hume Brown's George Buchanan, Humanist and Reformer (1890); monographs by R. Wallace (1899), D. Macmillan (1906); the Glasgow Quatercentenary Studies (by various hands; 1907), and George Buchanan: A Memorial, 1506-1906, edited by D. A. Millar (St Andrews, 1907); and Whibley's Essays in Biography (1913).

Robert Lindesay, tenant rather than laird of Pitscottie, near Ceres in Fife, is gratefully remembered as the gossiping chronicler of Scottish history, the 'auld Pitscottie' who was Sir Walter Scott's authority for many a vivid passage in his prose and verse—as, for instance, the story in Marmion of James IV's vision in Linlithgow kirk before Flodden; 'for quaint interest, the Herodotus of Scotland,' Andrew Lang calls him. For the dates of his birth and death, c.1500-c.1565, formerly accepted by him, Dr Mackay on no very convincing grounds substituted in 1899 c.1532-c.1578. Pitscottie belonged to a branch of the noble family of Lindsay; but though, like all Scotsmen in this 'romantic' age, he was a strong partisan, he took no conspicuous part in public affairs. His sympathies were with the English or Protestant party throughout, and he is manifestly unable to be fair to the other side. He is apt to be wonderfully wrong in his dates; he sometimes exasperates us by giving the driest and briefest annals in years full of great events for which he might rank as a contemporary authority. But when it does occur to him to tell a story in full, he does it with a will, and is both graphic, humorous, ample in striking details, and eminently quaint. He proposed to himself to be the continuator of Boece and Bellenden, and his first book is a translation, with additions, from Boece. The first printed edition—that of 1728—was 'modernised'; that of 1814 was well meant but uncritical. And all before that of the Scottish Text Society (3 vols. 1899-1911) were incomplete. Of sixteen MSS. examined for that edition by Sheriff Mackay, only one (which came to light in 1896) contained any account of the events of the interesting decade 1565-1575, which saw the murder of Darnley; the Bothwell marriage, Queen Mary's flight, the regency of Murray, the deaths of Knox and Lethington. In Dr Mackay's opinion this tardily discovered portion is Pitscottie's own, suppressed in the other MSS. because the scribes were afraid to copy Pitscottie's frank account of these critical times. Pitscottie thus recounts the escape of the Duke of Albany, the brother of James III., from Edinburgh Castle, to which, after a rebellion in 1479, the king had committed him:

Sone efter this they consallit the king to iustifie the Duik of Albanie his brother, thinkand gif they war quyte of him they suld do witht the king quhat they pleissit; for they stude in sic aw of the Duik of Albanie they durst not mell witht the king nor put hand in him, so lang as the said Duik was on lyue. Quhairfor thir consperatouris desyrit at all tymes to haue this Duik put to deid, trustand the better to come to thair purposis of the king. Althocht the conspiratouris thocht to haue this matter that is above specifyit in quyetnes, yet nochtwithstanding the king of France gat wit of the samin tressoun be moyen of sum that fawored the Duik of Albanie; and thairefter come ane Frinche schip out of France haistellie in to Scotland witht secreit wryttingis to the Duik of Albanie, quho then was in presone in the castell of Edinburgh, to advertise him that it was concludit with the king and consall that he sould be iustifieit witht in ane certane day; quihilk was the day befor the schip strak in the raid of Leyth besyde the Newheawin and gaif hir self fourtht as ane passinger witht wyne, and send wpe word to the castell to the Duik of Albanie gif he wald haue of the samin. Quhen he hard thir nowellis he desyrit the captaneis lecence to send for tuo bossis of wyne, quho gaif him leif glaidlie and provydit the bossis himself. And then the Duik of Albanie send his familiar servant to the said frinchman for the wyne and prayit him to send of the best and starkest; quho grantit the samin werie heartfullie and send him the tuo bossis of mavasie, and in the on of the bossis he pat ane roll of wax quhairin was clossit ane secreit writting quihilk schew the Duik of Albanie sic tydings as he was nocht content witht, bot in the wther boss thair was ane certane fadame of cordis to support him in his neid at that tyme. The bossis was of the quantatie of tuo gallouns the peace, quhairfoir they war the les to be knawin that thair was ought in to them bot the wyne. Nochtwithstanding the man that brocht the wyne sped him hame to his maister and schew him certane thingis be toung quihilk this stranger had bidin him, and that night the Duik of Albanie callit the captane to the supper and promissit him ane drink of goode wyne and he glaidlie desyrit the same, and came to him incontenent and suppit witht him. The Duik off Albanie gaif his chamberchylde command that he sould drink no wyne that night bot keip him fresche ffor he knew not quhat he wald haue adoe; thairfor he prayit him to be war witht him self and gif thair raise ony thing amangis them he prayit him to tak his pairt as he wald serue him. Quhen supper was done the captane went to the kingis challmer to sie quhat he was doand, quho was then ludgit in the castill; and quhen he had gart wesit it, he gart syne steik the zettis and syne gart sett the watch man and thairefter came againe to the Duik of Albanieis chamber to the collatioun; and efter that they had drukin and all men was in thair bedis, the Duik and the captane zeid to the tabillis and playit for the wyne. The fyre was hott and the wyne was stark and the captane and his men became merie; quhill at the last the Duik of Albanie persauet his tyme and saw them merrie and maid ane signe to his chamber chylde to be redy as he had instructit him befor. For the Duik thocht at that tyme that thair was no wther remeid bot ether do or die, because that he was suirle adwertissit be the frinche schip that he was to be heidit wpoun the morne; thairfor he thocht it best to prevene the tyme and to put his lyffe in jeopardie, thinkand the tyme might fall that he might releif himself. Thairfor he gaif the evintour and lap fra the boorde and straik the captane witht ane quhinger and slew him and allso siclyk to ane wther. Bot his chamber chylde was right bussie in the meane tyme and sua the tua wther tuik foure, that is to say the captane and his thrie men, and quhen they had done cast them in the fyre; and efterwart tuik out thair cordis and past to the wall heid at ane quyt place quhair the watches might haue no sight of thame, and thair laid ower the tow ower the wall and the Duik lat done his chamber chylde first. Bot the tow was schort and he fell and brak his thie baine, and thairefter cryit to his maister and bad him mak lang for he was gaine. Then the Duik raif the scheittis of his bed and maid the raife langer and past doune him self saiffie and quhen he come doune he persawit his servant lyand in the poynt of his lyfe. He tuik him wpe on his bak and buire him as far as he might win away and hide him in ane quyt place quhair he trowit he might be saif, and syne went to the New hevin, quho send thair bott to the land to him and ressawit him in to the schip; bot I knaw not giue his servant past witht him or not, bot suirle money gentillmen of Scotland wissit to be witht him. Amangis the laif Schir Alexander Jeardane laird of Apillgirth past witht him, witht sindrie gentillmen. Bot on the morne quhen the watchis persaut that the tow was hingand ower the wall, they ran to seik the captane to haue schawin him the maner; bot he was not in his chamber, they could not gett him. Then they passit to the Duik of Albanieis chamber and thair they fand the doore standand oppin and ane deid man lyand athort it; and also they saw the captane and tuo wther in the fyre burnand, whiche was werie dollarus and feirfull wnto them; bot they mist the Duik of Albanie and his chamber chylde, and thairfoir they rane spedelie and tauld the king how the matter had hapnit, that the captane was slaine and his servantis. Bot the king wald not credit them quhill he past him self and saw how the matter stude, and saw the captane and his men lyand deid and brunt in the fyre. Then he considerit the haill cause how it stude, and caussit the zettis to be haldin close that no worde sould pass to the toun quhill he had searchit all the place to se gif the Duik of Albanie had bene witht in the place or not. Bot quhen he could on nawayis comprehend him, he caussit to send out horsemen in all partis of the contrie to se gif they could comprehend him in ony place and bring him to the king againe, and they sall haue great revairdis thairfoir. Bot on nowayis could they gett wott of him, bot at last thair came ane man out of Leyth and schew the king that thair came ane bott of the frenche schip and tuik in certane men and thairefter pullit wpe thair saillis and trevissit wpe and doune the firth, quhom they iudgit all to be the Duik, as it was trew; for he past to France incontenent and thair was weill ressawit witht the king and gatt in marieaige the Duches of Ballan and gat wpoun hir Johnne Stewart quihilk efter him was Duik of Albanie and governour of Scotland.

The extract follows in all essentials the 1899 edition. The z in such words as 'zettis' is for the old 3—practically y; the w in 'wpoun' is of course u. Quhill means till; to justifie is to execute; mell, meddle; thir, these; nowellis, news ('nouvelles'); boss, cask or leathern butt; mavasie, malvoisie, malmsey; fadame, fathom; gart, caused; wesit, visit; steik, shut; zettis, yetts, gates; zeid, gaed, went; drukin, drunken; stark, strong; heidit, beheaded; gaif the evintour, 'gave the adventure,' made the venture; quhinger, whinger, hanger, large dirk; tow, rope; this baine, thigh bone; wissit, wished; mak lang, make away; athort, athwart; dollarus, dolorous; get wott, get wit; Ballan, Boulogne. It is characteristic of Pitscottie that by him this very circumstantial story is referred to the year 1483, when Albany again fled to England, not to France; and conversely, he makes him do in 1479 what he could not have done till 1483.

John Leslie, or LESLEY, Churchman and historian, was the son of the parish priest of Kingussie. Born in 1526, he studied at Aberdeen and Paris, was professor of canon law at Aberdeen, and in 1565 was made Bishop of Ross. He was a warm supporter of the queen, followed her in her evil fortunes, and was her commissioner and confidential friend as well as ambassador to Elizabeth, by whom he was imprisoned or confined for a year or two for promoting the marriage of Mary with the Duke of Norfolk. He pled Mary's cause at the courts of France, of Spain, and of the Empire; was sent from Rome as papal nuncio to the Emperor Maximilian; was vicar-general of the diocese of Rouen; and after Mary's execution (1587) retired to a monastery near Brussels, where he died in 1596. While in England he wrote in the vernacular Scots a History of Scotland from the death of James I. (where Boece left off) to his own time, which he finished during his confinement 'in the Bishop of London's house in the Cite of London' in 1570. At Rome after 1575 he rewrote this History in Latin, considerably expanding it, and prefixing a description of Scotland and a history from the fabulous beginnings, based on Boece and Major. This latter extended work was translated into Scots in 1596 by Father James Dalrymple, a monk of the monastery of St James at Ratisbon; the translation being edited for the Scottish Text Society in 1885-95. Leslie's History is wooden on the whole compared with Pitscottie, though it has its merits; and his original homely Scots is both clear and vigorous, and is much less artificial than Father Dalrymple's translation.

The following is part of Leslie's account of the reign of James IV., in which we have the Churchman's frank admissions as to ecclesiastical abuses in the court of Rome as well as in Scotland:

James, eldest sone to King James the third, wes borne the [17th] day of Marche 1472, quha esturart wes callit James the fourth, and wes ane iuste and guide prince.

Ane comette mervellus appeirit in the fouth, the xvij day of Januer till the xvij day of Februar, castand gret beames of licht touart the fouth, and wes placet betuix the pole and the pleyaidis callit the sevin starnis, quihilk the astrologis did afferme to be ane signe of mony mervellus changes in the world.

The greyt schip biggit be the bischop of St Androis, callit the bischoppis barge, being laidinnit with merchandice, brak and perischit besid Bamburghe, the xijth day of Marche; in the quihilk mony merchandis, clarkis, and utheris passingeris war drownit, except ane few number quha did eschape be ane boitt, in the quihilk the Abbot of Saint Colme wes takin prefoner, and haldin be ane James Kar in Ingland, quhill he payit four score pundis for his ranfoun. The haille gudeis being in the faide schip wes spulyeit and takin away be the Inglisshmen, to the gryet hurt of the merchandis and awnaris thaireof, notwithstanding of the trewis.

The Abbacye of Dunfermeling vacand, the convent cheisit ane of thair awn monkis, callit Alexander Thomfson, and the King promovit Henry Creychtoun Abbat of Paislay thairto, quha wes preferrit be the Paip, through the Kingis supplicationis, to the faide Abbacye. And sic lik Mr Robert Shaw, perfoun of Mynto, was promovit be the King, of the Abbacye of Paislay; and sua than first began sic maner of promotione of secularis to abbacies be the Kingis supplicationis, and the godlie electiones war frustrate and deokayde, becaus that the Court of Rome admittit the princis supplicationis, the rather that thay gat greis profit and fowmes of money thairby; quhair-fore the bischoppis durft not conferme thame that wes chosin be the convent, nor thay quha wer electit durft not perfew thair awn ryght. And sua the Abbayis come to secular abussis; the abbottis and pryouris being promovit furth of the court, quha levit courtlyk, secularlye, and voluptuoslye: And than ceiffit all religious and godlye myndis and deidis, quhairwith the secularis and temporall men beand sklanderit with thair evill example, fell fra all devocioun and godlynes to the warkis of wikednes, quhair of daylie mekill evill did increase.

This yeir [1474] in September, the indulgence of the feitt of St Androis wes publischet be Patrick Grahame Archebisshop thair of, and the same feitt erectit in ane Archebisshoprik; quhillk wes impetrat be the faide Patrick Grahame, quha maid narrative to the Paip, that becaus the Archebisshoprick of York wes metropolitane of Scotland before, and that thair wes oftymis wearis betuix Scotland and Ingland, quhairthrouch thay could not haif accesse to thair metropolitane, speciallie for remedie of appellacione, the Paip consentit to mak St Androis primat and metropolitan of Scotland, and ordanit the uther xij bischoppis of Scotland to be under his primacie; quha refistit thairto, and prometit ane taxacione of xij thousand merkis to the King for his mayntenance aganis the Archebisshop. And the prelatiss fend to Rome, quhair thay pleyit the cause.

Guide, good; starnis, stars; laidinnit, laden; clarkis, clergy; quhill, till; spulyeit, spoiled, plundered; awnaris, owners; trewis, truce; cheisit, chose; Paip, Pope; impetrat, obtained; pleyit, plead, pled.

The following, from the same reign, is Leslie's story of a famous incident, the subject of a satire by Dunbar (see page 199), who made out that the alchemist was the devil in disguise:

This tyme thair wes ane Italiene with the King, quha wes maid Abbott of Tungland, and wes of curious ingyne. He causet the King believe that he, be multiplyinge and utheris his inventions, wold make fine gold of uther metall, quhillk science he callit the quintessence; quhair-upon the King maid greit cost, bot all in vaine. This Abbott tuik in hand to flie with wingis, and to be in Fraunce befor the saidis ambassadouris; and to that effect he causet mak ane pair of wingis of fedderis, quihilkis beand fessinit apoun him, he flew off the castell wall of Striveling, bot shortlie he fell to the ground and brak his thee bane; bot the wyt thair of he ascryvit to that thair was sum hen fedderis in the wingis quhillk yarnit and covet the mydding and not the skyis.

Multiplyng is a regular word for alchemy in Chaucer; the saidis, the said, the above-mentioned; fedderis, feathers; fessinit, fastened; thee, thigh; wyt, blame; yarnit, &c., yearned for and desired; mydding, dunghill.

A sentence or two from Dalrymple's translation of the passage on the corruption in monasteries will show his Latinised style:

Now alms deidis abuset ar turnet into plesures, now what laid up was to help the miserie of the pure, is gyuen to satisfie the voluptuousness of the ryche. The mounkis now electis nocht Abbotis quha godlie ar maist and deuote, but kingis cheisis Abbots quha ar lustiest and maist with thame in saour.

Sir James Melville (1535-1617), privy-councillor and gentleman of the bed-chamber to Mary Queen of Scots, was born at Hallhill, in Fifeshire. He was page to Queen Mary at the French court, and subsequently undertook missions to the court of England and to the Elector Palatine. He left in manuscript an historical work, which long lay unknown in the Castle of Edinburgh, but, discovered in 1660, was published in 1683, as the Memoirs of Sir James Melville of Hallhill, professing to give 'an impartial account of the most remarkable affairs of state during the last age,' especially those under Elizabeth, Mary Queen of Scots, and James, in which the author was personally concerned. This work, of which the Bannatyne Club's standard edition appeared in 1827, is memorable for the vigour and liveliness of its style, and as sole authority for some important events.

An Interview with Queen Elizabeth.

Sche apperit to be fa effectiounit to the Quen hir gud sifter, that sche had a gret desyre to se hir; and because ther desyred meting culd not be fa haistely brocht till pafs, sche delyted oft to luk vpon hir picture, and tok me in to hir bed chamber, and oppenit a litle lettoun wherin wer dyuers litle pictures wrapped within paiper, and wreten vpon the paiper, ther names with hir awen hand. Vpon the first that sche tok vp was wreten, 'My lordis picture.' I held the candell and preffit to se my lordis picture. Albeit sche was laith to let me se it, at lenth I be importunite obteanit the sicht therof, and askit the same to cary hame with me vnto the Quen; quhilk sche refused, alleging sche had bot that ane of his. I said again, that sche had the principall; for he was at the farthest part of the chamber speaking with the secretary Cicill. Then sche tok out the Quenis picture and kiffit it; and I kiffit hir hand, for the gret loue I saw sche bure to the Quen. Sche schew me also a fair ruby, gret lyk a racket ball. Then I desyred that sche wald eyther fend it as a token vnto the Quen, or elis my Lord of Lecesters picture. Sche said, gene the Quen wald folou hir con-faill, that sche wald get them baith with tym, and all that sche had; bot suld fend hir a dyamont for a token with me. Now it was lait efter supper; sche appointed me to be at hir the nyxt mornyng be 8 houres, at quhilk tym sche vsed to walk in hir garden; and inquired fundre things at me of this contre, or vther contrees wherin I had laity trauelit; and caused me to eat with hir dame of honour, my lady Stafford, ane honorable and godly lady, wha had bene at Geneva, banisfit during the regne of Quen Mary, that I mycht be alwayes neir hir Maieste, that sche mycht conferr with me; and my lady Staffordis dochter was my mestres, for I was of ther acquaintance when they passit throw France, and had gud intelligence be hir and be my lady Throgmortoun.

At dyuers metingis ther wald be dyuers purposes; and the Quen my fouerane had instructed me somtymes to leau matters of grauite, and cast in some purposes of mirrines, or elis I wald be tyred vpon, as being weill informed of hir sifers naturell. Therefore in declaring the customes of Dutchland, Polle and Italy, the buiking and clothing of the dames and wemen was not forget, and what contrey weid was best setten for gentilwemen to wair. The Quen of England said sche had of dyuers fortis; quhilkis euery day fa lang as I was ther sche chengit; ane day the English weid, ane the Frenche, and ane the Ytalien, and fa of others; asking at me quhilk of them set hir best. I said the Italian weid; quhilk pleit hir weill, for sche delyted to schaw her golden coloured hair, wairing a kell and bonet as they do in Italy. Hir hair was reder then zellow, curlit apparantly of nature. Then sche entrit to dicern what kynd of coulour of hair was reputed best; and inquired whither the Quenis or hirs was best, and quhilk of them twa was fairest. I said, the fairness of them baith was not ther worst faltes. Bot sche was ernesft with me to declaire quhilk of them I thocht fairest. I said, sche was the fairest Quen in England, and ours the fairest Quen in Scotland. Yet sche was ernesft. I said, they wer baith the fairest ladyes of ther courtes, and that the Quen of England was whytter, bot our Quen was very lusome. Sche inquired quhilk of them was of hysft stature. I said, our Quen. Then sche said, the Quen was ouer heych, and that hir self was nother ouer hich nor ouer laich. Then sche askit what kynd of exercyses sche vsed. I said, quhen [when] that I was dispatchit out of Scotland, that the Quen was bot new com bak from the hyland hunting; and when sche had leaser fra the affaires of hir contre, sche red vpon gud bukis, the histories of dyuers contrees, and somtymes wald play vpon lut and virginelis. Sche sperit gene sche plaid weill. I said, raifonably for a Quen.

That fame day efter dener, my L. of Hundsfen drew me vp till a quyet gallerie that I mycht heir some musik, bot he said he durst not aduow it, wher I mycht heir the Quen play vpon the virginelis. Bot efter I had harkenit a whyll, I tok by the tapisserie that hang before the dur of the chamber, and feing hir bak was toward the dur, I entrit within the chamber and stod still at the dur chek, and hard hir play excellently weill; bot sche left aff fa schone as sche turnit hir about and saw me, and cam forwartis femyng to stryk me with hir left hand, and to think schame; alleging that sche vsed not to play before men, bot when sche was solitary hir allaine, till efchew melancholy; and askit how I cam ther. I said, as I was walken with my L. of Hundsfen, as we past by the chamber dur, I hard sic melodie, quhilk rauyft and drew me within the chamber I wist not how; excusing my falt of hamelynes, as being brocht vp in the court of France, and was now willing to suffer what kynd of puniffement wald pleife hir lay vpon me for my offence. Then sche fat down laich vpon a kusschen, and I vpon my knee besyd hir; bot sche gaif me a kusschen with hir awen hand to lay vnder my kne, quhilk I refused, bot sche compellit me; and callit for my lady Stafford out of the nyxt chamber, for sche was hir allain ther. Then sche asked whither the Quen or sche played best. In that I gaif hir the prayfe. Sche said my Frenche was gud; and sperit gif I culd speak Italen, quhilk sche spak raifonable weill. I said, I taried not abone tua monethes in Italy, and had brocht with me some bukis to reid vpon; bot had na leaser to learn the langage perfytyl. Then sche spak to me in Dutche, bot it was not gud; and wald wit what kynd of bukis I lyked best, whither of theologie, history, or loue matters. I said, I lyked weill of all the fortis.

I was ernesft to be dispetschit; bot sche said that I tyred schoner of hir company nor sche did of myn. I said, albeit I had na occasion to tyre, that it was tym to retourn; bot I was stayed twa dayes langer till I mycht se hir dance, as I was informed; quhilk being done, sche inquired at me whither sche or the Quen dancit best. I said, the Quen dancit not fa hich and disposedly as sche did. Then again sche wiffit that sche mycht se the Quen at some convenient place of meating. I offerit to convoy hir secretly in Scotland be poift, clothed lyk a paige disgyfed, that sche mycht se the Quen; as K. James the 5 pafit in France disgyfed, with his awen ambaffadour, to se the Duc of Vendomes lister that fuld haue bene his wyf; and how that hir chamber fuld be kepit as thoch sche wer feak, in the mean tym, and nane to be preyu therto bot my lady Stafford, and ane of the grumes of hir chamber. Sche said, Alace! gene sche mycht do it; and feamed to lyk weill of sic kynd of langage, and vfed all the meanis sche culd to caufe me perfuad the Quen of the gret loue that sche bure vnto hir, and was myndit to put away all geleufies and fuspitions, and in tymes comyng a straiter frendship to stand between them then euer had bene of before; and promyfed that my dispafche fuld be deluyerit vnto me very schortly, be Mefter Cicill at London.

James Melville (1556–1614) was, like his uncle, the Hellenist, divine, and great Presbyterian Churchman, Andrew Melville (1545–1622), born at Baldowie, Montrose, and became successively regent or tutor in the College of Glasgow, professor of Oriental Languages at St Andrews, and minister in 1586 of Anstruther and Kilrenny, whence he was ejected in 1606. He died at Berwick-on-Tweed. He is best remembered for his Diary (rather autobiography), which was edited for the Bannatyne Club (1829) and the Wodrow Society (1842).

His Childhood.

I haid an evill-inclyned woman to my nuris; thereafter speaned and put in a cottar hous, and about four or fyve yeir auld brought hame to a step-mother; yit a verie honest burges of Montros hes oft tauld me, that my father wald ley me down on my bak, pleying with mie, and lauche at me because I could nocht ryse, I was sa fatt; and wald ask mie what ealed mie: I wald answer, 'I am sa fatt I may nocht geang.' And trewlie sen my remembrance, I cam never to the place bot God moved sum an with a motherlie affection towardis me. About the fyft yeir of my age, the Grate Buik was put in my hand, and when I was seavine, lytle thairof haid I lernit at hame; therfor my father put my eldest and onlie brother, David, about a year and a half in age above me, and me togidder, to a kinsman and brother in the ministerie of his, to scholl, a guid, lerned, kynd man; whome for thankfulnes I name, Mr Wilyam Gray, minister at Logie-Montrose. He haid a sistar, a godlie and honest matron, rewar of his hous, wha often rememberit me of my mother, and was a verie loving mother to us, indeid. Ther was a guid number of gentle and honest men's bernis of the cowntrey about, weill treaned upe bathe in letters, godlines, and exercise of honest games. Ther we lerned to reid the Catechisme, Prayers, and Scripture; to rehers the Catechisme and Prayers par cœur; also nottes of Scripture, efter the reiding thairof; and ther first I fand (blysed be my guid God for it!) that Sprit of sanctification beginning to work sum motiones in my hart, even about the aught and nynt yeir of my age; to pray going to bed and rysing, and being in the fields alan to say ower the prayers I haid lernit with a sweit moving in my hart; and to abhorre swearing, and rebuk and complean upon sic as I hard swear. Wherunto the exemple of that godlie matron, seiklie, and giffen to read and pray in hir bed, did mikle profit me; for I ley in hir chamber and heard hir exerceises. We lerned ther the Rudiments of the Latin Grammair, with the vocables in Latin and Frenche; also dyverse speitchies in Frenche, with the reiding and right pronunciation of that toung. We proceedit fardor to the Etymologie of Lilius and his Syntax, as also a lytle of the Syntax of Linacer; therwith was joyned Hunter's Nomenclatura, the Minora Colloquia of Erasmus, and sum of the Eclogs of Virgill and Epistles of Horace; also Cicero his Epistles ad Terentiam. He haid a verie guid and profitable form of resolving the authors; he teached grammaticallie bathe according to the Etymologie and Syntax; bot as for me, the trewth was, my ingyne and memorie war guid aneuche, bot my judgment and understanding war as yit smored and dark, sa that the thing quhilk I gat was mair be rat ryme nor knowlage. Ther also we haid the aire guid, and fields reasonable fear, and be our maister war teached to handle the bow for archerie, the glub for goff, the batons for fencing, also to rin, to loope, to swoon, to warsell, to preve pratteiks, everie ane haiffing his matche and andagonist, bathe in our lessons and play. A happie and golden tyme, indeid, giff our negligence and unthankfullnes haid nocht moved God to schorten it, partlie be deceying of the number, quhilk caused the maister to weirie, and partlie be a pest quhilk the Lord, for sinne and contempt of his Gospell, send upon Montrose, distant from Over Logie bot twa myles; sa that scholl skalled, and we war all send for and brought hame. I was at that scholl the space of almost fyve yeirs, in the quhilk tyme, of publict news I remember I hard of the mariage of Hendrie and Marie, King and Quein of Scots, Seingnour Davie's [Riccio's] slauchter, of the King's mourder at the Kirk of Field, of the Quein's taking at Carbarri, and the Langsyd feild. Wherof reid Mr Bowchannan Cornicle, lib. 17, 18, 19.

Even at that tyme, me thought the heiring of these things moved me, and stak in my hart with sum joy or sorrow, as I hard they might helpe or hender the Relligion: Namelie, I remember the ordour of the fast keipit in anno 1566; the evill handling of the ministerie be taking away of their stipends; for Mr James Melvill, my uncle, and Mr James Balfour, his cusing-german, bathe ministers and stipendles, with guid, godlie, and kynd Patrick Forbes of Cors. The Lard of Kinnaber, and the godlie and zealus gentlemen of the coudrey, partlie for thair bernis' cause, and partlie for that notable instrument in the Kirk of Scotland, Jhone Erskine of Done, Superintendent of Merns and Angus, his résidence in Logy at certean tymes, did oftentymes frequent our hous, and talk of sic maters. Also, I remember weill whow we past to the head of the muir to sie the fyre of joy burning upon the stiple head of Montrose, at the daye of the King's birthe. These things I mark for the grait benefit of that place and companie, wherin the Lord wald haiff me treaned upe in my first and tender age.

Speaned, weaned; caled, ailed; genmes, games, sports, exercises; alan, alone; seiklie, sickly; ingyne, intelligence; smored, smothered, obscured; was mair rat ryme nor knowlage, was more by rote than knowledge; seir, fair; loope, leap; glub, club; warsell, wrestle; prove pratteiks, prove practiques, defend theses; deceying, deceyning; skalled, 'skalled', 'emptied', was dismissed; Bowchannan Cornicle, Buchanan's History of Scotland; bernes, bairns; whow, how; fyre of ioy, bonfire; treaned, trained.

His Flight by Sea from St Andrews to Berwick.

To keipe the sie all night in an opin litle bott, it was dangerus, and to go to Dumbar we durst nocht; sa, of necessitie, we tuk us toward St Tab's Heid. Bot we haiffing but twa eares, and the boot slaw and heavie, it was about alleavin houres of the night or we could win ther; whowbeit, na man was ydle, yea, I rowit my self, till the hyd cam af my fingars, mair acquented with the pen nor working on an are. Coming under the crag, we rowit in within a prettie lytle holl betwix the mean and the head, whare easelie going a-land, we refreschit us with cauld water and wyne; and returning to our boot, sleipit the dead of the night; bot neidit nan to wakin us, for soon, be the day-light piped, ther was sic a noyse of foulles on the crag, and about us, because of thair young annes that we war almaist pressed to lainche out. Now we haid Cawdingham bay and Hay-mouth to pas by, and that but slawly, rowing be the land, whar the residence of Alexander Home of Manderston, an of our cheiff confederat enemies, and wha haid intercepted a boot of the Earle of Angus coming about from Tattallon to Berwik nocht lang befor. This put us in grait feir; but our guid God gardit us, making a sweik thik mist till aryse, wherby we might bot skarslie gis at the sight of the land; and thairfra nane could sie us. Sa we cam on hulie and fear till we wan within the bounds of Berwik, whar we was in graittest danger of all, unbesett in the mist be twa or thrie of the cobles of Berwik, quhilk war sa swift in rowing, that they ged round about us; bot we being syve within burd, and haiffing twa pistolets, with thrie swords, and they na armour, they war fean to let us be, namlie, when they understud that we was making for Berwik.

Lesser Sixteenth - Century Prose Writers.—As we have seen, Scottish prose writing had made but feeble beginnings in the fifteenth century: the examples already cited show that development had taken place in the next century, which was active in historical, theological, and political disquisition. In theology both the Catholic Kirk and the Reformed found effective spokesmen. A few of the less prominent authors and books of this period may here be more summarily treated.

The old faith is well represented by Ninian Winzet (Winzet, i.e. Wingate), born at Linlithgow in 1518, who at the Reformation was provost of the collegiate church of his native town. Deprived of his post by the religious revolution, Winzet secured the queen's patronage for Certain Tractatis for Reformatioun of Doctryne and Maneris, discussing the Church question from the point of view of a modest reformer who remained loyal to the Catholic Kirk. He subsequently held offices in the University of Paris and the English college of Douay, and ended his life in 1592 as abbot of a monastery at Ratisbon. Quintin Kennedy (1520-64), abbot of Crossraguel, and son of the Earl of Cassillis, was an even more vehement defender of the papal cause after the Reformation. He conducted a famous Disputation with Knox at Maybole, and he printed also a Compendious Treatise . . . to establish the Conscience of a Christian Man on the points in dispute.

On the other side we have such men as John Gau, who, born at Perth in the last decade of the fifteenth century, was a student at St Andrews in 1509, 'drank of St Leonard's well,' and as a follower of the Reformed doctrines fled to Malmoe or Scania (then Danish). He ended his days as a prebendary of Our Lady's Church in Copenhagen. At Malmoe he in 1533 translated from the Danish of Christian Pedersen (who had in 1531 translated from the German of Urbanus Rhegius) a treatise—mainly Lutheran—on The Richt Vay to the Kingdom of Heuine. It is the earliest prose treatise on the Reformed doctrines in the Scottish dialect (edited for the Scottish Text Society in 1886-87), and contains in the appended 'epistol to ye nobil lordis and barons of Scotland' an interesting reference by a contemporary to the martyrdom of Patrick Hamilton. Another was John Craig (c. 1512-1600), an Aberdeenshire man, who studied at St Andrews, and became head of a monastery at Bologna; but, passing over to the new faith, escaped from Italy to Vienna, and became a colleague of Knox in the High Kirk of Edinburgh and coadjutor in Reformation work. He had an important share in drawing up the Second Book of Discipline and the National Covenant or Confession of 1560, and was the author of the Short Summe of the whole Catechisme, edited by Dr Law in 1883. Robert Rollock (c. 1555-1599), a Stirlingshire man, was brought in 1583 from his chair in St Andrews to be regent and then principal of the newly-founded University of Edinburgh. He was ultimately professor of theology and minister of the High Kirk, and was one of the earliest and most copious of Scottish Protestant commentators on the Bible. The greater number of his score of works were in Latin, but some commentaries and sermons were in vigorous vernacular. Two volumes of his select works were published by the Wodrow Society in 1844-49. The following is part of the sermon on 2 Cor. v.:

Will ye speir at men and wemen quhen they ar lying bathing them selfis in wickitnesse, gif they will gang to hevin; they will answeire, Yes they will gang to hevin or ever their feit be cauld. Bot vain lown, thou never knew Christis purpose in deing for thee. His purpose was that thbu suld be ane new man, and thou suld not live to thy awin self, bot to him. And the end sal prove (and [if] thou proceed sa, living to thyself and not to him quha hes died for thee) that the deith of Christ never had force in thee. Thairfoir luik gif thou livis [examine whether thou livest] to Christ; and gif thou dois sa, then assure thyself that Christ died for thee.

Another in the same series concludes thus:

And the Lord grant me this sinceritie; and I besek him that as he hes bene with me sen the beginning of my ministrie, sa he wald never leif me untill the time I finish my cours with joy, to his glory, and comfort of his Kirk, through Jesus Christ our Lord, to quhome with the Father and the Halie Gaist be all honour, praise and glorie for now and ever. Amen.

There is an anonymous Historie and Life of King James the Sixt; an anonymous Diurnal of Remarkable Occurrents in Scotland from the time of James IV. to 1575, scrappy but highly entertaining; The Diarie of Robert Birrel, Burges of Edinburgh, from 1532 to 1605; David Moysie's Memoirs of the Affairs of Scotland from 1577 to 1603; and from Richard Bannatyne, John Knox's secretary, we have a Memoriale of Transactions in Scotland from 1569 to 1573, which, though it records interesting facts, is, like most of the rest, lacking in almost all the graces of style. Dr Gilbert Skene left Ane Briefe Description of the Pest; The Sea Law of Scotland was expounded 'for the reddy use of seafaring men;' and John Skene prepared an Exposition of the Termes and Difficill Words in some collections of old Scots laws. The Rolment of Courtis, by Abakuk Bysset, written in the reign of Charles I., is, according to Sir J. A. H. Murray, 'perhaps the latest specimen of literary Middle Scots prose existing.' Most of these have been reprinted by the Bannatyne Club or the Scottish Text Society.

Sir Richard Maitland of Lethington, now Lennoxlove, near Haddington (1496-1586), father of the more famous Secretary Lethington, was educated at St Andrews and Paris, and served James V., the Queen-Regent, Mary, and James VI. as judge, privy-councillor, and Keeper of the Great Seal, and as commissioner for dealing with Border troubles. After he had become blind (before 1560) he filled in his spare time by writing a Historie of the House of Seaton; by writing a large number of poems, notable chiefly for shrewdness, sense, wit, and good feeling; and by compiling a very valuable collection of poems by Dunbar, Douglas, Henryson, himself, and other Middle Scots writers ('Maitland Folio MS.,' c. 1570); nearly a hundred pieces were also copied out for or by his daughter Marie (the 'Quarto Maitland,' 1586). Dr Craigie edited both MSS. for the S.T.S. (3 vols. 1919-1927). Many of his own poems, largely occasional—On the New Yeir, On the Queen's Maryage, &c.—beseech the factions which rent the country to be reconciled in the public interest. His facetious verses have something in common with Lyndsay's. The following is from his Satire on the Toun Ladyes.

Sum wyfis of the burrows-toun
Sa wondir vane ar, and wantoun,
In warld they watt not quhat to weir : wot
On claythis thay wair monye a croun ; spend
And all for newfangilnes of geir. . . . attire
And of fyne silk thair furrit cloikis,
With hingand sleivis, lyk geill poikis ; jelly-bags
Na preiching will gar thame foirbeir
To weir all thing that sinne provoikis ;
And all for newfangilnes of geir.

Thair wylecots man weill be hewit, petticoats
Broudirit richt braid, with pasmentis sewit : lace
I trow, quha wald the matter speir,
That thair gudmen had caus to rew it,
That evir thair wyfis weir sic geir.

Thair wovin hois of silk ar schawin, displayed
Barrit abone with tasteis drawin ;
With gartens of ane new maneir ;
To gar thair courtlines be knawin ;
And all for newfangilnes of geir.

Sumtyme thay will beir up thair gown,
To schaw thair wylecot hingeand down ;
And sumtyme bayth thay will upbeir,
To schaw thair hois of blak or broun ;
And all for newfangilnes of geir.

Thair collars, carcats, and hals beidis ; carcanets and necklaces
With velvet hats heicht on thair heidis,
Coirdit with gold lyik ane younkeir,
Brouderit about with goldin threidis ;
And all for newfangilnes of geir.

Thair schone of velvot, and thair muillis ; slippers
In kirk ar not content of stuillis, with stools
The sermon quhen thay sit to heir ;
Bot caryis cuschingis lyik vaine fuillis :
And all for newfangilnes of geir. . . .

And sum will spend mair, I heir say,
In spyce and droggis, on ane day,
Nor wald thair mothers in ane yeir :
Quhilk will gar monye pak decay,
Quhen thay sa vainlie waist thair geir. . . .

Leif, burgess men, or all be loist, Leave, cease
On your wyfis to mak sic cost, cry till
Quhilk may gar all your bairnis bleir : their eyes
Scho that may not want wyne and roist, are bleared
Is abill for to waist sum geir.

Betwene thame, and nobillis of blude,
Na difference bot ane velvous huid !
Thair camroche curcheis are als deir ; canbric kerchiefs
Thair uther claythis ar als guid ;
And thai als costlie in uther geir. . . .

Of burgess wyfis thoch I speik plaine,
Sum landwart ladyis ar als vain, country ladies
As be thair cleithing may appeir ;
Werand gayer nor thame may gain ; may suit
On our vaine claythis waistand geir.

Maitland's own poems were many of them printed by Pinkerton (1786) and by Sibbald (1807); and all of them by the Maitland Club (1830), so called in honour of the collector of the MSS.

Alexander Scott (1525?-1584?) is on slender evidence conjectured to have been the son of a (Catholic) prebendary of the Chapel-Royal at Stirling, and seems to have spent most of his life in Edinburgh, in what office or profession is not known. He left thirty-six short poems, of which the most notable is Ane New Yeir Gift to Quene Mary, which gives a rather melancholy picture of social conditions at the time; and a satire on the tournament, called Justing at the Drum, written obviously on the model of Chrystis Kirk of the Grene. The others are mainly love poems (some of them very coarse, some of them mere graceful exercises in verse, some with the note of true passion); Pinkerton, not quite unreasonably, called him the Scottish Anacreon. Of Scottish authors he stands nearest his English contemporaries Wyatt and Surrey; his verse is pointed, graceful, and melodious, and very varied in stanza and rhythm.

A Rondel of Lufe.

Lo, quhat it is to lufe, love
 Learn 3e that list to prufe,
 By me, I say, that no wayis may
 The grund of greif remufe,
 Bot still decay, both nycht and day;
 Lo, quhat it is to lufe!

Lufe is ane fervent fyre,
 Kendillit without desyre,
 Schort plesour, lang displeour;
 Repentence is the hyre;
 Ane pure tressour, without messour;
 Lufe is ane fervent fyre.

To lufe and to be wyiss,
 To rege with gud adwyiss, rage, be mad
 Now thus, now than, so gois the game,
 Incertane is the dyiss;
 There is no man, I say, that can
 Both lufe and to be wyiss.

Fle alwayis from the snair; Fly—snare
 Lerne at me to be ware;
 It is ane pane and dowble trane pain—train
 Of endles wo and cair;
 For to refrane that denger plane,
 Fle always from the snair.

In wayis, gois, the 'i' is not pronounced; wise in Scots (here wyiss) rhymes with dice.

To his Heart.

Hence, hairt, with hir that most departe, her—must
 And hald thee with thy soverane,
 For I had lever want ane harte, the rather
 Nor haif the hairt that dois me pane;
 Thairfoir, go with thy lufe remane,
 And lat me lei this vnmoile; live
 And se that thow cum not agane,
 Bot byd with her thow luvis best.

Sen scho that I haif scheruit lang, she—served
 Is to depairt so suddanly,
 Address thee now, for thow sall gang
 And beir thy lady company.
 Fra scho be gone, hairtless am I; Since she Ffor quhy? thow art with her possest.
 Thairfoir, my heart, go hence in hy, haste
 And byd with hir thow luvis best.

Though this belappit body heir beleaguered
 Be bound to scheruitude and thrall, servitude
 My faithful hairt is fre inteir,
 And mynd to serf my lady at all.
 Wald God that I wer perigall equal, fitted
 Vnder that redolent ross to rest! rose
 3et at the leist, my hairt, thow sall
 Abyd with hir thou lufis best.

Sen in 3our garth the lilly quhyte
 May not remane amang the laif, rest
 Adew the flour of haill delyte;
 Adew the succour that ma me saif; may
 Adew the fragrant balme suaif, sweet
 And lamp of ladeis lustiest!
 My faithful hairt scho sall it haif,
 To byd with hir it luvis best.

The merit of Scott's translations of the First and Fiftieth Psalms may be gathered from the first verse of the former (the double rhymes in first and third lines being a feature):

Happie is he hes hald him fre
 From folkis of defame;
 Always to fle iniquite
 And sent of syn and schame. scent, taint

Scott's poems were edited by D. Laing (1821), in the Hunterian Club's transcript of the Bannatyne MS. (1874-81), for the Scottish Text Society by Cranstoun (1895), and for the Early English Text Society from the Bannatyne and Maitland MSS. by A. K. Donald (1902).

Robert Sempill (1530?-95), author of The Sempill Ballates, was the most considerable verse-satirist in the period immediately following the Scottish Reformation. He has been—absurdly enough—identified with both the third and the fourth Lords Sempill, but was probably an illegitimate member of that noble house. Either as combatant or as spectator he was present at the siege of Leith in 1559-60. He was in Paris before 1572, whence he escaped at the massacre of St Bartholomew, and there is record of his having been paid for some service to the Scottish Government. A violent partisan of the ultra-Reforming party, he in his verses reviled Mary, Bothwell, Lethington, Kirkaldy of Grange, and the episcopal ('Tulchan') dignitaries, and treated their opponents as glorious and spotless heroes. His earlier pieces (three of which are in the Bannatyne MS.) are highly indecorous; his principal satires are rather lampoons—coarse, rude, but pithy and clever; his most decorous 'deplorations' of deaths and disasters are dismal diatribes, not poems. Yet he is doubtless the representative spirit of a party that has left no equally vivid picture of the temper of the times. The Regentes Tragedy was a lament for the Earl of Moray's death; Ane Complaint upon Fortoun records his regret for the fall of Morton; the Legend of the Bischop of St Androis Lyfe is a scurrilous invective against Archbishop Adamson, and opens thus:

To all and sundrie be it sene
 Mark weill this mater what I meine,
 The legend of a lymmaris lyfe, rogue's
 Our Metropolitane of Fyffe;

Ane schismatyke and gude swyne hogge,
 Come of the tryb [of] Gog Magoge ;
 Ane elphe, ane elvasche incubus,
 Ane leurand laurie licherous, leering fox
 Ane fals, forloppen fenyeit freir, run-away
 Ane ranigard for greid of geir ; runagate
 Still daylie drinckand or he dyne, ere
 A wirriare of the gude sweit wyne, swiller
 Ane baxters sone, ane beggar borne,
 That twyse his surname hes mensworne. . . .

How little descriptive poetry was Sempill's forte will be seen from these verses from The Sege of the Castil of Edinburgh in 1572 :

The vehement schot 3eid in at ather syde,
 By threttie Cannonis plasit at partis seuin,
 Quhill thay thair in mycht not thair heidis hyde
 For Pot Gun pellettis falland from the heuin.

Allan Ramsay printed in the Evergreen three of Sempill's poems given in Bannatyne's MS. ; T. G. Stevenson printed them all (with many not by him) in The Sempill Ballates (1873); and of the forty-eight pieces in Cranstoun's Satirical Poems of the Reformation (Scot. Hist. Soc. 1889-93) those certainly by Sempill are twelve in number, and a good many of the twenty-seven that are anonymous or pseudonymous were by the editor regarded as probably Sempill's.

Alexander Montgomerie (c. 1545-c. 1611) born probably at Hessilhead Castle near Beith, was in the service of his kinsmen the Duke of Lennox and James VI., travelled in France, Flanders, and Spain, was granted and lost a good pension, and, involved in Barclay of Ladyland's Catholic plot, was denounced as a rebel in 1597. His pasquinades are coarse and savage without being strong, his amatory poems laboured, and his devotional pieces poor. His fame rests on The Cherrie and the Slae, an allegorical poem representing virtue and vice, possibly written in Compstone Castle, on Tarff Water, above Kirkcudbright. First printed in 1597, it was later recast and extended, and enjoyed extraordinary popularity in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. The allegory is poorly managed, obscure and incoherent ; some of the descriptions are lively and vigorous ; and the rhyming is dexterous. The Bankis of Helicon (possibly his) follows a poetic but non-classical convention which, in speaking of the Muses, opposes a well or stream called Helicon to the mountain of Parnassus—a convention followed also by Chaucer ('By Elicon the cleré well'), Caxton, Gavin Douglas, Skelton, Davie Lyndsay, Spenser, the academic Pilgrimage to Parnassus, and even Ben Jonson, as well as by Burns. Mount Helicon was sacred to the Muses, and on it were the hallowed fountains Aganippe and Hippocrene (also called Fons Caballinus); and though there was a spring named Helicon near Parnassus and a river so called in Sicily, there is no classical authority for associating either with the Muses. The stanza is made up of a common enough ten-line verse followed by four short lines having double rhymes analogous to those of some Latin hymns. It has not usually been noted that Turberville (see page 265) uses a stave which in the matter of these double rhymes and other essentials is very similar. Maitland adopted this stanza, Ramsay revived it, and Burns often used it ; but, like several of Montgomerie's rhythms, this is rather complicated for his metrical skill or poetic gift. He was influenced by Alexander Scott and the English lyrists ; and it has been pointed out that several of his seventy sonnets are translations from Ronsard. The Flying with Sir Patrick Hume of Polwarth is as coarse as that of Dunbar with Kennedy. Like Dunbar, Holland, and other old Scottish poets, he wrote bitterly and contemptuously against 'Hielandmen.' The first verse of the Bankis of Helicon (which Dr Cranstoun accepted as certainly Montgomerie's) is :

Declar, 3e bankis of Helicon,
 Parnassus hillis and daillis ilk on, each one
 And fontaine Caballein, Hippocrene
 Gif ony of 3our Muses all (Fons Caballinus)
 Or nymphis may be peregall equal
 Vnto my lady schein. bright
 Or if the ladyis that did lave
 Their bodyis by your brim
 So seimlie war or jit so suave,
 So bewtiful or trim.
 Contempill, exempill Consider
 Tak be hir proper port, Take example by Gif onye sa bonye
 Amang 3ou did resort.

This is one of Montgomerie's sonnets to the king, begging for his pension :

If lose of guids, if gritest grudge or grief, greatest
 If povertie, imprisonment, or pane,
 If for guid will ingratitude agane,
 If lauguishing in langour but relief, without
 If det, if dolour, and to become deif,
 If travell tint and labour lost in vane tined, lost

He skilfully worked up an old motif and refrain into a new song, of which we hardly know how much is Montgomerie's and how much the original ('spiritualised' in the Gude and Godlie Ballatis). The first two stanzas run :

Hey, nou the day dawis ;

Montgomerie's Poems have been edited by Irving (1821) and Dr Cranstoun (S.T.S. 1886-87) ; in 1910 G. Stevenson in a supplementary volume for the S.T.S. gave additional texts of The Cherrie and the Slae, The Flyting, and miscellaneous poems, and threw new light on the life and influence of Montgomerie. Harvey Wood edited The Cherrie and the Slae in 1937. See studies by Dr Hoffmann (Altenburg, 1894) and R. Brotanek (Vienna, 1896). Westcott, in the Modern Language Review (Jan. 1911), is among those who fix rather earlier dates for Montgomerie's birth and death.

ELIZABETHAN AND JACOBEOAN LITERATURE.

LATER SIXTEENTH AND EARLY SEVENTEENTH CENTURIES.

It is growing to be more and more difficult, as knowledge becomes more exact, to find a general term by which to distinguish the magnificent literature of England at the close of the sixteenth and the opening of the seventeenth centuries. It was customary in earlier times to call everything from Sackville to Shirley Elizabethan, and in common parlance the entire period of sixty or seventy years is still laxly termed the Elizabethan age. In point of fact, the adjectives 'Elizabethan' and 'Jacobean,' though convenient, are misleading; and the literary movement from 1558 to 1625 cannot be regarded with reference to political events. The date of Elizabeth's death, 1603, is a particularly inconvenient one to the student of literature, and divides the epoch of Shakespeare and Ben Jonson in a meaningless way. Nor is there anything which properly connects a writer like Gascoigne with a writer like Quarles. The proper way of regarding this intensely vivid and various age is, perhaps, to divide it into four periods of unequal length and value. But before we define these stages in the evolution of the Elizabethan-Jacobean history, we must see where England stood among the peoples of Europe in 1558.

Italy at that moment was still at the summit of the intellectual world, easily first among the nations for learning and literary accomplishment. But she was already closely pursued by France, and before the age we are considering ended she was to be passed in the race by Spain and England. This, then, is to be noted, that we find Italian literature the first in Europe, and that we leave it the fourth; the rapid, steady decline of Italy being a phenomenon of highest import in our general survey. But prestige lingers long after the creative faculty has passed away; and the nations of Western Europe were still dazzled by the splendours of Italian poetry long after Italy had ceased to deserve homage. The chivalrous epic of Italy, with its tales 'of ladies dead and lovely knights,' whether entirely serious with Boiardo (1434-1494) and Ariosto (1474-1533), or tinged with burlesque humour with Pulci (1432-1487) and Berni (1497-1535), had been the last great gift of Italy to literature before she sank into her decline. The Orlando Furioso and the Morgante Maggiore set their stamp on European literature, and most of all on that of England. To note the influence of Ariosto on Spenser, in particular, is of the first critical importance.

All these Italian poets, it will be observed, were dead when Elizabeth came to the throne. There succeeded to these great names nothing better than those of serio-comic poets of the third class, such as Tassoni and Bracciolini, although, during our own great age, the light of Italian poetry made another flicker in the socket with Guarini and with Torquato Tasso. If, however, Italian verse was not any longer of commanding importance, Italian prose was so still less. Italy had possessed a noble school of political historians, but they had passed away before the middle of the sixteenth century. The novelists of manners, who exercised so important an influence on our drama, and on Shakespeare himself, belong to a period antecedent to the revival of English prose; Bandelio died in 1561, Cinthio in 1573; the Notti Piacevoli was published in 1554. A blight fell upon Italian prose after the appearance of these novels. More curious still was the early attempt made, at first apparently with extraordinary success, to create an Italian drama. It was doomed to sudden and abject failure. In all things it seemed as though Italy, after the splendours of the Cinque Cento, was deliberately drawn into the background by Providence to make room for France, and for Spain, and most of all for England.

If we turn to France, we find that by 1558 the principles of the Italian Renaissance had been completely introduced among the young writers. The famous Défense et Illustration de la Langue Française dates from 1549, and in its reformation of the language led to a parallel revival of literary forms and a return to natural poetic inspiration. The result had been an instant and extraordinary renovation of the essential French genius, dipped again in the waters of antiquity and transformed to youth and beauty. That France was ahead of England in her literary revival is easily exemplified by the fact that Joachim du Bellay, by whom the principles of that revival were illustrated with peculiar perfection and delicacy, died in 1560, before Shakespeare and Marlowe were born. Ronsard, who lived to the confines of old age, died just six months after Shakespeare came of age. The creation of tragedy in France followed a little later, but it was coincident with the earliest years of Elizabeth, and the date of the Cléopâtre of Jodelle is 1552. The beginnings of original comedy in France, with Grévin and Jean de la Taille, belong to the first decade of Elizabeth's reign. In all forms of imaginative revival France is seen to be about one generation ahead of us at this time. The same may be said of French prose in the hands of the writer who affected us most, namely, Montaigne (1533-1592).

In Spain the reign of Philip II. (1555-1598) was so nearly coincident with that of Elizabeth that we can trace the literary parallel with some closeness. The following of Italian models is far more general in Spain than it is with us, but it takes a form which is a perfectly original one and native to the Peninsula, namely, the lyrico-mystical. In St Teresa (1515-1582), St John of the Cross (San Juan de la Cruz, 1542-1591, abbot of the monastery of Ubeda, who was called 'the ecstatic doctor'), and Luis Ponce de Leon (1527-1591) we have poets of the transcendental order who were far ahead of any English writers of 1570 in vigour of diction and accomplishment of poetic art; these lyrists were destined to exercise an intense, though limited, influence on our own poetry. The novel, picaresque or pastoral, was cultivated in Spain before it was transplanted to us. Montemayor, who died in 1561, is the direct inspirer of Sidney and the school of Greene. Moreover, in the days of Philip II. the drama found in Spain that acceptance which it had failed to find in Italy, and the life of Lope de Vega extends on both sides beyond the life of Shakespeare. Mr Fitzmaurice-Kelly has dwelt on the dramatic experiments of Encina (1468-1534), and we have nothing in English of the early sixteenth century to compare with his 'liturgical' dramas. The amazing tragic-comedy or dramatised novel of Calisto and Melibea, by Rojas, dates from 1499, and is precisely on a level with what some Englishmen of like mind might have composed in 1599. We are not, however, to presume from this that England was all through the century a hundred years behind Spain, since there seems to have been made no further progress at all, in the novel or the drama, until the days of Cervantes and of Lope de Vega, who were exact contemporaries of Shakespeare and Spenser.

We may therefore roughly say that, standing on the first year of the reign of Elizabeth, we see Italy, flushed and garlanded with triumphs, and taking as a matter of course her prestige of supremacy, practically unsuspecting of the fact that her vitality has left her, and that she is dwindling to the fourth rank among the nations. We see France, at this very instant of sudden revival and reconstitution of her literature, taking the principles of humanism with a sort of limpid innocence, like a child, amusing herself by applying them to the outer surface of life and language, without troubling herself to see that they permeate into the veins of the race. France is in the heyday of her brief literary Age of Gold. Spain is the one country in Europe whose literary history at this moment resembles our own. Like ourselves, she has tardily accepted the Renaissance; the mediæval strain has nearly worked itself out of her; she is starting, or has started, each of the purely modern forms of literary expression. But, while Spain began her revival earlier than we did, she progressed with it in far more dilatory fashion. In 1558 we are still almost barbarous, while she looks back on Boscán and Garcilaso and Guevara; but Spain moves so slowly that by 1588 we have caught her up, and before 1600 we have passed her.

For in 1588 there was little being produced or prepared that could have suggested to such a general observer as did not then exist in the world that we could pretend to anything better than the fourth place among the literary nations. If we give a brief consideration to the first of the four divisions of one period of which we have spoken above, the record it presents to us is mainly one of sterile turmoil and the irritability of inexperience. From 1558 to 1570 we are told, indeed, that 'Minerva's men and finest wits' swarmed like bees at the universities and the Inns of Court, but little honey resulted, and that neither sweet nor translucent. One great poetic genius, indeed, born out of his due time, and crushed (it would appear) by the absolute inability of his age to comprehend what he was doing, does appear in the form of Thomas Sackville, whose Induction, a meteoric portent of a poem, not connected with any other in the generation, appeared in 1563 in the second edition of a dreary and antiquated verse-miscellany called A Mirror for Magistrates, where its vivid modern note clashes astonishingly with the droning and mumbling measure of its fellows. As I have remarked elsewhere, a sign of the unhealthy condition of letters in this hectic generation is that, although it produced experiments in literature, it encouraged no literary man, and Sackville passed abruptly from us into politics and silence. Ascham, an opponent of the Italian influence, and the head of a school which had endeavoured to press upon Englishmen a crabbed Hellenism, stripped of all the elements of beauty, died in 1568, leaving us unconvinced of the value of his own scheme of humanism, yet suspicious of and unprepared for any other. Arthur Brooke, convinced to the finger-tips that salvation can only come from Italy, produces a poem worthy of more historical attention than we have been accustomed to give. Churchyard, Googe, Turberville, dull dogs without much to say or voice for singing, keep the level of accomplishment as low as they can; while Ascham's theories about the classics lead to a great activity in the rendering of Greek and Latin classics into a horrible jargon that passes for the newest English. The year 1570 comes and goes, and English literature is still in doleful case.

It is permissible, however, to take the somewhat arbitrary date of the publication of the Bull of Excommunication by Pope Pius V. (April 25, 1570) as the opening of a new intellectual era in England. Elizabeth, not in the least daunted by her enemies, adopted an attitude of resolute isolation which gave confidence to her entire people. For the next ten years, by contrast with the distracted condition of Europe, the internal affairs of England were prosperous and tranquil, for the country had realised that it was face to face with an implacable foe, whom, nevertheless, by the exercise of patriotic virtue, it might confidently hope to defy. In this condition of exalted public feeling, under this pleasurable tension, these seeds of Renaissance culture, which had hitherto sent up such dwindled shoots into the English air, began to thrust forth an abundant harvest. The Bull of Deposition, which it was hoped by the Roman party would paralyse England, was a trumpet-blast calling upon all the slumbering forces of intelligence to waken and come forth. Hence the period from 1570 to 1590—the real and essential Elizabethan period—is one of the most vivid and exciting spaces of twenty years with which the student is called upon to deal in the whole history of letters. It rustles with growth, like a tropical forest in early summer. We find it difficult to take note of what is happening, so sudden and so manifold are the manifestations of originality.

In the higher poetry, Spenser, still a school-boy, leads the chorus with his first lispings translations from Petrarch and Joachim du Bellay as early as 1569. But for the solitary voice of Sackville, calling twice in the wilderness, like a ghostly clarion, there had been none to point out the excellent way of modern English poetry since Surrey. But by this time some of the poets had at least reached the age at which independent impressions are formed and can be retained. In 1570 we may recollect that Marlowe and Shakespeare were six years old, while Constable, Daniel, Drayton, Chapman, Greene, Lodge, Watson, and doubtless Peele and Kyd were children of more or less observation and advancement. Some of the great prose-writers of the next age were older still; Raleigh was eighteen, Hooker and Sidney sixteen, Bacon nine. These were among the foremost of the names which were to make the closing years of the reign of Elizabeth illustrious.

We may gain, perhaps, a useful idea of what took place within these twenty years if we glance for a moment at what had been accomplished at the close of them. In 1570 there was no poetry of real value being composed in England; in 1590 all the English world was reading the first three books of The Faerie Queen, in which romantic and allegorical narrative rose to a height which put us at once on a level with the Italy of Boiardo and Ariosto. In 1570 our prose was still inchoate, still cumbered with the dullness and stiffness of mediævalism, still in the leading-strings of Latin and French models. By 1590 it had begun to produce, although still rather timidly, a crop of national and individual works. Euphues and the Arcadia were written; there had grown up a school of writers of prose romances which were not without their promise. If, however, the revival of prose belongs to a still later period, one magnificent thing had been accomplished in these twenty years—the foundation of English drama. From the thin and stammering pseudo-classical plays of the beginning of Elizabeth's reign, from Ralph Roister Doister and The Supposes, to tragedy as created by Kyd and Marlowe, the transition is like that from deep night to full sunrise. With The Arraignment of Paris and Alexander and Campaspe (1584) England took her place among the drama-producing nations, but with Tamburlaine the Great she indicated her intention of standing at their head for all remaining time.

Nevertheless, it must be distinctly recognised that this second Elizabethan period, for all its warm fecundity, was in the main a period of preparation rather than fulfilment. The very type of it was George Gascoigne, who, without bequeathing to English literature a single work or even a single line which is now read with enjoyment, for its own sake, was an innovator of extraordinary ingenuity and versatility. Everything which was later on to be done well, every neglected instrument from which melody was presently to be extracted, was tested, was handled by Gascoigne without any considerable personal success. He died, as he arrived, too soon; in 1577 the world of English fancy was not prepared for the multitudinous experiments of Gascoigne's mind. The author of his elegy, addressing his contemporaries, cried, 'His scene is played; you, follow on the act!' and this is precisely what the greatest of them did. He had written the first Greek play introduced upon the English stage, the first prose drama, the first criticism, the first satire, the first non-dramatic poem in blank verse. Gascoigne was but a servitor among the Elizabethans; but he swept the floor, arranged the seats, and lighted the candles for the orchestra of magnificent performers which swept into their places when he had prematurely passed away.

Almost the only department in which Gascoigne is not known to have essayed his pale experiments is that of prose fiction. This was started by numerous travelled Englishmen, who had found delight in the Italian stories of the preceding century. Paynter's Palace of Pleasure (1566) in the very first years of Elizabeth's reign had alarmed sober and old-fashioned men by introducing tales by Bandello, Boccaccio, and even Straparola. This collection had contained, in its primitive form, the plot of Romeo and Juliet. A little later Englishmen attempted to emulate these romantic fictions by prose novels of their own; the Promos and Cassandra (1578) of Gascoigne's friend Whetstone being the earliest of these 'right excellent and famous histories, divided into comical discourses,' which can by any stretch of language be called a novel. Lyly's Euphues, a real addition to prose literature, and a milestone on the roadway of English style, dates from 1579; and it has been thought that the Don Simonides of Barnabe Rich (1581), containing 'strange and wonderful adventures' and 'very pleasant discourse,' the whole 'gathered for the recreation as well of our noble young gentlemen as of our honourable courtly ladies,' may be considered our earliest modern romance.

Therefore it seemed probable that the revival in English composition would take the form of the novel. Certainly an impartial observer between 1580 and 1590 would have been justified in supposing so. There came into existence a set of professional men of letters, who supplied the taste of the time with stories of extravagant adventure wrapped up in a curiously sophisticated moral disquisition. Greene began with Mamillia (1583), a long series of highly-coloured fantastic novels, 'love-pamphlets,' as he called them; and he was immediately imitated by Lodge, by Dickenson, by Lodewick Lloyd, and by many others of less notoriety. These books had a peculiarity which is of the greatest importance: they were written for women. It was frequent to dedicate a novel of this class 'To the Gentlewomen of England;' Lyly went so far as to say that his books would 'rather lie shut in a lady's casket than open in a scholar's study.' This gave a peculiarly civilising effect to what was best in these romances, most of which, although they were objected to by the severe on account of their appeal to frivolity and their long-drawn pictures of lovers' emotion, were in no sense licentious or even coarse.

This curious fashion, however, although introduced by a book so original, so wise, and in many ways so attractive as Euphues, and although for a little while so triumphant, was doomed to rapid and complete failure. The romantic novel in Elizabethan England culminated in the Rosalynde of Lodge (1590), and we may admit the space of twelve years as comprising its rise and its decay. From the first it was exotic; not one of the novels (with the curious exception of Nash's realistic picaresque romance of Jack Wilton, 1594, from which an extract is given below) touched the incidents of actual life. The landscape was a scene out of some vague, flowery Arcadia; the personages were heroic beyond mortal comprehension; the language used was almost invariably that artificial, mincing dialect suggested, as is now believed, by the study of the world-famous Reloj de Principes, or 'Dial of Princes,' by the Spanish bishop, Antonio de Guevara (translated from a French version by Lord Berners, see page 104; and again by Sir Thomas North in 1557). This dialect took the name of Euphuism, though it existed before the days of Euphues, and indeed hangs like a faint scent of musk over most early Elizabethan prose. Discredited and ridiculed, Euphuism was not only long in dying, but lived to impress indelibly the style of the greatest English writers of the next age, and Shakespeare himself.

The novel was a rapidly deciduous growth thrown off to prepare the minds and tongues of Englishmen for an infinitely more important and more national literary manifestation. The exotic, artificial romance was not nearly strong enough meat for the appetites of men, or of women either, awakened to the gust of life at the close of the glorious Tudor epoch. In the extreme fermentation of public and private existence, the violence and intensity of passion experienced in real life easily and finally rendered insipid the flowery, languid stories of the Euphuists. When life moved so quickly, and presented people with such startling reverses of fortune; when foreign politics, and home churchcraft, and the bewilderment of infatuated love, and the intrepidity of murder, and a thousand other forms of passionate, ill-regulated vitality, were stirring the fantasy of the populace, so that life itself was more exciting than a thousand romances, it was impossible to be interested for any length of time in long, blossomy conversations between the melancholy shepherd Menaphon and the fair nymph Samela of Cyprus. And out of this impatience grew the great literary invention of the Elizabethan age, the stage-play.

We have already passed in review, in earlier divisions of this volume, the Tudor miracles and moralities which illustrated the theatrical spirit for men who had not been touched by the new learning. In these interesting but primitive compositions plot had been entirely wanting, and everything approaching to evolution of character. These plays had been humorous, sensible, and lively; they had depended upon allegory for their interest; and they had been independent of all exotic influence. In the first years of Elizabeth certain faint efforts had been made at creating a native comedy and a native tragedy, and these will be chronicled in their place. But the mediæval play had to die before the Renaissance play could be created. According to an early legend, the boy Shakespeare went from his home to Coventry to watch a performance of the old pageant of Corpus Christi. It was the new world contemplating the old world, and between these two there was really no essential bond. The attempts made, therefore, to modernise the surface of the mediæval play, and give it a humanist veneer, are of purely antiquarian interest.

The first Renaissance English play belongs to a period earlier than that with which this division deals. Nor was Ralph Roister Doister a farce on English lines at all, but founded almost servilely on a classical model. There were several successors to Udall's clever adaptation of the manner of Plautus, but none of them led any farther in the development of comedy. In tragedy the same process was repeated, under a worse model, the so-called Seneca. The interest taken in this bombastic Latin tragedy in the early years of Elizabeth was very remarkable, and culminated in the production of Gorbuduc of Sackville and Norton, first performed in 1562. The irrational character of these dramatic experiments, and the fact that they led nowhere, and were incapable of development and extension, struck contemporary minds after a quarter of a century of bewildered subjection to Seneca. The most advanced critic to-day could scarcely define the faults of an early Elizabethan dramatist better than Whetstone did (in 1578) when he declared him to be 'most vain, indiscreet, and out of order; he first grounds his work on impossibilities; then in three hours runs he through the world; marries, gets children; makes children men, men to conquer kingdoms, murder monsters; and bringeth gods from heaven, and fetcheth devils from hell.'

What delayed the wholesome revival of the modern drama in England was the persistence with which the university wits, such as Sidney, Harvey, and Gosson, determined that this incoherence could only be abated by a stricter adherence to classical rules of composition. Their great mistake was to regard the drama as a purely intellectual or literary thing, without taking into consideration the material requirements of an audience in a theatre. But, while the scholars were wrangling in their closets as to the proper way in which the precepts of Aristotle should be carried out, the common people, who had never heard of Aristotle or of the unities, but who desired to be amused and alarmed in commodious play-houses, on their own lines, with intelligible chronicle-plays and farces, were really preparing the foundations of a national drama. Hence, in discussing the movement of our dramatic literature, it is impossible to escape from a subject not properly dealt with in this volume, namely, the history of the stage, or to decline to acknowledge the importance of the date 1576, as that of the year in which the great building of advanced suburban theatres began.

We are here, however, confronted, by the extremely curious fact that it seems impossible for us to discover what happened in the English theatrical world between this date and 1587. In spite of endless research and conjecture, these ten years, the conduct of which would be of extraordinary interest to us, obstinately refuse to deliver up their dramatic secrets. It is certain that several of the court-plays of Lyly, curious anomalies in stage-craft, which faintly prophesied of the poetic comedy of the next age, were performed; and it is also certain that one play of real merit, in its fragmentary way, The Arraignment of Paris, by George Peele, was played in 1584 by the Children of the Chapel Royal before Queen Elizabeth. Robert Greene, afterwards so famous, in these years 'left the University [of Cambridge] and away to London, where [he] became an author of plays.' But these early dramas of Greene have, without exception, perished or vanished. Perhaps the play of Sir Clyomon and Sir Clamydes, a strange medley of mediæval and Hellenic romance, belongs to this same dim period of transition. Putting together these and what other scraps of evidence we possess, we come to the conclusion that in these years, from 1576 to 1587, there was a tendency to the employment of Euphuism on the stage, to an avoidance of serious passion; that there was preferred the use of rhyming metres, blank verse still lacking the sonority desirable for the public stage; that no attention was seriously given to characterisation or construction, the two qualities upon which drama really depends; and that for all these reasons there was a suspended animation, the English drama being unable to start, although absolutely ready to do so, until some man or men should arise strong enough to sweep these obstacles out of her path.

It seems quite certain that neither Peele nor Lyly, though each had a graceful talent, was man enough to do this; and what Greene was doing when he was not penning love-pamphlets is so absolutely unknown to us that conjecture is idle. But the revolutionary qualities wanted were unquestionably met with in two men of extraordinary fertility of invention and resolute originality—Kyd and Marlowe. Of these Marlowe had doubtless the greater genius; the tradition of the seventeenth century, combined with very recent discoveries, leads us to suspect that Kyd was the more innovating spirit. The fault of allegorical pastorals like Endymion and The Arraignment of Paris was that they were too gentle; they merely brushed the surface of life. These were social entertainments, in which political and courtly complications were touched with so timid a hand that if the official world turned upon the poet he might say that he did not mean anything at all, and that the resemblance was accidental. But such plays ill-matched the deep excitement, the audacious keenness, of the maturing Elizabethan age; and therefore we see, in 1587, two dramatists, supported unquestionably by their strong personal friendship, rise like Harmodius and Aristogeiton to free English drama by an unexpected death-blow from the tyranny of a paralysing conventionality.

The blow was struck by Marlowe in Dr Faustus and by Kyd in The Spanish Tragedy. But to comprehend the nature of the revolution worked by these two men we must realise what their personal relations were with their time. It wanted but a little that these twin heralds of our dramatic dawn were burned at the stake for their atheistical and infamous opinions; they were in actual danger of a death as violent as any which they drew. One of them actually died by the hand of a murderer, and both were, in their brief, fiery, and tempestuous lives, the prototypes of the melodramatic villains of their own tragedies. Neither Kyd nor Marlowe shrank from the contemplation (we must not say the committal) in real life of those 'carnal, bloody, and unnatural acts' which they loved to describe. If the character of Faustus fascinated them, it was because they saw in him what they wished to be—a turbulent innovator, self-supported in a paroxysm of intellectual arrogance and revolt. These new authors, in addition to the startling frankness with which they voiced the pride of the age, each possessed one dramatic quality of the highest and most pregnant value. Kyd had discovered the secret of the evolution of a plot; Marlowe invented the sonorous fullness of an effective stage blank verse. These two things had but to be united, and tragedy was on the right road. The same year, 1587 (it is probable), saw the first working out of the story of Hamlet in a popular Senecan form, due, almost certainly, to Kyd. We incur little danger of mistake, indeed, if we take that date as the practical start-year of drama in its finished form in England. It is worthy of note that, while tragedy is thus taking hold of the English mind in deep romantic intensity, it is fading from the stage of France, where it seemed to be so passionately welcomed. Before Marlowe and Kyd are vocal, Jodelle and Garnier (with whom Kyd had much in common) have quitted the stage, and have left no direct descendants.

If we turn to narrative and lyrical poetry, we do not find the same abrupt transitions as meet us in the history of drama, but we observe a rapid upward development. Oddly enough, the period is limited, at its beginning and its close, by a publication of Spenser—The Shepherd's Calendar in 1579, and the first three books of The Faerie Queen in 1590. As will in due course be shown, Spenser himself almost wholly disappears from our view during those years; but the progress of poetry, set in action by the startling novelties of The Shepherd's Calendar, continues. Sidney's friendship with Spenser, and his presidency of the 'Areopagus,' a sort of club which set out to revolutionise poetry in a wholly undesirable way, dates from a year or so earlier than this; and Sidney, in defiance of his own rules, begins to write the canzonets and pastoral odes of the Arcadia, and, what is much more to the point, to introduce the sonnet and celebrate the alembicated loves of Astrophel and Stella. But these poems are not seen by the general public, and a profound sensation is made by Thomas Watson, whose Hecatompethia, or Passionate Centurie of Love, is published in 1582. Watson has, perhaps, not left behind him a single poem, a single line, which lives in English literature; yet his historical position is a very prominent one. He marks the disappearance of the last traces of mediævalism, and the completion of the triumph of southern influences. Watson is a Petrarchist of the late order, of the class of Bembo and Molza, and of his sonnets may be said what Dr Garnett has excellently remarked of those of the last-mentioned Italian, that they are 'as inexpressive as harmonious—a perpetual silvery chime which soothes the ear, but conveys nothing to the mind.'

It was, in all probability, a very propitious thing for English poetry that the Italian verse of the Cinque Cento declined so suddenly and lost its prestige so completely. The Petrarchists, after the brilliant success of their innumerable warblings, ceased to sing, or ceased to find listeners, in the middle of the century; the latest and perhaps the best of them, Bernardo Tasso and Luigi Tansillo, died in 1568–69. There was, therefore, no contemporary Italian, of their own exact class, before whom Sidney and Watson were tempted to bow down. The most they could do was to become the English Tansillo and Molza of a later age. In spite of the weakness of their cause, their success was considerable. It must not be overlooked that a strong chord of Petrarchism continued to run through the complicated music of the great Elizabethan period, and was not drowned until it melted into the grotesque melody of the disciples of Donne. Drayton, Daniel, Barnfield, even Shakespeare himself, are full of Petrarchism, and it is only proper to remember that all this was started and given direction to by Sidney and Watson, but by Watson most of all.

By the side of the Petrarchan there flourished the pastoral manner, borrowed from Italy and the Peninsula. One of the books of the Cinque Cento which most deeply influenced the literature of the world, and not least of England, was the Arcadia of Sannazaro (1504), a pastoral romance, written in careful, but not Euphuistic, prose, plentifully besprinkled with bucolic verse. This work positively fascinated the youth of Europe, and was imitated, to satiety and ridicule, in every language. The Portuguese, in particular, greatly delighted in it, and it was a poet of Portugal, Jorge de Montemayor, whose Castilian pastoral of the Diana (1558) awakened in the youthful Sidney the ambition to compete in English pastoral with the poets of Southern Europe. Sidney had imitated Montemayor and Sannazaro before these poets were widely known in England; a version of the Diana (1598), by Bartholomew Young, acquired great popularity. Pastoral was started in England in two species—the Virgilian and Chaucerian, mingled in a kind of national eclogue, by Spenser, the purely artificial and Sannazaran by Sidney—and this also had its vogue throughout the next half-century, as exemplified in the direct scholars of Spenser, such as Phineas Fletcher and Browne, and in the more voluptuous dramatists from Beaumont to Shirley.

One prominent section of literature remains to be spoken of, and that is prose. But here we find much less to be said of a definite kind. The great years from 1570 to 1590 were years of national concentration on the difficult and supremely fascinating art of verse, and very secondary and desultory attention was given to pedestrian prose. Of late what is perhaps an exaggerated attention has been given to the useful and picturesque but prolix translations of the early Elizabethan age. Sir Thomas North, Philemon Holland, Savile, and the rest have their place in the development of prose, but they were awkward writers, rocking feverishly between a vulgar raciness and an inappropriate pomposity of language. In Lyly, for the first time, we meet with an English writer of measured and occasionally elegant prose, although even Lyly is painfully prolix and mannered. In Hooker, for the first time, we discover really competent and practical prose, capable of conducting an argument with sanity, lucidity, and dignity; but Hooker published nothing until 1594. Much of the practical prose of the early Elizabethan is energetic, and it is possible from a dozen writers to select brief passages of extreme magnificence; but it is difficult to perceive that they wrote upon any system, or that it had ever crossed their minds that prose should be given, and could deserve, no less sustained technical attention than verse itself. After 1590 there came a burst of geographical and adventurous prose, much of which makes exceedingly good reading to-day. Nothing is more delightful than to plunge into those miscellanies in which Hakluyt and afterwards Purchas preserved the 'memorable exploits of late years by our English nation achieved, from the greedy and devouring jaws of oblivion.' Most of all, the progress of biblical and liturgical prose deserves our careful attention, the Bishops' Bible of Parker (1568) being the companion of men who gradually became dissatisfied with its imperfections, and demanded from the Conference of 1604 a revision of the English Scriptures, which led, in 1611, to the publication of a Bible the most faultless and the most melodiously picturesque to be found in any European vernacular. For the success of this crowning trophy of Jacobean genius praise must not be withheld from Lancelot Andrewes, the editor or chairman of James I.'s learned committee of ecclesiastics.

We have now indicated a few of the influences and the surroundings which moulded English imaginative thoughts in the days which preceded the magnificent burst of genius in the midst of which the voice of Shakespeare was raised. When the creators were at work, simultaneously building the vast palaces of Elizabethan poetry, it became difficult to recollect the very names of their predecessors. It has therefore seemed well that we should linger a little on the movement of those gentle forces which led up to the great explosion of genius, in order to prepare readers for the phenomena which will be presented to them in due chronological course. From 1591 to 1616—that is to say, during the quarter of a century peculiarly identified with the activity of Shakespeare—English literature was raised to an extraordinary height of splendour and originality, and this must now be studied in the detailed life of its individual exponents.

One general order of ideas may, however, be suggested. Without giving way to the tendency to see historical events immediately reflected in literary productions, we may yet perceive to advantage the many ways in which Elizabethan literature proceeded on lines continuous with those worked along by the great Tudor statesmen. First of all, it is impossible not to be struck by the contributions to the sentiments of national independence offered by one great author after another. There was this difference between, let us say, the polished epics of Italy and The Faerie Queen, that the one represented a vain aspiration and the other a living entity. When Spenser drew a picture of that newly-invented paragon of chivalry, the English gentleman, he painted something at once more attractive and more romantic than Orlando or Rinaldo had proved on the realistic canvas of Boiardo. But while he seemed, with his allegory and his fabulous geography, to be farther from existence than the southerners, he was actually moving much nearer to it, because he presented the veritable sentiment of the English champions who surrounded the virgin Gloriana on her throne.

The literature of this magnificent period, in its pride of mien and audacity of purpose, seems to support the prerogative of the English Crown. It is the literature of a nation that has just awakened to a sense of its strength, its isolation, its almost insupportable inward pertinacity. With the sudden development of political independence, there came an apprehension of the necessity of intellectual and spiritual cultivation. Every accomplishment helped to make England great, and while the Italian laboured at high astronomy or was martyred in the cause of ethical speculation without a spark of national enthusiasm, the Elizabethan turned his little copy of verses or practised an air on the theorbo with the belief that England would be so far the richer for his energy. The courtier, the speculator, the soldier, the poet, the adventurer on perilous seas, the patient and responsible public servant, were found united in a single personage in these 'spacious' times. The careers of men like Raleigh and Sidney appeal to us all; but those of Fulke Greville, of John Davies, of Sackville, may teach us still more of this devotion to the day's service, be it what it may; of this noble determination to do well whatever England may call a man to do, be it successively the task of a poet, a diplomatist, a member of Parliament, a lawyer, a financier, or a soldier.

It would be absurd, however, to pretend that Elizabethan literature was sustained at these crystal heights. Spenser and Shakespeare exemplify the chivalrous aspect at its best; we shall discover little chivalry in Marston and Joseph Hall. Yet even in the grossest and most turbid of the Elizabethans we find abundance of that energy and intensity which are the signs of life and youth, and their faults are those out of which a great nation grows into serenity and strength. If the playwrights were coarse and rough, they were at least rough with the crudity of a full-bodied vintage, a wine that suffers in its youth for the stoutness and vigour of its quality. This is quite another thing from the malady of morals which falls on a feeble and decaying people, and which is like the flatness of a thin, indifferent vintage kept too long. In the general fusion of forces which took place in the reign of Elizabeth, a certain confused violence could not fail to be a symptom, in literature as well as in politics and Church matters. Life suddenly began to be many-sided and copious, and elements of turbidity were inevitable in so tumultuous a torrent of thought.

The reader of the following pages will be able to appreciate what were the main imaginative forms taken by this redundancy and ebullience of national sentiment. If he passes suddenly from 1591 to 1616, which we take as the close of our third period, he will be surprised at the change he encounters. At the first date the world was opening before the inexperienced poet; at the second, all experiments have been tried, all heights reached in the summer of English poetry, and the faintest breath of autumnal sadness is felt in the air. We left Raleigh dreaming of Guiana; we find Ben Jonson and Donne blushing to remember their marriage odes on Somerset's hideous wedding. The man of the moment is Bacon; the Spanish Marriage fills the air; Shakespeare is dying, and Beaumont; Fletcher's dramatic art has already become a formula; the school of Spenser has sunk into silence. Everywhere there is a sense of the meridian being passed; in literature, as in politics, the high rapture cannot be sustained, and the independence of a people is no sooner broadly established than it begins to cultivate the weaknesses of other settled nations.

In nine years more, at the death of James I. in 1625, what we permitted ourselves to suspect has become matter of patent observation. Everywhere the symptoms of decay and decline are obvious. Bacon is degraded, and dying; and no one takes his place. Ben Jonson is paralysed, and 'sick and sad,' and his 'sons in Apollo' have not a tithe of his genius. Fletcher is dead, and his work descends to Massinger. Of the glorious romantic poets who had made London the capital of Parnassus, the weary Heywood is still hanging about the stage, Middleton is closing appropriately in Anything for a Quiet Life, and with Ford and Shirley a little momentary revival, a Martin's summer, is preparing England for a long period of darkness. In all this we trace nothing more nor less than the collapse of energy which answers in the history of the imagination of a people to nervous exhaustion in an individual. England was tired of her rapture, her transcendent effort, and she was ready to sink into the repose of a convention.

We may, perhaps, discover a further reason for the malady which begins to afflict her from the reign of James I. onwards to the end of the Commonwealth. One palpable cause of the neglect of letters has been always pointed out in the confusion of political issues, and the concentration of popular attention on vast constitutional problems. But this easy solution of the difficulty is not to be accepted without a protest. In the first place, the decline of literature was proceeding at full speed while the political world was still quiet, and when none but the most far-sighted patriots anticipated a grand upheaval. On the other hand, it is by no means certain that an eager interest in high matters of State is necessarily unfavourable to the production of literature. The ecclesiastical storms which led to the appointment of Elizabeth's High Commission swept through every household in England, but their violence and bluster did not brush a grain of jewel-dust off the wings of The Faerie Queen, or delay by an hour the evolution of the genius of Shakespeare. Nor is it at all certain that the disturbed condition of English politics half a century later had any ill effect on the imagination of Milton. We have to beware of attributing to politics too direct an influence on the waxing and waning of poetical literature.

When we close the brilliant and unparalleled period the examination of which we are now about to commence, what we do find is that England did not escape that curious blight or malady of the mind which fell on every other part of Europe, and marked, in so doing, the close of the Renaissance. This was the pre-occupation with a forced ingenuity of fancy which is known by so many names, and which affected so many literatures in different but contemporary ways, as in Donne with us, Marino with the Italians, Gongora with the Spaniards. In this a morbid horror of the obvious leads the writer into forms of thought and speech which are inelegant and non-natural, and in which the proportion between what is essential and what is trifling is lost. It is not quite exact to say that this change consisted in a decay of taste, because ugly and monstrous things had been written, with an almost innocent nonchalance, by the poets of the great period, while those of the decline were often prettier and more graceful in trifles than their masters had been. But there was a decay of the sense of relative values, and this we see exemplified in the works of a man of such amazing genius and force as Donne, who says the most penetrating and the most silly thing at the same moment, not (as it would appear) distinguishing what is silly from what is penetrating, and having no criterion by which to judge his creations.

So that, without paradox, we may say that what this period of our literary history did, in its excessive and volcanic strain of production, was to wear out and paralyse those faculties by which it held its own acts in the balance. It lost the sense of proportion, the power of parallel measurement, so that it stumbled and fell, as those do who by some affection of the nerves have lost the power of regulating their actions. What was left for further generations, then, to do was to recover the measuring and weighing power by means of a strict and tonic mental discipline. And it is thus, and thus alone, that we can comprehend the readiness with which those whose childhood had been spent in the light of Spenser and Shakespeare were willing to subject themselves to the Aristotelian rules and the versification of Waller and Denham. It was that the blaze and blare of Elizabethan genius had worn out their capacities of enjoyment, and they had to subject themselves to a system of intellectual discipline to recover their mental tone.

EDMUND GOSSE.

Thomas Sackville.—In the reign of Elizabeth the first great name in poetry is that of Thomas Sackville, Lord Buckhurst (1536–1608), from 1604 Earl of Dorset, and from 1599 Lord High-Treasurer of England; he has already come before us in the character of a dramatic writer (page 157). Probably in Edward VI.'s reign or the beginning of Mary's, the printer Whitchurch, or his successor Wayland, planned the Myrroure for Magistrates as a continuation of Lydgate's Falls of Princes (itself based on Boccaccio: see page 79). The first editor, George Baldwin, wrote many of the tales, and had George Ferrers for his chief collaborator. A portion was printed in 1554, and the whole in several parts in 1599–1610. Sackville apparently had no hand in the original design; but when political difficulties arose he proposed a modification, omitting the more recent tragedies. The poet was to descend into the underworld and converse with the most famous persons in English history who had suffered sad reverses of fortune; these were each to tell his own story as a mirror and warning to statesmen and rulers. Sackville wrote the noble Induction or Prologue describing the descent, and powerfully sketching the allegorical personages about the porch of hell; and told the tale of Henry Stafford, Duke of Buckingham—the Buckingham who first supported Richard III. and then suffered for intriguing against him. More than this Sackville did not contribute to the scheme; but what he wrote has alone real poetic value. The Induction (1563) is a truly remarkable poem, a startling apparition when contrasted with the work of such predecessors as Hawes. Hallam said it 'unites the school of Chaucer and Lydgate to the Faery Queen;' its pictures of gloom and sorrow, its allegorical personifications, rival Spenser's own work. The subject was not new; the stanza was that which Chaucer had made familiar; but the melody of the verse, the power and truth of the drawing, the dignity of the presentation, and the poetic charm were new and rare. Tottel's 'Miscellany' (1557) is the only other work of this time that contains anything comparable to Sackville in poetic value; and in rhythm and melody and metric perfection Sackville far surpasses Wyatt and Surrey. Spenser recognised his own debt to his predecessor, and was unquestionably influenced by him.

From the Induction to the 'Myrroure for Magistrates.'

An hideous hole all vaste, withouten shape,
Of endles depth, overwhelme with ragged stone,
With ougly mouth and griesly jawes doth gape,
And to our sight confounds itselfe in one.
Here entred wee and yeeding forth anone
An horrible lothly lake wee might discerne
As blacke as pitch, that cleped is Aerne.

going

A deadly gulfe where nought but rubbish grows,
With fowle blacke swelth in thickned lumps that lies,
Which up in th' ayre such stinking vapors throws
That over there may flie no fowle but dyes,
Choaked with the pestilent savors that arise,

Hither wee come whence forth wee still did pace,
In dreadfull feare amid the dreadfull place.

And first within the porch and jawes of Hell,
Sate deepe Remorse of Conscience, all besprent
With teares; and to her selfe oft would shee tell
Her wretchednes, and, cursing, never stent
To sob and sighe, but ever thus lament
With thoughtfull care; as shee that, all in vaine,
Would were and waste continually in payne:

Her eyes unsteadfast, rolling here and there,
Whirled on each place, as place that vengeance brought,
So was her minde continually in feare,
Tossed and tormented with the tedious thought
Of those detested crymes which shee had wrought;
With dreadful cheare, and lookes throwne to the skie,
Wishing for death, and yet shee could not die.

Next sawe wee Dread, all trembling how hee shooke,
With foote uncertaine, profered here and there;
Benumm'd of speach; and with a ghastly looke
Searched every place, all pale and dead for feare,
His cap borne up with staring of his heare;
Stoynd and amazed at his own shade for dreede,
And fearing greater daungers than was neede.

And next within the entry of this lake,
Sate fell Revenge, gnashing her teeth for ire;
Devising means how shee may vengeance take;
Never in rest, till she have her desire;
But frets within so far forth with the fire
Of wreaking flames, that now determines she
To dy by death, or venged by death to bee.

When fell Revenge, with bloody foule pretence,
Had showed herself, as next in order set,
With trembling limbs we softly parted thence,
Till in our eyes another sight wee met;
When fro my heart a sigh forthwith I fet,
Rewing, alas, upon the woefull plight
Of Misery, that next appeared in sight.

fetched

His face was leane, and somedeale pyned away,
And eke his hands consumed to the bone;
But what his body was, I cannot say,
For on his carkas rayment had he none,
Save clouts and patches pieced one by one;
With staffe in hand, and scrip on shoulder cast,
His chief defence agaynst the winters blast.

His foode, for most, was wild fruites of the tree,
Unlesse sometime some crums fell to his share,
Which in his wallet long, God wot, kept hee,
As on the which full daintely would fare;
His drink the running stream, his cup the bare
Of his palm closed; his bed, the hard cold ground;
To this poore life was Misery ybound.

Whose wretched state when wee had well beheld,
With tender ruth on him and on his feres,
In thoughtfull cares forth then our pace wee held;
And by and by another shape apperes
Of greedy Care, still brushing up the breres;
His knuckles knob'd, his flesh deepe dented in,
With tawed hands and hard ytanned skin:

comrades

briers

The morrowe gray no sooner hath begun
To spreade his light even peping in our eyes,
When hee is up, and to his worke yrun ;
But let the nights blacke misty mantles rise
And with foule darke never so much disguise
The fayre bright day, yet ceaseth hee no while,
But hath his candels to prolong his toyle.

By him lay heavy Sleepe, the cosin of Death,
Flat on the ground, and still as any stone,
A very corps, save yielding forth a breath ;
Small keepe took hee whom Fortune frowned on,
Or whom shee lifted up into the throne
Of high renoune, but, as a living death,
So dead alive, of life he drew the breath :

The bodys rest, the quiet of the heart,
The travailles ease, the still nights feer was he, comrade
And of our life in earth the better part ;
Reaver of sight, and yet in whom wee see
Things oft that tyde and oft that never bee ;
Without respect esteming equally
King Cræsus pompe and Irus poverty.¹

And next in order sad, Old Age wee found :
His beard all hoare, his eyes hollow and blind ;
With drouping chere still poring on the ground,
As on the place where nature him assigned
To rest, when that the Sisters had untwyned
His vitall thred, and ended with their knyfe
The fleting course of fast declyning lyfe :

There heard wee him with broke and hollow plaint
Rew with him selfe his end approaching fast,
And all for nought his wretched mind torment
With sweete remembraunce of his pleasures past,
And fresh delytes of lusty youth forewast ; wasted
Recounting which, how would hee sob and shriek,
And to be yong again of Jove beseeke !

But an the cruell fates so fixed bee
That tyme forepast cannot retourne agayne,
This one request of Jove yet prayed hee—
That, in such withred plight, and wretched paine,
As eld, accompanied with his lothsome trayne,
Had brought on him, all were it woe and grieve,
He might a while yet linger forth his life,

And not so soone descend into the pit ;
Where Death, when hee the mortall corps hath slayne,
With reckless hand in grave doth cover it :
Thereafter never to enjoy agayne
The gladsome light, but, in the ground ylayne,
In depth of darknesse waste and weare to nought,
As hee had nere into the world been brought : never

But who had seene him sobbing how hee stood
Unto himselfe, and how hee would bemone
His youth forepast, as though it wrought him good
To talke of youth, all were his youth foregone,
He would have mused, and mervayled much whereon
This wretched Age should like desire so fayne
And knowes full well lyfe doth but length his payne.

Crookebackt he was, tooth-shaken, and blere-eyed ;
Went on three feete, and sometye crept on foure ;
With olde lame bones, that rattled by his syde ;
His scalp all pilled, and hee with eld forlore,
His withred fist still knocking at Deaths dore ;
Fumbling and driveling as hee drawes his breath ;
For brieft, the shape and messenger of Death.

And fast by him pale Malady was placed ;
Sore sicke in bed, her colour all foregone ;
Bereft of stomacke, savour, and of taste,
Ne could shee brooke no meate but broths alone ;
Her breath corrupt ; her kepers every one
Abhorring her ; her sickness past recure,
Detesting phisicke and all phisickes cure.

But, oh, the dolefull sight that then wee see !
Wee turned our looke, and on the other side
A griesly shape of Famine mought wee see :
With greedily lookes, and gaping mouth, that cryed
And roared for meate, as shee should there have dyed ;
Her body thin and bare as any bone,
Whereto was left nought but the case alone.

And that, alas ! was gnawne on every where,
All full of holes ; that I ne mought refrayne
From tears, to see how shee her arms could teare
And with her teeth gnash on the bones in vayne,
When, all for nought, shee fayne would so sustayne
Her starven corps, that rather seemed a shade
Than any substaunce of a creature made :

Great was her force, whome stone-wall could not staye ;
Her tearing nayles snatching at all shee sawe ;
With gaping jawes, that by no meanes ymay
Be satisfied from hunger of her mawe,
But eates herselfe as shee that hath no lawe ;
Gnawing, alas, her carkas all in vayne,
Where you may count each sinew, bone, and vayne.

On her while we thus firmly fixt our eyes,
That bled for ruth of such a drery sight,
Lo, suddenly she shriekt in so huge wise
As made Hell gates to shiver with the might ;
Wherewith a dart we sawe how it did light
Right on her brest, and therewithall pale Death
Enthrilling it, to reve her of her breath :

And by and by a dumb dead corps we sawe,
Heavy and colde the shape of Death aright,
That daunts all earthly creatures to his lawe,
Against whose force in vaine it is to fight ;
Ne peeres, ne princes, nor no mortall wyght,
No Townes, ne Realmes, Cityes, ne strongest Tower,
But all perforce must yield unto his power :

His dart anon out of the corps hee tooke,
And in his hand (a dreadfull sight to see)
With great triumph eftsoones the same hee shooke,
That most of all my feares affrayed mee ;
His body dight with nought but bones, pardé ;
The naked shape of man there saw I plaine,
All save the flesh, the sinew, and the veine.

Lastly, stood Warre, in glittering armes yclad,
With visage grym, stern lookes, and blackly hewed :
In his right hand a naked sworde he had,
That to the hilts was all with bloud embrued ;
And in his left (that kings and kingdoms rewed) rued

¹ Irus was the beggar of Ithaca, employed as messenger by Penelope's suitors.

Famine and fyer he held, and therewithall,
He razed townes, and threw downe towres and all.

Cities he sackt, and realmes (that whilome flowerd
In honour, glory, and rule, above the rest)
He overwhelme, and all their fame devoured,
Consumed, destroyed, wasted, and never ceast,
Till he their wealth, their name, and all oppresst :
His face forehewed with wounds ; and by his side
There hung his targe, with gashes deepe and wide.

Then first came Henry Duke of Buckingham,
His cloak of black all pilld, and quite forworne,
Wringing his hands, and Fortune oft doth blame,
Which of a duke had made him now her skorne ;
With gastly looks, as one in maner lorne,
Oft spred his armes, stretcht hands he joynes as fast,
With ruful cheer, and vapored eyes upcast.

His cloake he rent, his manly brest hee beat ;
His hayre all torne about the place it lay :
My heart so molt to see his grieve so great,
As felingly methought it dropt away ;
His eyes they whirld about withouten stay :
With stormy sighes the place did so complayne,
As if his heart at ech had burst in twayne.

Thrise he began to tell his dolefull tale,
And thrise the sighes did swallow up his voyce ?
At ech of which he shrieked so withall,
As though the heavens rived with the noyse ;
Till at the last recovering his voyce,
Supping the teares that all his breast beraynde,
On cruel Fortune weeping thus he playnde.

The Induction runs to eighty stanzas, the Complaint to over a hundred. Our text is substantially that of 1587. The first of some hundred characters in the completed work is King Albanact of Scotland in 1085 B.C. ; the last Wolsey and (1610) Queen Elizabeth. King Locrinus of Britain, son of Brutus, tells his story, King Bladud and Queen Cordila also ; and several Roman emperors figure among the British notables. Sackville-West edited the collected works of Sackville in 1859 ; M. Hearsey the Induction and Buckingham (with Life, 1936).

George Gascoigne (c. 1525-77), son of Sir John Gascoigne of Cardington in Bedfordshire, and descendant of the famous Chief-Justice under Henry IV., was an early dramatist (see above at page 238), one of our first satirists, an indefatigable translator, and a pioneer in many departments of literature. He studied at Cambridge, entered Gray's Inn, wrote poems, and sat in Parliament for Bedford (1557-59), but was disinherited for his prodigality. He married Nicholas Breton's mother (to improve his finances), was still persecuted by creditors, set out for Holland, and served gallantly under the Prince of Orange (1573-75). Surprised by a Spanish force and taken prisoner, he was detained four months ; and, on his return to England, settled at Walthamstow, where he collected and published his poems. He was praised by his own and the succeeding generation of writers, and experienced a share of royal favour ;

for he accompanied the queen to Kenilworth, and supplied part of the poetic-scenic entertainments there and at Woodstock. He translated in prose and verse, from Greek, Latin, and Italian. The Complaynt of Phylomene was begun in 1563. The Supposes, translated from I Suppositi of Ariosto, is the first prose comedy in English ; Jocasta (1566, with Francis Kinwelmersh), practically a translation from Dolce's Giocasta (based indirectly on the Phænisæ of Euripides), is the second tragedy in English blank verse ; The Glasse of Government is an original comedy ; The Steele Glas is the earliest blank-verse satire ; and in the Notes of Instruction on Making of Verse we have the first considerable English essay on the subject. It is pathetic that already Gascoigne thought some of the standard poetic epithets were worn out : 'If I should undertake to wryte in prayse of a gentlewoman,' he says, 'I would neither praise hir christal eye nor hir cherrie lippe, etc. For these things are trita et obvia.' How often have they done duty since ! To such a zealous experimenter English literature obviously owes a deep debt, though much of his work is hopelessly tedious. It may be said for him that he sometimes attains freedom both in rhyme and in blank verse, and that his lyrics show even a certain grace and lightness of touch. In the Steele Glas, Gascoigne explains that he finds an old-fashioned mirror of steel greatly more truthful than those of glass (first made at Venice in 1300, but not in England until 1673). Common glass, beryl glass, and crystal he believes to be false :

That age is dead, and vanisht long ago,
Which thought that steele both trusty was and true,
And needed not a foyle of contraries,
But shewde al things even as they were indeede.
In steade whereof, our curious yeares can finde
The christal glass, which glimseth brave and bright
And shewes the thing much better than it is,
Beguiled with foyles of sundry subtil sights,
So that they seeme and covet not to be.

All the more reason that, having had such a trusty steel mirror bequeathed to him, the satirist should put it to some use ! Thus he can show his contemporaries their faults, as in the two following extracts (the second from the Epilogus)—drunken soldiers, false judges, usurious merchants being also not forgotten :

On the Country Gentleman.

The Gentleman which might in countrie keepe
A plenteous boorde and feed the fatherlesse
With pig and goose, with mutton, beefe, and veale
(Yea, now and then a capon and a chicke),
Will breake up house and dwel in market-townes
A loitring life, and like an Epicure.
But who meanwhile defends the common welth ?
Who rules the flocke when sheperds so are fled ?
Who stayes the staff which shuld uphold the state ?
Forsoth, good Sir, the Lawyer leapeth in—
Nay, rather leapes both over hedge and ditch,
And rules the rost : but few men rule by right.

O Knights, O Squires, O Gentle blouds yborne,
 You were not borne onely for your selves :
 Your countrie claymes some part of al your paines ;
 There should you live, and therein should you toyle,
 To hold up right and banish cruel wrong,
 To help the pore, to bridle backe the riche,
 To punish vice and vertue to advaunce,
 To see God servde, and Belzebub suppress.
 You should not trust lieftenaunts in your rome,
 And let them sway the scepter of your charge,
 Whiles you meanwhile know scarcely what is don,
 Nor yet can yeld accompt if you were callde.

On the Court Ladies.

Beholde, my lorde, what monsters muster here,
 With Angels face and harmfule helish harts,
 With smyling lookes, and deep deceitful thoughts,
 With tender skinnies and stony cruel mindes,
 With stealing steppes, yet forward feete to fraude.
 Behold, behold, they never stande content,
 With God, with kinde, with any helpe of arte,
 But curle their locks with bodkins and with braids,
 But dye their heare with sundry subtil sleights,
 But paint and slicke till fayrest face be foule,
 But bumbast, bolster, frisle, and perfume :
 They marre with muske the balme which nature made,
 And dig for death in delicatist dishes.
 The yonger sorte come pypping on apace,
 In whistles made of fine enticing wood,
 Till they have caught the birds for whom they birded.
 The elder sorte go stately stalking on,
 And on their backs they beare both land and fee,
 Castles and towres, revenewes and receipts,
 Lordships and manours, fines, yea, fermes and al.
 What should these be? Speak you, my lovely lord.
 They be not men, for why, they have no beards ;
 They be no boyes which weare such side long gowns ;
 They be no Gods, for al their gallant glosse ;
 They be no divels, I trow, that seme so saintish.
 What be they? Women masking in men's weedes—
 With dutchkin dublets, and with jerkins jaggde,
 With Spanish spangs and ruffes fet out of France,
 With high copt hats and feathers flaunt-a-flaunt—
 They, to be sure, seem even too to men, indeed !

The Arraignment of a Lover.

At Beautyes barre as I dyd stande,
 When False Suspect accused mee,
 'George,' quod the judge, 'holde up thy hande,
 Thou art arraigned of flatterye ;
 Tell, therefore, howe wylt thou bee tryed,
 Whose judgment here wylt thou abyde?'
 'My Lord,' quod I, 'this lady here,
 Whom I esteeme above the rest,
 Doth knowe my guilte, if any were ;
 Wherefore hir doome shall please me best. verdict
 Let hir bee judge and jurour bothe,
 To trye mee guiltlesse by myne oathe.'

Quoth Beautie : 'No, it fitteth not
 A prince himselfe to judge the cause ;
 Wyll is our justice, well you wot,
 Appointed to discusse our Lawes ;
 If you will guiltlesse seeme to goe,
 God and your countrie quitte you so.'

Then Crafte the cryer called a quest,
 Of whom was Falshoode foremost feere ;
 A pack of pickethankes were the rest,
 Which came false wittenesse for to beare ;
 The jury suche, the Judge unjust,
 Sentence was said : 'I should be trust.' trussed

Jelous the jayler bound mee fast,
 To hear the verdict of the byll ;
 'George,' quod the judge, 'nowe thou are cast,
 Thou must goe hence to Heavie Hill,
 And there be hanged all by the head ;
 God rest thy soule when thou art dead !'

Downe fell I then upon my knee,
 All flatte before Dame Beauties face,
 And cried : 'Good Ladye, pardon mee !
 Which here appeale unto your grace ;
 You knowe if I have beene untrue,
 It was in too much praysing you.

'And though this judge doe make suche haste,
 To shed with shame my guiltlesse blood,
 Yet let your pittie first be plac't
 To save the man that meant you good ;
 So shall you shewe yourself a Queene,
 And I maye bee your servaunt scene.'

Quod Beauty : 'Well ; bicause I guesse
 What thou dost meane hencefoerth to flee ;
 Although thy faultes deserve no lesse
 Than Justice here hath judged thee ;
 Wylt thou be bounde to stynt all strife,
 And be true prisoner all thy lyfe?'

'Yea, Madame,' quod I, 'that I shall ;
 Loe fayth and trueth my suerties !'
 'Why, then,' quod she, 'come when I call,
 I aske no better warrantise.'
 Thus am I Beauties bounden thrall,
 At hir commaund when shee doth call.

There are editions by W. C. Hazlitt (1868-69) and Cunliffe (1907-10), reprints by Arber of the Instruction, the Phylomene, and the Steele Glas (1868), and a Life by Schelling (Boston, 1893).

Thomas Tusser (c. 1524-80) was, in Fuller's words, 'successively a musician, schoolmaster, serving-man, husbandman, grazier, poet, more skilful in all than thriving in any vocation.' Sprung of a good stock near Witham, in Essex, he was trained especially in singing and music, became a chorister at St Paul's and elsewhere, studied at Eton and Cambridge, and lived at court for ten years as retainer and musician to Lord Paget. He then tried farming both in Suffolk and in Norfolk, but without success ; about 1559 was a singer in Norwich Cathedral ; farmed taxes in Essex ; became a servant at Trinity Hall, Cambridge ; but died in London in 1580.

His highly didactic poem, a Hundreth Good Pointes of Husbandrie, first published in 1557, is a series of practical directions for farming, expressed in always rude but not always dull and sometimes quite pointed dactylic verse, and many proverbs are traced back to him. There was also a Hundreth Poyntes of Good Husserie ; and the two were finally expanded (1573) into Five Hundreth Pointes of Good Husbandry united to as many of Good Huswifery, of which there have been a score of reprints and editions, including one in Scott's edition of the Somers Tracts, and one for the English Dialect Society by Payne and Herrtage (1878; reprod. 1931). He has been called the British Varro; Scott praises his minute and comprehensive observation, his quaint and pointed style.

The following verses, not consecutive, will show his shrewdness and common-sense, as well as his uncouth notion of 'poetry':

Of mastiues and mungrels, that many we see,
a number of thousands, too many there be:
Watch therefore in Lent, to thy sheepe go and looke,
for dogs will have vittels by hooke and by crooke.

Good Ploughman look weekly of custom and right for rostmeat on Sundaies and Thursday at night:
This dooing and keeping, such custom and guise,
they call thee good huswife, they loue thee likewise.

As cat a good mouser is needful in house because of hir commons she killeth the mouse:
So rauening currs, as a meany do keep,
makes maister want meat and his dog to kill sheepe.

In meadow or pasture (to grow the more fine)
let campers be camping in any of thine:
Which if ye do suffer, when low is the spring,
you gaine to your self a commodious thing.

The camping recommended for improving pasture is football-playing; and 'camping fields' are still known where the word camping or kemping is no longer used for the game. Tusser sometimes varies his usual verse with a rhythm of shorter lines, which partly anticipates Shenstone and Cowper, as in these lines in praise of having fields enclosed or fenced:

The countrie inclosed I praise,
the tother delighteth not me,
For nothing the wealth it doth raise to such as inferiour be.
Now both of these partly I know;
here somewhat I mind for to show.

There swineherd that keepeth the hog,
there neatherd with cur and his horne,
There shepheard with whistle and dog be sence to the meadow and corne;
There horse being tied to a balk is ready with theefe for to walke.

Over and above these disadvantages, he contends that poor fields enclosed will give better returns than rich soil unenclosed:

More plenty of mutton and beefe, corne, butter, and cheese of the best,
More wealth any where (to be breefe),
more people, more handsome and prest, ^{neat}
Where find ye (go search any cost) than there where enclosure is most?

The following is part of Tusser's meteorology:

In winter—

North winds send haile, South winds bring raine,
East winds we bewaile, West winds blow amaine;
North-east is too cold, South-east not too warme,
North-west is too bold, South-west doth no harme.

In spring—

The North is noier to grass of all suites,
The East a destroyer to hearbs and al fruites.

In summer—

The South with his showers refresheth the corne,
The West to al flowers may not be forborne.

In autumn—

The West as a father all goodness doth bring,
The East, a forbearer, no maner of thing;
The South, as vnkind, draweth sicknes too neere,
The North as a friend maketh all again cleere.

Though winds do rage, as winds were wood, ^{mad}
And cause spring-tides to raise great flood;
And lofty ships leaue anker in mud,
Bereauing many of life and of bloud;
Yet, true it is, as cow chews cud,
And trees, at spring, doth yeeld forth bud,
Except wind stands as neuer it stood,
It is an ill wind turnes none to good.

In his Farmers' Year (1899) Sir Rider Haggard followed, but in prose, the example of Tusser, who more than three hundred years earlier tilled the land in the same county of Norfolk; he repeatedly quotes Tusser—less in appreciation of his poetry than in approval of his sentiments and opinions. Tusser knew perfectly what to do with dogs that take to lamb-killing, and how to employ branches of trees to eke out hay and straw as fodder: 'Good lamb is worth gold' then as now; but, alas! by reason of the bad times for farmers, Sir Rider Haggard seems to have been less confident than his predecessor that

Good farme and well stored, good housing and drie,
Good corne and good dairie, good market and nie;
Good shepherd, good tilman, good Jack and good Gill,
Make husband and huswife their coffers to fil;

though even these aids are necessary to ward off total ruin.

Queen Elizabeth deserves a niche in the literary history of the period named from her reign. Born in 1533, she was queen from 1558 to 1603. She was one of the learned ladies of her time, like Lady Jane Grey, Mildred Cooke (afterwards the Countess of Burghley), and Sir Thomas More's daughter Margaret; had many accomplishments; and was well and widely read—a better classic, it would appear, than Lady Jane, and more proficient in modern tongues. She translated Boethius as well as Sallust. When she was Ascham's pupil she could already speak Latin easily, Greek moderately well, and French and Italian as perfectly as English. And her mastery of her mother-tongue is borne witness to by every recorded saying or letter of hers; her style reflects her powerful, subtle mind—terrible and insinuating by turns, cold and stately or playful and genial, unmistakably direct and trenchant or impenetrably oracular, as she willed it to be, but always memorable. Her poems, though, like her beauty, praised in her own time as unsurpassable, are less triumphant, but show at least, as Bishop Creighton puts it, that 'she was infected with the poetical fury of the times.' When in Mary's reign she was practically imprisoned in the gatehouse of Woodstock, she wrote with charcoal on a shutter this not unpoetical and quite characteristic expression of her ill-humour :

Oh Fortune how thy restless wavering state
Hath wrought with care my troubled wit,
Witness the present prison whither fate
Could bear me and the joys I quit.
Thou caus'dst the guilty to be loosed
From bonds wherein an innocent enclosed,
Causing the guiltless to be strait reserved
And freeing those that death had well deserved.
But by her envy can be nothing wrought.
So God send to my foes all they have wrought.
Quoth Elizabeth, Prisoner.

Bishop Creighton accepted as probably genuine the famous impromptu made when her sister the queen caused her to be plied with questions about her belief in transubstantiation :

Christ was the Word that spake it,
He took the bread and brake it,
And what his words did make it
That I believe and take it.

Her best-known poem or exercise in verse is the so-called sonnet, selected by Puttenham in Elizabeth's lifetime as a specimen of the 'gorgious,' and by him described as 'a ditty of her Maiesties owne making, passing sweete and harmonically.' Puttenham expressly says it refers to Elizabeth's alarm at the intrigues of her prisoner Mary Queen of Scots ('the daughter of Debate'); Bishop Creighton thought it must have been written soon after Norfolk's execution. Here we follow Puttenham's version :

The doubt of future foes exiles my present joy,
And wit me warnes to shun such snares as threaten mine annoy.
For falshood now doth flow, and subject faith doth ebb,
Which would not be, if reason rul'd or wisdom wev'd the webbe.
But cloudes of tois untried do cloake aspiring mindes,
Which turne to raigne of late repent, by course of changed windes.
The toppe of hope supposed, the roote of ruth will be,
And frutelesse all their grafted guiles, as shortly ye shall see.
Then dazeld eyes with pride, which great ambition blinds,
Shalbe unseeld by worthy wights, whose foresight falshood finds,
The daughter of debate, that eke discord doth sowe,
Shal reap no gaine where former rule hath taught stil peace to growe.
No forreine bannisht wight shall ancre in this port,
Our realme it brookes no strangers force, let them elsewhere resort.

Our rusty sworde with rest shall first his edge employ
To polle their toppes that seeke such change and gape for joy.

In some versions doubt in the first line is dread; subject faith is subjects; raigne of late repent is 'the rain of a too late repentance.'

At page 228 will be found Sir James Melville's 'interview' with the queen, and his notes of her conversation. The following, written in August 1588 after the defeat of the Spanish Armada, is from the Camden Society's volume (1849) of her letters to James VI. :

Now may appeare, my deare brother, how malice conioined with might, strived [sic] to make a shameful end to a vilanous beginning, for, by Gods singular fauor, having ther flete wel beaten in our narrow seas, and pressing with all violence to atcheue some watering-place, to continue ther pretended invation, the winds have carried them to your costes, wher I dout not the shal receaue smal succor and les welcome, vnles thos lords [the Catholic earls] that so traitors like wold belie ther own prince, and promis another king reliefe in your name, be suffred to live at libertye, to dishonor you, peril you, and aduance some other (wiche God forbid you suffer them live to do). Therfor, I send you this gentilman [Sir Robert Sidney, afterwards Earl of Leicester], a rare younge man and a wise, to declare unto yov my ful opinion in this greate cause, as one that neuer wyl abuse you to serve my owne turne; nor wyl you do aught that myselfe wold not perfourme, if I wer in your place. You may assure yourselfe that, for my part, I dout no whit but that all this tirannical, prowde, and brainsick attempt wil be the beginning, thogh not the end, of the ruine of that king that most unkingly, euen in mids of treating peace, begins this wrongfull war. He hath procured my greatest glory that ment my sorest wrack, and hath so dimmed the light of his svnshine, that who hathe a wyl to obtaine shame let them kipe his forses companye. But for al this, for yourselfe sake, let not the frends of Spain be suffred to yeld them forse; for thogh I feare not in the end the sequele, yet if by leaving them unhelped you may increase the English harts unto you, you shal not do the worst dede for your behalfe; for if aught should be done, your excuse wyl play the boiteux, if you make not sure worke with the likely men to do hit. Looke wel unto hit, I besiche you.

The necessity of this mattir makes my skribling the more spidy, hoping that you wyl mesure my good affection with the right balance of my actions, wiche to you shalbe euer such as I haue professed, not douting of the reciproque of your behalfe, according as my last messenger unto you hathe at large signefied, for the wiche I render you a milion of grateful thankes together, for the last general prohibition to your subjects not to foster nor ayde our general foe, of wiche I dout not the obseruation, if the ringeleaders be safe in your hands; as knoweth God, who euer haue you in his blessed kiping, with many happy yerres of raigne. Your most assured louing sistar and cousin,
ELIZABETH R.

To my verey good brother the king of Scotts.

She wrote French with almost equal freedom and vigour. But in spite of her mental gifts and acquirements, it must be added that Elizabeth does not seem to have really cared for literature or interested herself in learned men. She paid no special heed to Shakespeare's plays when they were performed before her, and took no interest in Spenser or his work. If the Elizabethan writers made her name famous, conferred glory on her reign, and celebrated herself in extravagant terms, it was not because Elizabethan literature owed anything to her. In temper she was rather pre-Elizabethan, or at most Early Elizabethan, than truly Elizabethan. Her last literary criticism was uttered shortly before her death, but throws a light backward on her whole life—one remembers what poetry and Shakespeare were to Tennyson on his death-bed. When Elizabeth was in her last illness, Sir John Harington, her godson, was gratified to note that she 'inquired of some matters which I have written,' he says, and tried to 'feed her humour' by reading to her some of his verses; 'whereat she smiled once and was pleased to say [to the discomfited poet], "When thou dost feel creeping time at thy gate, these fooleries will please thee less."'

John Foxe, the martyrologist, was born at Boston in 1516. He studied at Oxford, where he applied himself with ardour to the study of divinity, and was ultimately drawn to the doctrines of the Reformers; the consequence being that his position in Magdalen became unbearable, and he resigned his fellowship in 1545. He was not expelled, as used to be said. He was tutor in the Lucy house at Charlecote, and then in the family of the Duchess of Richmond at Reigate, in Surrey, where he continued till the persecutions of Mary's reign made him flee for safety to the Continent. Passing through Antwerp, Frankfort, and Strasburg to Basel, he there supported himself by correcting the press for the printer Oporinus. At the accession of Queen Elizabeth he returned to England, and was kindly received and provided for by the Duke of Norfolk, who had been his pupil at Reigate. Through other powerful friends, he might now have obtained considerable preferment; but, entertaining conscientious scruples as to surplices and some of the ceremonies of the Church, he declined the offers made to him, except that of a prebend at Salisbury, which he accepted with reluctance. He pled in vain for mercy for the persecuted Anabaptists. He died in 1587.

Foxe published numerous controversial treatises and sermons, besides an apocalyptic Latin mystery-play, called Christus Triumphans (Basel, 1556). But the work that has immortalised his name is his History of the Acts and Monuments of the Christian Martyrs and Matters Ecclesiastical passed in the Church of Christ from the Primitive Beginning to these our Days, as well in other Countries as namely in England and Scotland, popularly known as Foxe's Book of Martyrs, the first part of which was published in Latin at Strasburg in 1554. The first English edition (folio) appeared in 1563. Sanctioned by the bishops, it was ordered by the Anglican Convocation of 1571 to be placed in the hall of every episcopal palace in England; and it went through four editions in Foxe's lifetime, and many more since his death. The book is not a biographical record of those whom Foxe regarded as God's martyred saints; it is an enthusiastic apology of the Reformation, a fierce impeachment of the errors of the Roman Church, a compendium of controversial theology. Next to the Bible it moulded the temper of English Protestants. Foxe's statements cannot be accepted as trustworthy evidence, if unsupported from other sources. His story is doubtless substantially true, although his credulity and obvious prejudice hardly suggest critical capacity in the selection of his authorities. But in those days most strong natures were prejudiced, and bitterly prejudiced one way or other. People who can admire J. A. Froude's brilliant gifts as a historian, and make allowance for his keen prejudices, should not be too severe on Foxe's partisanship. And Foxe was no doubt as thoroughly sincere in his abhorrence of popery and papists as in his joy in the privileges of the newer light. He possessed the gift of graphic narrative, knew thoroughly how to use interesting episodes, and relieved the pathos and the horrors of his story by homely touches and even amusing episodes. And his work will survive as a noble monument of English.

From the 'Book of Martyrs.'

[Under the year 1555 Foxe tells at length 'a Notable History of William Hunter, a Young Man, an apprentice of 19 years, pursued to Death by Justice Brown, for the Gospel's Sake, worthy of all Young Men and Parents to be read.' William Hunter, apprentice to a silk-weaver in London, was discharged from his master's employment for refusing to attend mass. Having returned to the house of his father at Brentwood, he attracted the attention of the spiritual authorities by reading the Scriptures on the desk in Brentwood chapel. The summer, Father Atwell, challenged him, and reported the matter to the Vicar; he questioned him closely on transubstantiation, and reported to the magistrate, Master Brown, who caused the constable to arrest Hunter, and brought the heretic before Bonner, the Bishop of London. Hunter was repeatedly examined by the Bishop, put in the stocks, kept in irons in prison for nine months, and, having been five times examined, was at length condemned in the consistory at St Paul's, when Foxe was present. Hunter was sent for a time to Newgate, and then to Brentwood to prepare for death. The conversations with all his various visitors, including Master Higbed, a gentleman of Essex, who was one of the next victims, are detailed with suspicious precision by Foxe, who gives the last part of the story thus:]

In the meantime, Williams father and mother came to him, and desired heartily of God that he might continue to the end in that good waie which hee had begun; and his mother sayde to him that she was glad that ever she was so happie to beare such a childe, which could find in his heart to lose his life for Christs names sake. Then William sayde to his mother: 'For my little paine which I shall suffer, which is but a short braide, Christ hath promised me, mother,' sayd he, 'a crowne of joy: may you not bee glad of that, mother?' With that, his mother kneeled downe on her knees, saying: 'I pray God strengthen thee, my sonne, to the end: yea, I thinke thee as well bestowed as any childe that ever I bare.'

At the which words, Maister Higbed tooke her in his arms, saying: 'I reioice' (and so said the others) 'to see you in this mind, and you have a good cause to reioice.' And his father and mother both said that they were never of other minde, but praied for him, that as he had begun to confesse Christ before men, he likewise might so continue to the end. Williams father said: 'I was afraid of nothing, but that my son should have bin killed in the prison for hunger and cold, the bishop was so hard to him.' But William confessed after a month that his father was charged with his boorde [board], that he lacked nothing, but had meate and cloathing enough, yea, even out of the court, both mony, meate, clothes, woode, and coales, and all things necessary.

Thus they continued in their inne, being the Swan in Brentwood, in a parlor, whither resorted many people of the country to see those good men which were there; and many of Williams acquaintance came to him, and reasoned with him, and he with them, exhorting them to come away from the abomination of popish superstition and idolatry.

Thus passing away Saturday, Sunday, and Munday, on Munday, at night, it hapned that William had a dreame about two of the clock in the morning, which was this: how that he was at the place where the stake was pight where he should be burned, which (as hee thought in his dreame) was at the towns end where the butts stood, which was so indeed; and also hee dreamed that he met with his father as he went to the stake, and also that there was a priest at the stake, which went about to have him recant. To whom he said (as he thought in his dreame), how that he bade him: Away, false prophet, and how that he exhorted the people to beware of him and such as he was; which things came to passe indeed. It hapned that William made a noise to himselfe in his dreame, which caused M. Higbed and the others to wake him out of his sleepe, to know what he lacked. When he awaked, he told them his dreame in order as is said.

Now when it was day, the sheriffe, M. Brocket, called on to set forward to the burning of William Hunter. Then came the sheriffes son to William Hunter, and embraced him in his right arme, saying: 'William, be not afraid of these men which are here present with bowes, bills, and weapons, ready prepared to bring you to the place where you shall be burned.' To whom William answered: 'I thank God I am not afraid; for I have cast my coumpt what it will cost me, already.' Then the sheriffes son could speake no more to him for weeping. Then William Hunter plucked up his gown, and stepped over the parlour grounsell, and went forward cheerefully, the sheriffes servant taking him by one arm, and his brother by another; and thus going in the way, he met with his father, according to his dreame, and he spake to his son, weeping, and saying: 'God be with thee, son William;' and William said: 'God be with you, father, and be of good comfort, for I hope we shall meet againe, when we shall be mery.' His father said: 'I hope so, William,' and so departed. So William went to the place where the stake stood, even according to his dreame, whereas all things were verie unreadie. Then William tooke a wet broom fagot, and kneeled down thereon, and read the 51st Psalme, till he came to these words: 'The sacrifice of God is a contrite spirit; a contrite and a broken heart, O God, thou wilt not despise.'

Then said Master Tirell of the Beaches, called William Tirel: 'Thou liest,' said he; 'thou readest false, for the words are, "an humble spirit."' But William said: 'The translation sayth "a contrite heart."'

'Yea,' quoth M. Tyrell, 'the translation is false; ye translate books as ye list your selves, like heretickes.' 'Well,' quoth William, 'there is no great difference in those words.' Then said the sheriffe: 'Here is a letter from the queen: if thou wilt recant, thou shalt live; if not, thou shalt be burned.' 'No,' quoth William, 'I will not recant, God willing.' Then William rose, and went to the stake, and stood upright to it. Then came one Richard Ponde a bailiff, and made fast the chain about William. Then said Master Brown: 'Here is not woode enough to burn a legge of him.' Then said William: 'Good people, pray for me; and make speed, and dispatch quickly; and pray for mee while yee see me alive, good people, and I will pray for you likewise.' 'How!' quoth Master Brown, 'pray for thee? I will pray no more for thee than I will pray for a dogge.' To whom William answered: 'Master Brown, now you have that which you sought for, and I pray God it be not laide to your charge in the last daie: howbeit, I forgive you.' Then said Master Brown: 'I aske no forgiveness of thee.' 'Well,' said William, 'if God forgive you not, I shall require my bloud at your hands.' Then said William: 'Sonne of God, shine upon me!' and immediately the sunne in the element shone out of a dark cloude so full in his face that hee was constrained to looke another way; wherat the people mused, because it was so darke a little time afore. Then William took up a fagot of broom, and embraced it in his armes. Then this priest which William dreamed of came to his brother Robert with a popish booke to carrie to William, that hee might recant; which booke his brother would not meddle withall. Then William, seeing the priest, and perceiving how hee would have showed him the booke, saide: 'Away, thou false prophet! Beware of them, good people, and come away from their abominations, lest that you be partakers of their plagues.' Then quoth the priest: 'Look how thou burnest here; so shalt thou burne in hell.' William answered: 'Thou liest, thou false prophet! Away, thou false prophet! away!'

Then there was a gentleman which said: 'I pray God have mercie upon his soul.' The people said: 'Amen, Amen.' Immediately fire was made. Then William cast his psalter right into his brother's hand, who said: 'William, thinke on the holy passion of Christ, and be not afraide of death.' And William answered: 'I am not afraid.' Then lift he up his hands to heaven, and said: 'Lord, Lord, Lord, receive my spirit!' And casting downe his head againe into the smothering smoke, he yielded up his life for the truth, sealing it with his bloud to the praise of God.

Better known is Foxe's account of 'The Behaviour of Dr Ridley and Master Latimer':

Upon the north-side of the towne, in the ditch over against Baile [Balliol] colledge, the place of execution was appointed; and for feare of any tumult that might arise, to let the burning of them, the lord Williams was commanded by the queenes letters, and the housholders of the city, to be there assistant, sufficientlie appointed. And when every thing was in a readiness, the prisoners were brought forth by the maior and the bayliffes. Master Ridley had a faire blacke gowne furred, and faced with foines, such as he was wont to weare beeing bishop, and a tippet of velvet furred likewise about his neck, a velvet night-cap upon his head, and a corner cap upon the same, going in a paire of slippers to the stake, and going between the maior and an alderman, etc. After him came master Latimer in a poor Bristow freeze frock all worne, with his buttoned cap, and a kerchiefe on his head all readie to the fire, a newe long shrowde hanging over his hose downe to the feet; which at the first sight stirred mens hearts to rue upon them, beholding on the one side the honour they sometime had, and on the other, the calamitie whereunto they were fallen.

Master doctour Ridley, as he passed toward Bocardo, looked up where master Cranmer did lie, hoping belike to have seene him at the glass windowe, and to have spoken unto him. But then master Cranmer was busie with Frier Soto and his fellowes, disputing together, so that he could not see him through that occasion. Then master Ridley, looking backe, espied master Latimer comming after, unto whom he said, 'Oh, be ye there?' 'Yea,' said master Latimer, 'have after as fast as I can follow.' So he following a prettie way off, at length they came both to the stake, the one after the other, where first Dr Ridley entring the place, marvellous earnestly holding up both his hands, looked towards heaven. Then shortlie after espying master Latimer, with a wondrous cheereful looke he ran to him, imbraced and kissed him; and, as they that stood neere reported, comforted him saying, 'Be of good heart, brother, for God will either asswage the furie of the flame, or else strengthen us to abide it.' With that went he to the stake, kneeled downe by it, kissed it, and most effectuouslie praied, and behind him master Latimer kneeled, as earnestlie calling upon God as he. After they arose, the one talked with the other a little while, till they which were appointed to see the execution, removed themselves out of the sun. What they said I can learn of no man.

Then Dr Smith, of whose recantation in king Edwards time ye heard before, beganne his sermon to them upon this text of St Paul in the 13 chap. of the first epistle to the Corinthians: Si corpus meum tradam igni, charitatem autem non habeam, nihil inde utilitatis capio, that is, 'If I yeelde my body to the fire to be burnt, and have not charity, I shall gaine nothing thereby.' Wherein he alledged that the goodness of the cause, and not the order of death, maketh the holines of the person; which he confirmed by the examples of Judas, and of a woman in Oxford that of late hanged her selfe, for that they, and such like as he recited, might then be adjudged righteous, which desperatelie sundered their lives from their bodies, as hee feared that those men that stood before him would doe. But he cried stil to the people to beware of them, for they were heretikes, and died out of the church. And on the other side, he declared their diversities in opinions, as Lutherians, Ecolampadians, Zuinglians, of which sect they were, he said, and that was the worst: but the old church of Christ and the catholike faith beleevd far otherwise. At which place they lifted uppe both their hands and eies to heaven, as it were calling God to witnes of the truth: the which countenance they made in many other places of his sermon, whereas they thought he spake amisse. Hee ended with a verie short exhortation to them to recant, and come home againe to the church, and save their lives and soules, which else were condemned. His sermon was scant in all a quarter of an houre.

Doctor Ridley said to master Latimer, 'Will you begin to answer the sermon, or shall I?' Master Latimer said: 'Begin you first, I pray you.' 'I will,' said master Ridley.

Then the wicked sermon being ended, Dr Ridley and master Latimer kneeled downe upon their knees towards my lord Williams of Tame, the vice-chancellor of Oxford, and divers other commissioners appointed for that purpose, which sate upon a forme thereby. Unto whom master Ridley said: 'I beseech you, my lord, even for Christs sake, that I may speake but two or three wordes.' And whilst my lord bent his head to the maior and vice-chancellor, to know (as it appeared) whether he might give him leave to speake, the bailiffes and Dr Marshall, vice-chancellor, ran hastily unto him, and with their hands stopped his mouth, and said: 'Master Ridley, if you will revoke your erroneous opinions, and recant the same, you shall not onely have liberty so to doe, but also the benefite of a subject; that is, have your life.' 'Not otherwise?' said maister Ridley. 'No,' quoth Dr Marshall. 'Therefore if you will not so doe, then there is no remedy but you must suffer for your deserts.' 'Well,' quoth master Ridley, 'so long as the breath is in my bodie, I will never deny my Lord Christ, and his knowne truth: Gods will be done in me!' And with that he rose up and said with a loud voice: 'Well then, I commit our cause to almightie God, which shall indifferently judge all.' To whose saying, maister Latimer added his old posie, 'Well! there is nothing hid but it shall be opened.' And he said, he could answer Smith well enough, if hee might be suffered.

Incontinently they were commanded to make them readie, which they with all meeknesse obeyed. Master Ridley tooke his gowne and his tippet, and gave it to his brother-in-lawe master Shepside, who all his time of imprisonment, although he might not be suffered to come to him, lay there at his owne charges to provide him necessities, which from time to time he sent him by the sergeant that kept him. Some other of his apparel that was little worth, hee gave away; other the bailiffes took. He gave away besides divers other small things to gentlemen standing by, and divers of them pitifullie weeping, as to sir Henry Lea he gave a new groat; and to divers of my lord Williams gentlemen some napkins, some nutmegges, and races [roots] of ginger; his diall, and such other things as he had about him, to every one that stood next him. Some plucked the pointes of his hose. Happie was he that might get any ragge of him. Master Latimer gave nothing, but very quickly suffered his keeper to pull off his hose, and his other aray, which to look unto was very simple: and being stripped into his shrowd, hee seemed as comly a person to them that were there present as one should lightly see; and whereas in his clothes hee appeared a withered and crooked sillie olde man, he now stood bolt upright, as comely a father as one might lightly behold.

Then master Ridley, standing as yet in his trusse, said to his brother: 'It were best for me to go in my trusse still.' 'No,' quoth his brother, 'it will put you to more paine: and the trusse will do a poore man good.' Whereunto master Ridley said: 'Be it, in the name of God;' and so unlaced himselfe. Then beeing in his shirt, he stood upon the foresaid stone, and held up his hande and said: 'O heavenly Father, I give unto thee most heartie thanks, for that thou hast called mee to be a professour of thee, even unto death. I beseech thee,

Lord God, take mercie upon this realme of England, and deliver the same from all her enemies.'

Then the smith took a chaine of iron, and brought the same about both Dr Ridleyes and maister Latimers middles; and as he was knocking in a staple, Dr Ridley tooke the chaine in his hand, and shook the same, for it did girde in his belly, and looking aside to the smith, said: 'Good fellow, knocke it in hard, for the flesh will have his course.' Then his brother did bringe him gunnepowder in a bag, and would have tied the same about his necke. Master Ridley asked what it was. His brother said, 'Gunnepowder.' 'Then,' sayd he, 'I take it to be sent of God; therefore I will receive it as sent of him. And have you any,' sayd he, 'for my brother?' meaning master Latimer. 'Yea, sir, that I have,' quoth his brother. 'Then give it unto him,' sayd hee, 'betime; least ye come too late.' So his brother went, and caried of the same gunnepowder unto maister Latimer.

In the meantime Dr Ridley spake unto my lord Williams, and saide: 'My lord, I must be a suter unto your lordshippe in the behalfe of divers poore men, and speciallie in the cause of my poor sister; I have made a supplication to the queenes majestie in their behalves. I beseech your lordship for Christs sake, to be a mean to her grace for them. My brother here hath the supplication, and will resort to your lordshippe to certifie you herof. There is nothing in all the world that troubleth my conscience, I praise God, this only excepted. Whiles I was in the see of London divers poore men tooke leases of me, and agreed with me for the same. Now I heare say the bishop that now occupieth the same roome will not allow my grants unto them made, but contrarie unto all lawe and conscience hath taken from them their livings, and will not suffer them to enjoy the same. I beseech you, my lord, be a meane for them; you shall do a good deed, and God will reward you.'

Then they brought a faggotte, kindled with fire, and laid the same downe at Dr Ridleyes feete. To whome master Latimer spake in this manner: 'Bee of good comfort, master Ridley, and play the man. Wee shall this day light such a candle, by God's grace, in England, as I trust shall never bee putte out.'

And so the fire being given unto them, when Dr Ridley saw the fire flaming up towards him, he cried with a wonderful lowd voice: 'In manus tuas, Domine, commendo spiritum meum: Domine recipe spiritum meum.' And after, repeated this latter part often in English, 'Lord, Lord, receive my spirit;' master Latimer crying as vehementlie on the other side, 'O Father of heaven, receive my soule!' who received the flame as it were embracing of it. After that he had stroaked his face with his hands, and as it were bathed them a little in the fire, he soone died (as it appeared) with verie little paine or none. And thus much concerning the end of this olde and blessed servant of God, master Latimer, for whose laborious travailes, fruitfull life, and constant death the whole realme hath cause to give great thanks to almightie God.

But master Ridley, by reason of the evill making of the fire unto him, because the wooden faggots were laide about the gosse [gorse], and over-high built, the fire burned first beneath, being kept downe by the wood; which when he felt, hee desired them for Christes sake to let the fire come unto him. Which when his brother-in-law heard, but not well understood, intending to rid him out of his paine (for the which cause hee gave attendance), as one in such sorrow not well advised what hee did, heaped faggots upon him, so that he cleane covered him, which made the fire more vehement beneath, that it burned cleane all his neather parts, before it once touched the upper; and that made him leape up and down under the faggots, and often desire them to let the fire come unto him, saying, 'I cannot burne.' Which indeed appeared well; for, after his legges were consumed by reason of his struggling through the paine (whereof hee had no release, but onelie his contentation in God), he showed that side toward us cleane, shirt and all untouched with flame. Yet in all this torment he forgate not to call unto God still, having in his mouth, 'Lord have mercy upon me,' intermeddling this cry, 'Let the fire come unto me, I cannot burne.' In which paines he laboured till one of the standers by with his bill pulled off the faggots above, and where he saw the fire flame up, he wrested himself unto that side. And when the flame touched the gunpowder, he was seen stirre no more, but burned on the other side, falling downe at master Latimers feete. Which some said happened by reason that the chain loosed; other said that he fel over the chain by reason of the poise of his body, and the weakness of the neather lims.

Some said that before he was like to fall from the stake, hee desired them to hold him to it with their billes. However it was, surelie it mooved hundreds to teares, in beholding the horrible sight; for I thinke there was none that had not cleane exiled all humanitie and mercie, which would not have lamented to beholde the furie of the fire so to rage upon their bodies. Signes there were of sorrow on everie side. Some tooke it greivouslie to see their deathes, whose lives they held full deare: some pittied their persons, that thought their soules had no need thereof. His brother mooved many men, seeing his miserable case, seeing (I say) him compelled to such infelicitie, that he thought then to doe him best service when he hastned his end. Some cried out of the lucke, to see his indevor (who most dearelie loved him, and sought his release) turne to his greater vexation and increase of paine. But whoso considered their preferments in time past, the places of honour that they some time occupied in this common wealth, the favour they were in with their princes, and the opinion of learning they had in the university where they studied, could not chuse but sorrow with teares to see so great dignity, honour, and estimation, so necessary members sometime accounted, so many godly vertues, the study of so manie yeres, such excellent learning, to be put into the fire and consumed in one moment. Well! dead they are, and the reward of this world they have already. What reward remaineth for them in heaven, the day of the Lord's glorie, when hee commeth with his saints, shall shortlie, I trust, declare.

Perhaps the best-known edition of Foxe's Book of Martyrs is that by Cattle (8 vols. 1837-41), but it is far from perfect; in the last paragraph quoted, for example, Cattle had altered 'lucke' to 'fortune.' The best is that in the 'Reformation' series of the Ecclesiastical Historians of England, edited by Mendham and Pratt (8 vols. 1853 et seq.), with Townsend's vindication against the attacks of Catholic critics. But many of the Catholic criticisms were justified; and Foxe's exaggerations and want of historical precision were fully exposed by Dr S. R. Maitland in a series of pamphlets (1837-42). The biography of Foxe, attributed to his son Samuel, and published in both Latin and English in the 1641 edition of the Acts, is certainly apocryphal, although it has formed the basis of numerous popular memoirs.

Raphael Holinshed (HOLYNSHED, HOLINGSHEAD, &c.), principal writer of the Chronicles which bear his name, is said by Wood to have been educated at one of the universities, and to have become a minister of God's Word. It is certain that he came to London; was a translator in the printing-office of the German, Reginald Wolfe; was steward to Thomas Burdet of Bromcote, in Warwickshire; and died about the year 1580. He had Leland's MSS. at his command, and he was assisted by William Harrison (1534-93), who, born in London and educated at both universities, became chaplain to Lord Cobham and Canon of Windsor; and by Richard Stanyhurst (1547-1618), born in Dublin, educated at Oxford, who, destined to be afterwards famous as the translator of Virgil, wrote for Holinshed on Irish affairs under the guidance of the Jesuit martyr, Edmund Campion. Prefixed to the historical portion of the work is a description of Britain and its inhabitants, by William Harrison, which gives an interesting picture of the state of the country and manners of the people in the sixteenth century. This is followed by a history of England to the Norman Conquest, by Holinshed; a history and description of Ireland, by Stanyhurst; additional chronicles of Ireland, translated (from Giraldus Cambrensis and others) or written by Holinshed and Stanyhurst; a description and history of Scotland, mostly translated from Hector Boece and Major, by Holinshed and others; and, lastly, a history of England, by Holinshed, from the Norman Conquest to 1577, when the first edition of the Chronicles was published. The book was eagerly welcomed and widely read; but some passages reflecting on debatable topics offended the queen and the ministers, and had to be cancelled. The second edition, when it appeared in 1587, was revised and continued down to 1586 under the editorship of John Hooker or Vowell, chamberlain of Exeter and uncle of 'the Judicious Hooker,' who had for coadjutors John Stow, elsewhere mentioned; Abraham Fleming (1552?-1607), a translator from the classics, a poor poet but a competent antiquary; and Francis Thynne, calling himself Boteville (1545?-1608), the Lancaster Herald. In this second edition of 1587, several sheets containing matter offensive to the queen and her ministers were mutilated in all but the first impressions; but the uncastrated text was restored in the excellent edition in six volumes quarto published in London in 1807-8. Shakespeare got the material of almost all his historical plays from the Chronicles, and sometimes copied the very words. It was from Holinshed—who followed Boece—that Shakespeare derived the groundwork of Macbeth, as well as of King Lear and (in part) of Cymbeline. In Lear Shakespeare partly followed an earlier play based on Holinshed: the passages of Holinshed paraphrased in Henry VI. are themselves paraphrases of Hall. And the author (or authors) of Henry VIII. might have taken the passages originally due to Cavendish's Life of Wolsey either from MS., from the second edition of Holinshed which had followed Cavendish, or from Stow, whose Chronicles contains selections from Cavendish.

Sometimes the text of Shakespeare's plays is little more than a blank verse rearrangement of Holinshed's facts and words. Thus in Act I. scene i. of Henry V. the Salic law is thus expounded:

There is no barre

To make against your Highnesse claim to France
But this which they produce from Pharamond:

'In terram Salicam mulieres ne succedant,'

'No woman shall succeed in Salic land;'

Which Salike land the French unjustly gloze

To be the Realme of France and Pharamond

The founder of this Law and Female Barre;

Yet their own Authors faithfully affirme

That the Land Salike is in Germanie

Betweene the Flouds of Sala and of Elve,

Where Charles the Great, &c.

In Holinshed it is thus put: 'Against the surmised and false law Salike, which the Frenchmen allege ever against the kings of England in barre of their just title to the crowne of France. The verie words of that supposed law are these: "In terram salicam mulieres ne succedant;" that is to say, "Into the Salike land let not woman succeed." Which the French glossers expound to be the realme of France, and that this law was made by King Pharamond: whereas their owne authors affirme that the land Salike is in Germanie, betweene the rivers of Elbe and Sala; and that where Charles the Great,' &c.

So in Act IV. scene viii. the list of prisoners and slain reported to the king after Agincourt is quite amusingly close to Holinshed's, as will appear from the last few lines.

The king, having recited the long list of French slain, says:

Here was a Royall fellowship of death!

Where is the number of our English dead?

Edward the Duke of Yorke, the Earle of Suffolke,

Sir Richard Kettle, Davy Gam, Esquire:

None else of name; and of all other men

But five and twentie.

The corresponding sentence in Holinshed is: 'Of Englishmen there died at this battell, Edward Duke of Yorke; the Earle of Suffolke; Sir Richard Kikelie; and Davie Gamme, Esquier; and of all other not above five and twentie persons.' The parallelisms have been worked out at length by Mr Boswell-Stone in his Shakespeare's Holinshed (1896).

Holinshed tells at great length the proton pseudos, the fundamental fable about Brutus, the eponymous hero of Britain, which from the days of Geoffrey of Monmouth continued so long to falsify English history. Britain, it appears, was peopled within two hundred years after the flood by the children of Japhet, whose son Samoth was the founder of Celtica, including Gallia and Britannia, and was succeeded by five kings of the Celts and Samotheans. Then came the giant Albion and his followers, and gave the island a new name. These legends fill a whole book of the history of England, though they are admitted to be somewhat disputed. But there is no doubt about Brute. The second book begins thus :

Hitherto have we spoken of the inhabitants of this Ile before the comming of Brute, although some will needs have it, that he was the first which inhabited the same with his people descended of the Trojans, some few giants onelie excepted whom he utterlie destroied, and left not one of them alive through the whole Ile. But as we shall not doubt of Brutes comming hither, so may we assuredly thinke, that he found the Ile peopled either with the generation of those which Albion the giant had placed here, or some other kind of people whom he did subdue, and so reigned as well ouer them as ouer those which he brought with him.

When Brutus (or Brytus) 'came to the age of 15 yeeres so that he was now able to ride abrode with his father into the forests and chases, he fortun'd (either by mishap or by God's providence) to strike his father with an arrow in shooting at a deere, of which wound he also died. . . . And the yoong gentleman, immediatlíe after he had slaine his father (in maner before alledged) was banished his countrie, and thereupon got him into Grecia, where travelling the countrie, he lighted by chance upon some of the Trojan offspring, and associating himself with them, grew by meanes of the linage (whereof he was descended) in great reputation among them.'

By-and-by Brutus, who had taken to wife Innogen, the daughter of King Pandrasus, led his Trojans from Grecia by way of the Straits of Gibraltar; fell in with more Trojans near the Pyrenees under their king, Gorineus; united their forces and fight with a king of the Picts in Poitou or Pictland; and, directing their course to this island, finally 'after a few days sailing they landed at the haven now called Totnesse, the year of the world 2850, after the destruction of Troy 66.' After Brute and Gorineus had destroyed the giants Gogmagog and all such as stood against the invaders, Brute gave Cornwall to Gorineus, and set to building a capital on the Thames for himself :

Here therefore he began to build and lay the foundation of a citie, in the tenth or (as other thinke) in the second yeare after his arriual, which he named (saith Gal. Mon.) Troinouant, or (as Hum. Llloyd saith) Troinewith, that is, new Troy, in remembrance of that noble citie of Troy from whence he and his people were for the greater part descended.

When Brutus had builded this citie, and brought the island fullie vnder his subiection, he by the aduise of his nobles commanded this Ile (which before hight Albion) to be called Britaine, and the inhabitants Britons after his name, for a perpetuall memorie that he was the first bringer of them into the land. In this meane while also he had by his wife iij. sonnes, the first named Locrinus or Locrine, the second Cambris or Camber, and the third Albanactus or Albanact. Now when the time of his death drew neere, to the first he betooke the gouernment of that part of the land nowe knowne by the name of England : so that the same was long after called Loegria, or Logiers, of the said Locrinus. To the second he appointed the countrie of Wales, which of him was first named Cambria, diuided from Loegria by the riuier of Seuerne. To his third sonne Albanact he deliuered all the north part of the Ile, afterward called Albania, after the name of the said Albanact : which portion of the said Ile lieth beyond the Humber northward. Thus when Brutus had diuided the Ile of Britaine (as before is mentioned) into 3 parts, and had gouerned the same by the space of 15 yeares, he died in the 24 yeare after his arriual (as Harison noteth) and was buried at Troinouant or London : although the place of his said buriall there be now growne out of memorie.

Then follows the history 'of Locrine the eldest sonne of Brute, of Albanact his yoongest sonne, and his death : of Madan, Mempricius, Ebranke, Brute Greensheeld, Leill, Ludhurdibras, Baldud, and Leir, the nine rulers of Britaine successively after Brute.' Cordelia, Gorboduc, and many less-known potentates are dealt with before Cassibelaune and Julius Cæsar are arrived at. Vortigern and Hengist do not appear till the tenth book of nearly mere fable. From the Anglo-Saxon settlement on there is much sound history.

These eponymous elucubrations about Albion and Brute naturally led the Scottish authors to claim for their kingdom a still more venerable antiquity and noble origin. The history of Scotland, compiled for Holinshed by Harrison from Boece and others, in like manner records the voyages of Gathelus, a Greek, who in Egypt marries Scota, the daughter of Pharaoh who was drowned in the Red Sea, and by way of Portingale comes to Ireland, now called Scotia after Scota. It was a prince called Rothsay that first took the Scots over to the western isles; and when they settled on the mainland of the country after then to be known as Scotland, they called the first district they settled Argathelia or Argyll, from their 'first captein and guide, Gathelus.' Thus Scottish history, like English history, was founded on baseless fables. This self-glorification by alleging descent from the great classical nations began with the Franks, but was much more diligently worked out by the Celtic peoples, the Irish series being mainly quite different in substance from those of Welsh manufacture. But the Brutus and other like fables seem to have long been about the most popular part of British history, and were quite heartily taken over and cherished by the Normans, who interested themselves more in the Welsh fable than in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle. In England the myths derived from Geoffrey of Monmouth began to lose credit a generation or two after Holinshed; but in Scotland, as we have seen (page 212), these constituted the warp and woof of early Scottish history till well on in the eighteenth century (see page 824).

John Stow (1525?-1605), an industrious writer, was born in London about the year 1525. He was the son of a tailor, and was brought up to the same trade, but early showed a turn for antiquarian research. About 1560 he planned to write on English history, and travelled on foot through a great part of England examining the historical manuscripts in cathedrals and collections. He bought up, as far as his resources allowed, old books and manuscripts, of which there were many scattered through the country, in consequence of the suppression of monasteries by Henry VIII. When necessity compelled him to fall back on his trade, his studies were suspended till the bounty of Archbishop Parker enabled him again to resume them. He edited Chaucer in 1561. In 1565 he published his Summarie of Englyshe Chronicles, and in 1580 his Chronicles of England (dedicated to the Earl of Leicester), which was afterwards called Annales of England, and re-edited, expanded, and altered by other hands. At length, in 1598, appeared his Survey of London, the best known of his writings, which has served as the groundwork of all subsequent histories of the city (see the edition by C. L. Kingsford in 1908). There was another work he was anxious to publish, a large history of Britain, on which forty years' labour had been bestowed; the MS. was extant, but it is not known what became of it. His industry deserved a better fate than befell him. In his old age he fell into such poverty as to be driven to solicit charity from the public. Having made application to James I., he received the royal license 'to repair to churches or other places to receive the gratuities and charitable benevolence of well-disposed people.' Under the pressure of want and disease, Stow died in 1605 at the age of eighty. His works possess few graces of style, but he was on the whole the most accurate and conscientious chronicler of the time, though still too willing to accept the fables on which the early history was based. He often declared that in his histories he had never allowed himself to be swayed either by fear, favour, or malice, but that he had impartially and to the best of his knowledge delivered the truth. Bacon and Camden took statements upon his sole credit.—Richard Grafton, chronicler, has been already referred to (page 106) as continuator of Hall.

The Anthologies.

Master Slender 'had rather than forty shillings that he had his book of songs and sonnets here,' but it would appear that he had lent it, at All-hallowmass last, to Alice Shortcake, with his book of riddles. Which of several anthologies it was that Cousin Abraham regretted it is impossible to decide, for he was offered the choice of several such collections of 'dainty passages of wit.' The names of most of these miscellanies are far more poetical than their contents, and have led the unwary to suppose that these were garlands and posies of enchanting lyrics. It is desirable to insist upon the fact that, with certain exceptions, they were nothing of the kind. We have already spoken of the earliest and most important anthologies, the 'Miscellany' published by Tottel (1557); in thirty years this went through eight editions, and the latest of them may presumably be the volume which Slender missed. This, however, was in no sense an Elizabethan work, although one or two of the contributors survived and continued to write in the reign of Elizabeth. The earliest of the genuine Elizabethan anthologies was The Paradyse of Daynty Devises, published in 1576, by Richard Edwards, sometime of Her Majesty's Chapel, who wrote a large portion of it himself; Lord Vaux, Lord Oxford, and Jasper Heywood were also contributors. This collection has a charming title, but there its merit ends; it is, as a contemporary called it, 'a packet of bald rhymes.' It was strangely popular, however, being incessantly reprinted until at least 1606.

An even finer title adorns a still more humdrum volume, A Gorgeous Gallery of Gallant Inventions, edited by Thomas Proctor in 1578. This is attributed to 'divers worthy workmen of later days;' but what is not written in the form of 'pretty pamphlets' by Proctor himself seems to be from the hand of a certain Owen Roydon, of whom nothing else is known. The spirit of poetry is eminently absent from A Gorgeous Gallery of Gallant Inventions. It was followed, in 1584, by A Handful of Pleasant Delights, edited by Clement Robinson. This marks a bold advance towards music; the editor took credit for printing every sonnet 'orderly in his proper time,' and the pieces were arranged to be sung. No poets of any prominence were among the contributors, however, and the actual merit of most of the ballads in A Handful of Pleasant Delights is extremely small. (But see below at page 274.) The fifth anthology, A Bouquet of Dainty Conceits (1588), said to be a collection of 'sweet ditties either to the lute, bandora, virginals or any other instrument,' I have never seen; it is said to exist in a unique exemplar in a private library. It was edited, or written, by Antony Munday. Mr Bullen, who examined this treasure, confessed that 'there is not even a passable lyric to be found' in it.

We come in 1593—when, it should be noticed, the lyrical revival was already complete—to The Phoenix Nest. Lodge and Breton contributed to this, and it was edited by an unidentified R. S., of the Inner Temple. In 1599 William Jaggard brought out The Passionate Pilgrim, by W. Shakespeare. This was a purely piratical miscellany, consisting of twenty pieces, the property of Shakespeare, Raleigh, Marlowe, Barnfield, and others, obviously all stolen. The history of this strangely tantalising compilation, and its actual connection with Shakespeare, remain obstinately obscure. We are told, however, by Heywood that Jaggard was 'altogether unknown' to Shakespeare when he 'presumed to make so bold with his name.' The Passionate Pilgrim, as a fraudulent publication, hardly deserves a place among the anthologies. The next on the list seems to be Belvedere, or the Garden of the Muses (1600), which, however, is a nosegay of such fragmentary extracts as deserve rather to be called petals than flowers. We come at last to the famous England's Helicon, or the Muses' Harmony (1600), a kind of Golden Treasury of the Elizabethan age, summing up the splendours of its lyric promise, and edited by one John Bodenham. Even more precious is the Poetical Rhapsody (1602), edited by Francis Davison, not because it contains more excellent poetry, but because it was compiled from fresher sources, and adds more to the total harvest of our literature. In both these collections, and still more in the enlarged reprint of England's Helicon of 1614, there were delightful numbers; Shakespeare himself, and Greene, and Barnfield, and Sidney, and Spenser, and Lodge being among the songsters whose throats are seen quivering with ecstasy on the boughs of these latest anthologies. But neither these nor their predecessors (always excepting Tottel's 'Miscellany') had much influence on the development of poetry or deserve any prominent place in its history. Before 1585 the anthologies had been filled with dry and tuneless morality, in which youth was admonished to withdraw his affection from the vain seducements of fancy. After 1585 they became collections, and mostly reprints, of poems, in themselves indeed most beautiful, but written without relation to the anthology and unstimulated by its existence. The Poetical Miscellanies, then, are literary curiosities which have, in the opinion of the present writer, received an amount of attention from critics which they do not intrinsically deserve, and which should be transferred from them to the music-books. These latter really did influence and even transform the character of lyrical poetry in England. The inaugurators of the Song were not the didactic Edwardses and Proctors, in spite of the beautiful names which they gave to their collections, but musicians such as Byrd, and Dowland, and that rare artist in both kinds, the incomparable Thomas Campion.

EDMUND GOSSE.

Translators and Translations.

At many different dates English literature has been largely influenced by translations and translators. In early Christian days Biblical renderings and the close contact with Church Latin gave a Hebraic-Latinistic flavour to Anglo-Saxon. Alfred was a prince of translators, and Boethius and Orosius left their mark on English thought. Caxton, his patrons, friends, and successors were zealous in translating. The version of Cicero's De Senectute in 1473 is one of the first instances of the translation of a great classic, and is thought by some to have been identical with that rendering printed by Caxton in 1481 (see page 97). Gavin Douglas's metrical rendering of the Aeneid (1513) was, all things considered, a notable achievement.

But the great age of great translators was the second half of the sixteenth century and the earlier decades of the seventeenth—the age of Hoby and North, of Philemon Holland and Florio, in prose, whose achievements were rivalled, then or later, by Phaer's and by Stanyhurst's Virgil, Golding's Ovid, Chapman's Homer, Harrington's Ariosto, and Fairfax's Tasso in verse. Many hands were now busy rendering the Greek and Latin classics, and giving their contemporaries better or worse versions of French, Italian, and Spanish masterpieces. Urquhart, the translator of Rabelais, was a late contemporary of Fairfax's. If it cannot be said that the great Tudor translators were as a rule quite accurate or faithful, if they did not make it their business to reproduce the distinctive form and manner of their originals, they yet succeeded admirably in fulfilling one of the canons of perfect translation—they produced noble English versions which to the reader seem wonderfully like spontaneous and original works.

Sir Thomas Hoby (1530–1566), translator of The Courtyer of Castiglione, made Englishmen familiar with the Renaissance ideal of a gentleman, but remained himself so faithful to all that was best in English character that Ascham, though constantly suspicious of 'the Englishman Italianate,' unreservedly praised both Hoby and his book. Born at Leominster, Hoby studied at St John's, Cambridge, travelled in France and Italy, and was ambassador in France. The Cortegiano, planned by Castiglione in 1508, was not printed till 1528, and found as much favour in France and Spain, translated, as at home. Hoby was at work on his English translation in his youth, but did not print it till 1561. The book was received with universal applause, was repeatedly reprinted, and produced very traceable influences on the next age and its writers. Sir Walter Raleigh, who edited Hoby (1900) for the 'Tudor Translations,' while praising the true English style and its rhythm, admitted that, like so many of the Elizabethan translators, he tried rather to restate in English the substance of the original than to make an accurate translation. He made many mistakes through imperfect knowledge, was sometimes even slipshod in his English, and allowed himself rather to limit his vocabulary by the preference (common to him with Cheke and that school) for homely English words, in direct contrast to the pedantic Ciceronianism of the universities, the 'inkhorn terms' that commended themselves to another generation. Much more influential, however, was Hoby's contemporary, North.

Sir Thomas North (1535–1601), often referred to as the first great matter of English prose, was the second son of the first Lord North, seems to have been educated at Cambridge, was a student at Lincoln's Inn, but early devoted himself to literature. He was apparently often embarrassed in circumstances, and even 'drowned by poverty,' but maintained some dignity in Cambridgeshire, being knighted about 1591. His first work was The Diall of Princes by Guevara, 'Englysshed oute of the Frenche,' but partly at least direct from Spanish (1557). Lord Berners had as early as 1534 translated a shorter version by Guevara of the same work (see pages 104, 105). Of late it has been attempted to trace the Euphuism of Lyly to Guevara, and probably Lyly was influenced by the renderings both of Berners and of North; but a substantial residuum of Euphuism is Lyly's own, and cannot be traced to either of Guevara's translators. In other respects North's influence on almost all subsequent writers of English was very marked. The Morall Philosophie of Doni is a witty and pithy rendering of an Italian work. His most famous work, The Lives of the Noble Grecianes and Romanes compared together by that grave learned Philosopher and Historiographer Plutarke of Chæronia, professedly from the French rendering of Amyot, was in magnificently racy, nervous, idiomatic English—all the more that the translator did not greatly concern himself to follow Amyot closely, still less the Greek original. He wrote freely, using new-coined Latinisms, contemporary colloquialisms, and English slang with equal effectiveness. The work, which reads like an original, became one of the most popular books of the time, and was largely Shakespeare's encyclopædia of classical history. In Antony and Cleopatra Shakespeare has used North's words and phrases very closely; in Coriolanus there are whole speeches taken almost straight from North.

Aristides the Just Ostracised.

The people moreover being grown very dissolute & licentious, by reason of the victorie of Marathon, and seeking to have all things passe by them and their authoritie, beganne nowe to mislike and to be greatly offended that any private man should go before the rest in good fame and reputacion. Whereupon they came out of all shires of Attica into the city of Athens, and so banished Aristides with the Ostracismon: disguising the envy they bare to his glory with the name of feare of tyranny. For this maner of banishment called Ostracismon, or Exostracismon, was no ordinary punishment for any fault or offence committed: but to give it an honest cloke, they said it was onely a pulling downe and tying shorte of too much greatnesse and authority, exceeding farre the maner and countenance of a popular state. But to tell you truly, it was none otherwise then a gentle meane to qualifie the peoples envy against some private person: which envy bred no malice to him whose greatnesse did offend them, but onely tended to the banishing of him for ten yeares. But afterwards when by practise this Ostracismon banishment was laid upon meane men and malefactors, as upon Hyperbolus that was the last man so banished, they never after used it any more at Athens. And by the way it shall not be amisse to tell you here why and wherefore this Hyperbolus was banished. Alcibiades and Nicias were the chieftest men of Athens at that time, and they both were ever at square together, a common thing amongst great men. They perceiving now by the peoples assembling, that they went about to execute the Ostracismon, were marvelously afayed it was meant to banishe one of them: wherefore they spake together, and made both their followers frends with each other, and joynd them in one tribe together, insomuch, when the most voyces of the people were gathered to condemne him that should be banished, they founde it was Hyperbolus. The people therewith were much offended, to see the Ostracismon so embased and scorned, that they never after would use it againe, and so left it off for ever. But briefly to let you understand what the Ostracismon was, and after what sorte they used it: ye are to know that at a certaine day appointed every citizen caried a great shell in his hande, whereupon he wrote the name of him he would have banished, and brought it into a certaine place railed about with woodden barres in the market place. Then, when every man had brought in his shell, the magistrates and officers of the city did count and tell the number of them: for if there were lesse then 6000 citizens, that had thus brought these shels together, the Ostracismon was not full and perfect. That done, they laid apart every mans name written in these shels: and whose name they found written by most citizens, they proclaimed him by sounde of trumpet a banished man for ten yeares, during which time notwithstanding the party did enjoy al his goods. Now every man writing thus his name in a shel, whom they would have banished: it is reported there was a plaine man of the countrey (very simple) that could neither write nor reade, who came to Aristides (being the first man he met with) and gave him his shell, praying him to write Aristides name upon it. He being abashed withall, did aske the countrey man if Aristides had ever done him any displeasure. No, said the contrie man, he never did me hurt, nor I know him not: but it grieves me to heare every man call him a just man. Aristides hearing him say so, gave him no answer, but wrote his own name upon the shell, and delivered it againe to the countrey man. But as he went his way out of the city, he lift up his hands to heaven, and made a prayer contrary to that of Achilles in Homer, beseeching the gods that the Athenians might never have such troubles in hand as they should be compelled to call for Aristides againe. Notwithstanding, within three yeares after, when Xerxes king of Persia came with his army through the countries of Thessaly and Boeotia, & entred into the heart of the countrey of Attica, the Athenians revoking the law of their Ostracismon, called home againe all those they had banished, and specially, because they were affraid Aristides would take part with the barbarous people, and that his example should move many other to do the like; wherein they were greatly deceived in the nature of the man: for before that he was called home, he continually travelled up and downe, perswading and encouraging the Grecians to maintaine and defende their liberty. After that lawe was repealed by proclamation, & that Themistocles was chosen the only Lieutenant generall of Athens, he did alwaies faithfully aid and assist him in al things, as well with his travell, as also with his counsell: and thereby wan his enemies great honor, because it stood upon the safety and preservation of his countrey. For when Euribiades, Generall of the army of the Grecians, had determined to forsake the Ile of Salamina, and that the gallies of the barbarous people were come into the middest of the seas, and had environed the Iles all about and the mouth of the arme of the straight of Salamina, before any man knew they were thus inclosed in: Aristides departing out of the Ile of Ægina with a marvellous boldnesse, ventured through the middest of all the barbarous ships and flete, and by good hap got in the night into Themistocles tent, and calling him out, spake with him there in this sort: Themistocles, if we be both wise, it is high time we should now leave off this vaine envy and spite we have long time borne each other, and that we should enter into another sort of envy more honourable and profitable for us both: I meane, which of us two should do his best endeavour to save Grece: you, by ruling and commaunding all like Lieutenant generall: and I, by counselling you the best, and executing your commandement: considering you are the man alone that will roundliest come unto the point that is best: which is in my opinion that we should hazard battell by sea within the straight of Salamina, and that as soone as might be possible. But if our frendes and confederates do let this to be put in execution, I do assure you your enemies do helpe it forward. For it is said, that the sea both before and behind us, & round about us, is covered all over with their shippes, so as they that would not before, shall now be compelled of force and in spight of their hearts to fight and bestirre them like men: because they are compassed in all about; and there is no passage left open for them to escape, nor to flie. Whereunto Themistocles answered, I am sory, Aristides, that herein your honesty appeareth greater then mine: but since it is so, that you have deserved the honor in beginning and procuring such an honourable and commendable strife betweene us, I will henceforth indeavour my selfe to excede you in continuing this your desire.

See the Lives of the Norths by Roger North, as edited by Dr Jessopp (3 vols. 1890); and Professor Skeat's notes in his Shakespeare's Plutarch (1875) on the Lives that illustrate Shakespeare's Plays, the edition of the Morall Philosophie by Joseph Jacobs (1888), and the edition by Wyndham of the Plutarch in the 'Tudor Translations' (6 vols. 1895-96).

Philemon Holland (1552-1637), styled by Fuller 'the translator-generall in his age,' was born at Chelmsford, became a Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, and in 1591 obtained somewhere the degree of M.D. He afterwards practised medicine at Coventry, and in 1628 was head-master for ten months of the free school there. His more notable translations were Livy, Pliny's Natural History, Suetonius, Plutarch's Morals, Ammianus Marcellinus, Xenophon's Cyropædia, and Camden's Britannia. The translation of Suetonius was carried out when the plague raged at Coventry in 1605-6; in his later years the old man suffered from bodily frailties and poverty. His translations are faithful on the whole, and in fine Elizabethan English, and though not so stately as North's English renderings, have their own quaint charm. They mostly appeared in majestic folios; and this, with their number, led to Pope's well-known jesting allusion, 'And here the groaning shelves Philemon bends.' His son, Henry Holland, a bookseller in London, wrote some historical works, and published, after his father's death, one or two works by Philemon on medical subjects.

Hannibal crossing the Alps.

So that Anniball took up his lodging for one night, without his cariages & horsemen. The morrow after, when as the barbarous people ran betweene them more coldly than before, he joined his forces together, and passed the streight, not without great dammage and losse; but with more hurt of the sumpter horses than of men. After this, the mountainers (fewer in number, and in robbing wise rather than in warlike sort) ran in heapes, one while upon the vaward, other while upon the rereward, as any one of them could either get the vantage of ground, or by going one while afore, and by staying another while behind, winne and catch any occasion & opportunity. The elephants, as they were driven with great leasure, because through these narrow streights, they were readie ever & anone to run on their noses: so what way soever they went, they kept the army safe & sure from the enemies; who being not used unto them, durst not once come neer. The ninth day he woon the verie tops of the Alpes, through by-lanes and blind cranks: after he had wandred many times out of the way, either through the deceitfulness of their guides, or for that when they durst not trust them, they adventured rashly themselves upon the vallies, and guessed the way at adventure, and went by aime. Two daies abode he encamped upon the tops thereof, and the soldiours werieled with travaile and fight rested that time: certaine also of the sumpter horses (which had slipt aside from the rockes) by following the tracks of the armie as it marched, came to the campe. When they were thus overtired and wearied with these tedious travailes, the snow that fell (for now the starre Vergilie [i.e. the Pleiades] was set and gone downe out of that horizon) increased their feare exceedingly. Now when as at the breake of day the ensignes were set forward, and the armie marched slowly, through the thicke and deepe snow; and that there appeared in the countenance of them all, slouthfulness and desperation: Anniball advanced before the standers, and commaunded his soldiours to stay upon a certaine high hill, (from whence they had a goodly prospect and might see a great way all about them) and there shewed unto them Italie, and the goodly champion fields about the Po, which lie hard under the foot of the Alpine mountains: saying, That even then they mounted the wals, not only of Italy, but also of the cittie of Rome; as for all besides (saith hee) will be plaine and easie to be travelled: and after one or two battailes at the most, ye shall have at your command, the verie castle and head citie of all Italy. Then began the armie to march forward: and as yet the enemies verely themselves adventured nothing at all, but some pettie robberies by stealth, as opportunitie & occasion served. Howbeit they had much more difficult travailling down the hill, than in the climbing & getting up; for that most of the advenues to the Alpes from Italy side, as they be shorter, so they are more upright: for all the way in a manner was steepe, narrow, and slipperie, so as neither they could hold themselves from sliding, nor if any tripped and stumbled never so little, could they possibly (they staggered so) recover themselves and keep sure footing, but one fell upon another, as well horse as man. After this they came to a much narrower rocke, with crags & rags so steepe downeright, that hardly a nimble soldiour without his armour and baggage (do what he could to take hold with hands upon the twigs and plants that there about grew forth) was able to creep down. This place being before naturally of it selfe steepe & pendant with a downe-fall, now was choked & dammed up with a new fall of earth, which left a bank behind it of a wonderful & monstrous heighth. There the horsmen stood still as if they had been come to their waies end. And when Anniball merveiled much what the matter might be that staid them so, as they marched not on : word was brought him, that the Rock was unaccessible & unpassable. Wherupon, he went himself in person to view the place, & then he saw indeed without all doubt, that although he had fetched a compasse about, yet he had gained nought thereby, but conducted his armie to passe through wilds & such places as before had never been beaten & troden. And verely that (of al other) was such as it was impossible to passe through. For, wher as there lay old snow untouched & not trodden on, and over it other snow newly fallen, of a smal depth ; in this soft & tender snow, & the same not verie deep, their feet as they went easely tooke hold : but that snow, being once with the gate of so many people & beasts upon it, fretted and thawed, they were faine to go upon the bare yce underneath, and in the slabberie snow-broth, as it relented and melted about their heeles. There they had foule adoe and much struggling, for that they could not tread sure upon the slipperie yce : and againe, going as they did (downe hill) their feet sooner failed them : and when they had helped themselves once in getting up, either with hands or knees ; if they chanced to fal again, when those their props and staies deceived them, there were no twigs nor rootes about, whereon a man might take hold, and rest or stay himselfe, either by hand or foot. And therefore all that the poore garrons and beasts could doe was to tumble and wallow only upon the slipperie and glassie yce and the molten slabbie snow. Otherwhiles also they perished as they went in the deepe snow, whiles it was yet soft and tender : for when they were once slidden and fallen, with flinging out their heeles, and beating with their hooves more forcibly for to take hold, they brake the yce through ; so as most of them, as if they had ben caught fast and fettered, stucke still in the deepe, hard frozen, & congealed yce. At last, when as both man & beast were wried and overtoiled, and all to no purpose, they encamped upon the top of an hill, having with very much ado clensed the place aforehand for that purpose : such a deale of snow there was to be digged, faied, and thrown out. This done, the souldiors were brought to breake that rocke, through which was their onely waie : and against the time that it was to be hewed through, they felled & overthrew many huge trees that grew there about, and made a mightie heape and pile of wood : the wind served fitly for the time to kindle a fire, & then they set all a burning. Now when the rock was on fire and red hot, they powred thereon strong vinegar for to calcine & dissolve it. When as the rock was thus baked (as it were) with fire, they digged into it, and opened it with pickeaxes, and made the descent gentle and easie, by meanes of moderate windings and turnings : so as not onely the horses and other beasts, but even the elephants also might be able to go downe. Foure daies he spent about the levelling of this rock : & the beasts were almost pined and lost for hunger. For the hill tops for the most part are bare of grasse ; and looke what fog and forage there was, the snow overhilled it. The dales and lower grounds have some little banks lying to the sunne, and rivers withall, neere unto the woods, yea and places more meet and beseeming for men to inhabite. There were the labouring beasts put out to grasse & pasture, and the soldiors that were wearied with making the waies had three daies allowed to rest in. From thence they went downe into the plaine countrie, where they found both the place more easie and pleasant, and the natures of the inhabitants more tractable.

(From the Livy.)

See Fuller's Worthies, and Whibley's preface to the Suetonius in the 'Tudor Translations' (1899). Garron is a pony ; faied, cleared away ; fog, coarse winter grass.

John Florio, the translator of Montaigne, was born in London about 1553. His father was a Protestant exile and Italian preacher in London, but unpleasant charges were brought against his moral character, and he lost his post and his patrons. John Florio appears as a private tutor in foreign languages at Oxford about 1576, and two years later published his First Fruites, mainly English and Italian dialogues, accompanied by A Perfect Induction to the Italian and English Tongues. In 1581 Florio was admitted a member of Magdalen College, and became a teacher of French and Italian. He enjoyed the patronage successively of the Earls of Leicester, Southampton, and Pembroke. The Second Fruites, more Italian and English dialogues, had annexed to it the Garden of Recreation, containing Italian Proverbs (1591). His Italian and English dictionary, entitled A Worlde of Wordes, was published in 1598, and was repeatedly reprinted, extended, and translated. Florio was appointed reader in Italian to Queen Anne, and afterwards groom of the privy-chamber. In 1603 he published in folio his famous translation of Montaigne, of which it is praise enough to say that it is a version worthy of its original, and a noble monument of Elizabethan English. Thanks to him, as was said at the time, 'Montaigne now speaks English : ' in that version Montaigne spoke to Shakespeare. In his later translation (1685) Charles Cotton, himself not immaculate, dwells on the numerous and gross errors of his predecessor. There are indeed not a few slips in Florio's by no means literal translation ; and it may fairly be claimed that Cotton's easy colloquial style comes nearer the diction of the Essays than Florio's quaint and stately but cumbrous and involved English. But Florio, it should be remembered, would not seem quaint to Elizabethans ; and his Montaigne still ranks as the great standard English rendering. The title was The Essayes on Morall, Politike and Millitarie Discourses of Lord Michaell de Montaigne. It is certain from the Tempest that Shakespeare was familiar with the book ; and it was long, but quite gratuitously, believed that the pedantic Holofernes in Love's Labour's Lost was a study after Florio. No doubt Shakespeare must have known one who was a protégé of his own patrons ; but Florio was not the only Italian then in London, and Florio (who died of plague at Fulham in 1625) was no absurd pedant.

From the Essay of Lyers.

I see all men generally busied (and that verie improperly) to punish certaine innocent errours in children, which have neither impression nor consequence, and chastice and vex them for rash and fond actions. Onely lying, and stubbornnesse somewhat more, are the faults whose birth and progresse I would have severely punished and cut off; for they grow and increase with them: and if the tongue have once gotten this ill habit, good Lord! how hard, nay how impossible it is to make her leave it! whereby it ensueth, that we see many very honest men in other matters, to bee subject and enthralled to that fault. I have a good lad to my tailour, whom I never heard speak a truth; no not when it might stand him in stead of profit. If a lie had no more faces but one, as truth hath, we should be in farre better termes than we are: For whatsoever a lier should say, we would take it in a contrarie sense. But the opposite of truth hath many, many shapes, and an indefinite field. The Pythagoreans make good to be certaine and finite, and evill to bee infinite and uncertaine. A thousand bywayes misse the marke, one onely hits the same. Surely I can never assure my selfe to come to a good end, to warrant an extreme and evident danger, by a shamelesse and solemne lie. An ancient Father saith, We are better in the companie of a knowne dogge, than in a mans societie whose speech is unknowne to us. Ut externus alieno non sit hominis vice (PLIN. Nat. Hist. vii. 1). A stranger to a stranger is not like a man. And how much is a false speech lesse sociable than silence? (Book i. chap. 15.)

Of the Force of Imagination.

Fortis imaginatio generat casum: A strong imagination begetteth chance, say learned clearks. I am one of those that feelee a very great conflict and power of imagination. All men are shockt therewith, and some overthrowne by it. The impression of it pierceth me, and for want of strength to resist her, my endeavour is to avoid it. I could live with the only assistance of holy and merry-hearted men. The sight of others anguishes doth sensibly drive me into anguish; and my sense hath often usurped the sense of a third man. If one cough continually, he provokes my lungs and throat. I am more unwilling to visit the sicke dutie doth engage me unto, than those to whom I am little beholding and regard least. I apprehend the evill which I studie, and place it in me. I deeme it not strange that she brings both agues and death to such as give her scope to worke her wil, and applaude her. Simon Thomas was a great Physitian in his daies. I remember upon a time coming by chance to visit a rich old man that dwelt in Tholouse, and who was troubled with the cough of the lungs, who discoursing with the said Simon Thomas of the meanes of his recoverie, he told him that one of the best was to give me occasion to be delighted in his companie, and that fixing his eyes upon the livelines and freshnes of my face, and setting his thoughts upon the jolitie and vigor wherewith my youthfull age did then flourish, and filling all his senses with my florising estate, his habitude might thereby be amended and his health recovered. But he forgot to say that mine might also be empaired and infected. Gallus Vibius did so well enure his mind to comprehend the essence and motions of folly, that he so transported his judgement from out his seat, as he could never afterward bring it to his right place againe; and might rightly boast to have become a foole through wisdom. Some there are that through feare anticipate the hangmans hand; as he did, whose friends having obtained his pardon, and putting away the cloth wherewith he was hood-winkt that he might heare it read, was found starke dead upon the scaffold, wounded only by the stroke of imagination. Wee sweat, we shake, we grow pale, and we blush at the motions of our imaginations; and wallowing in our beds we feelee our bodies agitated and turmoiled at their apprehensions, yea in such manner as sometimes we are ready to yeeld up the spirit.

(Book i. chap. 2c.)

The Profit of One Man is the Dammage of Another.

Demades the Athenian condemned a man of the Citie, whose trade was to sell such necessaries as belonged to burials, under colour, hee asked too much profit for them; and that such profit could not come unto him without the death of many people. This judgement seemeth to be ill taken, because no man profiteth but by the losse of others: by which reason a man should condemne all manner of gaine. The Merchant thrives not but by the licentiousnesse of youth; the Husbandman by dearth of corne; the Architect but by the ruine of houses; the Lawyer by suits and controversies betweene men: Honour it selfe, and practice of religious Ministers, is drawne from our death and vices. No Physitian delighteth in the health of his owne friend, said the ancient Greeke Comike: nor no Souldier is pleased with the peace of his Citie, and so of the rest. And which is worse, let every man sound his owne consciencè, hee shall finde that our inward desires are for the most part nourished and bred in us by the losse and hurt of others; which when I considered, I began to thinke how Nature doth not gainesay herselfe in this, concerning her generall policie; for Physitians hold that The birth, increase, and augmentation of everything is the alteration and corruption of another.

The second edition of the Montaigne appeared in 1613, a third in 1632. There have been reprints by Morley (1 vol. 1885), M'Carthy (3 vols. 1889-90), Chubb (1 vol. 1893), Waller ('Temple Classics,' 6 vols. 1897-98), Saintsbury ('Tudor Translations,' 3 vols. 1892-93). See a French study by the Comtesse de Chambrun (1921).

William Painter (1540?-94) studied at Cambridge, was master of Sevenoaks school, but in 1561 became Clerk of Ordnance in the Tower. His Palace of Pleasure (1566-67), largely composed of stories from Boccaccio, Bandello, and Margaret of Navarre, became popular, and was the main source whence many dramatists drew their plots; several of Shakespeare's plays owe something to his Italian borrowings. Twenty-six of the tales come from Bandello, but were done, not from the Italian, but from one or other of the French versions. Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet is based directly on the rhymed translation of Arthur Broke, but may in some points have followed Painter's Rhomo and Iulietta, published in the second volume (1567) of the Palace of Pleasure. The reader may compare the balcony scene in Painter with that given on the next page as in Broke:

And continuing this manner of Lyfe for certaine Dayes, Rhomo not able to content himself with lookes, daily did behold and marke the situation of the house, and one day amongs others hee espyed Iulietta at hir Chamber Window, bounding vpon a narrow Lane, ryght ouer against which Chamber he had a Gardein, which was the cause that Rhomeo, fearing discouery of their loue, began the day time to paffe no more before the Gate, but so soone as the Night with his browne Mantell had couered the Earth, hee walked alone vp and downe that little streat. And after he had bene there many times, missing the chiefeft cause of his coming, Iulietta, impatient of hir euill, one night repaired to hir window, & perceiued through the bryghtnesse of the Moone hir Friend Rhomeo vnder hir Window, no lesse attended for, than hee hymselfe was waighting. Then she secretly with Teares in hir Eyes, & wyth voyce interrupted by sighes, said: 'Signior Rhomeo, me thinke that you hazarde your person to mutch, and commyt the fame into great Daunger, at thys time of the Nyght to protrude your self to the Mercy of them which meane you little good. Who yf they had taken would haue cut you in pieces, and mine honor (which I esteeme dearer than my Lyfe,) hindred and suspected for euer.' 'Madame,' aunswered Rhomeo, 'my Lyfe is in the Hand of God, who only can dispose the fame: howbeyt yf any Man had foughte menes to bereyue mee of my Lyfe, I should (in the presence of you) haue made him knownen what mine ability had ben to defend the fame. Notwithstanding Lyfe is not so deare, and of futch estimation wyth me, but that I coulde vouchsafe to sacryfice the fame for your sake: and although my myshappe had bene so greate, as to bee dyspatched in that Place, yet had I no cause to be sorrye therefore, excepte it had bene by losynge the meanes, and way how to make you vnderstande the good wyll and duety which I beare you, desyrynge not to conferue the fame for anye commoditye that I hope to haue thereby, nor for anye other respecte, but onely to Loue, Serue, and Honor you so long as breath shal remaine in me.' So soone as he had made an end of his talke, loue and pity began to seaze vpon the heart of Iulietta, & leaning hir head vpon hir hand, hauing hir face all besprent wyth teares, she said vnto Rhomeo: 'Syr Rhomeo, I pray you not to reneue that grief agayne: for the onely Memory of futch inconuenience maketh me to counterpoyse betwene Death and Lyfe, my heart being so vnited with yours, as you cannot receyue the least Injury in this world, wherein I shall not be so great a Partaker as your self: beseechyng you for conclusion, that if you desire your owne health and mine, to declare vnto me in fewe Wordes what youre determination is to attaine: for if you couet any other secrete thing at my Handes, more than myne Honoure can well allowe, you are maruelously deceived.

The Palace of Pleasure has been edited by Haslewood (1813) and Joseph Jacobs (1890).

Arthur Broke, or BROOKE, had the honour of writing that Tragicall Historie of Romeus and Iuliet (1562) from which probably Shakespeare chiefly took the story of his drama. Though professedly translating from the Italian of Bandello, Broke worked from a French translation, and the result was a paraphrase, with additions, amplifications, and alterations, in rather limping verse—rhymed couplets of twelve and thirteen syllables alternately. (The prose version of the tale by Painter may also have been before Shakespeare, but Broke's poem gave Shakespeare not merely the plot but sometimes the words; the Nurse is partly Broke's creation.) Part of the balcony scene is quoted. Nothing is known of Broke except that he died by shipwreck while passing to France by way of Newhaven to join the English troops fighting for the Huguenots in 1563:

Impacient of her woe, she hapt to leane one night
Within her window, and anon the Moone did shine so bright

That she espyde her loue, her hart reuiued, sprang;
And now for ioy she clappes her handes, which erst for woe she wrang.

Eke Romeus, when he sawe his long desired sight,
His moorning cloke of mone cast of, hath clad him with delight.

Yet dare I say, of both that she reioyced more:
His care was great, hers twice as great was all the tyme before.

But eche of them alike dyd burne in equall flame,
The welbelouing knight, and eke the welbeloued dame.
Now whilst with bitter teares her eyes as fountaynes ronne:
With whispering voyce, ybroke with sobes, thus is her tale begonne:

Oh Romeus of your lyfe too lauas sure you are:
That in this place, and at thys tyme to hasard it you dare.
What if your dedly foes, my kynsmen, saw you here?
Lyke Lyons wylde, your tender partes asonder would they teare.

In ruth and in disdayne, I, weary of my life,
With cruell hand my moorning hart would perce with bloody knyfe.

For you, myne owne once dead, what ioy should I haue
heare?

And eke my honor staynde which I then lyfe doe holde more deare.

Fayre lady myne, dame Iuliet, my lyfe (quod he)
Euen from my byrth committed was to fatal sisters three.
They may, in spyte of foes, draw foorth my liuely threed;
And they also, who so sayth nay, a sonder may it shreed.
But who to reauue my lyfe, his rage and force would bende,
Perhaps should trye vnto his payne how I it could defende.
Ne yet I loue it so, but alwayes, for your sake,
A sacrifice to death I would my wounded corps betake.

And how I wishe for lyfe, not for my propre ease:
But that in it, you might I loue, you honor, serue and please.

Tyll dedly pangs the sprite out of the corps shall send:
And therupon he sware an othe, and so his tale had ende.

Now loue and pitty boyle in Iuliets ruthfull brest,
In windowe on her leaning arme her weary hed doth reste,
Her bosome bathd in teares, to witnes inward payne,
With dreary chere to Romeus, thus aunswerd she agayne, Ah my deere Romeus, keepe in these woordes (quod she),
For lo, the thought of such mischaunce already maketh me
For pitty and for dred welnigh to yelde vp breath:
In euen ballance peysed are my life and eke my death.
For so my hart is knitte, yea made one selfe with yours:
That sure there is no greefe so small, by which your mynde endures.

Lauas is lavish; peysed, poised. The poem has been repeatedly reprinted since 1821, as in J. P. Collier's School of Shakespeare (1843).

John Harington, the elder (flor. 1540-78), who was a confidential servant of Henry VIII., wrote very pleasing love-verses, some of which were published in the Nugæ Antiquæ (1804). The poet married first a natural daughter of the king, and then Isabella Markham, one of the Princess Elizabeth's gentlewomen; and with his second wife was sent to the Tower by Queen Mary, together with Elizabeth, who, on her accession to the throne, rewarded him with many favours. The following verses, from the author's own MS. dated 1564 (but written probably ten years before), were composed on Isabella Markham; and Sir John Harington (page 391), the translator of Ariosto, was the son of this loving couple:

Whence comes my love? O hearte, disclose:
'Twas from cheeks that shame the rose,
From lips that spoyle the rubyes prayse,
From eyes that mock the diamond's blaze:
Whence comes my woe? as freely owne;
Ah me! 'twas from a hearte lyke stone.

The blushyng cheek speakes modest mynde,
The lipps, befitting wordes moste kynde,
The eye does tempte to love's desire,
And seems to say 'tis Cupid's fire;
Yet all so faire but speake my moane,
Syth noughte dothe saye the hearte of stone.

Why thus, my love, so kynd bespeake
Sweet lyppe, sweet eye, sweet blushyng cheeke—
Yet not a hearte to save my paine?
O Venus, take thy giftes again;
Make not so faire to cause our moane,
Or make a hearte that's lyke our owne.

Richard Edwards (1524-66) was a Somerset man, who studied at Oxford, and was a member of Lincoln's Inn, but became a gentleman of the Chapel Royal and Master of the Children of the Chapel. See Bradner's Life and Poems of Richard Edwards (1927). His drama of Palamon and Arcite has not been preserved; but Damon and Pythias is in Dodsley's collection. Many of his poems are in The Paradise of Daynty Devises. One was Amantium Iræ Amoris Redintegratio Est.

In going to my naked bed, as one that would have slept,
I heard a wife sing to her childe, that long before had wept.

She sighed sore, and sung full sweet, to bring the babe to rest,

That would not cease, but cried still, in sucking at her brest.

She was full wearie of her watch, and grieved with her childe;

She rocked it, and rated it, till that on her it smilde;

Then did she say: Now have I found this proverb true to prove,

The falling out of faithfull freendes renewing is of love.

Then tooke I paper, pen, and ink, this proverb for to write,

In register for to remaine of such a worthy wight,

As she proceeded thus in song unto her little brat,

Much matter uttered she of waight in place whereas she sat;

And proved plaine there was no beast, nor creature bearing life,

Could well be knowne to live in love without discorde and strife:

Then kissed she her little babe, and sware by God above,

The falling out of faithfull freendes renewing is of love.

I marvaile much, pardie, quoth she, for to beholde the rout,

To see man, woman, boy, and beast, to tosse the world about;

Some kneele, some crouch, some becke, some check, and some can smoothly smile,

And some embrace others in arme, and there thinke many a wile.

Some stand aloofe at cap and knee, some humble, and some stout,

Yet are they never freendes indeed until they once fall out.

Thus ended she her song, and said, before she did remove:

The falling out of faithfull freendes renewing is of love.

George Turberville (1540?-1610) was of the ancient Dorset house from which Thomas Hardy's 'Tess of the D'Urbervilles' was descended, and was secretary to Sir Thomas Randolph, Queen Elizabeth's ambassador in Scotland and (for two years) in Russia. He translated from Latin into English verse (Ovid, ed. Boas 1928), and from Italian (Ten Tragicall Tales, also versified); wrote on Falconrie and hunting, and—his most notable book, in virtue of which he ranks amongst Elizabethan poets—Epitaphes, Epigrams, Songs and Sonets (2nd ed. 1567; reprinted by Collier 1867). A number of his poems, written in 'Moscovia,' describe the manners of the Russians.

That Death is not so much to be Feared as Daylie Diseases are.

What? ist not follie for to dread and stand of Death in feare,

That Mother is of quiet rest,
and griefs away doth weare?

That brings release to want of wealth, and poore oppressed Wights?

He comes but once to mortall men,
but once for all he smites.

Was never none that twice hath felt of cruell Death the Knife;

But other griefes and pining paines
doe linger on thro life,

And oftentimes one selfe same Corse with furious fits molest,

When Death by one dispatch of life
doth bring the soule to rest.

A Vow to Serve Faithfully.

In greene and growing age, in lustie yeeres,

In latter dayes when silver bush appeers;

In good and gladsome hap when Fortune serves,

In lowring luck when good aventure swerves;

By day when Phoebus shewes his princely pride,

By night when golden Starres in skies doe glide;

In Winter when the groves have lost their greene,
 In Sommer when the longest dayes are seene ;
 In happie helth when sicklesse limmes have lyfe, ^{free}
 In grieffull state, amids my dolours ryfe, ^{from}
 In pleasant peace when Trumpets are away, ^{sickness}
 In wreakful warre when Mars doth beare the sway ;
 In perillous goulfe amid the sinking sande,
 In safer soyle and in the stable lande ;—
 When so you laugh, or else with grimmer grace
 You beare your faithfull Friend unfriendly face,
 In good report and time of wooser fame,
 I will be yours, yea though I loose the game.

To a Gentlewoman that alwayes willed him to weare Rosemarie.

The greene that you did wish mee weare
 aye for your loove,
 And on my helme a braunch to beare
 not to remooove :
 Was ever you to have in minde,
 Whom Cupid hath my Feere assignde.

As I in this have done your will,
 and minde to doo :
 So I request you to fulfill my fansie too :
 A greene and loving heart to have,
 And this is all that I doe crave.

For if your flowring heart should chaunge his colour greene,
 Or you at length a Ladie straunge of mee be seene :
 Then will my braunch against his use
 His colour chaunge for your refuse.

As Winters force can not deface
 this braunch his hue :
 So let no chaunge of love disgrace
 your friendship true :
 You were mine owne and so be still,
 So shall we live and love our fill.

Then may I thinke my selfe to bee
 well recompent,
 For wearing of the Tree that is so well defenst
 Agaynst all weather that doth fall,
 When waywarde Winter spits his gall.

And when wee meete, to trie me true,
 looke on my hed,
 And I will crave an oath of you wher Faith be fled : ^{whether}
 So shall we both assured bee,
 Both I of you, and you of mee.

The verse, 'Of One that had Little Witte'—

I thee advise
 If thou be wise
 To keepe thy wit
 Though it be small :
 'Tis rare to get
 And farre to fet,
 'Twas ever yit
 Dearste ware of all—

looks back to Skelton ; that 'To his Ladie'—

Discharge thy dole,
 Thou subtille soule,
 It standes in little steede
 To curse the kisse
 That causer is Thy chirrie lippe doth bleede—is a very old stave (as in Sir Thomas More, page 124, and the older song on page 157) ; and

This kind of paine
 Doth he sustaine
 Not ceasing Increasing,
 His pittifull pining wo :
 In plenties place,
 Devoide of grace,
 Releasing
 Or ceasing
 The pangs that pinch him so—suggests the bob-wheel used afterwards by Montgomerie in The Cherrie and the Slae.

A few other contemporaries we name here :
Barnabe Googe (1540–1594), born in Lincoln, studied both at Cambridge and at Oxford, and in 1574 was by Cecil sent to Ireland, where he became provost-marshal in Connaught. He was well spoken of as a poet for his Eglogs, Epytaphes, and Sonettes (1563), and translated The Popish
Kingdome or Reigne of Antichrist, a satirical Latin poem by Thomas Naogeorgus or Kirchmayer.—
Thomas Churchyard (1520?–1604), soldier, poetaster, and miscellaneous writer, produced scores of volumes, pamphlets, and broadsides in prose and verse. He served in the army ; 'trailed a pike' in the reigns of Henry VIII., Mary, and Elizabeth ; fought in Scotland (he described the siege of Leith in a poem), Ireland, Flanders, and France ; and received from Elizabeth—whom he had propitiated by complimentary addresses—a pension of eighteenpence a day, which was not paid regularly. Churchyard was the Old Palæmon of Spenser's Colin Clout,

That sang so long untill quite hoarse he grew.

His best poem is The Legend of Shore's Wife
 (1563), but is not great. The Worthiness of Wales is a highly topographical poem (1587, republished by the Spenser Society in 1871). His adventures are described in Churchyardes Chippes (1575, &c. ;
 the part concerning Scotland was reprinted by Chalmers in 1817). Single pieces or selections were printed by Sir Alexander Boswell and others.
 —Thomas Phaer (c. 1510–60), lawyer, physician, and translator, apparently born at Norwich, is remembered for his translation (1555–60) of the first nine books of the Æneid into fourteen-syllable verse (completed later by other hands) ; it was warmly commended by Puttenham and other contemporaries.—Sir Thomas Chaloner (1521–65), a London
 mercer's son, who was at the court of Charles V.
 as a diplomatist, repeatedly conducted negotiations with the Scots, fought at Pinkie, and was later ambassador to Spain. He wrote in prose and verse, both Latin and English, and contributed to the Myrroure for Magistrates.—Arthur Golding (1535?–1605?), the son of an Essex gentleman, is said to have been educated at Cambridge, and was an industrious translator of theological works from Latin and French, especially Calvin, Beza, and Bullinger. He also Englished Cæsar and part of Seneca, but is best known for his rendering in English ballad metre of Ovid's Metamorphoses (1565–67; republished 1904), praised by all contemporary critics, and familiar to Shakespeare.

Literary Criticism.

Most early English literary criticism is incidental, as in Ascham's Scholemaster; or, like Gascoigne's Notes of Instruction (see page 247), deals directly with the craft of verse-making. Gabriel Harvey staggered his friend Spenser with his pedantic arguments against rhyme, and in favour of regulating English verse by the rules of classical prosody (see page 332). William Webbe, about whom little is known save that after studying at St John's College, Cambridge, he became tutor in families of distinction, in 1586 took the same side, in his Discourse of English Poetrie, 'with the author's judgment touching the reformation of English verse.' He not merely protested against 'the tinklerly verse which we call rhyme,' but provided his enemies with arguments by printing, as example of reformed verse, his own wooden hexameters and sapphics. But he cursorily surveys English poetry to his own time, gives us much interesting information on current views, and, in spite of his theory, welcomes the (anonymous) author of the Shepheards Calender as 'the best of all English poets that I have seen or heard.' In 1602 Thomas Campion, graceful songwriter though he was, was still denouncing 'the childish titilation of riming,' and being answered by Daniel (see page 339). Gosson's School of Abuse (1579) was not so much literary criticism as a sincere and powerful Puritan impeachment, by a converted playwright, of modern manners, including playgoing and poetry-making; and ultimately called forth Sidney's Apology (1595). Meanwhile Puttenham's Art of Poesie had appeared.

Stephen Gosson (1555–1624), a Kentish man, studied at Oxford, and having been poet, actor (perhaps), dramatist, satirist, and preacher, died rector of St Botolph's, Bishopsgate. His pastorals were praised; none of his comedies or tragedies have been preserved. Gosson's famous satire, the School of Abuse (1579), was dedicated to Sidney, and moved him, after a time, to write his apology or defence of poetry, as Gosson's short treatise is 'an invective against poets, pipers, players, jesters, and such-like caterpillars of a commonwealth.' The first regular theatre in England had been built by Burbage three years before (1576), and was keenly attacked by the clergy. Gosson says:

And because I have bene matriculated my selfe in the schoole where so many abuses flourish, I will imitate the dogs of Ægypt, which, comming to the banks of Nylus to quenche their thirste, syp and away, drinke running, lest they be snapte short for a pray to crocodiles. I shoulde tel tales out of the schoole and bee ferruled for my faulte or hyssed at for a blab yf I layde all the orders open before your eyes. You are no sooner entred, but libertie looseth the reynes, and geves you head, placing you with poetrie in the lowest forme; when his skill is showne to make his scholer as good as ever twangde. Hee preferres you to piping, from pyping to playing, from play to pleasure, from pleasure to slouth, from slouth to sleepe, from sleepe to sinne, from sinne to death, from death to the devill, if you take your learning apace and passe through every forme without revolting.

Like other satirical writers, when he inveighs against the degeneracy of his own time he forgets all its claims to credit, and leaves out of account all the glories of the Elizabethan era. Thus:

Our wrestling at arms is turned to wallowyng in ladies laps, our courage to cowardice, our running to ryot, our bowes into bolles [bowls], and our dartes to dishes. We have robbed Greece of gluttonie, Italy of wantonnesse, Spaine of pride, Fraunce of deceite, and Dutchland of quaffing. Compare London to Rome and England to Italy, you shall find the theaters of the one, the abuses of the other, to be rife among us. Experto crede, I have seene somewhat, and therefore I thinke may say the more.

Lodge replied to Gosson almost at once (see an extract at page 318); and there were defences, attacks, and reiterations on both sides. Sidney's apology did not appear till 1595.

George Puttenham.—In 1589 appeared anonymously The Arte of English Poesie, written, as its publisher states, for the queen herself, courtiers, and ladies and young gentlewomen 'desirous to become skilful in their owne mother tongue, and for their private recreation to make now and then ditties of pleasure.' Edmund Bolton, writing about 1615, assigned the authorship to 'one of the queen's gentleman pensioners, Puttenham.' This was long understood to be Sir Thomas Elyot's nephew, George Puttenham (died 1590); but (as many now hold) it may have been George's brother Richard (c. 1520–1601). The author describes himself as a scholar of Oxford, and as having travelled abroad, been at court, and written interludes, poems, and prose works (unknown to any later generation). Slender as are the grounds for fixing the authorship, there is no doubt that the Arte of Poesie is the first systematic criticism of literature as art in English; more comprehensive than the cognate essays of Webbe (1586) and Sidney (1595), and from its publication onwards treated as a standard work. It is a treatise of some length, divided into three books—the first of poets and poesy, the second of proportion, and the third of ornament. There are chapters on language, rhyme in Latin, the poetry of 'wilde and savadge people,' the different kinds of poesy, cadence, metres, style, figures, and an interesting survey of English poetry down to his own time, quoted below. The first book thus opens:

A Poet is as much to say as a maker. And our English name well conformes with the Greeke word: for of ποιητήν, to make, they call a maker Poeta. Such as (by way of resemblance and reverently) we may say of God: who without any travell to his divine imagination, made all the world of nought, nor also by any paterne or mould as the Platonicks with their Idees do phantastically suppose. Even so the very Poet makes and contrives out of his owne braine both the verse and matter of his poeme, and not by any foreine copie or example, as doth the translator, who therefore may well be sayd a versifier, but not a Poet. The premises considered, it giveth to the name and profession no small dignitie and preheminance above all other artificers, Scientificke or Mechanicall. And neverthesse without any repugnancie at all, a Poet may in some sort be said a follower or imitator, because he can expresse the true and lively of every thing is set before him, and which he taketh in hand to describe: and so in that respect is both a maker and a counterfaior: and Poesie an art not only of making, but also of imitation. . . . (From Chap. i.)

It appeareth by sundry records of bookes both printed and written, that many of our countrey men have painfully travelled in this part: of whose works some appeare to be but bare translations, other some matters of their owne invention and very commendable, whereof some recitall shall be made in this place, to th'intent chiefly that their names should not be defrauded of such honour as seemeth due to them for having by their thankfull studies so much beautified our English tong, as at this day it will be found our nation is in nothing inferior to the French or Italian for copie of language, subtiltie of device, good method and proportion in any forme of poeme, but that they may compare with the most, and perchance passe a great many of them. And I will not reach above the time of king Edward the third and Richard the second for any that wrote in English meeter: because before their times by reason of the late Normane conquest, which had brought into this Realme much alteration both of our langage and lawes, and there withall a certain martiall barbarousnes, whereby the study of all good learning was so much decayd, as long time after no man or very few intended to write in any laudable science: so as beyond that time there is litle or nothing worth commendation to be founde written in this arte. And those of the first age were Chaucer and Gower, both of them as I suppose Knights. After whom followed John Lydgate the monke of Bury, and that nameles, who wrote the Satyre called Piers Plowman; next him followed Harding the Chronicler, then in king Henry th' eighth times Skelton, (I wot not for what great worthines) surnamed the Poet Laureat. In the latter end of the same kings raigne sprong up a new company of courtly makers, of whom Sir Thomas Wyatt th'elder and Henry Earle of Surrey were the two chieftaines, who having travailed into Italie, and there tasted the sweete and stately measures and stile of the Italian Poesie as novices newly crept out of the schooles of Dante, Arioste and Peirarch, they greatly polished our rude and homely maner of vulgar Poesie, from that it had bene before, and for that cause may justly be sayd the first reformers of our English meetre and stile. In the same time or not long after was the Lord Nicholas Vaux, a man of much facilitie in vulgar makings. Afterward in king Edward the sixths time came to be in reputation for the same facultie Thomas Sternehold, who first translated into English certaine Psalms of David, and John Heywood the Epigrammatist who for the myrth and quicknesse of his conceits more then for any good learning was in him came to be well benefited by the king. But the principall man in this profession at the same time was Maister Edward Ferrys, a man of no lesse mirth and felicitie that way, but of much more skil and magnificence in his meeter, and therefore wrate for the most part to the stage, in Tragedie and sometimes in Comedie or Enterlude, wherein he gave the king so much good recreation, as he had thereby many good rewardes. In Queene Maries time florished above any other Doctour Phaer, one that was well learned and excellently well translated into English verse heroically certaine bookes of Virgils Aeneidos. Since him followed Maister Arthure Golding, who with no lesse commendation turned into English meetre the Metamorphosis of Ovide, and that other Doctour, who made the supplement to those bookes of Virgils Aeneidos, which Maister Phaer left undone. And in her Maiesties time that now is are sprong up an other crew of Courtly makers, Noble men and Gentlemen of her Majesties owne servauntes, who have written excellently well as it would appeare if their doings could be found out and made publicke with the rest, of which number is first that noble Gentleman Edward Earle of Oxford. Thomas Lord of Bukhurst, when he was young, Henry Lord Paget, Sir Philip Sydney, Sir Walter Rawleigh, Master Edward Dyar, Maister Fulke Grevell, Gascon, Britton, Turberville and a great many other learned Gentlemen, whose names I do not omit for envie, but to avoyde tediousnesse, and who have deserved no litle commendation. But of them all particularly this is myne opinion, that Chaucer, with Gower, Lidgat and Harding for their antiquitie ought to have the first place, and Chaucer as the most renowned of them all, for the much learning appeareth to be in him above any of the rest. And though many of his bookes be but bare translations out of the Latin and French, yet are they wel handled, as his bookes of Troilus and Cresseid, and the Romant of the Rose, whereof he translated but one halfe, the device was John de Mehus a French Poet; the Canterbury tales were Chaucers owne invention as I suppose, and where he sheweth more the naturall of his pleasant wit then in any other of his workes, his similitudes, comparisons and all other descriptions are such as can not be amended. His meetre heroically of Troilus and Cresseid is very grave and stately, keeping the staffe of seven, and the verse of ten; his other verses of the Canterbury tales be but riding ryme, neverthesse very well becoming the matter of that pleasaunt pilgrimage in which every mans part is playd with much decency. Gower saving for his good and grave moralities had nothing in him highly to be commended, for his verse was homely and without good measure, his wordes strained much deale out of the French writers, his ryme wrested, and in his inventions small subtiltie: the applications of his moralities are the best in him, and yet those many times very grossely bestowed, neither doth the substance of his workes sufficiently aunswere the subtiltie of his titles. Lidgat a translatour onely and no deviser of that which he wrate, but one that wrate in good verse. Harding a Poet Epick or Historicall, handled himselfe well according to the time and maner of his subject. He that wrote the Satyr of Piers Plowman seemed to have bene a malcontent of that time, and therefore bent himselfe wholy to taxe the disorders of that age, and specially the pride of the Romane Clergy, of whose fall he seemeth to be a very true Prophet; his verse is but loose meetre, and his termes hard and obscure, so as in them is litle pleasure to be taken. Skelton a sharpe Satirist, but with more rayling and scoffery then became a Poet Lawreat; such among the Greekes were called Pantomini, with us Buffons, altogether applying their wits to Scurrillities and other ridiculous matters. Henry Earle of Surrey and Sir Thomas Wyat, betweene whom I finde very litle difference, I repute them (as before) for the two chief lanternes of light to all others that have since employed their pennes upon English Poesie; their conceits were loftie, their stiles stately, their conveyance cleanly, their termes proper, their meetre sweete and well proportioned, in all imitating very naturally and studiously their Maister Francis Petrarcha. The Lord Vaux his commendation lyeth chiefly in the facilitie of his meetre, and the aptnesse of his descriptions such as he taketh upon him to make, namely in sundry of his Songs, wherein he sheweth the counterfait action very lively and pleasantly. Of the later sort I thinke thus. That for Tragedie the Lord of Buckhurst, and Maister Edward Ferrys for such doings as I have sene of theirs do deserve the hiest price: Th'Earle of Oxford and Maister Edwardes of her Majesties Chappell for Comedy and Enterlude. For Eglogue and pastorall Poesie, Sir Philip Sydney and Maister Challenner, and that other Gentleman who wrate the late Shepherdes Callender. For dittie and amorous Ode I finde Sir Walter Rawleyghs vayne most loftie, insolent, and passionate. Maister Edward Dyar, for Elegie most sweete, solempne and of high conceit. Gascon for a good meeter and for a plentifull vayne. Phaer and Golding for a learned and well corrected verse, specially in translation cleare and very faithfully answering their authours intent. Others have also written with much facilitie, but more commendably perchance if they had not written so much nor so popularly. But last in recitall and first in degree is the Queene our soveraigne Lady, whose learned, delicate, noble Muse easily surmounteth all the rest that have written before her time or since for sense, sweetnesse and subtiltie, be it in Ode, Elegie, Epigram, or any other kinde of poeme Heroick or Lyricke wherein it shall please her Majestie to employ her penne, even by as much oddes as her owne excellent estate and degree exceedeth all the rest of her most humble vassalls. . . .

(From Book i. chap. 31.)

There are shrewd observations in Puttenham's advice to the poet on diction or choice of words:

Before the Conquest of the Normans it was the Anglesaxon, and before that the British, which as some will is at this day the Walsh, or as others affirme the Cornish: I for my parte thinke neither of both, as they be now spoken and pronounced. This part in our maker or Poet must be heedily looked unto, that it be naturall, pure, and the most usuall of all his cuntry: and for the same purpose rather that which is spoken in the kings Court, or in the good townes and Cities within the land, then in the marches and frontiers, or in port townes, where straungers haunt for traffike sake, or yet in Universities where Schollers use much peevish affectation of words out of the primitive languages, or finally, in any uplandish village or corner of a Realme, where is no resort but of poore rusticall or uncivill people:

neither shall he follow the speach of a craftes man or carter, or other of the inferiour sort, though he be inhabitant or bred in the best towne and Citie in this Realme, for such persons doe abuse good speeches by strange accents or ill shapen soundes, and false ortographie. But he shall follow generally the better brought up sort, such as the Greekes call charientes, men civill and graciously behavoured and bred. Our maker therfore at these days shall not follow Piers Plouman nor Gower nor Lydgate nor yet Chaucer, for their language is now out of use with us: neither shall he take the termes of Northern-men, such as they use in dayly talke, whether they be noble men or gentlemen, or of their best clarkes all is a matter: nor in effect any speach used beyond the river of Trent, though no man can deny but that theirs is the purer English Saxon at this day, yet it is not so Courtly nor so currant as our Southerne English is, no more is the far Westerne mans speach: ye shall therefore take the usuall speach of the Court, and that of London and the shires lying about London within lx. myles, and not much above. I say not this but that in every shyre of England there be gentlemen and others that speake but specially write as good Southerne as we of Middlesex or Surrey do, but not the common people of every shire, to whom the gentlemen, and also their learned clarkes do for the most part condescend, but herein we are already ruled by th'English Dictionaries and other bookes written by learned men, and therefore it needeth none other direction in that behalfe.

(From Book iii. chap. 4.)

It will be noticed that he includes amongst poets Hardyng (1378-1465), a mere rhyming chronicler; Edward Ferrys or Ferrers, apparently by mistake for George Ferrers, soldier, courtier, and writer of masques, who died in 1579; Phaer, Golding, and Chaloner are named at pages 265-6. Gascon is Gascoigne; Britton is Breton.

Camden.

William Camden (1551-1623), one of the best historians of his age, was born in London, and educated at Christ's Hospital, St Paul's School, and Oxford. In 1575 he became second master of Westminster School, but devoted his leisure hours to the study of the antiquities of Britain—a subject to which from his earliest years he had been strongly inclined. That he might personally examine ancient remains, he in 1582 travelled through some of the eastern and northern counties of England; and the fruits of his researches appeared in his famous Britannia, written in Latin, and describing itself (in the translation by Philemon Holland, 1610, prepared apparently under Camden's own superintendence) as A Chorographicall Description of the most Flourishing Kingdomes of England, Scotland, Ireland, and the Ilands adioyning, out of the Depth of Antiquitie. This was published in 1586, and immediately brought him into high repute as an antiquary and man of learning. Anxious to improve and enlarge it, he again and again journeyed into different parts of the country, examining archives and relics of antiquity, and collecting, with indefatigable industry, whatever information might contribute to render it more complete. The sixth edition, published in 1607, was that which received his finishing touches; and of this an English translation, made with the author's sanction by Dr Philemon Holland, appeared in 1610. Holland's second edition (1637) contained many additions by the translator. From the preface to the translation we extract the following account by Camden of his historical labours:

I hope it shall be no discredite to me if I now use againe the same words with a few more than I used twenty-foure yeeres since in the first edition of this worke. Abraham Ortelius, the worthy restorer of ancient geographie, arriving heere in England above thirty-foure yeeres past, dealt earnestly with me that I would illustrate this Ile of Britaine, or (as he said) that I would restore antiquity to Britaine, and Britaine to his antiquity; which was, as I understood, that I would renew ancientie, enlighten obscuritie, cleare doubts, and recall home veritie by way of recovery, which the negligence of writers, and credulitie of the common sort had in a maner proscribed and utterly banished from among us. A painfull matter, I assure you, and more than difficult; wherein what toyle is to be taken as no man thinketh so no man beleeveth but he that hath made the triall. Nevertheless, how much the difficultie discouraged me from it, so much the glory of my country encouraged me to undertake it. So while at one and the same time I was fearefull to undergoe the burden, and yet desirous to doe some service to my country, I found two different affections, Feare and Boldnesse, I knowe not how, conjoined in me. Notwithstanding, by the most gracious direction of the Almighty, taking industrie for my consort, I adventured upon it; and, with all my studie, care, cogitation, continuale meditation, paine, and travaile, I emploied myselfe thereunto when I had any spare time. I made search after the etymologie of Britaine and the first inhabitants timerously; neither in so doubtfull a matter have I affirmed ought confidently. For I am not ignorant that the first originalls of nations are obscure, by reason of their profound antiquitie, as things which are seene very deepe and farre remote; like as the courses, the reaches, the confluents, and the out-lets of great rivers are well knowne, yet their first fountaines and heads lie commonly unknowne. I have succinctly runne over the Romans government in Britaine, and the inundation of forrayne people thereinto, what they were, and from whence they came. I have traced out the ancient divisions of these kingdoms; I have summarily specified the states and judiciale Courts of the same. In the severall counties, I have compendiously set downe the limites (and yet not exactly by perarch and pole, to breed questions), what is the nature of the soile, which were places of the greatest antiquitie, who have been the dukes, marquesses, earles, viscounts, barons, and some of the most signall and ancient families therein (for who can particulate all?) What I have performed, I leave to men of judgment. But time, the most sound and sincere witsnesse, will give the truest information, when envie, which persecuteth the living, shall have her mouth stopped. Thus much give mee leave to say—that I have in nowise neglected such things as are materiall to search and sift out the Truth. I have attained to some skill of the most ancient British and English-Saxon tongues. I have travailed over all England for the most part; I have conferred with most skillfull observers in each country; I have studiously read over our owne countrie writers, old and new, all Greeke and Latine authors which have once made mention of Britaine; I have had conference with learned men in the other parts of Christendome; I have been diligent in the Records of this Realme; I have looked into most Libraries, Registers, and memorials of Churches, Cities, and Corporations; I have pored over many an old Rowle and Evidence, and produced their testimony (as beyond all exception) when the cause required, in their very owne words (although barbarous they be) that the honor of veritie might in no wise be impeached.

The Britannia went through many subsequent editions, and proved so useful a repository of antiquarian and topographical knowledge that it was styled 'the common sun, whereat our modern writers have all lighted their little torches.' A later translation was by Gibson, Bishop of London (1695); and, with large additions, by Richard Gough (1789 and 1806).

In 1593 Camden became head-master of Westminster School, and, for the use of his pupils, published a Greek Grammar in 1597. In the same year he left the task-work of teaching on his receiving the appointment of Clarencieux King-of-Arms, an office which allowed him more leisure for his favourite pursuits. Other works, all in Latin, were an account of the monuments and inscriptions in Westminster Abbey; a collection of ancient English historians; a narrative of the trial of the Gunpowder Plotters, drawn up at the desire of James VI.; and annals of the reign of Queen Elizabeth. The last of these works is praised by Hume both for style and matter, and as being 'written with simplicity of expression, very rare in that age, and with a regard to truth.' It is eminently favourable to Elizabeth; and Robertson protested against its account of Scottish affairs under Queen Mary as inaccurate. Camden, who left a short autobiography in Latin, died unmarried at Chislehurst, 9th November 1623, at the age of seventy-two, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. Not long before his death he founded and endowed a history lecture at Oxford.

In the Britannia, Camden, after describing the Britons of England, Wales, and Cornwall, and the Picts of Caledonia, thus proceeds to distinguish between the 'wild Scots' and the 'civill Scots':

Among the people of Britaine, after Picts, the Scottish nation by good right challenge the next place: concerning whom, before I speak ought, for feare lest evill willers and frowardly peevish, should calumniously misconstrue those allegations, which I, simply, ingenuously, and in all honest meaning, shall heere cite out of ancient writers as touching Scots, I must certifie the Reader before hand, that everie particular hath reference to the old, true, and naturall Scots onely: whose of-spring are those Scots speaking Irish, which inhabit all the West part of the kingdom of Scotland, now so called, and the Ilands adjoyning thereto, and who now a-daies be termed High-land men. For, the rest which are of civill behaviour, and bee seated in the East part therof, albeit they beare now the name of Scottish-men, yet are they nothing lesse than Scots, but descended from the very same Germane originall, that we English men are. And this, neither can they chuse but confesse, nor we but acknowledge, being as they are, termed by those abovesaid, High-land men, Sassones, as well as we; and using as they doe the same language with us, to wit, the English-Saxon, different onely in Dialect, a most assured argument of one and the same originall. In which regard, so farre am I from working any discredit unto them, that I have rather respectively loved them alwaies, as of the same bloud and stocke, yea and honoured them too, even when the Kingdomes were divided: but now much more, since it hath pleased our almightie and most mercifull God, that wee growe united in one bodie, under one most Sacred head of the Empire, to the joy, happinesse, welfare, and safetie of both Nations, which I heartily wish and pray for.

He is sceptical about the most current contradictory etymologies of the word Scoti, and sensibly says, 'A man may with as great probability derive the Scots pedigree from the gods as from Scota, that supposed and counterfeit daughter of the Ægyptian King Pharao, wedded (forsooth) unto Gaithelus, the sonne of Cecrops, founder of Athens!'—a derivation not exploded in Scotland at that time. Less justly he weighs and rejects the etymology accepted by modern Celtic scholars: 'And yet I cannot but marvell whence Isidorus had this: The Scots (saith he) take their name in their own proper tongue of their painted bodies, for that they are marked with sharpe yron pricks and inke.' (Professor Rhys defends the view that Scoti is a Latin word from a British verb scod, used of this tattooing process.) Camden then shows justly enough that the early Scots were Irish:

For certainly knownen it is that out of Ireland, an Ile inhabited in old time by Britans, as shall in due place be proved, they passed into Britain, and what time as they were first known unto writers by this name, seated they were in Ireland. For Claudian the Poet hath written of their irruptions into Britaine, in these verses:

*Totam cum Scotus Hibernem
Movit, et infesto spumavit remige Thetis:*

What time the Scots all Ireland stir'd offensive armes to take,

And with maine stroke of enemies ores, the sea much some did make.

Also in another place;

Scotorum cumulos flevit glacialis Hiberne:

And frozen Ireland heapes of Scots bewail'd with many a teare.

Orosius likewise writeth thus; Ireland is peopled with Scottish Nations. Gildas calleth Scots, Irish Spoilers. And Bede; The Scots that inhabite Ireland, an Isle next unto Britaine: as also elsewhere. Yea, and in the daies of Charles the Great, Eginhardus in expresse words calleth Ireland The Isle of Scots. Moreover, Giraldus Cambrensis; That the Scottish nation (saith he) is descended out of Ireland, the affinitie as well of their Language, as of their apparell, of their weapons also, and of their maners even to this day doe sufficiently prove.

Camden finally accepts the tradition that the Scots came from Spain into Ireland, and the (Irish) identification of the words Scoti and Scythi. And though he sees the inconveniences of the theory, he is bound to hold that the Scythians must have been Goths, and so a kind of Germans originally. He adds a new argument for the identification of Scots, Scythi, and Gothi:

But if arguments in this case may bee taken from the habite and apparell of the people, surely the array and clothing of the wild Scots at this day, is all one with that of the Gothes in times past; as we may by and by perceive out of Sidonius Apollinaris, who in describing a Goth, portraieth and depainteth unto us a wild Scot, as right as may be. They are (saith he) of a flaring deepe yellow, died with saffron; they buckle upon their feet a paire of Broges made of raw and untanned leather up to their ankles; their knees, thighs, and calves of their legs are all bare; their garments high in the necke, straight made and of sundry colours, comming skarce downe to their hammes; the sleeves cover the upper points of their armes and no more; their souldiers coats of colour greene, edged with a red fringe; their belts hanging downe from the shoulder; the lappets of their eares hidden under the curled glibbes and lockes of haire lying all over them, (For so a man may very rightly call the manifold branched and parted twists of haire, which Scots and Irish weare;) they use also hooked Spears, which Gildas termeth Vincinata tela, and axes to fling from them. They wore likewise strait bodied coats (as saith Porphyrio) fitted close to their breasts, without girdles. If this be not for all the world the very right apparell of the wild Irish-Scots, let themselves be Iudges.

This undated letter of Camden to Sir Robert Cotton, printed by the Camden Society¹ (Letters, 1843), illustrates Camden's use of learned leisure:

RYGHT WORTHY SYR,—That in my solitarines here I may avoide the deadly sinne of Slouth, I am now an humble suitor to you that you would send me by William Holland my servant the Book of Heraldry, if you have bound it up, or as it is. Or some other booke or Papers which you shall think fitting my studies or delight. The Booke of France which I lately receaved standeth me in small steed, for I perceive by my Notes that I have had it heretofore. And therefore I will shortly returne it. Your Absolon de Vita Guthlaci is the very same that other call Fœlix Monachus; and I have already both it and the other conjoined therewith. But for Theodulus, I never sawe him before. Thus presuming of your ancient kindness, I rest,—Yours in all most assuredly, WILL'M CAMDEN.

Felix's Life of St Guthlac is still an authority for the Life of the Hermit of Crowland.

Based on his own Memorabilia de Seipso and his letters, there are Lives of Camden by Smith (1691), in the various editions of the Britannia, and in Wood's Athenæ Oxonienses.

¹ Founded 1838; amalgamated with Royal Historical Soc. 1897.

John Speed (1552?-1629) published in 1611 a History of Great Britaine, in which he was assisted by Spelman, Cotton, and others. Born at Farrington, in Cheshire, and a London tailor too by trade, he enjoyed few advantages from education; yet his history is highly creditable to his acquirements and judgment, and was long the best in existence. He rejected some of the fables of preceding chroniclers concerning the origin of the Britons, and though he retained many of the time-honoured errors, was more discriminating in his selection of authorities. His history of the island extends to the union of England and Scotland under King James, to whom the work was dedicated. In 1606 he published maps of England and Wales, subsequently extended to Scotland and Ireland, the best that had till then appeared. The following letters of the learned tailor to Cotton reveal the conscientious author and proof-reviser:

Worshipfull Sir, my thoughts runnyng upon the well performance of this worke, and fearfull to comitt any thing disagreeing from the truth, I have sent you a copy of some part of that which you have alrede sene, because you left in writing at the Printers that with a fast eye you had overune it, and your leasure better affording that busines in the contrey then here you had; this therefore hath caused me to send you as much as my Printer cane espare, beseeching your Worships to read it more attentyvly, to place the Coynes, and what adicssions you will before you returne it; and I pray you to past a paper where you doe adde, and not to intirline the copy, for somewhere we cannot read your Notes because the place geues your pene not rome to exprese your mynd. I have sent such Coynes as are cutt, and will weekly supply the same; so much therefore as you shall perfect I praye you send againe with as much speed as you can; but where you do want the Coynes, kepe that copy still with you, untill I send them; for I shall not be satisfiished with your other directions or Mr Coles helpe. Good Sir, afford me herein your assistanc as you have begune, and remember my suit to my L. privy-seall, wherein you shall binde me in all dutifull service and affection to your Worship's command. So beseking the Almighty to prosper our indevours I humbly take my leave, and leave your Worship to the Lordes protection.

Your Worships to comand in all dutifull service,

JOH. SPEED.

I am returned to my Printers, and therefore yf you please your directions maye be thither. Remember to signify the formes of your Altars.

Sir, I do most hartely thanke for your Worships assistance and kinde remembrance of our busynes, which doth not a little revive my now decayed spirit, lying on bed of my old disease the stone, which is not more grievous unto me than the detraction of this so chargable a busyness. I have sent you as many Coynes as are done, and will weekly supply them as we can get them from detracting Swisser [Christopher Switzer, a well-known engraver]. Also you shall herewith receive two leaves of copy which we can not read the place that you have interlined, and either to falsify your meaning, or leave out one silable we wold be lothe. Therefore I pray you both perfect that, and the yere of Christ in the other, and send them again in all hast possible, for the Printer already hath overtaken us. Thus comending my self most hartely to your Worship, I humble tak my leave this 30th of August.

Yor Worships in all duty,

JOH. SPEEDE.

Good Sir, I most earnestly entreat you to send these tow sheets inclosed, upon Wensday next, for in truth I dowbt we shall want them before that daye.

Yf you will send a Note of all Monasteryes in the Realm, as also the Book of Henry the fourth, I shalbe much beholding to your Worship. Thus you see how bold I am, but it is in love of that Kingdom which your self seeks still to adorne.

Amongst historical writers is also the poet Samuel Daniel (see page 339), who wrote the first and second parts of a History of England, extending from the Norman Conquest to the death of Edward III., a mere compilation.—Sir Henry Spelman (1564-1641), antiquary, was born at Congham, in Norfolk, of which county he was high-sheriff in 1604. His works are almost all upon legal and ecclesiastical antiquities. Having found it necessary to study Anglo-Saxon, he embodied the fruits of his labour in his ponderous Glossarium Archaeologicum (1626-64), explaining the obsolete words occurring in the laws of England; it was completed after the author's death by his son and Dugdale. Another work was a Latin history of English church councils, also left incomplete. He wrote further on tithes and on sacrilege.—Sir John Hayward (1564?-1627), born at Felixstowe, in 1599 published The First Part of the Life and Reign of Henry IV., which he dedicated to the Earl of Essex. Some passages in it gave such offence to the queen that she caused the author to be imprisoned. He conciliated James I. by defending his succession and the divine right of kings, and at the desire of Prince Henry, composed Lives of the Three Norman Kings of England (1613). After his death, in 1627, was published (1630) his Life and Raigne of King Edward the Sixt. He writes with smoothness, but in a dramatic style, imitating Livy and other ancient historians in the practice of putting speeches into the mouths of his historic characters. When Queen Elizabeth ordered Lord Bacon to search Hayward's Life of Henry IV. to see if it contained any treason, Bacon reported that there was no treason, but that there were many felonies; for the author had stolen many of his sentiments and conceits out of Tacitus.—Sir Robert Bruce Cotton (1571-1631) is celebrated as an industrious collector of records, charters, and writings of every kind pertaining to the ancient history of England. In the prosecution of his object he enjoyed only too great facilities, the recent suppression of monasteries having thrown many valuable books and written documents into private hands. In 1600 he accompanied his friend Camden on an excursion to Carlisle, for the purpose of examining the Picts' wall and other relics of former times. It was principally on his suggestion that James I. resorted to the scheme of creating baronets, as a means of supplying the treasury; and he himself was one of those who purchased the distinction. Sir Robert Cotton was the author of various historical, political, and antiquarian works. His Raigne of Henry III. (1627) frankly discusses kingcraft; his Dangers wherein the Kingdom now Standeth (1628) marked him out to the court as an enemy; and an ironical Proposition to Bridle the Impertinency of Parliament led to his imprisonment for a time. His name is remembered chiefly for the benefit which he conferred upon literature, by gathering his valuable library of manuscripts, which was not restored to him on his release from prison; and grief at the deprivation shortened his days. After being considerably augmented by his son and grandson, it became, in 1706, the property of the nation, and in 1757 was deposited in the British Museum. One hundred and eleven of the manuscripts, many of them highly valuable, had before this time been unfortunately destroyed by fire. During his lifetime materials were drawn from his library by Raleigh, Bacon, Selden, and Herbert; and he furnished literary assistance to Camden, Speed, and many contemporary authors.

Richard Knolles (1550?-1610) published a Generall Historie of the Turkes, which Johnson, in the 122nd number of the Rambler, eulogised as 'displaying all the excellences that narration can admit. His style, though somewhat obscured by time, and sometimes vitiated by false wit, is pure, nervous, elevated, and clear.' Hallam ranks Knolles high among our elder writers; and Southey and Byron were equally pronounced in their admiration. Southey recommended Coleridge to read him; Byron said old Knolles was one of the first books that gave him pleasure as a child, made him wish to visit the Levant, and 'gave perhaps that oriental colouring that has been observed in my poetry.' The historical value of the book is slender; original research on the subject was hardly possible to Knolles, and he seems to have followed a Latin history by Boissard, published at Frankfort in 1596. Knolles, born apparently at Coldashby, in Northamptonshire, was educated at Oxford, and soon after 1571 became master of the free school at Sandwich, in Kent, where he spent the rest of his life. A fifth edition was issued in 1638; and the history was continued by Sir Paul Rycaut, whose edition in three folio volumes (1687-1700) became the standard one. An abridgment by John Savage (1701) was much read.

The Taking of Constantinople.

A little before day the Turks approached the walls and began the assault, where shot and stones were delivered upon them from the walls as thick as hail, whereof little fell in vain, by reason of the multitude of the Turks, who, pressing fast unto the walls, could not see in the dark how to defend themselves, but were without number wounded or slain; but these were of the common and worst souldiers, of whom the Turkish king made no more reckoning than to abate the first force of the defendants. Upon the first appearance of the day, Mahomet gave the sign appointed for the general assault, whereupon the city was in a moment and at one instant on every side most furiously assaulted by the Turks; for Mahomet, the more to distress the defendants and the better to see the forwardness of the souldiers, had before appointed which part of the city every colonel with his regiment should assail. Which they valiantly performed, delivering their arrows and shot upon the defendants so thick that the light of the day was therewith darkened; other in the meantime courageously mounting the scaling-ladders, and coming even to handy-strokes with the defendants upon the wall, where the formost were for most part violently borne forward by them which followed after. On the other side, the Christians with no less courage withstood the Turkish fury, beating them down again with great stones and weighty pieces of timber, and so overwhelmed them with shot, darts, and arrows, and other hurtful devices from above, that the Turks, dismayed with the terrour thereof, were ready to retire.

Mahomet, seeing the great slaughter and discomfiture of his men, sent in fresh supplies of his janizaries and best men of war, whom he had for that purpose reserved as his last hope and refuge; by whose coming on his fainting souldiers were again encouraged, and the terrible assault begun afresh. At which time the barbarous king ceased not to use all possible means to maintain the assault; by name calling upon this and that captain, promising unto some whom he saw forward golden mountains, and unto others in whom he saw any sign of cowardise, threatning most terrible death; by which means the assault became most dreadful, death there raging in the midst of many thousands. And albeit that the Turks lay dead by heaps upon the ground, yet other fresh men pressed on still in their places over their dead bodies, and with divers event either slew or were slain by their enemies.

In this so terrible a conflict, it chanced Justinianus the general to be wounded in the arm, who, losing much blood, cowardly withdrew himself from the place of his charge, not leaving any to supply his room, and so got into the city by the gate called Romana, which he had caused to be opened in the inner wall; pretending the cause of his departure to be for the binding up of his wound, but being indeed a man now altogether discouraged.

The souldiers there present, dismayed with the departure of their general, and sore charged by the janizaries, forsook their stations, and in hast fled to the same gate whereby Justinianus was entred; with the sight whereof the other souldiers, dismayed, ran thither by heaps also. But whilst they violently strove all together to get in at once, they so wedged one another in the entrance of the gate, that few of so great a multitude got in; in which so great a press and confusion of minds, eight hundred persons were there by them that followed trodden under foot or thrust to death. The emperor himself, for safeguard of his life flying with the rest in that press as a man not regarded, miserably ended his days together with the Greek empire. His dead body was shortly after found by the Turks among the slain, and known by his rich apparel, whose head being cut off, was forthwith presented to the Turkish tyrant; by whose commandment it was afterwards thrust upon the point of a lance, and in great derision carried about as a trophy of his victory, first in the camp, and afterward up and down the city.

The Turks, encouraged with the flight of the Christians, presently advanced their ensigns upon the top of the uttermost wall, crying Victory; and by the breach entred as if it had been a great flood, which, having once found a breach in the bank, overfloweth and beareth down all before it; so the Turks, when they had won the utter wall, entred the city by the same gate that was opened for Justinianus, and by a breach which they had before made with their great artillery, and without mercy cutting in pieces all that came in their way, without further resistance became lords of that most famous and imperial city. Some few there were of the Christians who, preferring death before the Turkish slavery, with their swords in their hands sold their lives dear unto their enemies; among whom the two brethren Paulus and Troilus Bochiardi, Italians, with Theophilus Palaeologus, a Greek, and Joannes Stiavus, a Dalmatian, for their great valour and courage deserve to be had in eternal remembrance; who after they had like lions made slaughter of their enemies, died in the midst of them embued with their blood, rather oppressed by multitude than with true valour overcome. In this fury of the barbarians perished many thousands of men, women, and children, without respect of age, sex, or condition. Many for safeguard of their lives fled into the temple of Sophia, where they were all without pity slain, except some few reserved by the barbarous victors to purposes more grievous than death itself. The rich and beautiful ornaments and jewels of that most sumptuous and magnificent church (the stately building of Justinianus the emperor) were in the turning of a hand plucked down and carried away by the Turks; and the church it self, built for God to be honoured in, for the present converted into a stable for their horses, or a place for the execution of their abominable and unspeakable filthiness; the image of the crucifix was also by them taken down, and a Turks cap put upon the head thereof, and so set up and shot at with their arrows, and afterwards in great derision carried about in their camp, as it had been in procession, with drums playing before it, railing and spitting at it, and calling it the God of the Christians; which I note not so much done in contempt of the image, as in despite of Christ and the Christian religion.

But whilst some were thus spoiling of the churches, others were as busie in ransacking of private houses, where the miserable Christians were enforced to endure in their persons whatsoever pleased the insolent visitors; unto whom all things were now lawful that stood with their lust, every common souldier having power of life and death at his pleasure to spare or spill. At which time riches were no better than poverty; and beauty worse than deformity. What tongue were able to express the misery of that time? or the proud insolency of the conquerors? where of so many thousands every man with greediness fitted his own unreasonable desire; all which the poor Christians were enforced to endure. But to speak of the hidden money, plate, jewels and other riches there found passeth credit; the Turks themselves wondred thereat and were therewith enriched, that it is a proverb amongst them to this day, if any of them grow suddenly rich, to say, He hath been at the sacking of Constantinople; whereof if some reasonable part had in time been bestowed upon the defence of the city, the Turkish king had not so easily taken both it and the city.

Dryden, who rarely borrowed, seems, as Macaulay pointed out, to have adapted a couplet from Knolles's history. Under the engraved portrait of Mustapha I. are these lines:

Greatnesse on goodnesse loves to slide, not stand,
And leaves for Fortune's ice Vertue's firme land.

In Absalom and Achitophel, Dryden has:

But wild Ambition loves to slide, not stand,
And Fortune's ice prefers to Virtue's land.

Knolles also translated Bodin's Common Weale.

Sir Paul Rycaut (1628–1700), the continuator of Knolles, deserves mention for his other works. The son of a financier from Brabant who settled in England, he was born at Aylesford, in Kent, was secretary of Embassy at the Porte, consul at Smyrna, secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and British resident at Hamburg. In 1668 he published The Present State of the Ottoman Empire, based largely on his own observations; he also translated Platina's Latin history of the Popes, long a standard authority, and Garcilaso de la Vega's Commentaries of Peru.

The Elizabethan Song-Writers.

The influence of music on the evolution of lyrical poetry in England was sudden and decisive. It saved English verse, in the very nick of time, from being ruined by the heresies of the humanists, who wished to eject rhyme and to introduce lumbering equivalents for the classical measures. The necessity of writing in such a manner as that the words could be used to accompany music drove the poets into the employment of brisk, simple, and melodious metres. It may therefore be said that Byrd and Tallis, the two first great English musicians, whose labours date from about 1575, were the earliest encouragers of Elizabethan lyric, although at first little followed their training. The year 1588 was really that which marks the starting-point of easy song-writing. This was a year of surprising musical activity in England—now was printed the Musica Transalpina, which introduced the forms of Italian madrigal amongst us; now William Byrd (1543–1623) published his first English song-book, the Psalms, Sonnets, and Songs; now Dowland began his career as a lutanist in Oxford. After this year the art of writing madrigals or songs in light English verse was one which was perfectly understood; it was rendered easier by the introduction of Luca Marenzio's very popular Roman music, which was excessively admired in London, and by the publication of Byrd's Songs of Sundry Natures in 1589 and of Thomas Watson's Italian Madrigals Englished in 1590.

It would not be right, however, while emphasising the fact that the main flood of song-writing in England begins in 1588, to neglect to notice that several poets had, since 1580, been attempting, and sometimes with considerable success, to attain a pure lyrical movement. It is difficult to know exactly how to date the songs of Sidney, all of which must be precedent to 1586, while some may date from 1581. 'My true love has my heart' and 'Weep, neighbours, weep,' were in any case among the very earliest and most successful of Elizabethan songs. The miscellany called A Handful of Pleasant Delights was published in 1584, and the contents of it are entirely, as A. H. Bullen pointed out, 'intended to be sung to one or other popular tune.' This is from that collection:

Consider, Sweet, what sighs and sobs
Do nip my heart with cruel throbs,
And all, my Dear, for love of you,
Trust me truly;
But I hope that you will some mercy show
In due time duly.

If that you do my case well weigh,
And show some sign whereby I may
Have some good hope of your good grace,
Trust me truly;
I count myself in blessed case;
Let reason rule ye.

Here, however, it may be said that little advance beyond the shambling measures of folk-song has been made. But into his comedies of Campaspe and of Sappho and Phao (1584) Lyly introduced six or seven songs of a definitely artistic character, and these—whoever wrote them—may be said to mark the advent of pure Elizabethan song (see p. 315). No previous lyricist had sung like this in England:

What bird so sings, yet so does wail?
O 'tis the ravish'd nightingale.
Jug, jug, jug, jug, tereu! she cries,
And still her woes at midnight rise.
Brave prick-song! Who is 't now we hear?
None but the lark so shrill and clear;
How at heaven's gates she claps her wings,
The morn not waking till she sings.
Hark, hark, with what a pretty throat
Poor Robin Redbreast tunes his note;
Hark! how the jolly cuckoos sing!
Cuckoo! to welcome in the spring!
Cuckoo, to welcome in the spring.

The same ecstatic and almost infantile melody is found in one or two scraps of another dramatist, George Peele, whose famous 'Fair, and fair, and thrice so fair' (quoted below at page 323) is found in his Arraignment of Paris, which dates from 1584.

It is, however, certain that in the abundant romances of the period and the various poetical miscellanies this peculiar note of joyous lyricism does not show itself until about 1588, whereas after that year it becomes so natural and abundant that we cease to record its manifestations. This is undoubtedly connected with the foundation of the national chamber music, which owed its character to William Byrd. Italian airs were now imported and English airs invented in immense numbers, and it was necessary to find poems to suit those airs; the result was the composition of innumerable brief snatches of song, lucid, aerial, and sympathetic, either of a gaiety that clapped its hands and danced, or else of a melancholy which melted into tears. To 1588 belongs the old favourite by Sir Edward Dyer:

My mind to me a kingdom is:
Such perfect joy therein I find
That it excels all other bliss
That God or Nature hath assigned.
Though much I want that most would have,
Yet still my mind forbids to crave.

One of the earliest poets to obtain ease in this particular manner of writing was Nicholas Breton. This song belongs to the same year, but is of quite a different order of dance-music:

Tho' Amaryllis dance in green
Like Faery Queen;
And sing full clear
Corinna, with a smiling cheer;
Yet since their eyes make heart so sore,
Hey ho! I'll love no more.

My sheep are lost for want of food;
And I so wood mad
That all the day
I sit and watch a herd-maid gay,
Who laughs to see me sigh so sore;
Hey ho! I'll love no more.

At the same time, the importation of the madrigal began from Italy. Here is an example, dating probably from 1589, by Thomas Watson; it is an adaptation to the case of Sir Philip Sidney of a popular Italian madrigal by Luca Marenzio:

How long with vain complaining,
How long with dreary tears and joys refraining,
Shall we renew his dying,
Whose happy soul is flying—
Not in a place of sadness—
But of eternal gladness?
Sweet Sidney lives in heaven;
O therefore let our weeping
Be turned to hymns and songs of pleasant greeting.

From this time until the end of the century the abundance and variety of song in English poetry is beyond the power of any historian to chronicle. The full choir burst forth simultaneously into warbling melody. But it is to be noted that the connection with music continued unbroken. The most exquisite songs of Shakespeare and Fletcher were introduced to lighten the action by an instrumental as well as a vocal interlude; even the lyrics in the romances of Greene and Lodge were probably intended to be sung to an accompaniment on the lute. Campion, one of the most delicate and characteristic of Elizabethan lyricists, was an accomplished musician; and some of the most exquisite specimens of pure song-writing which have come down to us are those which have been gathered out of the motets and madrigals of Morley, Dowland, Robert Jones, Wilbye, Weelkes, and Orlando Gibbons, the Little Masters of English chamber music.

EDMUND GOSSE.

Sir Edward Dyer (c.1545–1607), poet and courtier-diplomatist, was born at Sharpsham Park, in Somerset, studied at Oxford, was knighted in 1596, and died in London. He was praised by his intimate friend Sidney, as well as by Puttenham and Meres, who commended especially his elegies. It was long difficult to know which were his poems: some ascribed to him in one collection were elsewhere recognised as the work of Lodge or Breton; but in 1872 Dr Grosart did his best to identify and edit all Dyer's extant work—a dozen pieces in all. 'My Mind to Me a Kingdom is,' set to music by Byrd in 1588, is almost certainly his, and is by far the best known.

My Mind to Me a Kingdom is.

My mynde to me a kyngdome is,
Such preasent joyes therein I fynde,
That it excells all other blisse
That earth affords or growes by kynde.
Thoughe muche I wante which moste would have,
Yet still my mynde forbiddes to crave.

No princely pompe, no wealthy store,
Nor force to winne the victorye;
No wilye wit to salve a sore,
No shape to feede a lovinge eye;
To none of these I yielde as thrall,
Forwhy? my mynde doth serve for all.

Because

I see how plenty suffers ofte,
And hasty clymers sone do fall;
I see that those which are alofte
Mishappe doth threaten moste of all;
They get with toyle, they keepe with feare:
Such cares my mynde could never beare.

Content I live, this is my staye;
I seeke no more than maye suffice;
I presse to beare no haughty swaye;
Look, what I lack my mynde supplies:
Lo! thus I triumphe like a kynge,
Content with that my mynde doth bringe.

Some have too muche, yet still do crave;
I little have and seek no more.
They are but poore, though muche they have,
And I am ryche with lyttle store:
They poore, I ryche; they begge, I gyve;
They lacke, I leave; they pyne, I lyve.

I laughe not at another's losse;
I grudge not at another's gayne;
No worldly waves my mynde can toss;
My state at one dothe still remayne:
I feare no foe, I fawne no friende;
I loathe not lyfe nor dread my ende.

Some weighe theyre pleasure by theyre luste,
Theyre wisdom by theyre rage of wyll;
Theyre treasure is theyre onely truste;

A clocked craft theyre store of skylle: clocked

But all the pleasure that I fynde,
Is to mayntayne a quiet mynde.

My wealthe is healthe and perfect ease:
My conscience cleere my choyce defence;
I neither seek by brybes to please,
Nor by deceyte to breede offence:
Thus do I lyve; thus will I dye;
Would all did so well as I!

Dr Hannah, the editor of Raleigh and others, has pointed out that one of Greene's poems ends with:

A mind content both croune and kingdome is;

and Dyer himself, as if to show that this happy optimism was not the whole truth, indited a very different tune:

The Man of Woe.

The mann whose thoughtes agaynste him do conspyre,
On whom Mishapp her storye dothe depaynt;
The mann of woe, the matter of desier,
Tree of the dead, that lives in endles plaine;
His spirit am I whiche in this deserte lye,
To rue his case whose cause I cannot flye.

Despayre my name whoe never findes releife,
Frended of none, but to myself a foe;
An idle care mayntaynde by firme beleife,
That prayse of saythe shall through my torments growe;
And counte those hopes that others hartes do ease,
Butt base conceites the common sense to please.

For sure I am I never shall attayne
The happy good from whence my joys aryse;
Nor have I power my sorrows to reffrayne,
Butt wayle the wante when noughte ellse maye suffice;
Whersbye my lyfe the shape of deathe muste beare,
That deathe which feesles the worst that lyfe doth feare.

But what avayles with tragicall complaynte,
Not hopinge healpe, the Furies to awake?
Or why should I the happy mynds aquaynte
With doleful tunes, theyre settled peace to shake?
All ye that here behould Infortune's feare,
May judge noe woe may withe my gref compare.

And the alternating joys and sorrows of the lover are expressed in the song beginning:

I woulde it were not as it is,
Or that I cared not yea or no;
I woulde I thoughte it not amiss,
Or that amiss myghte blamless goo;
I wold I were, yet wold I not;
I myghte be gladd, yet coude I not.

And he sums up the situation in:

Now grieve, now hope, now love, now spyghte,
Long sorrows mixte with shorte delyghte.

Nicholas Breton (1545?–1626?) was a prolific and versatile writer of works in prose and verse, pastoral, satirical, romantic, religious, and humorous. Of him little personally is known, save that his father, William Breton, a London merchant, left money and property for his education. William's widow married the poet Gascoigne, and Nicholas is said, on poor authority, to have studied at Oriel

College, Oxford. His Works of a Young Wit appeared in 1577; and a swift succession of small volumes proceeded from his pen—over a score in prose and about as many in verse; eight pieces with his name, comprising his first lyrics, are in England's Helicon, a notable poetical miscellany published in 1600, including contributions from Sidney, Spenser, Raleigh, Lodge, Marlowe, Watson, Greene, &c. He wrote far too much. His satire is less coarse but less effective than that of some contemporaries; his religious poems are disfigured by too fantastic conceits. Wil's Trenchmour, a prose idyl of angling, though named from an old merry dance, is one of his most notable pieces.

A Pastoral of Phillis and Coridon.

On a hill there growes a flower,
Faire befall the daintie sweet!
By that flower there is a bower,
Where the heavenly Muses meete.

In that bower there is a chaire,
Fringed all about with golde,
Where doth sit the fairest faire
That did ever eye beholde.

It is Phillis, fair and bright,
She that is the shepheards joy,
She that Venus did dispight,
And did blind her little boy.

There is she, the wise, the rich,
That the world desires to see;
This is ipsa quæ, the which
There is none but onely shee.

Who would not this face admire?
Who would not this saint adore?
Who would not this sight desire,
Though he thought to see no more?

O faire eyes, yet let me see
One good looke, and I am gone:
Looke on me, for I am hee,
Thy poor sillie Coridon.

Thou that art the shepheards queene,
Looke upon thy silly swaine;
By thy comfort have beene seene
Dead men brought to life againe.

Phyllida and Coridon.

In the merry moneth of May
In a morne by breake of day,
Forth I walked by the wood-side,
Whenas May was in his pride:
There I spied all alone
Phyllida and Coridon.
Much adoo there was, God wot!
He would love and she would not.
She sayd, Never man was true;
He sayd, None was false to you.
He sayd, He had loved her long;
She sayd, Love should have no wrong.
Coridon would kisse her then;
She sayd, Maides must kisse no men

Till they did for good and all;
Then she made the shepheard call
All the heavens to witness truth—
Never loved a truer youth.
Thus with many a pretty oath,
Yea, and nay, faith and troth,
Such as seely shepheards use
When they will not love abuse,
Love, which had beene long deluded,
Was with kisses sweete concluded;
And Phyllida with garlands gay
Was made the Lady of the May.

A Sweet Lullable.

Come, little babe, come, silly soule,
Thy father's shame, thy mother's griefe,
Borne as I doubt to all our dole,
And to thyself unhappie chiefe:
Sing lullable and lap it warme,
Poore soule that thinkes no creature harme.

Thou little thinkst, and lesse doost knowe
The cause of this thy mother's moane;
Thou wantst the wit to waile her woe,
And I myselfe am all alone;
Why doost thou weepe? why doost thou waile?
And knowest not yet what thou doost ayle.

Come, little wretch! Ah! silly heart,
Mine onely joy, what can I more?
If there be any wrong thy smart,
That may the destinies implore,
'Twas I, I say, against my will—
I wayle the time, but be thou still.

And doest thou smile? O thy sweete face!
Would God Him selfe He might thee see!
No doubt thou wouldst soone purchase grace,
I know right well, for thee and mee,
But come to mother, babe, and play,
For father false is fled away.

Sweet boy, if it by fortune chance
Thy father home againe to send,
If Death do strike me with his launce,
Yet mayest thou me to him commend:
If any aske thy mother's name,
Tell how by love she purchast blame.

Then will his gentle heart soone yeeld:
I know him of a noble minde:
Although a Lyon in the field,
A lamb in towne thou shalt him finde:
Aske blessing, babe, be not afraide!
His sugred words hath me betrayde.

Then mayst thou joy and be right glad,
Although in woe I seeme to moane.
Thy father is no rascall lad:
A noble youth of blood and boane,
His glancing lookes, if he once smile,
Right honest women may beguile.

Come, little boy, and rocke a-sleepe!
Sing lullable, and be thou still!
I, that can doe naught else but weepe,
Will sit by thee and waile my fill:
God blesse my babe, and lullable,
From this thy father's quality.

Popular and esteemed in the seventeenth century, Breton's work was forgotten in the eighteenth, till Bishop Percy printed in the Reliques two of his pieces from England's Helicon. There was no edition of his works in prose and verse till Dr Grosart produced them for the 'Chertsey Library' in 1877-93. Kentish-Wright also edited his prose writings, in 1929. Single works have been published separately — as The Bower of Delights in the 'Elizabethan Library' in 1893, and No Whippinge nor Trippinge in 1896. Professor Saintsbury reprinted in his Elizabethan and Jacobean Tracts (1892) Breton's 'Pretie and Wittie Discourse between Wit and Will,' which contains the 'Song between Wit and Will' and other amœbean strains between them, between Care and Misery, &c.

Edward de Vere, EARL OF OXFORD (1550-1604), studied at Cambridge, succeeded his father as seventeenth earl in 1562, and, already a favoured courtier, married Burghley's daughter in 1571. He was handsome, accomplished, foppish, luxurious, ruinously extravagant, and unbearably insolent and wrong-headed. He called Sidney a puppy, but was not allowed by the queen to accept Sidney's challenge. He was appointed to high offices, was special commissioner for the trial of Mary Queen of Scots, and acted as Lord Chamberlain at James I.'s coronation. But his estates had to be sold, and Burghley had to provide for his family. Yet some twenty-three of his poems (including 'If Women Would be Fair and yet not Fond') remain to support the contemporary judgment that he was one of the best of the courtier poets of Elizabeth's early reign; they were printed in the Paradyse of Daynty Devises and other anthologies. Puttenham illustrated his English Poesie with one of the best known, given below; Grosart printed all that could be attributed to Oxford in his Miscellanies of the Fuller Worthy Library (1872).

Fancy and Desire.

Come hither, shepherd's swaine !

Sir, what doe ye require ?

I pray thee shew to me thy name !

My name is Fond Desire.

When werthe thou borne, Desyre ?

In pryde and pompe of May.

By whom, sweet boy, wert thou begott ?

By selfe-conceyte, men say.

Tell me who was thy nourse ?

Freshe youthe, in sugred ioye,

What was thy meat and dayly food ?

Sad syghes and great annoy.

What haddest thou than to drinke ?

Unfayned lovers' teares.

What cradle wert thou rocked in ?

In hope devoyde of feares.

What lulled thee to thy sleepe ?

Sweet thoughtes which lyked one beste.

And wher is now thy dwelling place ?

In gentle hearts I rest.

What thing doth please thee most ?

To gaze on beauty still.

Whom dost thou think to be thy foe ?

Disdayne of my good will.

Dothe companye displease ?

It dothe in manye one.

Where would Desyre than chuse to be ?

then

He loves to muse alone.

Will ever age or death

Bring thee unto decaye ?

Noe, noe ! Desyre both lives and dyes

A thousande tymes a daye.

Then, fond Desyre, farewell !

Thou art no mate for me ;

I should be lothe methinks to dwell

With such a one as thee.

Another short poem runs thus :

Doth sorrow fret thy soule ? O direfull spirit.

Doth pleasure feed thy heart ? O blessed man.

Hast thou bene happie once ? O heavy plight.

Are thy mishaps forepast ? O happie than.

Or hast thou blisse in eld ? O blisse too late.

But hast thou blisse in youth ? O sweet estate.

Thomas Watson (1557?-1592) was author of Hecatompithia, or Pessionate Centurie of Love (1582), a series of sonnets; Amyntæ Gaudia (in Latin, 1585); Italian Madrigals Englished (1590), one of which is quoted above at page 274; The Tears of Fancie (1593). He translated the Antigone of Sophocles into Latin. In the Hecatompithia, 'a hundred passions,' a hundred eighteen-line poems called 'sonnets,' describe each a several passion; two of these are given below. But the lovemaking was as artificial as the record of it; though Watson ranks high among the 'amoretists,' Professor Arber reprinted the Hecatompithia, the Tears of Fancie, and some of Watson's other things (1870) in his 'English Reprints.'

When Maye is in his prime, and youthfull Spring
Doth cloath the tree with leaves and ground with flowres,
And time of yere reviveth every thing,
And lovely nature smiles and nothing lowres ;
Then Philomela most doth straine her brest
With night-complaints, and sits in litle rest.
This birds estate I may compare with mine,
To whom fond Love doth worke such wrongs by day,
That in the night my heart must needes repine,
And storm with sighes to ease me as I may ;
Whilst others are becalm'd or lye them still,
Or sayle secure with tide and winde at will.
And as all those which heare this bird complaine
Conceive in all her tunes a sweete delight,
Without remorse or pitying her payne ;
So she, for whom I wayle both day and night,
Doth sport her selfe in hearing my complaint ;
A just reward for serving such a saint !

Time wasteth yeeres, and months, and howrs ;
Time doth consume fame, honour, witt, and strength ;
Time kills the greenest herbes and sweetest flow'rs ;
Time weares out Youth and Beauties looks at length ;
Time doth convey to ground both foe and friend,
And each thing els but Love, which hath no end.

Time maketh every tree to die and rott ;
 Time turneth ofte our pleasures into paine ;
 Time causeth warres and wronges to be forgott ;
 Time cleares the skie which first hung full of rayne ;
 Time makes an end of all humane desire,
 But onely this which settis my heart on fire.
 Time turneth into naught each princely state ;
 Time brings a fludd from newe resolved snowe :
 Time calmes the sea where tempest was of late ;
 Time eates whate'er the moone can see belowe ;
 And yet no time prevails in my behove,
 Nor any time can make me cease to love !

Henry Constable (1562–1613), poet, the son of Sir Robert Constable of Newark, at sixteen entered St John's College, Cambridge, early turned Catholic, and betook himself to Paris. He was an active Catholic negotiator, conducted a mission to James VI. at Edinburgh (without result) on behalf of the papal powers, and was by-and-by pensioned by the French king. But he maintained his political loyalty, though on his return to England in 1604 he was for a few months confined in the Tower. He died at Liège. In 1592 was published his Diana, a collection of twenty-three sonnets; two years later, the second edition, containing seventy-six, but some of these were by his friend Sir Philip Sidney and other poets. 'The Shepherds Song of Venus and Adonis,' one of four pastoral poems contributed by him to England's Helicon, was thought by Malone and others to have suggested Shakespeare's Venus and Adonis. See W. C. Hazlitt's edition of his works (1859), and J. Gray's (1897). The following is one of Constable's sonnets :

My ladies presence makes the Roses red,
 because to see her lips they blush for shame ;
 the lyllyes leaves for envie pale became,
 and her white hands in them this envie bred.
 The Marigold the leaves abroad doth spread,
 because the sunnes and her power are the same ;
 the Violet of purple coulour came,
 dyed in the blood shee made my hart to shed.
 In briebe all flowers from her their vertue take ;
 from her sweet breath their sweet smels do proceede ;
 the living heate which her eye beames doth make warmeth the ground and quickeneth the seede :
 The raine wherewith shee watereth the flowers
 Falls from mine eyes which she dissolves in showers.

Venus and Adonis begins thus :

Venus fair did ride,
 Silver doves they drew her,
 By the pleasant lawnds
 Ere the sun did rise ;
 Vestas beauty rich
 Open'd wide to view her ;
 Philomel records
 Pleasing harmonies.

Barnabe Barnes (1569–1609), son of the Bishop of Durham, approved himself a true poet, but had been well-nigh forgotten when in 1875 Dr Grosart reprinted his poems—Parthenophil, containing 'sonnets, madrigals, elegies and odes,' by far his best work, and a collection of Spiritual Sonnets. He also wrote an unpleasant tragedy,

The Devil's Charter, and a treatise on political offices and duties ; as a friend and collaborator of Gabriel Harvey, he suffered at the hands of Nash and his allies ; and see below at Shakespeare, page 364. Professor Arber included Parthenophil in his English Garner (vol. v. 1882). This 'echo sonnet' from Parthenophil shows Barnes perhaps at his worst, but is a fair specimen of the uncouth and inartistic artificialities to which writers of really fine verse sometimes condescended (rew being a form of 'row,' and here presumably meaning 'rank') :

What be those hairs dyed like the marigold ?
Echo : Gold !
 What is that brow whose frown makes many moan ?
Anemone !
 What were her eyes when they great lords controlled ?
Rolled !
 What be they when from them loves thrown ?
Love's throne !
 What be her cheeks (when blushes rose) like ?
Rose-like !
 What are those lips which 'bove pearls' rew be ?
Ruby !
 Her ivory shoulders, what be those like ?
Those like !
 What saints are like her ! speak, if you be ?
Few be !
 Thou dwelst in rocks, hart-like somewhat, then ?
What then ?
 And rocks dwell in her heart, is 't true ?
'Tis true !
 Whom she loves best, know this cannot men.
Not men !
 Pass him she loathes ! Then I dismiss you.
Miss you !
 What's sex to whom men sue so vain much ?
Vain much !
 Furies their fires, and I complain such ?
Plain such !

Lord Vaux and Nicholas Grim(m)old were amongst the contributors to Tottel's 'Miscellany.' Other sonneteers and minor poets of the period were : William Percy (1575–1648), third son of the eighth Earl of Northumberland, a fellow-student at Oxford and close friend of Barnes's, who produced in 1594 a volume of sonnets called Calia.—Henry Lok, or Locke (1553?–1608?), son of a London mercer, published upwards of three hundred sonnets on Christian Passions, Conscience, and the like, which show more piety than poetry, and his sixty secular ones are hardly more valuable. He also versified Ecclesiastes and some of the Psalms.—R. Griffin—probably Bartholomew Griffin—who published in 1596 a collection of sixty-two sonnets called Fidessa, some of them admirable. He may have been an attorney, but the facts of his life are little known.—Richard Linche, or Lynche, who wrote two unimportant prose works, is believed to have been the R. L. who in 1596 published a collection of thirty-eight sonnets somewhat unequal in quality.—William Smith, another Spenserian sonneteer, is remembered chiefly for his collection of over fifty sonnets called Chloris, published in 1596.

Richard Hooker.

Richard Hooker, one of the great glories of the English Church, was born in Exeter in March 1554, of a family originally called Vowell, his uncle being city chamberlain (see the article on Holinshed). At school he displayed so much aptitude for learning and gentleness of disposition that, having been recommended to Jewel, Bishop of Salisbury, he was sent by him to Oxford. At the university he studied with ardour and success. Sandys, Bishop of London, put his son under Hooker's care. Another of his pupils was George Cranmer, a grand-nephew of the archbishop; and with both these young men he formed a close and enduring friendship. In 1579 his skill in Oriental languages led to his temporary appointment as deputy-professor of Hebrew; and two years later he entered into holy orders. Not long after this he had the misfortune to be led into a marriage which proved a constant source of annoyance to him during life. The tale is told by his biographer, Izaak Walton, whose picture of the saintly and simple-minded theologian is one of the most perfect things in English biography. But it must be remembered that Walton did not sketch from life: Keble pointed out that the excessive meekness and simplicity of the sketch hardly harmonise with the insight, incisiveness, and humour shown in Hooker's works. Dean Paget thinks there are but a few grains of truth in the gossip Walton got from Hooker's pupils Sandys and Cranmer; but there seems no doubt Mrs Hooker was a shrew from whom her husband got little sympathy. Appointed to preach at Paul's Cross in London, Hooker put up at a house set apart for the reception of the preachers. On his arrival there from Oxford he was wet and weary, but received so much kindness and attention from the hostess that, according to Walton, 'he thought himself bound in conscience to believe all that she said. So the good man came to be persuaded by her that he was a man of a tender constitution; and that it was best for him to have a wife, that might prove a nurse to him—such a one as might both prolong his life, and make it more comfortable; and such a one she could and would provide for him, if he thought fit to marry.' Hooker authorising her to select a wife for him, she not unnaturally selected her own daughter, 'a silly, clownish woman, and withal a mere Xantippe.' With this helpmate he led but an uncomfortable life, though apparently in a spirit of resignation. When visited by Sandys and Cranmer at the Buckinghamshire rectory to which he had been presented in 1584, he was found by them reading Horace and tending sheep in the absence of his servant. In his house they received little entertainment except from his conversation; and even this Mrs Hooker did not fail to disturb, by calling him away to rock the cradle, and by exhibiting such other shrewish dispositions as made them glad to depart on the following morning. In taking leave, Cranmer expressed his regret at the smallness of Hooker's income and the uncomfortable state of his domestic affairs; to which the worthy man replied, 'My dear George, if saints have usually a double share in the miseries of this life, I, that am none, ought not to repine at what my wise Creator hath appointed for me, but labour—as indeed I do daily—to submit mine to His will, and possess my soul in patience and peace.' On his return to London, Sandys made a strong appeal to his father in behalf of Hooker, the result of which was the appointment of the meek divine, in 1585, to the office of Master of the Temple. He accordingly removed to London, and commenced his labours as forenoon preacher. Now, the afternoon lecturer was Walter Travers, a man of great learning and eloquence, but a Puritan and high Calvinist, whereas Hooker's views, both on church-government and theology, were 'judicious' and moderate. The consequence was that 'the forenoon sermons spoke Canterbury, and the afternoon Geneva;' Travers sometimes even expressly denounced the latitudinarianism of his colleague; and in consequence of these controversies Whitgift suspended Travers from preaching. Travers appealed to the Council with charges against Hooker's doctrine; and Hooker answered conclusively. But to Hooker the personal controversy was so vexatious that he strongly expressed to the archbishop his wish to retire into the country, where he might live in peace and have leisure to finish his treatise Of the Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity. A letter he wrote to the archbishop shows his temper and aim:

RICHARD HOOKER.

(After Hollar.)

MY LORD—When I lost the freedom of my cell, which was my college; yet I found some degree of it in my quiet country parsonage; but I am weary of the noise and oppositions of this place, and indeed God and nature did not intend me for contentions, but for study and quietness. And, my lord, my particular contests here with Mr Travers have proved the more unpleasant to me, because I believe him to be a good man; and that belief hath occasioned me to examine mine own conscience concerning his opinions; and to satisfy that, I have consulted the holy Scripture and other laws, both human and divine, whether the conscience of him and others of his judgment ought to be so far complied with by us as to alter our frame of Church-government, our manner of God's worship, our praising and praying to him, and our established ceremonies, as often as their tender consciences shall require us; and in this examination I have not only satisfied myself, but have begun a Treatise in which I intend the satisfaction of others, by a demonstration of the reasonableness of the Laws of our Ecclesiastical Polity; in which design God and his holy Angels shall at the last great day bear me that witness which my conscience now does; that my meaning is not to provoke any, but rather to satisfy all tender consciences, and I shall never be able to do this but where I may study, and pray for God's blessing upon my endeavours, and keep myself in peace and privacy, and behold God's blessing spring out of my mother earth, and eat my own bread without oppositions; and therefore, if your Grace can judge me worthy of such a favour, let me beg it, that I may perfect what I have begun.

In consequence of this appeal, Hooker was presented in 1591 to the rectory of Boscombe, in Wiltshire; there he finished four books of his treatise (printed in 1594). He became sub-dean and prebendary of Sarum, and in 1595 was presented to the rectory of Bishopsbourne, in Kent. Here he wrote the fifth book, published in 1597, and on 2nd November 1600 he died. The sixth and eighth books appeared in 1648; the seventh in 1662. Doubts were raised as to the genuineness of the sixth book; it is certainly out of keeping with the general plan of the work, but Keble had no doubt it was substantially Hooker's work, though not designed as part of the Polity. The seventh and eighth books were probably written from Hooker's notes by Gauden, the editor or author of the Eikon Basilike.

Hooker's Ecclesiastical Polity is an unsurpassed masterpiece of reasoning and eloquence; its diction majestic, sonorous, and rhythmical. But the style is eminently Latinised, and so at times somewhat rhetorical and artificial; and the sentences are not seldom intolerably long, with inconvenient breaks and parentheses. 'So stately and graceful is the march of his periods,' said Hallam, 'so various the fall of his musical cadences upon the ear, so rich in images, so condensed in sentences, so grave and noble his diction, so little is there of vulgarity in his racy idiom, of pedantry in his learned phrase, that I know not whether any later writer has more admirably displayed the capacities of our language, or produced passages more worthy of comparison with the splendid monuments of antiquity.'

The argument against Roman Catholics and Puritans alike is conducted by Hooker with rare moderation and candour, and on broad general principles, not on detached texts or interpretations of Scripture. The fundamental idea is the unity and all-embracing character of law as the manifestation of the divine order of the universe, the outward expression of the mind of God, identical with reason. 'It was a kind of maxim among the Puritans that Scripture was so much the exclusive rule of human actions, that whatever, in matters at least concerning religion, could not be found to have its authority, was unlawful. Hooker devoted the whole second book of his work to the refutation of this principle. He proceeded afterwards to attack its application, more particularly to the episcopal scheme of church-government, and to the various ceremonies or usages which those sectaries treated as either absolutely superstitious, or at least as impositions without authority. It was maintained by this great writer, not only that ritual observances are variable according to the discretion of ecclesiastical rulers, but that no certain form of polity is set down in Scripture as generally indispensable for a Christian church.' The guide of human conduct is not Scripture alone, but the concurrent instruction of all the sources of knowledge Providence has put at man's command. The work is not a vast controversial pamphlet, but a monument of massive logic and masterly philosophical thought—one of the earliest and greatest in the English tongue. It is fair to say that to the Ecclesiastical Polity of the 'judicious Hooker' Anglican theology owes the tone and direction which largely still characterise it. 'It is claimed for this great book,' Dean Paget says, 'that it first revealed to the nation what English prose might be. It is significant that even those who censured him felt that somehow he stood apart, and that later ages have looked back to him as eminent even in the period of Spenser, of Shakespeare, and of Bacon.'

There is a preface—not too conciliatory—to them that 'seek (as they term it) the reformation of the laws and orders ecclesiastical in the Church of England,' which begins thus:

Though for no other cause, yet for this; that posterity may know we have not loosely through silence permitted things to pass away as in a dream, there shall be for men's information extant thus much concerning the present state of the Church of God established amongst us, and their careful endeavour which would have upheld the same. At your hands, beloved in our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ (for in him the love which we bear unto all that would but seem to be born of him, it is not the sea of your gall and bitterness that shall ever drown), I have no great cause to look for other than the selfsame portion and lot, which your manner hath been hitherto to lay on them that concur not in opinion and sentence with you. But our hope is, that the God of peace shall (notwithstanding man's nature too impatient of contumelious malediction) enable us quietly and even gladly to suffer all things, for that work sake which we covet to perform. [He tells the malcontents by whom 'their discipline was planted.] A founder it had, whom, for mine own part, I think incomparably the wisest man that ever the French church did enjoy, since the hour it enjoyed him. His bringing up was in the study of the civil law. Divine knowledge he gathered, not by hearing or reading so much, as by teaching others. For, though thousands were debtors to him, as touching knowledge in that kind; yet he to none but only to God, the author of that most blessed fountain, the Book of Life, and of the admirable dexterity of wit, together with the helps of other learning which were his guides: till being occasioned to leave France, he fell at the length upon Geneva; which city the bishop and clergy thereof had a little before (as some do affirm) forsaken, being of likelihood frightened with the people's sudden attempt for abolishment of Popish religion: the event of which enterprise they thought it not safe for themselves to wait for in that place. At the coming of Calvin thither, the form of their civil regiment was popular, as it continueth at this day: neither king, nor duke, nor nobleman of any authority or power over them, but officers chosen by the people yearly out of themselves, to order all things with public consent. For spiritual government, they had no laws at all agreed upon, but did what the pastors of their souls by persuasion could win them unto. Calvin, being admitted one of their preachers, and a divinity reader amongst them, considered how dangerous it was that the whole estate of that church should hang still on so slender a thread, as the liking of an ignorant multitude is, if it have power to change whatsoever itself listeth. [And so he expounds the Calvinistic system, as he conceived it.]

The Nature and Majesty of Law.

And if any complain of obscurity, they must consider that in these matters it cometh no otherwise to pass than in sundry the works both of art and also of nature, where that which hath greatest force in the very things we see, is notwithstanding itself oftentimes not seen. The stateliness of houses, the goodness of trees, when we behold them, delighteth the eye; but that foundation which beareth up the one, that root which ministereth unto the other nourishment and life, is in the bosom of the earth concealed; and if there be at any time occasion to search into it, such labour is then more necessary than pleasant, both to them which undertake it and for the lookers on. In like manner the use and benefit of good laws all that live under them may enjoy with delight and comfort, albeit the grounds and first original causes from whence they have sprung be unknown, as to the greatest part of men they are. But when they who withdraw their obedience pretend that the laws which they should obey are corrupt and vicious; for better examination of their quality, it behoveth the very foundation and root, the highest well-spring and fountain of them, to be discovered. Which because we are not oftentimes accustomed to do, when we do it, the pains we take are more needful a great deal than acceptable; and the matters which we handle seem by reason of newness (till the mind grow better acquainted with them) dark, intricate, and unfamiliar. . . .

And because the point about which we strive is the quality of our laws, our first entrance hereinto cannot better be made than with consideration of the nature of law in general. . . .

All things that are have some operation not violent or casual. Neither doth anything ever begin to exercise the same without some fore-conceived end for which it worketh. And the end which it worketh for is not obtained, unless the work be also fit to obtain it by. For unto every end every operation will not serve. That which doth assign unto each thing the kind, that which doth moderate the force and power, that which doth appoint the form and measure of working, the same we term a Law. So that no certain end could ever be obtained unless the actions whereby it is obtained were regular, that is to say, made suitable, fit, and correspondent unto their end by some canon, rule, or law. Which thing doth first take place in the works even of God himself.

(From Book i. chap. 1.)

Dangerous it were for the feeble brain of man to wade far into the doings of the Most High; whom although to know be life, and joy to make mention of his name; yet our soundest knowledge is to know that we know him not as indeed he is, neither can know him: and our safest eloquence concerning him is our silence, when we confess without confession, that his glory is inexplicable, his greatness above our capacity and reach. He is above, and we upon earth; therefore it behoveth our words to be wary and few.

(From Book i. chap. 2.)

Moses in describing the work of creation attributeth speech unto God: 'God said, let there be light; let there be a firmament; let the waters under the heaven be gathered together into one place; let the earth bring forth; let there be lights in the firmament of heaven.' Was this only the intent of Moses, to signify the infinite greatness of God's power by the easiness of his accomplishing such effects, without travail, pain, or labour? Surely it seemeth that Moses had herein besides this a further purpose, namely, first to teach that God did not work as a necessary, but a voluntary agent, intending beforehand and decreeing with himself that which did outwardly proceed from him; secondly, to shew that God did then institute a law natural to be observed by creatures, and therefore, according to the manner of laws, the institution thereof is described as being established by solemn injunction. His commanding those things to be which are, and to be in such sort as they are, to keep that tenure and course which they do, importeth the establishment of nature's law. This world's first creation, and the preservation since of things created, what is it but only so far forth a manifestation by execution, what the eternal law of God is concerning things natural? And as it cometh to pass in a kingdom rightly ordered that after a law is once published it presently takes effect far and wide, all states framing themselves thereunto; even so let us think it saith in the natural course of the world: since the time that God did first proclaim the edicts of his law upon it, heaven and earth have hearkened unto his voice, and their labour hath been to do his will. He 'made a law for the rain,' he gave his 'decree unto the sea, that the waters should not pass his commandment.' Now, if nature should intermit her course, and leave altogether, though it were but for a while, the observation of her own laws; if those principal and mother elements of the world, whereof all things in this lower world are made, should lose the qualities which now they have; if the frame of that heavenly arch erected over our heads should loosen and dissolve itself; if celestial spheres should forget their wonted motions, and by irregular volubility turn themselves any way as it might happen; if the prince of the lights of heaven, which now as a giant doth run his unwearied course, should, as it were through a languishing faintness, begin to stand and to rest himself; if the moon should wander from her beaten way, the times and seasons of the year blend themselves by disordered and confused mixture, the winds breathe out their last gasp, the clouds yield no rain, the earth be defeated of heavenly influence, the fruits of the earth pine away as children at the withered breasts of their mother, no longer able to yield them relief: what would become of man himself, whom these things now do all serve? See we not plainly that obedience of creatures unto the law of nature is the stay of the whole world?

(From Book i. chap. 3.)

Wherefore that here we may briefly end: Of Law there can be no less acknowledged than that her seat is the bosom of God, her voice the harmony of the world: all things in heaven and earth do her homage; the very least as feeling her care, and the greatest as not exempted from her power: both Angels and men, and creatures of what condition soever, though each in different sort and manner, yet all with uniform consent, admiring her as the mother of their peace and joy.

(From Book i. chap. 18.)

Scripture and the Law of Nature.

What the Scripture purposeth, the same in all points it doth perform. Howbeit that here we swerve not in judgment, one thing especially we must observe; namely, that the absolute perfection of Scripture is seen by relation unto that end whereto it tendeth. And even hereby it cometh to pass that first such as imagine the general and main drift of the body of sacred Scripture not to be so large as it is, nor that God did thereby intend to deliver, as in truth he doth, a full instruction in all things unto salvation necessary, the knowledge whereof man by nature could not otherwise in this life attain unto; they are by this very mean induced either still to look for new revelations from heaven, or else dangerously to add to the Word of God uncertain tradition, that so the doctrine of man's salvation may be complete; which doctrine we constantly hold in all respects without any such things added to be so complete that we utterly refuse as much as once to acquaint ourselves with anything further. Whatsoever to make up the doctrine of man's salvation is added, as in supply of the Scripture's unsufficiency, we reject it; Scripture purposing this, hath perfectly and fully done it. Again, the scope and purpose of God in delivering the holy Scripture, such as do take more largely than behoveth, they, on the contrary, side-racking and stretching it further than by him was meant, are drawn into sundry as great inconveniences. These pretending the Scripture's perfection, infer thereupon that in Scripture all things lawful to be done must needs be contained. We count those things perfect which want nothing requisite for the end whereto they were instituted. As therefore God created every part and particle of man exactly perfect, that is to say in all points sufficient unto that use for which he appointed it; so the Scripture, yea, every sentence thereof, is perfect, and wanteth nothing requisite unto that purpose for which God delivered the same. So that, if hereupon we conclude that because the Scripture is perfect, therefore all things lawful to be done are comprehended in the Scripture; we may even as well conclude so of every sentence, as of the whole sum and body thereof, unless we first of all prove that it was the drift, scope, and purpose of Almighty God in Holy Scripture to comprise all things which man may practise. But admit this, and mark, I beseech you, what would follow. God, in delivering Scripture to his Church, should clean have abrogated among them the Law of Nature, which is an infallible knowledge imprinted in the minds of all the children of men, whereby both general principles for directing of human actions are comprehended, and conclusions derived from them; upon which conclusions groweth in particularity the choice of good and evil in the daily affairs of this life. Admit this, and what shall the Scripture be but a snare and a torment to weak consciences, filling them with infinite perplexities, scrupulosities, doubts insoluble, and extreme despairs? Not that the Scripture itself doth cause any such thing (for it tendeth to the clean contrary, and the fruit thereof is resolute assurance and certainty in that it teacheth), but the necessities of this life urging men to do that which the light of nature, common discretion, and judgment of itself directeth them unto; on the other side, this doctrine teaching them that so to do were to sin against their own souls, and that they put forth their hands to iniquity, whatsoever they go about, and have not first the sacred Scripture of God for direction; how can it choose but bring the simple a thousand times to their wits' end; how can it choose but vex and amaze them? For in every action of common life to find out some sentence clearly and infallibly setting before our eyes what we ought to do (seem we in Scripture never so expert) would trouble us more than we are aware. In weak and tender minds we little know what misery this strict opinion would breed, besides the stops it would make in the whole course of all men's lives and actions. Make all things sin which we do by direction of nature's light, and by the rule of common discretion, without thinking at all upon Scripture; admit this position, and parents shall cause their children to sin, as oft as they cause them to do anything, before they come to years of capacity and be ripe for knowledge in the Scripture; admit this, and it shall not be with masters as it was with him in the gospel, but servants being commanded to go, shall stand still till they have their errand warranted unto them by Scripture. Which, as it standeth with Christian duty in some cases, so in common affairs to require it were most unfit.

(From Book ii. chap. 8.)

Defence of Reason.

But so it is, the name of the light of nature is made hateful with men; the 'star of reason and learning,' and all other suchlike helps, beginneth no otherwise to be thought of than if it were an unlucky comet; or as if God had so accursed it, that it should never shine or give light in things concerning our duty any way towards him, but be esteemed as that star in the Revelation, called Wormwood, which being fallen from heaven maketh rivers and waters in which it falleth so bitter that men tasting them die thereof. A number there are who think they cannot admire as they ought the power and authority of the Word of God, if in things divine they should attribute any force to man's reason. For which cause they never use reason so willingly as to disgrace reason. Their usual and common discourses are unto this effect. First, 'the natural man perceiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him ; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned.' . . . By these and the like disputes an opinion hath spread itself very far in the world, as if the way to be ripe in faith were to be raw in wit and judgment ; as if Reason were an enemy unto Religion, childish Simplicity the mother of ghostly and Divine Wisdom. . . .

To our purpose it is sufficient that whosoever doth serve, honour, and obey God, whosoever believeth in him, that man would no more do this than innocents and infants do, but for the light of natural reason that shineth in him, and maketh him apt to apprehend those things of God, which being by grace discovered, are effectual to persuade reasonable minds and none other, that honour, obedience, and credit belong aright unto God. No man cometh unto God to offer him sacrifice, to pour out supplications and prayers before him, or to do him any service, which doth not first believe him both to be, and to be a rewarder of them who in such sort seek unto him. Let men be taught this either by revelation from heaven, or by instruction upon earth ; by labour, study, and meditation, or by the only secret inspiration of the Holy Ghost ; whatsoever the mean be they know it by, if the knowledge thereof were possible without discourse of natural reason, why should none be found capable thereof but only men ; nor men till such time as they come unto ripe and full ability to work by reasonable understanding ? The whole drift of the Scripture of God, what is it but only to teach Theology ? Theology, what is it but the science of things divine ? What science can be attained unto without the help of natural discourse and reason ? 'Judge ye of that which I speak,' saith the apostle. In vain it were to speak anything of God, but that by reason men are able somewhat to judge of that they hear, and by discourse to discern how consonant it is to truth. Scripture, indeed, teacheth things above nature, things which our reason by itself could not reach unto. Yet those also we believe, knowing by reason that the Scripture is the word of God. . . .

The thing we have handled according to the question moved about it ; which question is, whether the light of reason be so pernicious that, in devising laws for the church, men ought not by it to search what may be fit and convenient. For this cause therefore we have endeavoured to make it appear how in the nature of reason itself there is no impediment, but that the self-same spirit which revealeth the things that God hath set down in his law, may also be thought to aid and direct men in finding out by the light of reason what laws are expedient to be made for the guiding of his church, over and besides them that are in Scripture.

(From Book iii. chaps. 8. and 9.)

Keble's edition of Hooker (1836 ; 7th ed. revised by Church and Paget, 1888) superseded all earlier ones ; it comprised Walton's Life and a full introduction by Keble. See also the introductions to Book V. by Paget (1899) and Bayne (1902), and Thornton's study (1924).

Henry Smith (1550?-1591) was called by contemporaries the 'silver-tongued Smith,' and esteemed the 'prime preacher of the nation ;' and Anthony Wood records him as the 'miracle and wonder of his age' for eloquence in the pulpit. He was the son of a gentleman of good estate in Leicestershire, studied at Lincoln College, Oxford, and, drawn into church work in spite of difficulties about subscription, became a 'lecturer' at St Clement Danes in London. He was suspended for Puritanism, but restored as being in full sympathy with the Church in faith and doctrine, though doubtful about minor details of discipline. His sermons, remarkable as specimens of English prose, have been commended as specially 'free from the besetting vices of the age—vulgarity and quaintness and affected learning.' The following passage on the two consciences is from Smith's famous sermon on 'The Betraying of Christ' :

If we would judge ourselves, we should not be judged. Be not deceived ; for sin doth not end as it begins. When the terrors of Judas come upon the soul, the tongue cannot hide his sins ; for despair and horror will not be smothered ; but he which hath Saul's spirit haunting him, will rage as Saul did. There is a warning conscience, and a gnawing conscience. The warning conscience cometh before sin ; the gnawing conscience followeth after sin. The warning conscience is often lulled asleep ; but the gnawing conscience wakeneth her again. If there be any hell in this world, they which feel the worm of conscience gnaw upon their hearts, may truly say that they have felt the torments of hell. Who can express that man's horror but himself ? Nay, what horrors are there which he cannot express himself ? Sorrows are met in his soul at a feast ; and fear, thought, and anguish divide his soul between them. All the furies of hell leap upon his heart like a stage. Thought calleth to fear, fear whistleth to horror, horror beckoneth to despair, and saith, Come and help me to torment this sinner. One saith that she cometh from this sin, and another saith that she cometh from that sin ; so he goeth through a thousand deaths and cannot die. Irons are laid upon his body like a prisoner : all his lights are put out at once : he hath no soul fit to be comforted. Thus he lies as it were upon the rack, and saith that he bears the world upon his shoulders, and that no man suffereth that which he suffereth. So let him lie (saith God) without ease, until he confess and repent, and call for mercy. This is the goodly way which the serpent said would make you gods, and made him a devil. Therefore at the last learn the sleight of Satan in this wretched traitor. His subtilties are well called the depths of Satan ; for he is so deep that few can sound him.

Richard Hakluyt (1552?-1616) was a laborious compiler, to whom the world is indebted for the preservation of narratives which might otherwise have fallen into oblivion, especially on the maritime adventures and discoveries of his countrymen. Hakluyt came of a family originally Dutch but settled for two centuries in Herefordshire (where the name was spelt in many ways, including Hacklewight !), and received his elementary education at Westminster School. He afterwards studied at Christ Church, Oxford, where he engaged in an extensive course of reading in various languages, on geographical and nautical subjects ; he was appointed to lecture at Oxford on cosmography and the collateral sciences, and carried on a correspondence with those celebrated Continental geographers, Ortelius and Mercator. For five years he was in Paris as chaplain to the English ambassador, during which time he cultivated the acquaintance of persons eminent for their knowledge of geography and maritime history. On his return from France in 1588, Sir Walter Raleigh appointed him one of the society of counsellors, assistants, and adventurers, to whom he assigned his patent for the prosecution of discoveries in America. He was in 1590 made rector of Wetheringsett, in Suffolk; was prebendary and archdeacon of Westminster, and chaplain of the Savoy; and was buried in Westminster Abbey. See Life by Parkes (N.Y. 1929). In 1582 and 1584 he had published two small collections of voyages to America; but these are included in a much larger work (3 vols. 1589) entitled The Principall Navigations, Voiages, Traffiques, and Discoveries of the English Nation, made by Sea or over Land, to the Remote and Farthest Distant Quarters of the Earth, at any Time within the Compass of these 1500 Years. In the first volume are contained voyages to the north and north-east; the true state of Iceland; the defeat of the Spanish Armada; the expedition under the Earl of Essex to Cadiz, &c. In the second he relates voyages to the south and south-east; and in the third, expeditions to North America, the West Indies, and round the world. Narratives are given of nearly two hundred and twenty voyages, besides many relative documents, such as patents, instructions, and letters. To this collection all the subsequent compilers in this department have been largely indebted. In the preliminary essay on the history of navigation prefixed to Churchill's Collection of Voyages, of which John Locke was—on doubtful grounds—said to be the author (though he certainly helped in collecting the material), Hakluyt's collection is spoken of as 'valuable for the good there to be picked out: but it might be wished the author had been less voluminous, delivering what was really authentic and useful, and not stuffing his work with so many stories taken upon trust, so many trading voyages that have nothing new in them, so many warlike exploits not at all pertinent to his undertaking, and such a multitude of articles, charters, privileges, letters, relations, and other things little to the purpose of travels and discoveries.' These documentary authentications would now be thought in nowise irrelevant or out of place in such a work. And when Froude called Hakluyt's Navigations 'the prose epic of the modern English nation,' he was probably rejoicing as much in these same warlike exploits the philosophical editor disapproved as in the more purely exploratory adventures. The poetry of this epic, it should be added, lies rather in the facts themselves than in any creative effort of Hakluyt's. For he keeps himself studiously in the background, and wrote little in his own name; though he could, and did, write admirably—witness his preface; and doubtless many of the narratives he professes to give in the writers' words owe much to his editorial pen, systematising and abridging in his own excellent

English. He issued a second edition in 1598–1600. A new edition (5 vols., 4to, 1809–12) containing a supplement of tales collected by Hakluyt was added. He translated French voyages to Florida, and, from the Portuguese, the travels of Ferdinand de Soto, in what was then called Virginia. His papers came into the hands of Purchas, and were used for the Pilgrims; and the Hakluyt Society was founded in 1846 for publishing the records of early voyages and travels. Hakluyt begins his Navigations (standard edition in 12 vols. 1903–5) with a few fables, in sharp contrast to the conscientiously realistic and authentic records of which all but the first two or three voyages consist. The first, unhappily, is a purely mythical 'Voyage of Arthur, King of Britaine, to Island and the most north-eastern parts of Europe, Anno 517,' taken, like the second, the voyage of Malgo, an even less-known British king, from Geoffrey of Monmouth and other Latin chroniclers. Real history begins in the fourth and fifth with stories from Bede. Othter's (Oththere's, see page 20) is the fifth voyage. The following is part of Hakluyt's own preface:

For (to conteine myselfe onely within the bounds of this present discourse, and in the midst thereof to begin) wil it not in all posteritie be as great a renowme unto our English nation, to have bene the first discoverers of a Sea beyond the North cape (never certainly knownen before) and of a convenient passage into the huge Empire of Russia by the bay of S. Nicholas and the river of Duina, as for the Portugales to have found a Sea beyond the Cape of Buona Esperanza, and so consequently a passage by Sea into the East Indies; or for the Italians and Spaniards to have discovered unknown landes so many hundred leagues Westward and Southward of the streits of Gibraltar, & of the pillars of Hercules? Be it granted that the renowned Portogale Vasques de Gama traversed the maine Ocean Southward of Africke: Did not Richard Chanceler and his mates performe the like Northward of Europe? Suppose that Columbus that noble and high-spirited Genuois escried unknown landes to the Westward of Europe and Africke: Did not the valiant English knight sir Hugh Willoughby; did not the famous Pilots Stephen Burrough, Arthur Pet, and Charles Jackman accoast Nova Zembla, Colgoieve, and Vaigatz to the North of Europe and Asia? Howbeit you will say perhaps, not with the like golden successe, not with such deductions of Colonies, nor attaining of conquests. True it is that our successe hath not bene correspondent unto theirs: yet in this our attempt the uncertaintie of finding was farre greater, and the difficultie and danger of searching was no whit lesse. For hath not Herodotus (a man for his time, most skilfull and judicial in Cosmographie, who writ above 2000 yeeres ago) in his 4. booke called Melpomene, signified unto the Portugales in plaine termes, that Africa, except the small Isthmus between the Arabian gulfe and the Mediterranean sea, was on all sides environed with the Ocean? And for the further confirmation thereof, doth he not make mention of one Neco an Ægyptian King, who (for trials sake) sent a fleet of Phoenicians downe the Red sea; who setting forth in Autumne and sailing Southward till they had the Sunne at noonetide upon their sterboud (that is to say, having crossed the Æquinoctial and the Southerne tropique) after a long navigation, directed their course to the North, and in the space of 3 yeeres environed all Africk, passing home through the Gaditan streites, and arriving in Ægypt? And doth not Plinie tel them that Noble Hanno, in the flourishing time and estate of Carthage, sailed from Gades in Spaine to the coast of Arabia Fœlix, and put downe his whole journall in writing? Doth he not make mention that in the time of Augustus Cæsar, the wracke of certaine Spanish ships was found floating in the Arabian gulfe? And, not to be over tedious in alleaging of testimonies, doth not Strabo in the 2. booke of his Geography, together with Cornelius Nepos and Plinie in the place beforenamed, agree all in one, that one Eudoxus fleeing from king Lathyrus, and valing [dropping] downe the Arabian bay, sailed along, doubled the Southern point of Africk, and at length arrived at Gades? And what should I speake of the Spaniards? Was not divine Plato (who lived so many ages ago, and plainly described their West Indies under the name of Atlantis) was not he (I say) instead of a Cosmographer unto them? Were not those Carthaginians mentioned by Aristotle lib. de admirabil. auscult. their forerunners? And had they not Columbus to stirre them up, and pricke them forward unto their Western discoveries; yea, to be their chiefe loads-man and Pilot? Sithens therefore these two worthy Nations had those bright lampes of learning (I meane the most ancient and best Philosophers, Historiographers and Geographers) to shewe them light; and the load-starre of experience (to wit those great exploits and voyages layed up in store and recorded) whereby to shape their course: what great attempt might they not presume to undertake? But alas our English nation, at the first setting forth for their Northeasterne discovery, were either altogether destitute of such cleare lights and inducements, or if they had any inking at all, it was as misty as they found the Northren seas, and so obscure and ambiguous, that it was meet rather to deterre them, then to give them encouragement.

But besides the foresaid uncertaintie, into what dangers and difficulties they plunged themselves, Animus meminisse horret, I tremble to recount. For first they were to expose themselves unto the rigour of the sterne and uncouth Northren seas, and to make triall of the swelling waves and boistrous winds which there commonly do surge and blow: then were they to saile by the ragged and perilous coast of Norway, to frequent the unhaunted shoares of Finmark, to double the dreadfull and misty North cape, to beare with Willoughbies land, to run along within kenning of the Countreys of Lapland and Corelia, and as it were to open and unlocke the seven-fold mouth of Duina. Moreover, in their Northeasterly Navigations, upon the seas and by the coasts of Condora, Colgoieve, Petzora, Joughoria, Samoedia, Nova Zembla, &c., and their passing and returne through the streits of Vaigats, unto what drifts of snow and mountaines of yce even in June, July, and August, unto what hideous oversals, uncertaine currents, darke mistes and fogs, and divers other fearefull inconveniences they were subject and in danger of, I wish you rather to learne out of the voyages of sir Hugh Willoughbie, Stephen Burrough, Arthur Pet and the rest, then to expect in this place an endless catalogue thereof. And here by the way I cannot but highly commend the great industry and magnanimity of the Hollanders, who within these few yeeres. have discovered to 78. yea (as themselves affirme) to 81. degrees of Northerly latitude: yet with this proviso; that our English nation led them the dance, brake the yce before them, and gave them good leave to light their candle at our torch. But nowe it is high time for us to weigh our ancre, to hoise up our sailes, to get cleare of these boistrous, frosty, and misty seas, and with all speede to direct our course for the milde, lightsome, temperate, and warme Atlantick Ocean, over which the Spaniards and Portugales have made so many pleasant prosperous and golden voyages. And albeit I cannot deny, that both of them in their East and West Indian Navigations have indured many tempests, dangers, and shipwracks: yet this dare I boldly affirme; first that a great number of them have satisfied their fame-thirsty and gold-thirsty mindes with that reputation and wealth, which made all perils and misadventures seeme tolerable unto them; and secondly, that their first attempts (which in this comparison I doe onely stand upon) were no whit more difficult and dangerous then ours to the Northeast. For admit that the way was much longer, yet was it never barred with ice, mist, or darknes, but was at all seasons of the yeere open and Navigable; yea and that for the most part with fortunate and fit gales of winde.

The following is a brief specimen of the warlike and non-geographical stories the Churchills' editor disapproved:

The 26 of July 1592, in my returning out of Barbary in the ship called the Amity of London, being in the height of 36 degrees or thereabout, at foure of the clocke in the morning we had sight of two shippes, being distant from us about three or foure leagues: by seven of the clocke we fetched them up, and were within gunshot: whose boldnesse, having the king of Spaines armes displayed, did make us judge them rather ships of warre, then laden with marchandise. And as it appeared by their owne speeches, they made full account to have taken us: it being a question among them whether it were best to cary us to S. Lucar, or to Lisbon. We waved ech other a maine. They having placed themselves in warlike order one a cables length before another, we began the fight. In the which we continued, so fast as we were able to charge and discharge, the space of five houres, being never a cables length distant either of us from other. In which time we received divers shot both in the hull of our ship, masts, and sailes, to the number of 32 great, besides 500 musket shot and harquebuzes a crocke [large earthenware jars], at the least, which we tolde after the fight. And because we perceived them to be stout, we thought good to boord the Biscaine, which was on head the other: where lying aboard about an houre, and plying our ordinance and small shot; in the end we stowed all his men. Now the other in the flie-boat, thinking we had entred our men in their fellow, bare roome with us, meaning to have layed us aboard, and so to have intrapped us betwixt them both: which we perceiving, fitted our ordinance so for him, as we quitted our selves of him, and he boorded his fellow: by which meanes they both fell from us. Then presently we kept our loofe [luff], hoised our top-sailes, and weathered them, and came hard aboard the flieboat with our ordinance prepared, and gave her our whole broad side, with the which we slew divers of their men; so as we might see the blood run out at the scupper holes. After that we cast about, and new charged all our ordinance, and came upon them againe, willing them to yeeld, or els we would sinke them : wherupon the one would have yeelded, which was shot betweene winde and water ; but the other called him traitor. Unto whom we made answere, that if he would not yeeld presently also, we would sinke him first. And thereupon he understanding our determination, presently put out a white flag, and yeelded, and yet refused to strike their own sailes, for that they were sworne never to strike to any Englishman. We then commanded their captaines and masters to come aboard us ; which they did. And after examination & stowing them, we sent certaine of our owne men aboard them, and strook their sailes, and manned their ships : finding in them both 126 persons living, & 8 dead, besides those which they themselves had cast overboard. So it pleased God to give us the victory being but 42 men and a boy, whereof 2 were killed and 3 wounded : for the which good successe we give God the only praise. These two rich prizes laden with 1400 chests of quicksilver with the armes of Castile and Leon fastened upon them, and with a great quantity of bulles or indulgences, and gilded Missals or Service books, with an hundred tunnes of excellent wines, we brought shortly after into the river of Thames up to Blacke-wall.

The Elizabethan Sonnet-Cycles.

The sonnet is a species of lyrical poetry which the world owes to the instinct of the Italians for delicate and harmonious form. The word sonnetto gives the effect of the recurring sound of a little peal of bells, skilfully rung once to attract attention or commemorate a passing event. That the sonnet was originally an adaptation from some Provençal lyrical sequence is not doubted, but the whole essence of its merit is its conciseness and rotundity, and its escape from the loose Provençal prodigality of rhyming. The sonnet must have fourteen lines, and an exact sonnet must have five rhymes arranged according to a very precise fashion (abba abba cde cde). This precision was not known to the earliest Italian sonneteers, who, however, never varied the number of lines, and never closed with a couplet. The oldest sonnet extant is believed to be one of considerable irregularity of form, written about 1220 by Piero delle Vigne. In the next generation Guittone di Arezzo, a poet of more industry than genius, gave his attention and its final form to the sonnet. Folgore de San Geminiano, a precursor of Dante, was the first, it appears, to produce a 'cycle' of sonnets—that is, a set of consecutive pieces dealing progressively with a definite theme.

The sonnet, having thus made Italy its home, flourished there, almost unintermittently, for the next five centuries, until it became as easy for an educated Roman or Neapolitan to write a sonnet as to sign his name. Petrarch was the model of excellence to all these generations of poets, and it is to be noted that when the renaissance was complete, and so many of the mediæval forms of literature were done away with, the sonnet was retained out of respect for the humanism of Petrarch. We have drawn attention on page 159 to the sonnets published in the collection which came to be known as 'Tottel's Miscellany' in 1557, in which Wyatt's and Surrey's paraphrases from Petrarch introduced the sonnet to English literature. The word 'sonnet,' however, was misunderstood, and was used for the next forty years or so, as it still is by uneducated people, to mean any lyrical poem or ballad. The French had by this time introduced several irregularities into the arrangement of the rhymes, and had invented the word 'quatorzain' to describe a poem in fourteen lines of rhymed verse, not necessarily a sonnet. We find this useful word introduced into English as early as 1582, and it is perhaps worth pointing out that the thousands of Elizabethan poems called 'sonnets' are in their vast majority merely quatorzains, and not real sonnets at all. Drayton was so conscious of this that he called his cycle of 1594 Amours in Quatorzains. That the Elizabethans were slow to comprehend the real essence of the sonnet is shown by the fact that the work which more than any other served to popularise the form in England, the Hecatompethia of Watson (1582), is composed in a form of eighteen, instead of fourteen, lines.

The fourteen-line limit, however, had been properly laid down in 1575 by Gascoigne, who, unfortunately, prescribes 'cross metre and the last two rhyming together,' heresies unknown to the Continental poets. Such rules did not affect Sir Philip Sidney, who is to be taken as the real introducer of the Petrarchan sonnet into English. As Sir Sidney Lee has said, the publication of Astrophel and Stella gave the sonnet in England 'a vogue that it never enjoyed before or since.' Sidney was the scholar of Petrarch in this matter ; but he had a closer and more familiar relation with his own French contemporaries, especially Ronsard and Du Bellay. It has recently been put forward that Sidney owed much as a sonneteer to Desportes ; but dates make this improbable. As a matter of fact, Sidney died but a few months after Ronsard ; he is affiliated as sonneteer to the original cénacle of the Pléiade. His sonnets were probably composed about the year 1580 ; they were posthumously published in 1591, and immediately set the fashion for cycles of sonnets. Sir Sidney Lee, in an appendix to his learned Life of William Shakespeare, has analysed the output of sonnets in England between 1591 and 1597. The result is surprising ; he estimates that during that time far more than two thousand sonnets of various kinds—amatory, congratulatory, philosophical, or religious—were actually published in this country. These post-Sidneian 'sonnets' were, almost without exception, quatorzains closing in a couplet.

The influence of Desportes, if we cannot detect it in Sidney, is obvious in these later Elizabethans. In 1592 came the first flight of English sonnet-sequences, with Constable's Diana and Daniel's Delia, both of them dipped in the conventional sweetness of Desportes. In 1593 the cycles of sonnets were like flights of locusts, with Barnes, Constable, Lok, Giles Fletcher (the elder), Watson, and Lodge, whose Phillis contains some very musical, experimental measures. Among the publications of 1594 deserve mention Drayton's Idea, Percy's Calia, a curious anonymous volume entitled Zephyria, Chapman's Coronet, and Barnfield's Italianated perversity called The Affectionate Shepherd. The year 1595 was made illustrious in the sonnet world by Spenser's series of eighty-eight Amoretti; 1596 produced Griffin's Fidessa, Linche's Diella, Barnes's Divine Century, and the Chloris of William Smith. This was the culminating year of the Elizabethan sonnet, and after this the fashion began rapidly to fade away. It is to be noted that several collections of sonnets probably belong to this short period of six years (1591-97), although they were not then published. Shakespeare's Sonnets is by far the most illustrious example of this temporary suppression; but with it must be compared, and to the same period attributed, the Calica of Lord Brooke, the Aurora of Sir William Alexander (the Earl of Stirling), the love-sonnets of Campion, and a comic cycle of Gulling Sonnets by Sir John Davies.

The sonnet continued to be cultivated more fitfully after the Elizabethan age was over. John Davies of Hereford and William Browne were less successful than Drummond of Hawthornden, who went back to the rigorous Petrarchan model with considerable adroitness. Donne composed two cycles of Holy Sonnets and La Corona, which were not published until a generation later. After this the form fell into a disrepute from which it did not recover until, in Milton's hands, 'the thing became a trumpet.'

It is not to be supposed that this extraordinary manufacture of short poems, all made after the same pattern, could display much individual originality. The sonnets of Shakespeare—puzzling as they are, and formed to mystify the commentator—are at least of a most thrilling sincerity, and are inspired by an original exercise of high imagination; but if from Shakespeare to Sidney and Spenser, as sonneteers, the descent is considerable, from these latter to the general herd of cycle-writers it is immense. In the average Elizabethan sonnet we find some picturesqueness of diction, much sweetness, a tiresome abuse of pedantry, an elegance which has something affected about it, a passion so covered up with the ashes of an alembicated preciousness that it is often doubtful whether it burns at all. The monotony of the Elizabethan sonnets, their vague allusiveness, the instability and dimness of the images they evoke, do much to lessen our pleasure in reading them. Yet it must not be forgotten that, even if Sidney, Shakespeare, and Spenser were removed, there would be left a body of graceful, melodious poetry, all of which helped to give distinction to average poetic style in England, and some of which possessed positive merit of a high lyrical order.

EDMUND GOSSE.

Sir Philip Sidney seemed destined to take a very prominent part in the evolution of English poetry. In considering his work in verse, we have to recollect that at the age which Sidney had attained when he fell beneath the walls of Zutphen, Spenser had published nothing but The Shepherd's Calendar, and Shakespeare was principally known as the author of Venus and Adonis. Sidney was no less painfully working out his way through linguistic and traditional difficulties towards the open light of a perfect style; but the poisoned bullet cut short his chances of achieving a Faerie Queene or a Hamlet. When critics speak of the 'coldness' and 'affectation' of Sidney's poetry, they are forgetting the conditions under which he laboured, and are neglecting the evidence that he was rapidly surmounting those conditions. Perhaps, if the truth were known, Philip Sidney was one of the most notable 'inheritors of unfulfilled renown' the world has ever seen. He studied the art of poetry so closely—he had such an expanding and mounting sense of its capacity—he was learning so to 'look into his heart, and write,' that everything seemed to point to his becoming one of the great English poets. That he never became; but the charm, the romantic pathos, of the imperfect verses he did write is perennial.

Sidney began to study verse at a time when the particular kind of poetry he enjoyed among the Italians and the Spaniards was unknown in England. He conceived a British variety of Petrarchan art, a species of lyrical songs and sonnets, which 'might be employed, and with how heavenly fruit, both private and public, in singing the praises of the Immortal Beauty.' But in doing so he was aware of the necessity of avoiding the insipidity and insincerity which had fallen upon such poetry on the continent of Europe—the vain repetitions, the languid conceits, the preposterous frozen compliments. In opening a new literature he desired to avoid falling immediately into the errors of an old, and indeed exhausted, literature, like that of Italy. Hence Sidney starts with a divided aim; he wishes to introduce the psychology of love, with its delicacies and its refined analysis of emotion, into the rough and awkward English tongue, but at the same time he wishes to escape the pitfalls into which those descend who 'poor Petrarch's long-deceased woes with new-born sighs and denizen'd wit do sing.'

The early numbers in the Astrophel and Stella show us the adventures of Sidney's spirit when this design of regenerating English lyrical poetry first occurred to him. He studied 'fine inventions' and Continental models, 'oft turning others' leaves.' He tried hard to reproduce his emotions, but the effect merely depressed him; he was conscious that what he composed was harsh and pedantic, and that his speech bore no relation to his glow of inward feeling. The words came forth halting, and he became aware that study was driving away invention. Then it was that, 'great with child to speak, and helpless in his throes,' Sidney was biting his pen and beating his bosom, when "Fool!" said my Muse to me, "look in thy heart and write." Accordingly, look in his heart he did; but to eyes unaccustomed to the blaze of nature the white light of the heart at first only blinds and bewilders. Hence, in the poetry which Sidney began to write about 1575 and onwards (for to this date we may, perhaps, attribute his determination to reform poetry in England) we find at first much that seems to us dry and displeasing, much empty fluency, much flatness, and even some insipidity. But Sidney advances in skill; he gains more and more command over the medium; and before the Astrophel and Stella is finished, we find that the young poet has secured the power of copying for mankind the emotional language which a living passion has written on his heart.

Hence the careful reader of Sidney's sonnets, who has at first found them a little colourless and dim after the far richer poetry of the succeeding generation, learns to appreciate in them that very quality which the eighteenth, and until lately even the nineteenth, centuries were unable to detect in them, their rigorous sincerity. When once the author has surmounted the difficulty of speaking in verse, of using the language of literature—as soon as he has gained confidence in his own observation and in his own judgment of values—he sings 'with his eye upon the object;' so that, although a species of archaism makes the Astrophel and Stella seem old-fashioned among the Elizabethan sonnet-cycles, it will yet be found to be more interesting, because more sincere, varied, and circumstantial, than any of its successors, except that of Shakespeare. All the time that he was writing so earnestly, an invincible modesty kept Sidney in the background of the poets—'Poor layman I, for sacred rites unfit,' he calls himself. But this simplicity gave him a realistic vitality. His genius was planted firmly on experience. The highway, along which his horse's feet went trampling, was his Parnassus. His sheep were thoughts, which he pastured, far from the haunts of men, on the 'fair hills of fruitless love.' Other men might be 'victors still of Phœbus golden treasure.' To Sidney poetry was never the main object of life, never life itself; but he adorned the paths of love, war, patriotism, religion, all that led through the wide fields of his beautiful, practical chivalry, with the roses and lilies of fragrant, flowery verse.

As a consequence of his not 'taking himself seriously' as a poet, when once his verse was written he ceased to care what became of it, and it might very easily have entirely disappeared. It is probably to the piety of his admirable sister, the Countess of Pembroke, who had the courage to ignore her brother's dying command that the MS. of his Arcadia should be destroyed, that we owe the preservation of Sidney's prose and verse. He published nothing in his lifetime; three editions of Astrophel and Stella belong to 1591, and his miscellaneous poems were added to the third edition (1598) of the Arcadia. Some sonnets appeared for the first time with Constable's poems, in 1594. A great mass of rather interesting verse, probably belonging to Sidney's early and unemancipated years, is embedded in the Arcadia itself (1590); so that the effect which was made by the poetry of Sidney, save through the literary coteries influenced by him in his lifetime, did not belong to the period of his career, but was almost wholly posthumous. With so extreme a rapidity was literature then developing, that in 1595 poetry of the most startling originality written in 1575, even by Spenser and Sidney, wore a faded air; as a consequence of this the influence of Sidney, which was for a few years immense, soon waned, though the Arcadia continued to be reprinted and many romances were written in imitation of it. EDMUND GOSSE.

Sidney was born, 30th November 1554, at Penshurst, in Kent, son of Sir Henry Sidney (who usually spelt the name Sydney, while his son preferred Sidney or Sidnei). Philip studied at Shrewsbury and Christ Church, and after spending nearly three years on the Continent returned to England, an accomplished writer, in 1575, and was introduced to the court by his uncle, the Earl of Leicester. He was present at the famous reception given by Leicester to the queen at Kenilworth in the summer of that year. At first a favourite of the queen, he was sent in 1577 on missions to the Elector Palatine, the Emperor Rudolf, and the Prince of Orange. Elizabeth was ungrateful towards his father for his exertions as Lord Deputy in Ireland, and Philip wrote in his defence; he also addressed the queen against her projected match with the Duke of Anjou. Elizabeth frowned on him; and his mother's brother, the once powerful Leicester, fell into disfavour. Sidney retired (1580) to his sister Mary, now Lady Pembroke, at Wilton, where, probably, most of his Arcadia was written. In 1583 he was knighted, and married Frances, daughter of Sir F. Walsingham. His arrangement (1585) to accompany Drake on one of his buccaneer expeditions was defeated by Elizabeth's caprice and Drake's treachery. Sidney was ordered to accompany Leicester, chosen by the queen to carry her half-hearted support to the Netherlands in their struggle against Spain. After one small brilliant exploit, he received, on 22nd September (O.S.) 1586, his death-wound under the walls of Zutphen—where five hundred and fifty Englishmen made a gallant but ill-judged attack on nearly 3000 Spaniards—and died on 17th October.

His work in literature may be placed between 1578 and 1582. Widely celebrated as it was in his lifetime, nothing was published till after his death. His brilliant character, his connections, his generous patronage of men of letters, with the report of those to whom his writings were communicated, united to give him his pre-eminent contemporary fame. This was, however, amply supported when the Arcadia (written probably 1578-80, but never finished) appeared, imperfectly in 1590, completely in 1598. This book long retained a vast popularity, though now it is almost unread. It is a pastoral romance, founded upon the Arcadia (1504) of Sannazaro, but perhaps even more influenced by the Spanish romances. An intricate love-story, intermixed with poems and written in melodious but diffuse, elaborate, and artificial prose, not free from the artificial 'conceits' of that age, the book was received with enthusiasm at home, and was almost as well received in France. Its influence on English literature was smaller. Shakespeare shows traces of his study of it in several of his plays, especially in Lear, Love's Labour's Lost, the Tempest, and the Midsummer Night's Dream; Spenser was indebted to it; Crowne imitated it; and many plays were based on episodes in it. The eighteenth century, on the whole, reversed the verdict passed by the sixteenth and seventeenth, though Richardson borrowed his heroine Pamela from it, and Cowper unfeignedly admired it, calling its author 'a warbler of poetic prose.' Horace Walpole called it a 'tedious, lamentable, pedantic, pastoral romance, which the patience of a young virgin in love cannot now wade through;' Hazlitt was hardly more favourable, and Hallam's praise is faint. Now, unquestionably, its interest is mainly historical, though much of it is fine. Drayton commended Sidney for having checked Euphuism and improved English style; he says he

Thoroughly paced our language as to show
That plenteous English hand in hand might go
With Greek and Latin, and did first reduce
Our tongue from Lyly's writing then in use.

To about 1580 may be assigned Sidney's Apologie for Poetrie (1591, afterwards named Defence of Poesy), written in clear, manly English in reply to an abusive Puritan pamphlet by Gosson. Sidney defines poetry, after Aristotle, as Ideal Imitation, and for her claims her ancient place as the highest mode of literature, teaching mankind the most important truths through the medium of that pleasure which is the formal end of all fine art. In mediæval fashion, many authorities are quoted, and the author's wide range of reading is displayed. Sidney criticises severely the crowd of contemporary versifiers—not peculiar to that age!—to whose want of power, bad taste, and trivial style he partly ascribes the then existing low estimate of poetry. And here he names the best English poets known to him: Chaucer, Sackville, Surrey, and Spenser's just (anonymously) published Calendar. 'Besides these, I do not remember to have seen but few (to speak boldly) printed, that have poetical sinews in them.' English drama, it will be remembered, was then in its cradle. In 1580 Ralph Roister Doister, Gorboduc, and Gammer Gurton were practically all the drama here to show; and Sidney could not foresee that his own contemporaries were just about to recreate the art. His criticism of the contemporary English stage was severe: trained to Italian and pseudo-classical canons, he demanded the complete separation of tragedy and comedy, and the adhesion to Senecan models. Even Gorboduc, which might have been 'an exact model of all tragedies,' is 'very defective in the circumstances.' The next ten years saw Greene, Peele, Marlowe, and Shakespeare all busily at work. In 1575 Sidney had met Penelope Devereux (1560-1607), daughter of the first Earl of Essex; but it was only in 1581, the year following her marriage to the Puritan Lord Rich, who afterwards divorced her, that Sidney awoke too late to love for her. The one hundred and eight sonnets and eleven songs of Astrophel and Stella (1591) offer a marvellous picture of passionate love. (In 1583 he was knighted, and married Walsingham's young daughter, Frances.) Sidney also translated the Psalms. He was among the first to recognise Spenser's promise; he knew Gabriel Harvey, Thomas Lodge, Marlowe, Bacon, and Raleigh; and he accepted dedications from Giordano Bruno.

Sidney's impetuosity of temper is seen in much of his writing, as in his reply to Leicester's Commonwealth, an attack on the Earl, his uncle: declaring to the attacker, 'thou therein liest in thy throat, which I will be ready to justify upon thee in any place in Europe.' The same trait appears in the following letter—containing what proved to be a groundless accusation—which he addressed in 1578 to Edward Molyneux, his father's secretary and (ultimately, at least) his own valued friend:

MR MOLYNEUX—Few words are best. My letters to my father have come to the eyes of some. Neither can I condemn any but you for it. If it be so, you have played the very knave with me; and so I will make you know, if I have good proof of it. But that for so much as is past. For that is to come, I assure you before God, that if ever I know you do so much as read any letter I write to my father, without his commandment, or my consent, I will thrust my dagger into you. And trust to it, for I speak it in earnest. In the meantime, farewell.

Of the following extracts, five are from Sidney's Arcadia, and the sixth from his Defence of Poesy.

The Arcadia professes to deal with love and adventures in the Greek province which, actually famed for its pure air and its people and the purity and simplicity of their lives, the Roman poets had idealised into a kind of pastoral and romantic Utopia. This is the opening:

It was in the time that the earth begins to put her new apparel against the approach of her lover, and that the Sun running a most even course becomes an indifferent arbiter betwene the night and the day: when the hopeless shepherd Strephon was come to the scendes which lie against the island of Cithera: where viewing the place with a heavy kinde of delight and sometimes casting his eyes to the Ileward, he called his friendly rivall the pastor Claius unto him; setting first downe in his darkened countenance a dolefull copie of what he would speake, and with a long speech on his absent love, during which they see a shipwrecked man, Musidorus, washed ashore. Him they offer to conduct back with them to their home in Arcadia, and to present to the hospitable gentleman Kalander.

In Arcadia.

The 3. day after in the time that the morning did throw roses and violets in the heavenly floore against the comming of the Sun (the nightingales striving one with the other which could in most dainty variety recount their wrong-caused sorrow) and made them part of their sleep, and rising from under a tree (which that night had bin their pavilion) they went on their journey which by and by welcomed Musidorus eyes, wearied with the wasted soile of Laconia, with delightfull prospects:

There were hilles which garnished their proud heights with stately trees; humble valleis, whose base estate seemed comforted with the refreshing of silver rivers; meadows, enameld with al sorts of ey-pleasing floures; thickets, which being lined with most pleasant shade, were witnessed so to by the chereful deposition of many wel-tuned birds; each pasture stored with sheep, feeding with sober security; while the prety lambs with bleting oratory craved the dams comfort; here a shepheards boy piping, as though he should never be old; there a yong shepherdesse knitting, and withall singing; and it seemed that her voice comforted her hands to work, and her hands kept time to her voices music. (Book i. chap. 2.)

A Stag Hunt.

Then went they together abroad, the good Kalander entertaining them with pleasaunt discoursing—howe well he loved the sporte of hunting when he was a young man, how much in the comparison thereof he disdained all chamber delights, that the sunne (how great a jornie soever he had to make) could never prevent him with earlines, nor the moone (with her sober countenance) disswade him from watching till midnight for the deeress feeding. O, saide he, you will never live to my age, without you kepe your selves in breath with exercise, and in hart with joyfullnes; too much thinking doth consume the spirits; and oft it fallies out, that, while one thinkes too much of his doing, he leaves to doe the effect of his thinking. Then spared he not to remember, how much Arcadia was chaunged since his youth; activitie and good felowship being nothing in the price it was then held in; but according to the nature of the old-growing world, still worse and worse. Then would he tell them stories of such gallaunts as he had knowen; and so with pleasant company beguiled the times hast, and shortned the wayes length, till they came to the side of the wood, where the houndes were in couples, staying their coming, but with a whining accent craving libertie; many of them in colour and marks so resembling, that it shewed they were of one kinde. The huntsmen handsomely attired in their greene liveries, as though they were children of Sommer, with staves in their hands to beat the guiltlesse earth, when the houndes were at a fault; and with hornes about their neckes, to sound an alarum upon a sillie fugitive: the houndes were straight uncoupled, and ere long the Stagge thought it better to trust the nimblenes of his feet then to the slender fortification of his lodging; but even his feete betrayed him; for, howsoever they went, they themselves uttered themselves to the scent of their enimies; who, one taking it of an other, and sometimes beleeving the windes advertisement, sometimes the view of their faithful counsellors the huntsmen, with open mouthes then denounced warre, when the warre was already begun. Their crie being composed of so well sorted mouthes, that any man would perceive therein some kind of proportion, but the skilful woodmen did find a musick. Then delight and varietie of opinion drew the horsemen sundrie wayes, yet cheering their houndes with voyce and horn, kept still as it were together. The wood seemed to conspire with them against his own citizens, dispersing their noise through all his quarters; and even the nimph Echo left to bewayle the losse of Narcissus, and became a hunter. But the Stagge was in the end so hotly pursued, that (leaving his flight) he was driven to make courage of despaire; and so turning his head, made the hounds with change of speech to testify that he was at a bay : as if from hot pursuit of their enemy, they were sodainly come to a parley.

(Book i. chap. 10.)

Shipwracke.

But by that the next morning began to make a guilden shewe of a good meaning, there arose even with the sun a vaile of darke cloudes before his face, which shortly (like inck powred into water) had blacked over all the face of heaven, preparing (as it were) a mournful stage for a Tragedie to be plaied on. For forthwith the windes began to speake lowder, and as in a tumultuous kingdom to thinke themselves fittest instruments of commandement ; and blowing whole stormes of hayle and raine upon them, they were sooner in daunger then they coulde almost bethinke themselves of change. For then the traitorous Sea began to swell in pride against the afflicted Navie, under which (while the heaven favoured them) it had layne so calmly ; making mountaines of it selfe, over which the tossed and tottring ship shoulde clime, to the streight carried downe againe to a pit of hellish darknesse, with such cruell blowes against the sides of the shippe that which way soever it went was still in his malice, that there was left neither power to stay nor way to escape. And shortly had it so dis-severed the loving companie, which the daie before had tarried together, that most of them never met againe, but were swallowed up in his never-satisfied mouth.

(Book ii. chap. 7.)

The prayer of the Princess Pamela was a favourite prayer of King Charles I., whom Milton reproached for 'having stolen a prayer word for word from the mouth of a heathen woman praying to a heathen god':

O all-seeing Light and eternal Life of all things, to whom nothing is either so great, that it may resist ; or so small, that it is contemned : looke vpon my miserie with thine eye of mercie, and let thine infinite power vouchsafe to limite out some proportion of deliuerance vnto me, as to thee shall seem most conuenient. Let not iniurie, O Lord, triumphe ouer me, and let my faultes by thy handes be corrected, and make not mine vniuste enemy the minister of thy Iustice. But yet, my God, if in thy wisdom this be the aptest chastizement for my inexcusable follie ; if this low bondage be fittest for my ouer-hie desires ; if the pride of my not-inough humble harte be thus to be broken, O Lord, I yeeld vnto thy will, and ioyfully embrace what sorrow thou wilt have me suffer. Onely thus much let me craue of thee, (let my crawing, O Lord, be accepted of thee, since euen that proceeds from thee,) let me craue, euen by the noblest title, which in my greatest affliction I may giue my selfe, that I am thy creature, and by thy goodnes (which is thy self) that thou wilt suffer some beame of thy Maiestie so to shine into my mind, that it may still depende confidently vpon thee. Let calamitie be the exercise but not the ouerthrowe of my vertue : let their power preuaile, but preuaile not to destruction : let my greatnes be their praie : let my paine be the sweetness of their reuenge : let them (if so it seem good vnto thee) vex me with more and more punishment. But, O Lord, let neuer their wickednes haue such a hand, but that I may carie a pure minde in a pure bodie. (And pausing a while) And O, most gracious Lord (said she) what euer become of me, preserue the vertuous Musidorus.

(Book iii. chap. 6.)

'In these my not old yeres and idelest times, having slipt into the title of a Poet, I am provoked to say something unto you in defence of that my unelected vocation,' says Sidney in the Apologie ; 'I have just cause to make a pittiful defence of poore Poetry, which from almost the highest estimation of learning is fallen to be the laughing-stocke of children.' And he thus compares poetry and philosophy :

The philosopher sheweth you the way, hee informenth you of the particularities, as well of the tediousnes of the way, as of the pleasant lodging you shall have when your journey is ended, as of the many by-turnings that may divert you from your way. But this is to no man but to him that will read him, and read him with attentive studious painefulnes. Which constant desire whosoever hath in him, hath already passed halfe the hardnes of the way, and therefore is beholding to the Philosopher but for the other halfe. Nay, truely, learned men have learnedly thought that where once reason hath so much over-mastred passion, as that the minde hath a free desire to doe well, the inward light each minde hath in it selfe is as good as a Philosophers book ; since in nature we know it is well to do well, and what is well and what is evile, although not in the words of Arte which Philosophers bestowe upon us ; for out of naturall conceit the Philosophers drew it. But to be moved to doe that which we know, or to be moved with desire to knowe, Hoc opus : Hic labor est.

Nowe therein of all sciences (I speak still of humane and according to the humane conceit) is our Poet the Monarch. For he dooth not only shew the way, but giveth so sweete a prospect into the way, as will intice any man to enter into it. Nay, he dooth, as if your journey should lye through a fayr Vineyard, at the very firste, give you a cluster of Grapes ; that, full of that taste, you may long to passe further. He beginneth not with obscure definitions ; which must blur the margent with interpretations, and load the memory with doubtfulness ; but he commeth to you with words set in delightfull proportion, either accompanied with, or prepared for, the well-inchaunting skill of musick ; with a tale forsooth he commeth unto you, with a tale which holdeth children from play, and old men from the chimney-corner. And pretending no more, doth intende the winning of the mind from wickednesse to vertue ; even as the childe is often brought to take most wholsom things, by hiding them in such other as have a pleasant taste ; which if one should beginne to tell them the nature of the Aloes or Rubarb they shoulde receive, would sooner take their Phisicke at their cares then their mouth. So is it in men (most of which are childish in the best things) till they bee cradled in their graves ; glad they will be to hear the tales of Hercules, Achilles, Cyrus, Æneas ; and hearing them, must needs heare the right description of wisdom, valure, and justice ; which if they had been barely, that is to say philosophically, set out, they would sweare they bee brought to schoole againe.

Sidney 'never heard the old song of Percy and Douglas but he found his heart stirred as with the sound of a trumpet,' and said 'they are never alone who are accompanied with noble thoughts ;' 'there will be the time to die nobly when you cannot live nobly ;' 'there is nothing more terrible to a guilty heart than the eye of a respected friend.'

Sonnets from 'Astrophel and Stella.'

With how sad steps, O Moone, thou clim'st the skies,
How silently, and with how wanne a face !
What, may it be, that even in heavenly place
That busie Archer his sharpe arrowes tries?
Sure, if that long-with-love-acquainted eyes
Can judge of love, thou feel'st a lover's case ;
I read it in thy lookes, thy languisht grace
To me that feeles the like thy state discries.
Then, even of fellowship, O Moone, tell me,
Is constant love deemed there but want of wit?
Are beauties there as proud as here they be?
Do they above love to be loved, and yet
Those lovers scorne whom that love doth possesse?
Do they call vertue there ungratefulnesse?

O happie Thames, that didst my Stella beare !
I saw thee with full many a smiling line
Upon thy cheereful face joy's livery weare,
While those faire planets on thy streames did shine.
The boate for joy could not to daunce forbear ;
While wanton winds, with beauties so divine
Ravisht, staid not, till in her golden haire
They did themselves (O sweetest prison) twine :
And faine those Ceol's youth there would their stay
Have made ; but, forst by Nature still to flie,
First did with puffing kisse those lockes display.
She, so dishevel'd, blusht. From window I,
With sight thereof, cried out : 'O faire disgrace ;
Let Honur' selfe to thee grant highest place !'

I never dranke of Aganippe well,
Nor ever did in shade of Tempe sit,
And Muses scorne with vulgar brains to dwell ;
Poore layman I, for sacred rites unfit.
Some doe I heare of poets' furie tell,
But, God wot, wot not what they meane by it ;
And this I sweare by blackest brooke of hell,
I am no pick-purse of another's wit.
How falles it then, that with so smooth an ease
My thoughts I speake ; and what I speake doth flow
In verse, and that my verse best wits doth please?
Ghesse we the cause? What, is it this? Fie, no.
Or so? Muche lesse. How then? Sure thus it is,
My lips are sweet, inspired with Stella's kisse.

Come, Sleepe, O Sleepe, the certaine knot of peace,
The baiting-place of wit, the balme of woe,
The poore man's wealth, the prisoner's release,
Th' indifferent judge betweene the high and low.
With shield of prooffe shield me from out the prease
Of those fierce darts Despaire at me doth throw ;
O make in me those civill warres to cease :
I will good tribute pay, if thou do so.
Take thou of me smooth pillowes, sweetest bed ;
A chamber deaf of noise, and blind of light ;
A rosie garland, and a weary hed.
And if these things, as being thine in right,
Move not thy heavy grace, thou shalt in me
Livelier than else-where Stella's image see.

Whether the Turkish new moone minded be
To fill her hornes this yeere on Christian coast?
How Poles' right king means without leave of hoast
To warme with ill-made fire cold Muscovy?

If French can yet three parts in one agree?
What now the Dutch in their full diets boast?
How Holland hearts, now so good townes be lost,
Trust in the shade of pleasant Orange-tree?
How Ulster likes of that same golden bit
Wherewith my father once made it halfe tame?
If in the Scotch Court be no weltring yet?
These questions busie wits to me do frame :
I, cumbred with good maners, answer doe,
But know not how ; for still I thinke of you.

Song : 'Love is dead.'

Ring out your belles, let mourning shewes be spread ;
For Love is dead :

All Love is dead, infected
With plague of deep disdain :
Worth, as nought worth, rejected,
And Faith faire scorne doth gaine.
From so ungrateful fancie,
From such a femall franzie,
From them that use men thus,
Good Lord, deliver us !

Weepe, neighbours, weepe ; do you not heare it said
That Love is dead?

His death-bed, peacock's follie ;
His winding-sheete is shame ;
His will, false-seeming holie ;
His sole exec'tour, blame.
From so ungrateful fancie,
From such a femall franzie,
From them that use men thus,
Good Lord, deliver us !

My True Love hath my Heart.

My true-love hath my heart, and I have his,
By just exchange the one for the other giv'ne :
I hold his deare, and mine he cannot misse ;
There never was a better bargain driv'ne.
His heart in me keepe me and him in one ;
My heart in him his thoughts and senses guides :
He loves my heart, for once it was his owne ;
I cherish his because in me it bides.
His heart has wound received from my sight ;
My heart was wounded with his wounded heart,
For as from mee on him his hurt did light,
So still methought in me his hurt did smart :
Both equal hurt, in this change sought our blisse,
My true-love hath my heart, and I have his.

(From the Arcadia.)

'Sidney's sister, Pembroke's mother' (c.1555-1621), was not merely the friend and patron of Spenser, Samuel Daniel, and others [see 'Mary Sidney,' by F. B. Young (1912)]. She edited the Arcadia her brother had dedicated to her, had a share with him in the translation of the Psalms, translated from the French A Discourse of Life and Death by her brother's friend Plessis du Mornay, and rendered into English blank verse Garnier's French tragedy, Antonie. She was the wife of the second Earl of Pembroke, and mother of the Earl to whom it has been supposed (and denied) that Shakespeare dedicated his sonnets.

Sidney's poems and Apologie have been edited, the first by Grosart (1877), the second by Arber (1868), Flügel (1889), Cook (1890), and Shuckburgh (1891); the Complete Works by Prof.

Feuillerat (4 vols. 1912-26), who gives three texts of the Arcadia, one from MS. The Arcadia was edited by E. A. Baker (1907), and reproduced in facsimile by O. Sommer in 1891. The Life by Fulke Greville (1652) was re-edited by N. Smith (1907); and there are Lives by Zouch (1808), J. A. Symonds (1886), Fox Bourne (1862 and 1892), Addleshaw (1909), Wallace (1915), and Willson (1931). See Philip Sidney's Memoirs of the Sidney Family (1899).

Edmund Spenser.

In a passage which has been often quoted Gibbon says, 'The nobility of the Spensers has been illustrated and enriched by the trophies of Marlborough; but I exhort them to consider the Faerie Queene as the most precious jewel of their coronet.' It is not, however, by any means certain that they have the right to claim him. He sprang from a family of Spensers settled at Hurstwood, in the north-east of Lancashire, and it is believed that his father was a certain John Spenser, a journeyman clothmaker, who came up to London before 1550. If so, his mother's name was Elizabeth, but her family is not known. He was born, about 1552, at East Smithfield, in 'merry London, my most kindly nurse,' as he says in the Prothalamion. From the 'Spending of the Money of Robert Nowell,' it appears that he was sent, as a 'poor scholar,' to Merchant Taylors' School when it was opened in 1561. It is supposed that he was a foundation scholar, and that he stayed at the school until 1569. Lancelot Andrewes was his schoolfellow, and their head-master was Dr Mulcaster.

Before he left school Spenser had 'commenced author,' for early in 1569 a Dutch refugee, Dr Jan van der Noodt, published a miscellany called A Theatre for Worldlings, in which were included certain translations from Petrarch and from Joachim du Bellay, which, though anonymous at the time, were afterwards in a modified form claimed by Spenser. These translations, in blank verse and rhyme, have created a great deal of discussion; but there is no reasonable doubt that they came from the hand of Spenser, and they already display some of the characteristics of his style.

On the 20th of May 1569 Spenser passed directly from Merchant Taylors' School to Pembroke College, Cambridge, where he matriculated as a sizar. We have evidence of his great poverty and of repeated illnesses while at college; he succeeded B.A. in 1573 and commenced M.A. in 1576, the year that he left Cambridge. He mentions the university in the Faerie Queene:

My mother Cambridge, whom as with a crown
He [i.e. the Ouse] doth adorn, and is adorned by it
With many a gentle Muse and many a learned Wit.

We know nothing of his academic life, but he formed at the university certain friendships which had an influence upon him. Edward Kirke, who afterwards edited the Shepherd's Calendar, and Gabriel Harvey, a poetaster and criticaster who assumed a position of authority at Cambridge, were his principal associates, and Harvey is the Hobbinol of Spenser's eclogues. As late as 1586

Spenser was still Harvey's 'devoted friend, during life.' Harvey was the chief of those who promulgated the heresy that the rhythms and rhymes of normal English verse were to be swept away in favour of accentuated rhymeless measures closely modelled on Greek and Latin prosody. There is no doubt that by too modestly acceding to all this nonsense Spenser was delayed in the development of his genius.

Spenser took his degree of M.A. in 1576 and left Cambridge. He went to his own people in Lancashire, and here, as has been suggested, met the Rosalind of his sonnets and pastorals. In the next year, Gabriel Harvey urging him to 'forsake his shire' and come south, Spenser seems to have paid a short visit to Ireland, and in 1578 or 1579 to have settled in London. Here he seems to have been early presented to Sir Philip Sidney and his brother-in-law, the Earl of Leicester, and to have taken up his abode in Leicester House. He wrote a series of poems which have been lost, called Stemmata Dudleiana. A correspondence with Gabriel Harvey, who addresses Spenser as 'Immerito,' has been preserved, and is full of bad advice about hexameters and trimeters. In this winter of 1579-80 Spenser had other poetical works ready—Dreams, The Dying Pelican, and Nine Comedies. All these have disappeared; but on the 5th of December 1579 was entered at Stationers' Hall a poem, the effect of which on the expansion of English literature was astounding. This is, of course, The Shepherd's Calendar.

The publication of this famous collection of pastorals placed Spenser, at a bound, in front of all

English poets since Chaucer. The originality and mastery of the 'new poet,' as Spenser began immediately to be styled, was admitted at once. The Shepherd's Calendar was anonymous, and consisted of twelve eclogues, as they may all be roughly styled, distinguished from one another in their metre, subject, and treatment. In adopting the Arcadian device of 'goatherds' tales' Spenser was yielding to the fashion of the hour, and to the practice of the followers of Sannazaro. The whole of England was supposed to be a sheep-farm, under the sway of the queen of shepherds, fair Elisa, daughter of Pan, the god of shepherds. This setting of bucolic allegory offers many inconveniences to the fancy of the poet, especially as he wishes to treat questions of Puritan religious discipline, which have remarkably little to do with Pan and Syrinx. Under the general denomination of 'eclogues,' moreover, are included fables, satires, amatory lyrics, and other forms of current verse, so that the Shepherd's Calendar is really to be looked upon as a sort of miscellany.

To his contemporaries the most daring thing about the new poet was his diction, which Spenser enriched, or attempted to enrich, with a multitude of obsolete and rural forms. Sidney, who was one of the earliest admirers of the Calendar, and who put the new poet on a level with Theocritus, Virgil, and Sannazaro, 'dared not allow that same framing of his style in an old rustic language.' Spenser's object, however, no doubt was by this diction to accentuate the English character of his verses and to lessen their Italian aspect. Moreover, in the Shepherd's Calendar Spenser shows himself still related to the primitive and rural poets of the English middle ages—allegorical and alliterative. Indeed, it is not to be denied that many critics, coming upon these poems after traversing the wastes of the fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries, have applauded them with excess, since, after all, in comparison with what the English poets, and Spenser himself, were almost immediately afterwards to produce, the greater part of the Shepherd's Calendar is but tame, colourless, and experimental. In the eclogues for May and August we see 'the new poet' at his best, and that is far ahead of any of his immediate predecessors, except Sackville.

In the summer of 1580 Lord Grey de Wilton, on being appointed the Queen's Deputy in Ireland, took Spenser (believed to have been married by then) to Dublin as his secretary, and it is supposed that he was an eye-witness of the horrible scenes enacted in Munster when the Rebellion of Desmond broke out. Long afterwards, in his prose View of Ireland, the poet recounted many of his experiences. In 1581 he was appointed Registrar of Chancery in Ireland, and got a lease or grant of the abbey and castle of Enniscorthy, in county Wexford; these were succeeded by various employments and residences, and Spenser probably made Dublin his headquarters from 1580 to 1588. In the latter year he seems to have settled at Kilcolman, an abandoned peel-tower of the Desmonds, in a then wooded glen of the Galtée Hills, in the north of county Cork, some thirty miles south of Limerick; this, with its 3000 or 4000 acres of land, was Spenser's share of the spoil. Here, in 1589, Sir Walter Raleigh visited him, and here Spenser read to his friend the early cantos of the great poem which had now for so many years been occupying his thoughts and leisure. The 'Shepherd of the Ocean,' as Raleigh was called, perceived in a moment that this romance of fairyland rose immeasurably high above anything that had called itself poetry in England before. In the very interesting autobiographical poem called Colin Clout's Come Home Again, first published in 1595, Spenser gives a minute account of the conversations of the two friends. Raleigh, on his part, read his own poem of Cynthia, the greater portion of which is now lost, and urged Spenser to come with him to court, so that they might in unison lay their songs before Elizabeth. This Spenser immediately agreed to do; it would appear that he accompanied Raleigh to England, and was presented to the queen. She gave him a pension of £50 a year, and in December 1589 the first three books of that epoch-making poem, the Faerie Queene, were entered in the registers of the Stationers' Company. It was announced as 'disposed into twelve books,' but when it was published early in 1590 only three books were produced, and it is probable that no more was at this time completed. It was dedicated, in words which seem blown through a golden trumpet, to 'the most high, mighty and magnificent Empress,' Elizabeth, 'to live with the eternity of her fame,' as was added in a later edition.

The reception of the Faerie Queene was more than enthusiastic. All England responded to the opinion attributed to Shakespeare, that Spenser's 'deep conceit was such as, passing all conceit, needed no defence.' He was accepted, in that age of glorious singers, as the first of English poets. Caressed and congratulated by all the court, Spenser stayed in England until far on into 1591, enjoying to the full, no doubt, these the most vivid and agreeable months of his existence. He was obliged at length to return to his duties, for he was now Clerk of the Council of Munster, and he had his poems to write, which no doubt were better encouraged by the solitude of Kilcolman than by the excitements of London. He was troubled, however, by a law-suit with his crazy neighbour, Lord Roche, but the importance of this has perhaps been exaggerated. We may believe that Spenser's life was now for some years comfortable, and of a nature to encourage him in the prosecution of his noble poetical labours. We may leave him at Kilcolman for the moment, and consider the scheme of his great romantic masterpiece.

The plan of the Faerie Queene was confessedly allegorical, and the author has left us no chance of miscomprehending his intention. By the 'Elvish' Monarch, Gloriana, who is kept out of sight throughout, but who animates the whole idea, he meant national splendour as embodied in Elizabeth. The Knight of the Red Cross was emblematical of Holiness, Sir Guyon of Temperance, the Lady Britomart of Chastity. The plot of the Faerie Queene was intended to be this: The Queen Gloriana keeps her annual festival upon twelve consecutive days, on each of which there occur adventures, undertaken by twelve successive knights, and these form the subjects of the books of the poem, eked out by such episodes as the overthrow of Marinell and the resistance of Belphebe. Such is the scheme of the Faerie Queene as Spenser himself unfolded it to Raleigh. It was to be a great chivalrous epic after the Italian fashion of Boiardo and Ariosto, but with this distinction, that allegory was to be predominant in the outline of it, and that the conduct of the sentiment was to be uniformly splendid, with none of the descents to playfulness and even triviality which the Italians allowed themselves. Since Pulci had enjoyed so facile a success with the Morgante Maggiore, there had been a growing tendency to introduce burlesque, and even pantomimic absurdity, into the chivalrous epic, which, indeed, was now dying in the south of Europe. Spenser came just in time to lift it again to an incomparable magnificence, in a poem of extreme dignity and gravity.

We do not know how Spenser would have rounded forth his plan, for he did not live to complete the Faerie Queene. Only six of the twelve promised books were finished. But nothing that he might have added could have removed one basal fault; as Dean Church says, the poem 'carries with it no adequate account of its own story; it does not explain itself, or contain in its own structure what would enable a reader to understand how it arose.' There seems to have been planned yet another parallel epic, celebrating the 'politic virtues,' also, no doubt, to be in twelve books. What we possess, therefore, is but a fragment; and yet, beautiful as this is, no one has ever wished for more. Spenser did not possess constructive gifts; he was more prolix, if possible, than his Italian predecessors; and it is better to enjoy the actual texture of what he gives us in such gorgeous profusion than to attempt to realise what it was which he intended to supply. As he wrote on he used the Faerie Queene as a receptacle into which to pour whatever he had felt or suffered, dreamed or longed for; it became his constant haunting vision of life, now dropped for a while, now taken up anew, fused in nothing but in its uniformity of delicious music and radiant colour.

The form of the Faerie Queene deserves our attention. Spenser chose the ottava rima, as it had been used by Boiardo and was still being used by Tasso, but he altered it by adding a line between the Italian fourth and fifth, by modifying the arrangements of rhymes, and by adding a foot to the last line, which became an Alexandrine. This was a real metrical invention of high importance, and it has been claimed for Spenser that it is the only one which can be traced home to an English poet. It was little appreciated in Spenser's own age, or at least little and incorrectly imitated; but from the central years of the eighteenth century, when it was resuscitated by Akenside and Thomson, onwards to Tennyson and later, it was the characteristic metre of English romance; to Byron, Shelley, and Keats, in particular, it proved irresistibly attractive. None of these poets have used it with more complete success than its founder, in whose hands its sinuous and voluptuous melody, so subtle, so long-drawn, so majestic, presents to us something which is the very type and emblem of sustained poetic expression. The difficulty of handling this metre, especially in the group of four identical rhymes, is, however, greater than Spenser, who seems strangely breathless and hurried, can give himself time to overcome. He constantly forces sound, sense, and grammar to the exigencies of rhyme, satisfied if, without positively tripping, he can close his stanza in a rich Alexandrine.

Before Spenser returned to Ireland, he published in London a collection of nine of his miscellaneous poems, which appeared early in 1591 under the general title of Complaints. One of these, Muioptomos, or the Fate of the Butterfly, had already been issued in 1590; this is a lyrical narrative of the loves of a winged fay, Clarion, treated with extreme delicacy and lightness of touch. The Ruins of Time is an exquisite series of elegies, prolonged in several measures, and closing with a lament for Sir Philip Sidney, who had died on the 17th of October 1586, which doubtless indicates the date of composition of the poem. In The Tears of the Muses the poet calls upon Clio and her sisters to sing the degradation and sloth of England and her rulers in jeremiads which have little appropriateness or value beyond their verbal music; this is one of the poorest of Spenser's compositions. Virgil's Gnat appears to be a very early production, touched up by the more practised hand of the poet just before publication; little is to be said regarding this fluent paraphrase. Vastly more important is Prosopopoia, or, as it is more usually named, 'Mother Hubbard's Tale.' This satire, we are told by the poet himself, was 'long sithens composed in the raw conceit of my youth.' It is interesting to see Spenser here deliberately competing with Chaucer. Two central ideas run through 'Mother Hubbard's Tale'; it is a sarcastic picture of the English court, in its political conditions, and it is a satire of the contest proceeding between the Catholic and the Reformed Church under Elizabeth. It has been observed that Spenser's picture of society is obscured by his inability to touch life directly; Spenser must always be either romancing or allegorising.

The rest of the miscellaneous volume entitled the Complaints is taken up by four series of short pieces, mystical or allegorical, two of which are translated from Joachim du Bellay, one paraphrased from Petrarch, while one, Visions of the World's Vanity, seems to be substantially original. Among the former are found the boyish sonnets of 1569, revised and republished to take their place among the maturer writings of the poet.

Early in 1592 (the date on the title-page is 1591) Spenser published Daphnaïda, an elegy in memorial of Douglas Howard Gorges, the only daughter of Lord Bindon. This is a good example of his less personal manner in funereal poetry, sedate, fluent, and elegant, but too much taken up with the commonplaces of mortuary reflection to move the heart very deeply. Indeed, there is little doubt that the composition of death-poems of this class was part of the business of a professional Elizabethan poet, and not the least lucrative part. A knowledge of the deceased was not necessary; the family supplied the outlines on which the elegy was to be constructed, and the verse-writer then built up his work around such a scaffolding. The poet, in fact, was called in, as the sculptor or the painter might have been, and no charge of insincerity could be brought against the result of his labours. Although the preface of Daphnaïda is signed 'London, this first of January, 1591[2],' there is good reason to believe that Spenser had reached Ireland before the close of December.

He resumed his duties as Clerk to the Council of the province of Munster. Of his history during the next two years nothing is preserved. He was probably working, in the seclusion of his barbarous little peel-tower of Kilcolman, on the remaining books of the Faerie Queene. On the 11th of June 1594 Edmund Spenser and Elizabeth Boyle were married in the Cathedral of Cork, by William Lyon, bishop of that diocese. [Elizabeth Boyle (c. 1575-1622) was apparently already the widow of Tristram Peace. She married a third and fourth time after Spenser's death.] She bore him several children. Two of Spenser's sons had characteristically romantic names—Sylvanus and Peregrine. (Sylvanus may have been the child of a previous marriage of Spenser's.) It has been discovered that about the time of his marriage Spenser resigned the Clerkship of the Council to Sir Richard Boyle, a kinsman of his wife, and a family arrangement has been conjectured. He was unquestionably anxious to be free to visit England once more and see his later poems through the press.

To Sir Walter Raleigh he had sent, immediately upon his arrival at Kilcolman in the winter of 1591, the MS. of his Colin Clout's Come Home Again, but his friend refrained from printing it. It was published in 1595. This is one of the most vigorous, varied, and felicitous of Spenser's works, a record in exquisitely animated verse of all that had happened to him, socially and spiritually, during the two years of brilliant awakening under Raleigh's protection. There is reason to suppose that Colin Clout's Come Home Again did not pass to the press straight from Spenser's hands, for it contains a celebration of his old lost love Rosalind, which reads strangely as coming from the recent bridegroom of Elizabeth Boyle. Probably the poem was printed, without his revision, from the old MS. But we are not left in the same doubt regarding Spenser's next publication, Amoretti and Epithalamion, which was brought over from Kilcolman in the autumn of 1595 by Sir Robert Needham, and put safely in the hands of Ponsonby, the publisher, who brought it out in a tiny volume in November.

This book was entirely devoted to a celebration of his married love. The Amoretti were the sonnets, eighty-eight in number, which he had composed during their courtship, while Epithalamion was their marriage ode. The former were of the Petrarchan order, melodious and graceful, but dimmed to excess by the indefiniteness which was Spenser's great fault, and very rarely giving the reader that hold upon reality which is indispensable for the true enjoyment of poetry of this class. On the other hand, Epithalamion is perhaps Spenser's most perfect and most picturesque production; this poem glows with life and passion. Hallam said long ago, 'I do not know any other nuptial song, ancient or modern, of equal beauty; it is an intoxication of ecstasy, ardent, noble, and pure.' This magnificent poem is a canzone of the Italian class, perhaps the most perfect in the English language; whether Spenser borrowed the form direct from Petrarch or was affected by some experiments of Sir Philip Sidney may be questioned. It is enough to point out here that the style of Spenser is nowhere of so consummate a splendour as it is in the gorgeous strophes of Epithalamion.

It is believed that Spenser returned to England towards the end of 1595, and that he brought with him the manuscript of the second part of the Faerie Queene, consisting of the fourth, fifth, and sixth books. This was published by Ponsonby in 1596, and continued the romance with the story of Cambel and Triamond, or of Friendship; that of Artegall, or of Justice; and that of Sir Calidore, or of Courtesy. This was all that Spenser ever published of his great scheme, but it is certain that he proceeded further, for two cantos, the sixth and the seventh of 'some following book' of the Faerie Queene, were published in 1609 in the earliest folio edition. These are known as the Cantos of Mutability, and they are supposed to illustrate a legend of constancy. In 1596 Spenser was a guest at the wedding of Elizabeth and Catherine, the daughters of the Earl of Worcester, and to this feast he contributed a 'spousal' ode, Prothalamion, which was privately printed by Ponsonby. This same year saw the publication of his Four Hymns—in Honour of Love, in Honour of Beauty, of Heavenly Love and of Heavenly Beauty. It has been claimed that these were among Spenser's earliest effusions, 'composed in the greener times of my youth,' and these words are supposed particularly to affect the two earlier hymns. These are, doubtless, more mannered and less highly finished than the two later ones; but they greatly differ, as we now possess them, from what Spenser originally composed. 'Many copies' of the two Earthly Hymns, in their earlier form, 'were formerly scattered about,' but not one has hitherto been discovered.

When the poet issued his Four Hymns he was living at Greenwich, where Queen Elizabeth had a palace. He was extremely active in the year 1596, doubtless availing himself of the fact that he was closer to London to publish the various miscellaneous effusions of the past years. He printed Astrophel, an Arcadian elegy on Sir Philip Sidney's death, a subject which he had treated elsewhere with greater fervour. In this year, too, Spenser wrote his prose treatise, the View of Ireland, a statesman-like proposition for the 'thorough subjugation of that rebellious country,' which has been misunderstood by Celtic patriotism. Spenser could not be expected to take a view in opposition to the queen whom he served and the Government with which he was associated; but his little book testifies to close and not unsympathetic study of the elements of Irish society as he saw it in those troubled years.

Ireland was peculiarly unsettled when Spenser, probably in the opening weeks of 1597, returned to his home in Kilcolman. On the 30th of September 1598 the poet was appointed Sheriff of Cork, and on this occasion the queen describes him in her letters as 'a gentleman dwelling in the county of Cork, who is so well known unto you all for his good and commendable parts, being a man endowed with good knowledge in learning, and not unskilful or without experience in the wars.' Meanwhile the new rebellion under Tyrone was gathering to a head in secret, and in 1598 the wild Irish rose throughout Munster in the hope of regaining from the English Undertakers, of whom Spenser was one, the lands of which they had been dispossessed. In October all the province of Munster was in the hands of the rebels. Spenser was attacked in his peel-tower, and had only just time to escape with his household before the whole of Kilcolman was in flames. Ben Jonson told Drummond of Hawthornden that Spenser's youngest child, a baby, perished in the fire. Spenser got safe to Cork, where he joined the President, Sir Thomas Norris, who sent the poet to London with a despatch containing a first report of the rebellion. Spenser arrived in England about the middle of the month of December 1598. Certain State papers drawn up by the poet for the queen's guidance 'in the recovery of the realm of Ireland' were printed first by Dr Grosart in 1884, and are valuable biographically, as showing that Spenser was not overwhelmed by his misfortunes. His end, however, was startlingly near at hand. On the 16th of January 1599 he died in an inn at King Street, Westminster. There was a very painful story of his having died in extreme indigence, from want of food; and Jonson reported that, as he was starving, 'he refused twenty pieces sent him by my lord Essex, and said he was sure he had no time to spend them.' It is also reported that he was buried at the expense of Lodowick Lloyd, the queen's serjeant-at-arms, a poetaster of the time. On the other hand, we hear from Camden that Essex paid for a public funeral at the Abbey, where the nobles and poets threw elegies, 'and the pens wherewith they had been written,' into the grave. A monument was raised in the Abbey by Anne Clifford, Countess of Dorset, in 1620.

Spenser was early distinguished as the poet's poet, and through successive generations, even when there has seemed little sympathy between his ideas and those in vogue among his youthful admirers, he has exercised an extraordinary influence over enthusiastic and imaginative young men. In his own day a cluster of disciples gathered about his work, although it is possible that of his person they knew little or nothing. Later on in the next century poets as unlike him as Cowley and Dryden acknowledged a lasting debt to him for stimulating their love of the poetic art. But we reach the most unlikely of the admirers of Spenser when we come to Pope, whose childhood was nourished on the Faerie Queene, who scornfully accused Addison of criticising Spenser without having really read him, and who held up the great Elizabethan as one of the landmarks of our literature. Pope wrote, when he was twelve, an epic poem of Alcander, in which he tried to reproduce the beauties of the Faerie Queene. When he was old he read Spenser's poems over again, and said that they gave him as much delight as they did when he was a child. The list of the great English poets which Pope drew out began with the name of Spenser.

This evidence of Pope's is of peculiar value, because of the diametrical opposition between the praiser and the praised in the technical character of their work. It shows that there is a peculiar quality of romance in the poetry of Spenser which is entirely independent of style and fashion, and naturally attracts all who are attracted, in whatever form, by the art of verse. After the classical period, and when romance came slowly back into fashion, it is no wonder that Spenser became again a favourite, or was imitated by such poets as Thomson, Collins, and Shenstone. With the complete revival of imaginative literature in England he was closely identified, and we trace him strongly in Shelley, Keats, and Wordsworth, and, less obviously, in Byron. In the writings of Tennyson and even of Browning the Spenserian elements are clearly perceptible. Spenser, in short, has entered into the very blood and bones of our national poetry, and we are with him oftener than we are conscious of his presence. He is still our criterion of the romantic virtues, of candour and courtesy in a man, of dignified sweetness in a woman. His types are, without our realisation of the fact, the ideal portraits which we like to point to as those of the noblest specimens of our race and breed.

When we look broadly at the poetic work of Spenser, we find that the Faerie Queene stands out so massively that it dwarfs all his other achievements. Taking this glorious fragment, then, as representative of his power and quality, we see that the most prominent characteristic of Spenser is his intense conviction of the paramount importance of beauty. No poet has ever lived in whom the obsession of loveliness, in person and scenery, in thought and act, in colour and sound, in association and instinct, was so constraining as it is in Spenser. He is led by beauty as by a golden chain, and his work has the weaknesses inherent on a too persistent concentration of the mind on this particular species of harmony. He lacks sublimity; he does not know the heightening power of austerity in treatment; he shrinks from all life that is not led in the mazes of an enchanted forest or by the lustral waters of an ocean. Accordingly, his stateliness and his fantastic pageant of the imagination have a certain unreality about them, which his magic is seldom quite intense enough to remove. His scenes are too spectacular and too phantasmal to give complete satisfaction to any but children and poets.

It would be an error, however, to regard 'our sage and serious Spenser' as one who merely designed to unroll before our eyes a panorama of exquisite and dignified pictures of an incredible chivalry. His extreme devotion to the principle of beauty did not preclude him from the aim of being 'a better teacher than Scotus or Aquinas.' It is true that the least pleasing parts of his great poem are those in which he strains most tightly his ethical or didactic purpose. Like many great teachers, he teaches best when his thoughts are least set on teaching. His studies of womanhood, extraordinary in their variety and subtlety, are living sources of education. Age after age our best youth has learned to adore the female virtues in this exquisite series of full-length portraits. What could not be said of Una and Amoret, of Britomart and Belphebe, of Florimel and Serena? In these stainless and tender creations Spenser taught the wild men of his own age, 'the rude rabblement' not less than the Satyranes and Braggadochios of Elizabeth's 'salvage' court, to honour and submit to the inherent majesty of woman; which, indeed, was at the same time quaintly and artificially foreshadowed by the etiquette due from a gentleman in addressing the queen as a beautiful and perfect maiden, although to the gross outward eye she might seem to him old and harsh and ugly.

Of Spenser's treatment of the phenomena of the physical world much might be said. He excels in broad effects; he brings up before us the illimitable wideness of great plains, the billowy vastness of primeval forests, the world veiled in shadow, drowned in a blaze of sunshine, brooded over by the starry stillness of midnight. His metre, so tense and delicate, becomes like an æolian harp as he describes the various movements of the air, from a light breeze to the very roar of tempest. But, perhaps, most of all Spenser exercises his magic in rendering the sound and appearance of living waters—in sea, in lake, in river. Even in the depths of the woodland his embodied virtues are never far from some glade down which the sound is heard of foaming breakers or of silver streams. Spenser's treatment of landscape can nowhere be more favourably studied than in the long-drawn voluptuous scenes of Acrasia's Bower of Bliss in the second book of the Faerie Queene, where we possess, combined in extraordinary fullness, his typical characteristics, his love of allegorical presentment, the richness of his vision, his amazing fluency and melody of style, his Platonic elevation, and also his cardinal fault, his want of constructive resolution. We think of him at last, in face of all that is ineffectual and mistaken in his theory of poetry, as nevertheless one of the noblest figures in our poetical history. He is clothed with romance as with a garment; he is an impassioned votary of the loftiest imaginative purity; and he is one of the most lavish of those who have strewn at our feet the rubies of exquisite diction. In the masque of the English poets Edmund Spenser rides on a white horse and blows a golden trumpet, the champion of beauty and Paladin of poets.

April.

'Ye daynty Nymphs, that in this blessed brooke
Doe bathe your brest,
Forsake your watry bowres, and hether looke,
At my request:
And eke you Virgins, that on Parnasse dwell,
Whence floweth Helicon, the learned weli,
Helpe me to blaze
Her worthy praise,
Which in her sexe doth all excell.

'Of fayre Elisa be your silver song,
That blessed wight,
The flowre of Virgins: may shee florish long
In princely plight!
For shee is Syrinx daughter without spotte,
Which Pan, the shepheards God, of her begot:
So sprong her grace
Of heavenly race,
No mortall blemishe may her blotte.

'See, where she sits upon the grassie greene,
(O seemely sight!)
Yclad in Scarlot, like a mayden Queene,
And ermines white:
Upon her head a Cremosin coronet,
With Damaske roses and Daffadillies set:
Bay leaves betweene,
And primroses greene,
Embellish the sweete Violet.'

(From The Shepherd's Calendar.)

Una and the Red Cross Knight.

A gentle Knight was pricking on the plaine,
 Ycladd in mightie armes and silver shielde,
 Wherein old dints of deepe woundes did remaine,
 The cruell markes of many a bloody field ;
 Yet armes till that time did he never wield.
 His angry steede did chide his foming bitt,
 As much disdayning to the curbe to yield :
 Full jolly knight he seemd, and faire did sitt,
 As one for knightly giusts and fierce encounters fitt.

And on his brest a bloodie Crosse he bore,
 The deare remembrance of his dying Lord,
 For whose sweete sake that glorious badge he wore,
 And dead, as living, ever him ador'd :
 Upon his shield the like was also scor'd,
 For soveraine hope which in his helpe he had.
 Right faithfull true he was in deede and word,
 But of his cheere did seeme too solemne sad ;
 Yet nothing did he dread, but ever was ydrad.

Upon a great adventure he was bond,
 That greatest Gloriana to him gave,
 (That greatest Glorious Queene of Faery lond)
 To winne him worshippe, and her grace to have,
 Which of all earthly thinges he most did crave :
 And ever as he rode his hart did earne
 To prove his puissance in battell brave
 Upon his foe, and his new force to learne,
 Upon his foe, a Dragon horrible and stearne.

A lovely Ladie rode him faire beside,
 Upon a lowly Asse more white than snow,
 Yet she much whiter ; but the same did hide
 Under a vele, that wimpled was full low ;
 And over all a blacke stole shee did throw :
 As one that inly mournd, so was she sad,
 And heaveie sate upon her palfrey slow ;
 Seemed in heart some hidden care she had,
 And by her in a line a milkewhite lambe she lad.

So pure and innocent as that same lambe
 She was in life and every vertuous lore ;
 And by descent from Royall lynage came
 Of ancient Kinges and Queenes, that had of yore
 Their scepters stretcht from East to Western shore,
 And all the world in their subjection held ;
 Till that infernall feend with foule uprore
 Forwasted all their land, and them expeld ;
 Whom to avenge she had this Knight from far compeld.

Behind her farre away a Dwarfie did lag,
 That lasie seemd, in being ever last,
 Or wearied with bearing of her bag
 Of needments at his backe. Thus as they past,
 The day with cloudes was suddaine overcast,
 And angry Jove an hideous storme of raine
 Did poure into his Lemans lap so fast,
 That everie wight to shrowd it did constrain ;
 And this faire couple eke to shroud themselves were fain.

Enforst to seeke some covert nigh at hand,
 A shadie grove not farr away they spide,
 That promist ayde the tempest to withstand ;
 Whose loftie trees, yclad with sommers pride,

Did spred so broad, that heavens light did hide,
 Not perceable with power of any starr :
 And all within were pathes and alleies wide,
 With footing worne, and leading inward farr.
 Faire harbour that them seems, so in they entred ar.

And foorth they passe, with pleasure forward led,
 Joying to heare the birdes sweete harmony,
 Which, therein shrouded from the tempest dred,
 Seemd in their song to scorne the cruell sky.
 Much can they praise the trees so straight and hy,
 The sayling Pine ; the Cedar proud and tall ;
 The vine-propp Elme ; the Poplar never dry ;
 The builder Oake, sole king of forrests all ;
 The Aspine good for staves ; the Cypresse funeral ;

The Laurell, meed of mightie Conquerours
 And Poets sage ; the Firre that weepeth still :
 The Willow, worne of forlorne Paramours ;
 The Eugh, obedient to the benders will ;
 The Birch for shaftes ; the Sallow for the mill ;
 The Mirrhe sweete-bleeding in the bitter wound ;
 The warlike Beech ; the Ash for nothing ill ;
 The fruitfull Olive ; and the Platane round ;
 The carver Holme ; the Maple seeldom inward sound.

Led with delight, they thus beguile the way,
 Untill the blustering storme is overblowne ;
 When, weening to returne whence they did stray,
 They cannot finde that path, which first was showne,
 But wander too and fro in waies unknowne,
 Furthest from end then, when they nearest weene,
 That makes them doubt their wits be not their owne :
 So many pathes, so many turnings seene,
 That which of them to take in diverse doubt they been.

(From The Faerie Queene, Book i. canto i.)

Acrasia's Bower of Bliss.

There the most daintie Paradise on ground
 It selfe doth offer to his sober eye,
 In which all pleasures plenteously abownd,
 And none does others happinesse envye ;
 The painted flowres, the trees upshooting hye,
 The dales for shade, the hilles for breathing space,
 The trembling groves, the christall running by,
 And, that which all faire workes doth most aggrace,
 The art which all that wrought appeared in no place.

One would have thought (so cunningly the rude
 And scorned partes were mingled with the fine)
 That nature had for wantonnesse ensude
 Art, and that Art at nature did repine ;
 So striving each th' other to undermine,
 Each did the others worke more beautify ;
 So diff'ring both in willes agreed in fine :
 So all agreed, through sweete diversity,
 This Gardin to adorne with all variety.

And in the midst of all a fountaine stood,
 Of richest substance that on earth might bee,
 So pure and shiny that the silver flood
 Through every channell running one might see ;
 Most goodly it with curious ymageree
 Was overwrought, and shapen of naked boyes,
 Of which some seemd with lively jollitee
 To fly about, playing their wanton toyes,
 Whylest others did them selves embay in liquid joyes.

And over all of purest gold was spred
 A trayle of yvie in his native hew ;
 For the rich metall was so coloured,
 That wight who did not well avis'd it vew
 Would surely deeme it to bee yvie trew :
 Low his lascivious armes adown did creepe,
 That themselves dipping in the silver dew
 Their fleecy flowres they fearefully did steepe,
 Which drops of Christall seemd for wantones to weep.

Infinit streames continually did well
 Out of this fountaine, sweet and faire to see,
 The which into an ample laver fell,
 And shortly grew into so great quantitie,
 That like a litle lake it seemd to bee ;
 Whose depth exceeded not three cubits hight,
 That through the waves one might the bottom see,
 All pav'd beneath with Jasper shining bright,
 That seemd the fountaine in that sea did sayle upright.

And all the margent round about was sett
 With shady Laurell trees, thence to defend
 The sunny beames which on the billowes bett,
 And those which therein bathed mote offend.
 As Guyon hapned by the same to wend,
 Two naked Damzelles he therein espyde,
 Which therein bathing seemed to contend
 And wrestle wantonly, ne car'd to hyde
 Their dainty partes from vew of any which them eyd.

Sometimes the one would lift the other quight
 Above the waters, and then downe againe
 Her plong, as over-maystered by might,
 Where both awhile would covered remaine,
 And each the other from to rise restraine ;
 The whiles their snowy limbes, as through a vele,
 So through the christall waves appeared plaine :
 Then suddainly both would themselves unhele,
 And th' amarous sweet spoiles to greedy eyes revele.

As that faire Starre, the messenger of morne,
 His deawy face out of the sea doth reare ;
 Or as the Cyprian goddess, newly borne
 Of th' Ocean's fruitfull froth, did first appeare :
 Such seemed they, and so their yellow heare
 Christalline humor dropped downe apace.
 Whom such when Guyon saw, he drew him neare,
 And somewhat gan relent his earnest pace ;
 His stubborne brest gan secret pleasaunce to embrace.

The wanton Maidens, him espying, stood
 Gazing awhile at his unwonted guise ;
 Then th' one her selfe low ducked in the flood,
 Abasht that her a straunger did avise ;
 But thother rather higher did arise,
 And her two lilly paps aloft displayd,
 And all that might his melting hart entyse
 To her delights she unto him bewrayd ;
 The rest hidd underneath him more desirous made.

With that the other likewise up arose,
 And her faire lockes, which formerly were bownd
 Up in one knott, she low adowne did lose,
 Which flowing low and thick her cloth'd around,

And th' yvorie in golden mantle gownd :
 So that faire spectacle from him was reft,
 Yet that which reft it no lesse faire was fownd.
 So hidd in lockes and waves from lookers theft,
 Nought but her lovely face she for his looking left.

Withall she laughed, and she blusht withall,
 That blushing to her laughter gave more grace,
 And laughter to her blushing, as did fall.
 Now when they spyde the knight to slacke his pace
 Them to behold, and in his sparkling face
 The secrete signes of kindled lust appeare,
 Their wanton meriments they did encrease,
 And to him beckned to approach more neare,
 And shewd him many sights that corage cold could reare.

On which when gazing him the Palmer saw,
 He much rebukt those wandring eyes of his,
 And counseld well him forward thence did draw.
 Now are they come nigh to the Bowre of blis,
 Of her fond favorites so nam'd amis,
 When thus the Palmer : ' Now, Sir, well advise ;
 For here the end of all our travaill is :
 Here wonnes Acrasia, whom we must surprise,
 Els she will slip away, and all our drift despise.'

Eftsoones they heard a most melodious sound,
 Of all that mote delight a daintie eare,
 Such as attonce might not on living ground,
 Save in this Paradise, he heard elsewhere :
 Right hard it was for wight which did it heare,
 To read what manner musicke that mote bee.
 For all that pleasing is to living eare
 Was there consorted in one harmonie ;
 Birdes, voices, instruments, windes, waters, all agree.

The joyous birdes, shrouded in chearefull shade
 Their notes unto the voice attempted sweet ;
 Th' Angelicall soft trembling voyces made
 To th' instruments divine responce ment ;
 The silver sounding instruments did meet
 With the base mutmure of the waters fall ;
 The waters fall with difference discreet,
 Now soft, now loud, unto the wind did call ;
 The gentle warbling wind low answered to all.

There, whence that Musick seemed heard to bee,
 Was the faire Witch her selfe now solacing
 With a new Lover, whom through sorceree
 And witchcraft she from farre did thither bring :
 There she had him now laid aslombering
 In secret shade after long wanton joyes ;
 Whilst round about them pleasauntly did sing
 Many faire, Ladies and lascivious boyes,
 That ever mixt their song with light licentious toyes.

And all that while right over him she hong
 With her false eyes fast fixed in his sight,
 As seeking medicine whence she was stong,
 Or greedily depasturing delight ;
 And oft inclining downe, with kisses light
 For feare of waking him, his lips bedewd,
 And through his humid eyes did sucke his spright,
 Quite molten into lust and pleasure lewd ;
 Wherewith she sighed soft, as if his case she rewd.

The whiles some one did chaunt this lovely lay :
 Ah ! see, whoso fayre thing doest faine to see,
 In springing flowre the image of thy day.
 Ah ! see the Virgin Rose, how sweetly shee
 Doth first peepe foorth with bashfull modestee,
 That fairer seemes the lesse ye see her may.
 Lo ! see soone after how more bold and free
 Her bared bosome she doth broad display ;
 Lo ! see soone after how she fades and falls away.

So passeth, in the passing of a day,
 Of mortall life the leafe, the bud, the flowre ;
 Ne more doth florish after first decay,
 That earst was sought to deck both bed and bowre
 Of many a lady, and many a Paramowre.
 Gather therefore the Rose whilst yet is prime,
 For soone comes age that will her pride deflowre ;
 Gather the Rose of love whilst yet is time,
 Whilst loving thou mayst loved be with equall crime.
 (From The Faerie Queene, Book ii. canto xii.)

The Temple of Venus.

' Into the inmost Temple thus I came,
 Which fuming all with frankensence I found
 And odours rising from the altars flame.
 Upon an hundred marble pillors round
 The roofe up high was reared from the ground,
 All deckt with crownes, and chaynes, and girlands gay,
 And thousand pretious gifts worth many a pound,
 The which sad lovers for their voves did pay ;
 And all the ground was strow'd with flowres as fresh as May.

' An hundred Altars round about were set,
 All flaming with their sacrifices fire,
 That with the steme thereof the Temple swet,
 Which rould in clouds to heaven did aspire,
 And in them bore true lovers voves entire :
 And eke an hundred brasen caudrons bright,
 To bath in joy and amorous desire,
 Every of which was to a damzell hight ;
 For all the Priests were damzels in soft linnen dight.

' Right in the midst the Goddess selfe did stand
 Upon an altar of some costly masse,
 Whose substance was uneath to understand :
 For neither pretious stone, nor durefull brasse,
 Nor shining gold, nor mouldring clay it was ;
 But much more rare and pretious to esteeme,
 Pure in aspect, and like to christall glasse,
 Yet glasse was not, if one did rightly deeme ;
 But, being faire and brickle, likest glasse did seeme.

' But it in shape and beautie did excell
 All other Idoles which the heathen adore,
 Farre passing that which by surpassing skill
 Phidias did make in Paphos Isle of yore,
 With which that wretched Greeke, that life forlore,
 Did fall in love : yet this much fairer shined,
 But covered with a slender veile afore ;
 And both her feete and legs together twyned
 Were with a snake, whose head and tail were fast combyned.

' And all about her necke and shoulders flew
 A flocke of litle loves, and sports, and joyes,
 With nimble wings of gold and purple hew ;
 Whose shapes seem'd not like to terrestriall boyes,
 But like to Angels playing heavenly toyes,
 The whilst their eldest brother was away,
 Cupid their eldest brother ; he enjoyes
 The wide kingdome of love with lordly sway,
 And to his law compels all creatures to obay.

' And all about her altar scattered lay
 Great sorts of lovers piteously complayning,
 Some of their losse, some of their loves delay,
 Some of their pride, some paragons disdayning,
 Some fearing fraud, some fraudulently fayning,
 As every one had cause of good or ill.
 Amongst the rest some one, through Loves constrayning
 Tormented sore, could not containe it still,
 But thus brake forth, that all the temple it did fill :

' "Great Venus ! Queene of beautie and of grace,
 The joy of Gods and men, that under skie
 Doest fayrest shine, and most adorne thy place ;
 That with thy smyling looke doest pacifie
 The raging seas, and makst the stormes to flie ;
 Thee, goddess, thee the winds, the clouds doe feare,
 And, when thou spredst thy mantle forth on hie,
 The waters play, and pleasant lands appeare,
 And heavens laugh, and al the world shews joyous cheare."'

Mutability.

When I bethinke me on that speech whyleare erewhile
 Of Mutabilitie, and well it way,
 Me seemes that though she all unworthy were
 Of the Heav'ns Rule ; yet, very sooth to say,
 In all things else she beares the greatest sway :
 Which makes me loath this state of life so tickle, insecure
 And love of things so vaine to cast away ;
 Whose flowring pride, so fading and so fickle,
 Short Time shall soon cut down with his consuming sickle.

Then gin I thinke on that which Nature sayd,
 Of that same time when no more Change shall be,
 But stedfast rest of all things, firmly stayd
 Upon the pillours of Eternity,
 That is contrayr to Mutabilitie ;
 For all that moveth doth in Change delight :
 But thence-forth all shall rest eternally
 With Him that is the God of Sabaoth hight :
 O ! that great Sabaoth God, grant me that Sabaoths sight

Spenser Visited by Walter Raleigh.

' One day (quoth he) I sat (as was my trade)
 Under the foote of Mole, that mountaine hore,
 Keeping my sheepe amongst the cooly shade
 Of the greene alders by the Mullaes shore ;
 There a straunge shepheard chaunst to find me out,
 Whether allured with my pipes delight,
 Whose pleasing sound yshrilled far about,
 Or thither led by chauce, I know not right :
 Whom when I asked from what place he came,
 And how he hight, himselfe he did ycleepe
 The Shepheard of the Ocean by name,
 And said he came far from the main-sea deepe.

He, sitting me beside in that same shade,
 Provoked me to plaie some pleasant fit ;
 And when he heard the musicke which I made,
 He found himselfe full greatly pleas'd at it :
 Yet, æmuling my pipe, he tooke in hond
 My pipe, before that æmuled of many,
 And plaid thereon ; (for well that skill he cond ;)
 Himselfe as skilfull in that art as any.
 He pip'd, I sung ; and, when he sung, I piped ;
 By chaunge of turnes, each making other mery ;
 Neither envying other, nor envied,
 So piped we, until we both were weary.'

From 'Amoretti.'

Sweet is the Rose, but growes upon a brere ;
 Sweet is the Junipere, but sharpe his bough ;
 Sweet is the Eglantine, but pricketh nere ;
 Sweet is the Firbloom, but his braunche is rough ;
 Sweet is the Cypressse, but his rynd is tough ;
 Sweet is the Nut, but bitter is his pill ;
 Sweet is the Broome-flowre, but yet sowre enough ;
 And sweet is Moly, but his root is ill. a magic herb of the Greeks
 So every sweet with soure is tempred still,
 That maketh it be coveted the more :
 For easie things, that may be got at will,
 Most sorts of men doe set but little store.

Why then should I account of little paine,
 That endlesse pleasure shall unto me gaine !

From 'An Hymn of Heavenly Beauty.'

Vouchsafe then, O thou most Almightye Spright !
 From whom all guifts of wit and knowledge flow,
 To shed into my breast some sparkling light
 Of thine eternall Truth, that I may show
 Some litle beames to mortall eyes below
 Of that immortall beautie, there with thee,
 Which in my weake distraughted mynd I see ;

That with the glorie of so goodly sight
 The hearts of men, which fondly here admyre
 Faire seeming shewes, and feed on vaine delight,
 Transported with celestiaall desyre
 Of those faire formes, may lift themselves up hyer,
 And learne to love, with zealous humble dewty,
 Th' eternall fountaine of that heavenly beauty.

Beginning then below, with th' easie vew
 Of this base world, subject to fleshly eye,
 From thence to mount aloft, by order dew,
 To contemplation of th' immortall sky ;
 Of the soare falcon so I learne to fly,
 That flags awhile her fluttering wings beneath,
 Till she her selfe for stronger flight can breath.

Then looke, who list thy gazefull eyes to feed
 With sight of that is faire, looke on the frame
 Of this wyde universe, and therein reed
 The endlesse kinds of creatures which by name
 Thou canst not count, much lesse their natures aime ;
 All which are made with wondrous wise respect,
 And all with admirable beautie deckt.

First, th' Earth, on adamantine pillars founded
 Amid the Sea, engirt with brasen bands ;
 Then th' Aire still flitting, but yet firmly bounded

On everie side, with pyles of flaming brands,
 Never consum'd, nor quencht with mortall hands ;
 And, last, that mightie shining christall wall,
 Wherewith he hath encompassed this All.

From the 'Epithalamion.'

Wake now, my love, awake ! for it is time ;
 The Rosy Morne long since left Tithones bed,
 All ready to her silver coche to clyme ;
 And Phœbus gins to shew his glorious hed.
 Hark ! how the cheerefull birds do chaunt theyr laies
 And carroll of Loves praise.
 The merry Larke hir mattins sings aloft ;
 The Thrush replies ; the Mavis descant playes :
 The Ouzell shrills ; the Ruddock warbles soft ; Redbreast
 So goodly all agree, with sweet consent,
 To this dayes merriment.
 Ah ! my deere love, why doe ye sleepe thus long,
 When meeter were that ye should now awake,
 T' awayt the comming of your joyous make,
 And hearken to the birds love-learned song,
 The dewy leaves among !
 Nor they of joy and pleasance to you sing,
 That all the woods them answer, and theyr eccho ring.

My love is now awake out of her dreames,
 And her fayre eyes, like stars that dimmed were
 With darksome cloud, now shew theyr goodly beams
 More bright than Hesperus his head doth rere.
 Come now, ye damzels, daughters of delight,
 Helpe quickly her to dight :
 But first come ye fayre houres, which were begot
 In Joves sweet paradise of Day and Night ;
 Which doe the seasons of the yeare allot,
 And al, that ever in this world is fayre,
 Doe make and still repayre :
 And ye three handmayds of the Cyprian Queene,
 The which doe still adorne her beauties pride,
 Helpe to addorne my beautifullest bride :
 And, as ye her array, still throw betweene
 Some graces to be seene ;
 And, as ye use to Venus, to her sing,
 The whiles the woods shal answer, and your eccho ring.

Now is my love all ready forth to come :
 Let all the virgins therefore well awayt :
 And ye fresh boyes, that tend upon her groome,
 Prepare your selves ; for he is comming strayt.
 Set all your things in seemely good aray,
 Fit for so joyfull day :
 The joyfult day that ever sunne did see.
 Faire Sun ! shew forth thy favourable ray,
 And let thy lifull heat not fervent be, life-full
 For feare of burning her sunshyny face,
 Her beauty to disgrace.
 O fayrest Phœbus ! father of the Muse !
 If ever I did honour thee aright,
 Or sing the thing that mote thy mind delight,
 Doe not thy servants simple boone refuse ;
 But let this day, let this one day, be myne ;
 Let all the rest be thine.
 Then I thy soverayne prayes loud wil sing,
 That all the woods shal answer, and theyr eccho ring.

Harke ! how the Minstrils gin to shrill aloud
 Their merry Musick that resounds from far,

The pipe, the tabor, and the trembling Croud. Fiddle
That well agree withouten breach or jar.
But, most of all, the Damzels doe delite
When they their tymbrels smyte,
And thereunto doe daunce and carrol sweet,
That all the sences they doe ravish quite ;
The whyles the boyes run up and downe the street,
Crying aloud with strong confused noyce,
As if it were one voyce,
Hymen, iö Hymen, Hymen, they do shout ;
That even to the heavens theyr shouting shrill
Doth reach, and all the firmament doth fill ;
To which the people standing all about,
As in approvance, doe thereto applaud,
And loud advaunce her laud ;
And evermore they Hymen, Hymen sing,
That al the woods them answer, and theyr eccho ring.

Loe! where she comes along with portly pace,
Lyke Phœbe, from her chamber of the East,
Arysing forth to run her mighty race,
Clad all in white, that seemes a virgin best.
So well it her beseemes, that ye would weene
Some angell she had bene.
Her long loose yellow locks lyke golden wyre,
Sprinkled with perle, and perling flowres atweene,
Doe lyke a golden mantle her attyre ;
And, being crowned with a girland greene,
Seeme lyke some mayden Queene.
Her modest eyes, abashed to behold
So many gazers as on her do stare,
Upon the lowly ground affixed are ;
Ne dare lift up her countenance too bold,
But blush to heare her prayses sung so loud,
So farre from being proud.
Nathlesse doe ye still loud her prayses sing,
That all the woods may answer, and your eccho ring.

Tell me, ye merchants daughters, did ye see
So fayre a creature in your towne before ;
So sweet, so lovely, and so mild as she,
Adorned with beautyes grace and vertues store ?
Her goodly eyes lyke Saphyres shining bright,
Her forehead ivory white,
Her cheekes lyke apples which the sun hath rudded,
Her lips like cherries charming men to byte,
Her brest like to a bowle of creame uncrudded,
Her paps lyke lyllys budded,
Her snowie necke lyke to a marble towre ;
And all her body like a pallace fayre,
Ascending up, with many a stately stayre,
To honors seat and chastities sweet bowre.
Why stand ye still, ye virgins, in amaze,
Upon her so to gaze,
Whiles ye forget your former lay to sing,
To which the woods did answer, and your eccho ring ?

But if ye saw that which no eyes can see,
The inward beauty of her lively spright,
Garnisht with heavenly guifts of high degree,
Much more then would ye wonder at that sight,
And stand astonisht lyke to those which red
Medusæes mafeul hed.
There dwels sweet love, and constant chastity,
Unspotted fayth, and comely womanhood,
Regard of honour, and mild modesty :

There vertue raynes as Queene in royal throne,
And giveth lawes alone,
The which the base affections doe obay,
And yeeld theyr services unto her will ;
Ne thought of thing uncomely ever may
Thereto approach to tempt her mind to ill.
Had ye once seene these her celestial treasures,
And unrevealed pleasures,
Then would ye wonder, and her prayses sing,
That al the woods should answer, and your eccho ring.

The View of the Present State of Ireland, 'discoursed by way of a dialogue betweene Eudoxus and Irenæus,' begins thus :

Eudox. But yf that countrey of Ireland, whence you lately came, be soe goodly and commodious a soyle, as ye report, I wonder that noe course is taken for the tourning therof to good uses, and reducing of that savadge nation to better government and civilitye.

Iren. Marry, soe there have beene divers good plottes devised, and wise counsellis cast alleready about reformation of that realme ; but they say, it is the fatall desteny of that land, that noe purposes, whatsoever are meant for her good, will prosper or take good effect, which whether it proceede from the very GENIUS of the soyle, or influence of the starres, or that Allmighty God hath not yet appoynted the time of her reformation, or that he reserveth her in this unquiett state still for some secrett scourdge, which shall by her come unto England, it is hard to be knowen, but yet much to be feared.

Spenser expounds at some length the melancholy fact that the earliest English settlers in Ireland became Hibernis ipsis Hiberniores :

Iren. The cheifest abuses which are nowe in that realme, are grown from the English that were, but are nowe much more lawless and licentious then the very wild Irish : soe that as much care as was then by them had to reforme the Irish, soe much and more must nowe be used to reform them ; soe much time doth alter the manners of men.

Eudox. That seemeth very straunge which you say, that men should soe much degenerate from theyr first natures as to growe wilde.

Iren. Soe much can libertye and ill example doe.

Eudox. What libertye had the English there, more then they had heere at home ? Were not the lawes plaunted amongst them at the first, and had not they governours to courbe and keepe them still in awe and obedience ?

Iren. They had, but it was, for the most part, such as did more hurte then good ; for they had governours for the most part of themselves, and commonly out of the two howses of the Geraldins and the Butlers, both adversaries and corryvalls one agaynst the other. Whoe though, for the most parte, they were but as deputyes under some of the King of Englandes sonnes, brethren, or other neere kinsemen, whoe were the Kinges lieutenantes, yet they swayed soe much, as they had all the rule, and the others but the title. Of which Butlers and Geraldins, albeit (I must confess) they were very brave and woorthye men, as also of other the Peeres of that realme, made Lord Deputyes and Lord Justices at sundry times, yet thorough greatnes of their late conquests and seignories they grewe insolent, and bent both that regall authority, and also theyr private powers, one agaynst another, to the utter subversion of themselves, and strengthening of the Irish agayne. This ye may see playnly discovered by a letter written from the cittizens of Corke out of Ireland, to the Earle of Shrewsbury then in England, and remayning yet upon record, both in the Towre of London, and also amongst the Chronicles of Ireland. Wherein it is by them complained, that the English Lords and Gentlemen, who then had great possessions in Ireland, beganne, through pride and insolencye, to make private warres one agaynst another, and when either parte was weake they would wage and drawe in the Irish to take theyr parte, by which meanes they both greatlie encouraged and enabled the Irish, which till that time had bene shutt up within the Moun-tayne of Slewloghir, and weakened and disabled themselves, insoemuch that theyr revenues were wonderfully impayred, and some of them, which are there reckoned to have bene able to have spent 12 or 13 hundred poundes per annum, of old rent, (that I may say noe more) besides theyr commodities of creekes and havens, were nowe scarce able to dispend the third part. From which disorder, an other huge calamitye came upon them, as that, they are nowe growen to be almost as lewde as the Irish: I meane of such English as were planted above toward the West; for the English Pale hath preserved it self, through neereness of their state, in reasonable civilitye, but the rest which dwell above Conaught and in Mounster, which is the sweetest soyle of Ireland, and some in Leinster and Ulster, are degenerate, and growen to be as very patchockes [clowns, boors] as the wild Irish, yea and some of them have quite shaken of theyr English names, and put on Irish that they might be alltogether Irish.

Yet, though taking a somewhat pessimist view of Irish polity and Irish character in these distracted times, Spenser, as Irenæus, says:

I have heard some greate warriors say, that, in all the services which they had seene abroad in forrayne countreys, they never sawe a more comely horseman then the Irish man, nor that cometh on more bravely in his charge: neither is his manner of mounting unseemely, though he wante stirrups, but more ready then with stirrups; for in his getting up his horse is still going, wherby he gayneth way.

And when Eudoxus asks about the bards:

Tell me (I pray you) have they any arte in theyr compositions? or be they any thing wittye or well savoured, as Poems should be? [Irenæus answers:]

Yea truly; I have caused diverse of them to be translated unto me that I might understand them; and surely they savoured of sweete witt and good invention, but skilled not of the goodly ornamentes of Poetrye: yet were they sprinkled with some prety flowers of theyr owne naturall devise, which gave good grace and comliness unto them.

The Faerie Queene was completed in six books in 1596; the earliest edition in folio is that of 1609. Spenser's works were first collected in 1611; and again in 1679, with a Life. See Globe edition (1899), and those by Grosart (1882-93), Collier (new ed. 1891), E. de Selincourt and Smith (Poetical Works, 1909-10), Renwick (1928 et seq.), Greenlaw and others (1933 et seq.); books by Church (1879), Carpenter (1894), Cory (1917), Jack (1920), Renwick (1925), E. EDMUND GOSSE.

Sir Walter Raleigh was one of the most brilliant and heroic of the great men who adorned the reign of Elizabeth. Raleigh, Rauleygh, and Rauley, other spellings used by himself, show how the name was pronounced. He was born in 1552, at Hayes manor, near Sidmouth in Devon, of an ancient family; and from his youth was distinguished by great intellectual acuteness, but still more by a restless and adventurous disposition. Having studied awhile at Oriel College, Oxford, he became a soldier at seventeen; fought for the Huguenot cause in the civil wars of France; and in 1578 joined a luckless expedition of his half-brother, Sir Humphrey Gilbert, in quest of the 'Unknown Goal.' In 1580 he went to Ireland with a hundred soldiers to act against the rebels. He took part in the massacre on 10th November of six hundred Spaniards and Italians from the fort of Smerwick, and in all his movements showed vigour and ability and no scruples. He remained in Ireland until December 1581, when we find him receiving £20 for carrying despatches from Colonel Zouch to the queen; with the aid of a handsome person and winning address, he soon became a special favourite with Elizabeth. The energy displayed in suppressing the rebellion of Desmond brought Raleigh a grant of part of the forfeited property—ultimately extended to 40,000 acres, it would seem; and he had the 'farm of wines' and a license to export broadcloth. In 1584 he was knighted; in 1585 he became Lord Warden of the Stannaries and Vice-Admiral of Devon and Cornwall; and in 1585-86 he sat in parliament for Devon. In 1584 he joined in an adventure for the discovery and settlement of unknown countries. With the help of his friends, two ships were sent out in quest of gold-mines to that part of North America of which a section still retains the name Virginia, conferred by Queen Elizabeth; but Raleigh himself was not with these vessels. The commodities brought home by them produced so good a return that the owners were induced to fit out, for the next year, another fleet of seven ships, under the command of Raleigh's cousin, Sir Richard Grenville. The attempt made to colonise America proved an utter failure; and after a second trial in 1587 the enterprise was given up. The second expedition is said to have been the means of introducing tobacco into England, and also of making known the potato, which was first cultivated on Raleigh's land in Ireland. On these expeditions he spent £40,000, but acquired a right to be regarded as the first Englishman who seriously aimed at creating a Greater England over-seas, the father of British colonial enterprise.

When visiting his Irish estates Raleigh formed or renewed with Spenser an acquaintance which ripened into intimate friendship. He introduced the poet to Elizabeth, and otherwise benefited him by his patronage and encouragement; for which favour Spenser acknowledged his obligation in

Colin Clout's Come Home Again, where Raleigh is celebrated under the title of the 'Shepherd of the Ocean;' and also in a letter to him, prefixed to the Faerie Queene, explaining the plan and design of that poem. Raleigh's famous tract on the Fight about the Isles of the Azores, which inspired Tennyson's noblest war lyric, appeared in 1591. In 1592 he prepared a new expedition to seize the Spanish treasure-ships, but his doting mistress forbade him to sail with the fleet. Now he fell into disgrace, Elizabeth having discovered his intrigue with one of her maids of honour, Bessy Throgmorton (whom he afterwards married); and Elizabeth sent both culprits to the Tower, where Raleigh was confined several months. So early as 1593 Raleigh had contemplated a voyage to Guiana, and in 1595 he undertook, at his own expense, an expedition to this region, concerning the riches of which many wonderful tales were then current. He took formal possession of the country in the queen's name; and after coming back to England, he published, in 1596, a Discovery of the Large, Rich, and Beautiful Empire of Guiana—a work Hume, following the sneering judgments of Raleigh's worst enemies, characterised as 'full of the grossest and most palpable lies that were ever attempted to be imposed on the credulity of mankind.' Subsequent explorers of Venezuela (part of Raleigh's 'Guiana') have proved his substantial accuracy. In the same year we find him holding a command in the expedition against Cadiz, under the Earl of Essex and Lord Effingham. In the successful attack on that town, his bravery, as well as prudence, was very conspicuous. In 1597 he was rear-admiral in the expedition which sailed under Essex to intercept the Spanish West-India fleet, and by capturing Fayal, one of the Azores, before the arrival of the commander-in-chief, gave great offence to the

Earl, who considered himself robbed of the glory of the action. A temporary reconciliation was effected; but Raleigh afterwards heartily joined with Cecil in promoting the downfall of Essex, and was a spectator of his execution from a window in the Armoury. On the accession of James I. in March 1603, Raleigh's prosperity was at an end. Cecil naturally promoted his own supporters, Raleigh's friends fell from power, and he himself was deprived of his offices. He may have done and said indiscreet things at a dangerous time. He was accused of conspiring to dethrone the king and place the crown on the head of Arabella Stuart; as also to bring in popery and put England in the power of Spain. After his arrest, he attempted suicide in the Tower. Tried for treason before a commission comprising Cecil, the Earls of Suffolk and Devon, the Chief Justice, and others, he was condemned to a traitor's death on very inadequate evidence, mainly that of Lord Cobham, himself already convicted of treason. Sir Edward Coke

SIR WALTER RALEIGH.

From the Portrait by Zucharo in the National Portrait Gallery.

('Coke-upon-Littleton'), who was then attorney-general, abused Raleigh during the trial in violent and disgraceful terms, bestowing upon him such epithets as viper, damnable atheist, the most vile and execrable traitor that ever lived, monster, and spider of hell! Raleigh defended himself with such temper, acuteness, and eloquence that some even of his enemies were convinced of his innocence, and all parties were ashamed of the judgment pronounced. He was reprieved on the scaffold, his sentence being commuted to perpetual imprisonment; and for six of the twelve and a half years during which he was confined in the Tower his wife was permitted to bear him company. During his imprisonment he wrote his History of the World, encouraged by the sympathy and friendship of Prince Henry (1594-1612).

In 1616 he was liberated through his having projected a second expedition to Guiana, from which the king hoped to derive some profit. His purpose was to colonise the country and work gold-mines; and in 1617 a fleet of twelve armed vessels sailed under his command. He made formal—but obviously impracticable—promises not to molest the dominions of the King of Spain, for the gold-mine he proposed to work was certainly on Spanish territory. Storms, disease, desertion, deaths in encountering Spanish hostility (Raleigh's elder son, Walter, being one of the slain), miserably thwarted the expedition. Returning to England, Raleigh landed at Plymouth, and on his way to London was betrayed by his cousin, Sir Lewis Stukeley, and arrested in the king's name. At this time the projected match between Prince Charles and the Infanta of Spain occupied James's attention, and, to propitiate the Spanish Government, he determined that Raleigh should be sacrificed. He damaged his defence before Bacon and a commission by equivocations and contradictory statements; he had many enemies who denounced him as proud, covetous, unscrupulous; it was decided to proceed upon the old sentence of 1603, and Raleigh was accordingly beheaded at Whitehall on the 29th of October 1618. On the scaffold his behaviour was firm and calm; after addressing the people in justification of his character and conduct, he took up the axe, and touching the edge, said with a smile, 'This gives me no fear. It is a sharp and fair medicine to cure me of all my diseases.' Having tried how the block fitted his head, he told the executioner that he would give the signal by lifting up his hand; 'and then, fear not, but strike home!' He laid himself down, but being requested to alter the position of his head, said, 'What matter how the head lie, so the heart be right?' On the signal being given, the executioner failed to act promptly, and Raleigh asked, 'Why dost thou not strike? Strike, man!' By two strokes received without shrinking, the head of that great Englishman was severed from his body.

Strange that the two most conspicuous and many-sided Englishmen of their time should both have fallen from fortune so calamitously as Raleigh and Bacon; and in both cases the fall was partly due to inherent faults of temper and character. Raleigh was, as Mr Stebbing has said, 'poet, statesman, courtier, schemer, patriot, soldier, sailor, freebooter, discoverer, colonist, castle-builder, historian, philosopher, chemist, prisoner, and visionary.' He was wonderfully gifted, gallant, fearless, enterprising; but he was also in his lifetime the best-hated man in England; and though political rancour and envy at his glory grossly exaggerated his defects of character, he was aggressively self-confident, overweeningly ambitious, self-seeking and grasping, regardless of others, and at times unscrupulous. The revulsion of feeling in his favour that followed on his death was partly due to increasing dislike of the king and dynasty, whose victim he was believed to have been. In his poems and books his best characteristics rather than his worse are reflected—his learning, his originality, his energy, his dignity, his masterly command of the mother-tongue as of all his tools. He seems to have really written these lines with the snuff of a candle the night before he died:

Cowards may fear to die; but courage stout,
Rather than live in snuff, will be put out.

His works lend no countenance to the tradition that he was an atheist; their devout tone makes it even difficult to believe that he was a sceptic at heart. 'Atheist' was long a term of reproach for all freethinkers; but universal rumour makes it certain that his house was a meeting-place for men who at least treated religious questions with a freedom then regarded as eminently suspicious. Marlowe (see pages 326, 350) may have been a member of this coterie, which Parsons the Jesuit called a 'school of Atheism.'

The following verses, like several other short poems, are said to have been composed the night before his execution; it seems certain that they were 'found in his Bible in the Gate-house at Westminster, 1618':

Even such is Time, that takes on trust
Our youth, our joys, our all we have,
And pays us but with earth and dust;
Who in the dark and silent grave,
When we have wandered all our ways,
Shuts up the story of our days:
But from this earth, this grave, this dust,
My God shall raise me up, I trust. W. R.

While in prison in expectation of death, either on this or the former occasion, he wrote also a tender and affectionate valedictory letter to his wife, of which the following is a portion:

You shall receive, my dear wife, my last words in these my last lines; my love I send you, that you may keep when I am dead, and my counsel, that you may remember it when I am no more. I would not with my will present you sorrows, dear Bess; let them go to the grave with me, and be buried in the dust. And seeing that it is not the will of God that I shall see you any more, bear my destruction patiently, and with a heart like yourself.

First, I send you all the thanks which my heart can conceive, or my words express, for your many travails and cares for me, which, though they have not taken effect as you wished, yet my debt to you is not the less; but pay it I never shall in this world.

Secondly, I beseech you, for the love you bear me living, that you do not hide yourself many days, but by your travails seek to help my miserable fortunes, and the right of your poor child; your mourning cannot avail me, that am but dust. . . .

Remember your poor child for his father's sake, who loved you in his happiest estate. I sued for my life, but, God knows, it was for you and yours that I desired it; for know it, my dear wife, your child is the child of a true man, who, in his own respect, despiseth death, and his mis-shapen and ugly forms. I cannot write much—God knows how hardly I steal this time when all sleep—and it is also time for me to separate my thoughts from the world. Beg my dead body, which living was denied you, and either lay it in Sherborne or Exeter Church, by my father and mother.¹ I can say no more; time and death calleth me away. The everlasting God, powerful, infinite, and inscrutable God Almighty, who is goodness itself, the true light and life, keep you and yours, and have mercy upon me, and forgive my persecutors and false accusers, and send us to meet in His glorious kingdom. My dear wife, farewell; bless my boy, pray for me, and let my true God hold you both in His arms.

¹ [He was buried in the chancel of St Margaret's, Westminster (some say at Beddington), but his wife preserved his head in a red leather bag till her death in 1647.]

Raleigh's short poems are excellent. He was more a man of action, of roving and adventurous spirit, than of poetic contemplation; but he had a daring and brilliant imagination, with a Shakespearean energy of thought and condensed felicity of expression. His long imprisonment turned his mind inward on itself, and tamed the wild fire of erratic hopes and ambitions. Spenser's allusions to his friend's poetical genius are well known, and Raleigh repaid the compliment by his beautiful sonnet on the Faerie Queene. One lost poem of Raleigh's, Cynthia, in praise of Queen Elizabeth, was only known through Spenser's mention of it, till part of it was published by Dr Hannah in 1870. There is no doubt that the following beautiful verses are by Raleigh; but some have been claimed for various contemporary writers:

On Passions.

Passions are likened best to floods and streams;
The shallow murmur, but the deep are dumb;
So when affections yield discourse, it seems
The bottom is but shallow whence they come.
They that are rich in words, in words discover
That they are poor in that which makes a lover.

Wrong not, sweet empress of my heart,
The merit of true passion,
With thinking that he feels no smart
That sues for no compassion;

Since if my plaints serve not to approve
The conquest of thy beauty,
It comes not from excess of love,
But from excess of duty:

For knowing that I sue to serve
A saint of such perfection,
As all desire, but none deserve,
A place in her affection,

I rather choose to want relief,
Than venture the revealing;
Where glory recommends the grief,
Despair distrusts the healing.

Thus those desires that aim too high
For any mortal lover;
When reason cannot make them die,
Discretion doth them cover.

Yet when discretion doth bereave
The plaints that they should utter,
Then thy discretion may perceive
That silence is a suitor.

Silence in love bewrays more woe
Than words though ne'er so witty;
A beggar that is dumb, you know,
May challenge double pity.

Then wrong not, dearest to my heart!
My true though secret passion;
He smarteth most that hides his smart,
And sues for no compassion.

A Vision upon this Conceit of the 'Faerie Queene'

Methought I saw the grave where Laura lay,
Within that temple where the vestal flame
Was wont to burn; and passing by that way,
To see that buried dust of living fame,
Whose tomb fair Love and fairer Virtue kept,
All suddenly I saw the Fairy Queen,
At whose approach the soul of Petrarch wept;
And from thenceforth those graces were not seen,
For they this Queen attended: in whose stead
Oblivion laid him down on Laura's hearse:
Hereat the hardest stones were seen to bleed,
And groans of buried ghosts the heavens did pierce,
Where Homer's sprite did tremble all for grief,
And cursed the access of that celestial thief.

Lines prefixed to Gorges' 'Lucan,' 1614.

Had Lucan hid the truth to please the time,
He had been too unworthy of thy pen,
Who never sought nor ever cared to climb
By flattery or seeking worthless men.
For this thou hast been bruised; but yet those scars
Do beautify no less than those wounds do,
Received in just and in religious wars;
Though thou hast bled by both, and bear'st them too.
Change not! to change thy fortune 'tis too late;
Who with a manly faith resolves to die
May promise to himself a lasting state,
Though not so great, yet free from infamy.
Such was thy Lucan, whom so to translate,
Nature thy muse like Lucan's did create.

The Pilgrimage.

Give me my scallop-shell of quiet,
My staff of faith to walk upon;
My scrip of joy, immortal diet;
My bottle of salvation;
My gown of glory, hope's true gage,
And thus I'll take my pilgrimage!
Blood must be my body's balmer,
No other balm will there be given;
Whilst my soul, like quiet palmer,
Travelleth towards the land of Heaven;
Over the silver mountains
Where spring the nectar fountains:
There will I kiss
The bowl of bliss,
And drink mine everlasting fill
Upon every milken hill.
My soul will be a-dry before;
But after, it will thirst no more.

Then by that happy blissful day,
 More peaceful pilgrims I shall see,
 That have cast off their rags of clay,
 And walk apparelled fresh like me.
 I'll take them first
 To quench their thirst,
 And taste of nectar suckets
 At those clear wells
 Where sweetness dwells
 Drawn up by saints in crystal buckets.

And when our bottles and all we
 Are filled with immortality,
 Then the blest paths we'll travel,
 Strewed with rubies thick as gravel—
 Ceilings of diamonds, sapphire floors,
 High walls of coral and pearly bowers.
 From thence to heaven's bribeless hall,
 Where no corrupted voices brawl;
 No conscience molten into gold,
 No forged accuser bought or sold,
 No cause deferred, no vain-spent journey,
 For there Christ is the King's Attorney;
 Who pleads for all without degrees,
 And He hath angels, but no fees;
 And when the grand twelve-million jury
 Of our sins, with direful fury,
 'Gainst our souls black verdicts give,
 Christ pleads His death, and then we live.
 Be thou my speaker, taintless pleader,
 Unblotted lawyer, true proceeder!
 Thou giv'st salvation even for alms;
 Not with a bribed lawyer's palms.
 And this is mine eternal plea
 To Him that made heaven, earth and sea,
 That since my flesh must die so soon,
 And want a head to dine next noon,
 Just at the stroke when my veins start and spread,
 Set on my soul an everlasting head!
 Then am I ready, like a palmer fit,
 To tread those blest paths which before I writ.
 Of death and judgment, heaven and hell,
 Who oft doth think, must needs die well.

The Pilgrimage is supposed to have been written by Raleigh in 1603, in the interval between his condemnation and his respite. One of the finest of Raleigh's poems is an epitaph on Sir Philip Sidney, appended to Spenser's Astrophel, and published without signature, but quoted as Raleigh's, in 1591. We give the first three of the fifteen verses. The versification even more than the elegiac tone suggests a comparison with Tennyson's In Memoriam:

On Sir Philip Sidney.

To praise thy life, or wail thy worthy death,
 And want thy wit—thy wit high, pure, divine—
 Is far beyond the power of mortal line,
 Nor any one hath worth that draweth breath.
 Yet rich in zeal (though poor in learning's lore),
 And friendly care obscured in secret breast,
 And love that envy in thy life suppressed—
 Thy dear life done—and death hath doubled more.
 And I, that in thy time and living state,
 Did only praise thy virtues in my thought,
 As one that seeld the rising sun hath sought, seldom
 With words and tears now wail thy timeless fate.

The 'bold and spirited poem' of The Lie is traced in manuscript to 1593, but first appeared in print in the second edition (1608) of Davison's Poetical Rhapsody. It has been assigned to various authors, but on Raleigh's side there is good evidence besides the internal testimony. Two answers to it, written in Raleigh's lifetime, ascribe it to him; and two manuscript copies of the period of Elizabeth bear the title of Sir Walter Wrawly his Lye:

The Lie.

Go, soul, the body's guest,
 Upon a thankless arrant;
 Fear not to touch the best,
 The truth shall be thy warrant:
 Go, since I needs must die,
 And give the world the lie.

errand

Say to the court it glows,
 And shines like rotten wood;
 Say to the church it shews
 What's good, and doth no good.
 If church and court reply,
 Then give them both the lie.

Tell potentates, they live
 Acting by others' action,
 Not loved unless they give,
 Not strong but by a faction
 If potentates reply,
 Give potentates the lie.

Tell men of high condition
 That manage the estate,
 Their purpose is ambition,
 Their practice only hate.
 And if they once reply,
 Then give them all the lie.

Tell them that brave it most,
 They beg for more by spending,
 Who, in their greatest cost,
 Seek nothing but commending.
 And if they make reply,
 Then give them all the lie.

Tell zeal it wants devotion,
 Tell love it is but lust,
 Tell time it is but motion,
 Tell flesh it is but dust;
 And wish them not reply,
 For thou must give the lie.

Tell age it daily wasteth;
 Tell honour how it alters;
 Tell beauty how she blasteth;
 Tell favour how it falters:
 And as they shall reply,
 Give every one the lie.

Tell wit how much it wrangles
 In tickle points of niceness;
 Tell wisdom she entangles
 Herself in over-wisness.
 And when they do reply,
 Straight give them both the lie.

Tell physic of her boldness,
 Tell skill it is pretension,
 Tell charity of coldness,
 Tell law it is contention.
 And as they do reply,
 So give them still the lie.

Tell fortune of her blindness,
 Tell nature of decay,
 Tell friendship of unkindness,
 Tell justice of delay.
 And if they will reply,
 Then give them all the lie.

Tell arts they have no soundness,
 But vary by esteeming ;
 Tell schools they want profoundness,
 And stand too much on seeming.
 If arts and schools reply,
 Give arts and schools the lie.

Tell faith it's fled the city ;
 Tell how the country erreth ;
 Tell manhood shakes off pity ;
 Tell virtue least preferreth :
 And if they do reply,
 Spare not to give the lie.

So when thou hast, as I
 Commanded thee, done blabbing ;
 Although to give the lie
 Deserves no less than stabbing ;
 Yet stab at thee who will,
 No stab the soul can kill.

Raleigh's Nymph's Reply to Marlowe's Pas-sionate Shepherd will be found in the section on Marlowe, page 353.

Where glory recommends the grief
 Despair disdains the healing—

is a well-known quotation from his Silent Lover.

During the twelve years of his imprisonment, Sir Walter Raleigh wrote the chief portion of his works, especially the History of the World, of which only a part was finished, the six books comprehending the period from the Creation to the downfall of the Macedonian empire, about 170 B.C. This was published in 1614. The acquirements of Raleigh—who, in the words of Hume, 'being educated amidst naval and military enterprises, had surpassed, in the pursuits of literature, even those of the most recluse and sedentary lives'—justly excited much admiration ; but, it is to be remembered, the historian was aided by the contributions of his learned friends. Ben Jonson told Drummond that Raleigh 'esteemed more fame than conscience. The best wits in England were employed in making his history.' Ben himself had 'written a piece to him of the Punic war, which he altered, and set in his book.' According to another contemporary, a still more important helper was Dr Robert Burrell [Burhill or Burghill], rector of Northwold, in the county of Norfolk, who was a great favourite of Sir Walter Raleigh, and had been his chaplain. 'All, or the greatest part of the drudgery of Sir

Walter's History, for criticisms, chronology, and reading Greek and Hebrew authors, was performed by him ;' but the design and composition of the work were Raleigh's own. The historical lore is now antiquated and useless ; the method is wholly that of a compiler, not of a scientific historian ; large sections of the history are uninspired and tedious to a degree. But a thousand asides and excursions illustrate Raleigh's genius and powerful personality ; and his profound and varied knowledge of men and experience of the world, with a wealth of apt and witty illustrations, give a perennial charm to this most extraordinary product of prison life.

Both in manner and in matter, the History is vastly superior to all the English historical productions which had as yet appeared. Its style, though frequently clumsy and awkward, and abounding in immensely long and lumbering sentences, is freer than that of any contemporary writer from euphuisms or fantastic conceits, and is usually dignified and often majestic. The preface announces very forcibly the responsibility of rulers, and expressly attacks Henry VIII. ; and the history everywhere deals severely with the tyranny and injustice of kings. James naturally thought it 'too saucy in censuring the acts of kings,' and the book was suppressed for a time. Raleigh's ideal was the benevolent despotism of an oligarchy ; he was essentially aristocratic in his attitude towards 'the rabble.' Other writings of Raleigh's captivity were The Prerogative of Parliaments ; The Cabinet Council, published by Milton in 1658 ; and Three Discourses, that on war being one of his most perfect pieces of writing. The Advice to his Son contains much admirable counsel, sometimes tintured, indeed, with that worldliness and suspicion which the writer's hard experience had strengthened in a mind naturally disposed to self-interest. Points on which he advises his son are the choice of friends and of a wife, flattery, quarrels, preservation of estate, choice of servants, the eschewing of evil ways of seeking riches, drunkenness, and the service of God. Our first prose extracts are from the History.

The Uncertainty of Human Happiness.

If we truly examine the difference of both conditions ; to wit, of the rich and mighty, whom we call fortunate ; and of the poor and oppressed, whom we account wretched ; we shall find the happiness of the one and the miserable estate of the other so tied by God to the very instant, and both so subject to interchange (witness the sudden downfall of the greatest princes, and the speedy uprising of the meanest persons), as the one hath nothing so certain, whereof to boast ; nor the other so uncertain, whereof to bewail itself. For there is no man so assured of his honour, of his riches, health, or life, but that he may be deprived of either or all the very next hour or day to come. Quid vesper vehat, incertum est : 'What the evening will bring with it, it is uncertain.' 'And yet ye cannot tell' (saith S. James) 'what shall be to-morrow. To-day he is set up, and to-morrow he shall not be found ; for he is turned into dust, and his purpose perisheth.' And although the air which compasseth adversity be very obscure, yet therein we better discern God than in that shining light which environeth worldly glory ; through which, for the clearness thereof, there is no vanity which escapeth our sight. And let adversity seem what it will ; to happy men, ridiculous, who make themselves merry at other men's misfortunes ; and to those under the cross, grievous : yet this is true, that for all that is past, to the very instant, the portions remaining are equal to either. For be it that we have lived many years, 'and' (according to Salomon) 'in them all we have rejoiced ;' or be it that we have measured the same length of days, and therein have evermore sorrowed : yet, looking back from our present being, we find both the one and the other, to wit the joy and the woe, sailed out of sight ; and death, which doth pursue us and hold us in chace from our infancy, hath gathered it. Quicquid atatis retro est mors tenet : 'Whatsoever of our age is past, death holds it.' So as whosoever he be to whom Fortune hath been a servant and the Time a friend ; let him but take the account of his memory (for we have no other keeper of our pleasures past), and truly examine what it hath reserved, either of Beauty and Youth, or foregone delights ; what it hath saved, that it might last, of his dearest affections, or of whatever else the amorous Spring-time gave his thoughts of contentment, then unvaluable ; and he shall find that all the Art which his elder years have, can draw no other vapour out of these dissolutions, than heavy, secret, and sad sighs. He shall find nothing remaining but those sorrows which grow up after our fast springing youth ; overtake it when it is at a stand ; and overtop it utterly when it begins to wither : insomuch as looking back from the very instant time and from our now being, the poor, diseased, and captive creature hath as little sense of all his former miseries and pains, as he that is most blessed in common Opinion hath of his forepast pleasures and delights. For whatsoever is cast behind us is just nothing ; and what is to come, deceitful hope hath it. Omnia quæ ventura sunt in incerto jacent. Only those few black Swans I must except, who, having had the grace to value worldly vanities at no more than their own price, do, by retaining the comfortable memory of a well-acted life, behold death without dread, and the grave without fear ; and embrace both, as necessary guides to endless glory.

(From the Preface to the History.)

The Battle of Thermopylæ.

After such time as Xerxes had transported his army over the Hellespont, and landed in Thrace (leaving the description of his passage along that Coast, and how the River of Lissus was drunk dry by his multitudes, and the Lake near to Pissyrus by his cattel, with other accidents in his marches towards Greece), I will speak of the encounters he had, and the shameful and incredible overthrows which he received. As first at Thermopylæ, a narrow passage of half an acre of ground lying between the mountains which divide Thessaly from Greece, where sometime the Phocians had raised a wall with gates, which was then for the most part ruined. At this entrance Leonidas, one of the kings of Sparta, with three hundred Lacedæmonians, assisted with one thousand Tegeatæ and Mantineans, one thousand Arcadians, and other Peloponnesians, to the number of three thousand one hundred in the whole, besides one thousand Phocians, four hundred Thebans, seven hundred Thespians, and all the forces (such as they were) of the bordering Locrians, defended the passage two whole days together against that huge Army of the Persians. The valour of the Greeks appeared so excellent in this defence, that in the first dayes fight Xerxes is said to have three times leaped out of his Throne, fearing the destruction of his Army by one handful of those men, whom not long before he had utterly despised ; and when the second day's attempt upon the Greeks had proved vain, he was altogether ignorant how to proceed further ; and so might have continued, had not a runagate Grecian taught him a secret way, by which part of his Army might ascend the ledge of mountains, and set upon the backs of those who kept the Straits. But when the most valiant of the Persian Army had almost enclosed the small forces of the Greeks, then did Leonidas, King of the Lacedæmonians, with his three hundred and seven hundred Thespians, which were all that abode by him, refuse to quit the place which they had undertaken to make good, and with admirable courage not only resist that world of men which charged them on all sides ; but issuing out of their strength, made so great a slaughter of their enemies, that they might well be called vanquishers, though all of them were slain upon the place. Xerxes, having lost in this last fight, together with twenty thousand other Soldiers and Captains, two of his own brethren, began to doubt what inconvenience might befall him by the virtue of such as had not been present at these battles, with whom he knew that he shortly was to deal. Especially of the Spartans he stood in great fear, whose manhood had appeared singular in this trial, which caused him very carefully to inquire what numbers they could bring into the field. It is reported of Dieneces the Spartan, that when one thought to have terrified him by saying that the flight of the Persian Arrows was so thick as would hide the Sun, he answered thus : 'It is very good news, for then shall we fight in the cool shade.'

(Book iii. chap. 6.)

English Valour and English Cross-bows.

All that have read of Cressi and Agincourt will bear me witness, that I do not alledge the Battel of Poitiers for lack of other as good examples of the English Vertue ; the proof whereof hath left many a hundred better marks in all quarters of France, than ever did the valour of the Romans. If any man impute these Victories of ours to the long-bow, as carrying farther, piercing more strongly, and quicker of discharge than the French Cross-bow ; my answer is ready : that in all these respects, it is also (being drawn with a strong arm) superiour to the Musket ; yet is the Musket a weapon of more use. The Gun and the Cross-bow are of like force when discharged by a Boy or Woman, as when by a strong man ; Weakness, or sickness, or a sore finger, makes the long Bow unserviceable. More particularly, I say, that it was the custome of our ancestors to shoot for the most part pointblank, and so shall he perceive that will note the circumstances of almost any one Battel. This takes away all objection ; for when two Armies are within the distance of a Butts length, one flight of Arrows, or two at the most, can be delivered before they close. Neither is it in general true, that the long Bow reacheth farther, or that it pierceth more strongly than the Cross-bow. But this is the rare effect of an extraordinary arm ; whereupon can be grounded no common rule. If any man shall ask, how then came it to pass that the English wan so many great battels, having no advantage to help him? I may, with best commendation of modesty, refer him to the French Historian; who, relating the victory of our men at Crevant, where they passed a Bridge in face of the Enemy, useth these words: 'The English comes with a conquering bravery, as he that was accustomed to gain every where, without any stay; he forceth our guard placed upon the Bridge to keep the passage' [John de Serres]. Or I may cite another place of the same Author, where he tells how the Britons, being invaded by Charles the Eighth, king of France, thought it good policy to apparel a Thousand and five Hundred of their own men in English Cassocks, hoping that the very sight of the English red cross would be enough to terrifie the French. But I will not stand to borrow of the French Historians (all which, excepting De Serres and Paulus Æmilius, report wonders of our Nation) the proposition which first I undertook to maintain, That the military virtue of the English, prevailing against all manner of difficulties, ought to be preferred before that of the Romans, which was assisted with all advantages that could be desired. If it be demanded, Why then did not our Kings finish the conquest, as Cæsar had done? my answer may be (I hope without offence), that our kings were like to the Race of Æacidæ, of whom the old Poet Ennius gave this note: Bellipotentis sunt magis quam sapientipotentis: 'They were more warlike than politic.' Who so notes their proceedings may find that none of them went to work like a Conquerour, save only King Henry the Fifth, the course of whose victories it pleased God to interrupt by his death.

(Book v. chap. 1.)

On Ambition and Death.

By this which we have already set down is seen the beginning and end of the three first Monarchies of the World, whereof the Founders and Erecters thought that they could never have ended. That of Rome, which made the fourth, was also at this time almost at the highest. We have left it flourishing in the middle of the Field, having rooted up or cut down all that kept it from the eyes and admiration of the World. But after some continuance, it shall begin to lose the beauty it had; the storms of ambition shall beat her great boughs and branches one against another, her Leaves shall fall off, her Limbs wither, and a rabble of barbarous Nations enter the field, and cut her down. . . .

For the rest, if we seek a reason of the succession and continuance of this boundless ambition in mortal men, we may add to that which hath been already said, that the Kings and Princes of the world have always laid before them the actions, but not the ends, of those great Ones which preceded them. They are always transported with the glory of the one, but they never mind the misery of the other, till they find the experience in themselves. They neglect the advice of God, while they enjoy life, or hope it; but they follow the counsel of Death upon his first approach. It is he that puts into man all the wisdom of the world, without speaking a word, which God, with all the words of his law, promises, or threats, doth not infuse. Death, which hateth and destroyeth man, is believed; God, which hath made him and loves him, is always deferred: 'I have considered,' saith Solomon, 'all the works that are under the sun, and, behold, all is vanity and vexation of spirit;' but who believes it, till Death tells it us? It was Death which opening the Conscience of Charles the Fifth made him enjoin his Son Philip to restore Navarre; and King Francis the First of France, to command that justice should be done upon the murderers of the Protestants in Merindol and Cabrieres, which till then he neglected. It is therefore Death alone that can suddenly make man to know himself. He tells the proud and insolent that they are but abjects, and humbles them at the instant, makes them cry, complain, and repent, yea even to hate their forepast happiness. He takes the account of the rich, and proves him a beggar, a naked beggar, which hath interest in nothing but in the gravel that fills his mouth. He holds a Glass before the eyes of the most beautiful, and makes them see therein their deformity and rottenness, and they acknowledge it.

O eloquent, just, and mighty Death! whom none could advise, thou hast perswaded; what none have dared, thou hast done; and whom all the world hath flattered, thou only hast cast out of the world and despised; thou hast drawn together all the far-stretched greatness, all the pride, cruelty, and ambition of man, and covered it all over with these two narrow words, Hic jacet!

(Conclusion of the History, Book v. chap. 1.)

The last paragraph is usually accounted its author's most eloquent, just, and mighty utterance. Raleigh's contemporary 'report on the truth of the fight about the Isles of the Azores, this last sommer: betwixt the Revenge, one of Her Maiestie's Shippes, and an Armada of the King of Spaine,' has acquired new interest from Tennyson's magnificent verse rendering of the story:

After the Revenge was intangled with this Philip, foure other boorded her; two on her larboord, and two on her starboord. The fight thus beginning at three of the clocke in the after noone, continued verie terrible all that evening. But the great San Philip having receyved the lower tire of the Revenge, discharged with crossebar-shot, shifted hir selfe with all diligence from her sides, utterly misliking hir first entertainment. Some say that the shippe foundred, but wee cannot report it for truth, unlesse we were assured. The Spanish ships were filled with companies of souldiers, in some two hundred besides the Marriners; in some five, in others eight hundreth. In ours there were none at all, beside the Marriners, but the servants of the commanders and some fewe voluntarie Gentlemen only. After many enter-changed voleies of great ordinance and small shot, the Spaniards deliberated to enter the Revenge, and made divers attempts, hoping to force her by the multitudes of their armed souldiers and Musketers, but were still repulsed againe and againe, and at all times beaten backe, into their owne shippes, or into the seas. In the beginning of the fight, the George Noble of London, having received some shot thorow her by the Armados, fell under the Lee of the Revenge, and asked Syr Richard what he would command him, being but one of the victulers and of small force: Syr Richard bid him save himselfe, and leave him to his fortune. After the fight had thus without intermission continued while the day lasted and some houres of the night, many of our men were slaine and hurt, and one of the great Gallions of the Armada and the Admirall of the Hulkes both sunke, and in many other of the Spanish ships great slaughter was made. Some write that Sir Richard was verie dangerously hurt almost in the beginning of the fight, and laie speechlesse for a time ere he recovered. But two of the Revenues owne companie, brought home in a ship of Lime from the Ilandes, examined by some of the Lordes, and others, affirmed that he was never so wounded as that hee forsooke the upper decke, til an houre before midnight, and then being shot into the bodie with a Musket as hee was a dressing, was againe shot into the head, and withall his Chirurghion wounded to death. . . .

But to return to the fight: the Spanish ships which attempted to board the Revenge, as they were wounded and beaten of, so alwaies others came in their places, she having never lesse then two mightie Gallions by her sides, and aboard her. So that ere the morning from three of the clocke the day before, there had fiftene severall Armados assailed her; and all so ill approved their entertainment, as they were by the breake of day far more willing to harken to a composition then hastily to make any more assaults or entries. But as the day increased, so our men decreased: and as the light grew more and more, by so much more grew our discomforts. For none appeared in fight but enemies, saving one small ship called the Pilgrim, commanded by Jacob Whiddon, who hovered all night to see the successe: but in the mornynge bearing with the Revenge, was hunted like a hare amongst many ravenous houndes, but escaped.

All the powder of the Revenge to the last barrell was now spent, all her pikes broken, fortie of her best men slaine, and the most part of the rest hurt. In the beginning of the fight she had but one hundreth free from sicknes, and fourescore and ten sicke, laid in hold upon the Ballast. A small troupe to man such a ship, and a weake Garrison to resist so mighty an Army. By those hundred all was sustained, the voleis, boardings, and entrings of fiftene shippes of warre, besides those which beat her at large. On the contrarie, the Spanish were alwaies supplied with souldiers brought from everie squadron: all maner of Armes and powder at will. Unto ours there remained no comfort at all, no hope, no supply either of ships, men, or weapons; the mastes all beaten over board, all her tackle cut asunder, her upper worke altogether rased, and in effect evened shee was with the water, but the verie foundation or bottom of a ship, nothing being left over head either for flight or defence. Syr Richard finding himselfe in this distresse, and unable anie longer to make resistance, having endured in this fiftene houres fight, the assault of fiftene severall Armados, all by tornes aboorde him, and by estimation eight hundred shot of great artillerie besides manie assaults and entries; and that himselfe and the shippe must needes be possessed by the enemye, who were now all cast in a ring round about him; the Revenge not able to move one way or other, but as she was moved with the waves and billow of the sea; commanded the maister Gunner, whom he knew to be a most resolute man, to split and sinke the shippe; that thereby nothing might remaine of glorie or victorie to the Spaniards: seeing in so manie houres fight, and with so great a Navie they were not able to take her, having had fiftene houres time, fiftene thousand men, and fiftie and three saile of men of warre to performe it withall. And perswaded the companie, or as manie as he could induce, to yeelde themselves unto God and to the mercie of none els; but as they had like valiant resolute men repulsed so manie enimies, they should not now shorten the honour of their nation, by prolonging their owne lives for a few houres or a few daies. The maister Gunner readilie condescended and divers others; but the Captaine and the Maister were of an other opinion, and besought Sir Richard to have care of them: alleaging that the Spaniard would be as readie to entertaine a composition, as they were willing to offer the same: and that there being diverse sufficient and valiant men yet living, and whose woundes were not mortall, they might doe their cuntry and prince acceptable service hereafter. And (that where Sir Richard had alleaged that the Spaniards should never glorie to have taken one shippe of her Maiesties, seeing that they had so long and so notably defended them selves) they answered, that the shippe had sixe foote water in hold, three shot under water which were so weakly stopped, as with the first working of the sea, she must needes sinke, and was besides so crusht and brused, as she could never be removed out of the place.

And as the matter was thus in dispute, and Sir Richard refusing to hearken to any of those reasons: the maister of the Revenge (while the Captaine wan unto him the greater party) was convoyde aborde the Generall Don Alfonso Bassan. Who finding none over hastie to enter the Revenge againe, doubting least S. Richard would have blowne them up and himselfe, and perceiving by the report of the maister of the Revenge his dangerous disposition: yeelded that all their lives should be saved, the companie sent for England, and the better sorte to pay such reasonable ransome as their estate would beare, and in the meane season to be free from Gally or imprisonment. To this he so much the rather condescended as well as I have saide, for feare of further losse and mischief to them selves, as also for the desire hee had to recover Sir Richard Grinville; whom for his notable valure he seemed greatly to honour and admire.

When this answer was returned, and that safetie of life was promised, the common sort being now at the end of their perill, the most drew backe from Sir Richard and the maister Gunner, being no hard matter to diswade men from death to life. The maister Gunner finding him selfe and Sir Richard thus prevented and maistered by the greater number, would have slaine himselfe with a sword, had he not beene by force withheld and locked into his Cabben. Then the Generall sent manie boates aboard the Revenge, and diverse of our men fearing Sir Richards disposition, stole away aboord the Generall and other shippes. Sir Richard thus overmatched, was sent unto by Alonso Bassan to remove out of the Revenge, the shippe being marvellous unsaverie, filled with bloud and bodies of deade, and wounded men like a slaughter house. Sir Richard answered that he might do with his bodie what he list, for he esteemed it not, and as he was carried out of the shippe he swounded, and reviving againe desired the companie to pray for him. The Generall used Sir Richard with all humanitie, and left nothing unattempted that tended to his recoverie, highly commending his valour and worthines, and greatly bewailed the daunger wherein he was, beeing unto them a rare spectacle, and a resolution sildome approved, to see one ship turne toward so many enemies, to endure the charge and boarding of so many huge Armados, and to resist and repell the assaults and entries of so many souldiers. . . .

Syr Richard died, as it is said, the second or third day aboard the Generall, and was by them greatly bewailed. What became of his bodie, whether it were buried in the sea or on the lande wee know not: the comfort that remaineth to his friendes is that he hath ended his life honourably in respect of the reputation wonne to his nation and country, and of the same to his posteritie, and that being dead, he hath not outlived his owne honour.

It is not Raleigh that gives the dying sailor's speech, so admirably adapted by Tennyson, but the Dutch traveller Jan Huygen van Linschoten (1563-1611), who at the time of the battle was at Terceira (seventy miles from Flores), on his return voyage from India. He published in Dutch an account of his voyage to and from India immediately after his return, and an English translation appeared in 1598. Mr Arber has printed his account of the engagement along with Raleigh's and Gervase Markham's metrical rendering of it. One paragraph from Linschoten is as follows:

He was borne into the ship called the Saint Paule, wherein was the Admirall of the fleet, Don Alonso de Barsan: there his woundes were drest by the Spanish Surgeons, but Don Alonso himselfe would neither see him, nor speake with him: all the rest of the Captaines and Gentlemen went to visite hym, and to comfort him in his hard fortune, wondring at his courage and stout hart, for that he shewed not any signe of faintnes nor changing of colour. But feeling the hower of death to approach, hee spake these wordes in Spanish, and said: Here die I Richard Greenfield, with a joyfull and quiet mind, for that I have ended my life as a true soldier ought to do, that hath fought for his countrey, Queene, religion, and honor, whereby my soule most joyfull departeth out of this bodie, and shall alwaies leave behinde it an everlasting fame of a valiant and true soldier, that hath done his dutie, as he was bound to doe. When he had finished these or such other like wordes, hee gave up the Ghost with great and stout courage, and no man could perceive any true signe of heaviness in him.

An edition of the Works was published at Oxford in 1829, with the Lives by Oldys (1736) and Birch (1751) prefixed. The story of the Revenge we have given substantially as in Mr Arber's reprint (1871); the extracts from the History are from the 1614 edition. Sir E. Brydges edited the poems in 1814, and Agnes Latham in 1929; and there is a bibliography by Brushfield (1886; new ed. 1908). Recent research has proved that many poems and prose pieces once attributed to Raleigh are not his. There are Lives by Cayley (1805), Kingsley (1859), Edwards (1868), St John (1868), Mrs Creighton (1877), Gosse (1886), Stebbing (1892), Hume (1898), Rodd (1904), H. de Selincourt (1908), Waldman (1928); and see Lee's Great Englishmen (1904) and Harlow, Raleigh's Last Voyage (1932). For Raleigh's trial, see Howell's State Trials (1899); and for the atheism attributed to Raleigh and Marlowe, see Boas's edition of Kyd's works (1900).

John Lyly, author of Euphues and dramatist, was born in the Weald of Kent about 1554. He went to Magdalen College, Oxford, in 1569, and graduated M.A. in 1575, as at Cambridge in 1579. He petitioned Queen Elizabeth in vain that he might be appointed Master of the Revels; but Lord Burghley gave him a post in his household. In 1589 he took part in the Martin Marprelate controversy, and incurred the enmity of Gabriel Harvey, who described him in Pierces Supererogation (1593) as 'a mad lad as ever twang'd, never troubled with any substance of witt or circumstance of honestie, sometime the fiddlestick of Oxford, now the very bable of London.' He was returned for Hindon to parliament in 1589, for Aylesbury in 1593, for Appleby in 1597, and again for Aylesbury in October 1601. The precise date of his death is not known; but he was buried in London on the 30th of November 1606.

The first part of Lyly's famous romance, Euphues, the Anatomy of Wit, was published in the spring of 1579; the second, Euphues and his England, in 1580; and at court both were received with applause. The book went through five editions in six years, and became a sort of textbook for court ladies and people of fashion, who were fascinated by its curious ornate style, comparisons, and conceits, and got its peculiar phrases by heart. In the words of Edward Blount the publisher: 'Our Nation are in his debt for a new English which hee taught them. . . . All our Ladies were then his Schollers; And that Beautie in Court which could not Parley Euphueisme was as little regarded as shee which now there speakes not French.' The significance of the fact that Lyly wrote for the women of England has already been touched on at page 239. Lyly renounced the old sources of interest, in enchantments and startling adventures, and relied solely on his style, its alliterations and antitheses, its word-plays and conceits, which have to bear the burden of much moralising and many disquisitions, often quite trivial. Another feature of Lyly's 'new English' is the constant employment of similes, drawn from mediæval fables, from bestiaries and herbals, about animals, plants, and minerals. It is usual to trace the euphuistic style to the influence of Guevara. Lord Berners and North had translated works of Guevara (see pages 104 and 259), and other Englishmen also were affected by him. Euphuism was an exaggeration of the style introduced by Sidney from the Italian romancers; Gongorism (from the Spaniard Gongora) and Marinism (from the Italian Marini) were somewhat analogous later influences in poetry; and Ronsard, the Pleiad, and Du Bartas illustrate the same tendency. Sir Sidney Lee held that Guevara's influence on euphuism has been exaggerated; that pedantic eccentricity was in the air. Dr Croll, in his edition of Euphues (1916), traces the essential sources of euphuism to mediæval Latin rather than to Renaissance influences. Greene, Lodge, and others deliberately imitated Euphues (see page 317); but their affectations were seldom so pronounced as Lyly's, though Lyly is more sober and less tedious than many of his imitators. Later the euphuistic style was held up to derision. Drayton, who praises Sidney for having put euphuism out of fashion, speaks scornfully of Lilly's writing then in use,

Talking of stones, stars, plants, of fishes, flies,
Playing with words and idle similes.

Sidney and, later, Ben Jonson were amongst hostile critics; Shakespeare (Love's Labour's Lost) and Sir Walter Scott caricatured the style; Scott's Sir Piercie Shafton, meant for a euphuistic hero, is an extravaganza. Some of the influences of euphuism continued in the so-called 'metaphysical school' disturbed the standard of English style till the great writers of the seventeenth century, such as Milton, Clarendon, and Barrow, effectively revived dignified simplicity and vigour. But of late the excellences of Lyly have also been recognised; in spite of over-ornament, the iteration of antitheses, and consequent tediousness, there is, as Gosse has pointed out, a new element of richness and harmony in Lyly's style, and Euphuus is in England the earliest 'book prose which shows any desire to be splendid.' The matter is in many ways excellent; sound advice is offered on friendship, love, travel, education, morals, and religion; in his views on the conduct of life the anti-Puritan pamphleteer was, theoretically at least, a Puritan. In the first part of the romance the author places his hero, a young Athenian, in Naples; and in the second part brings him to England, 'his voyage and adventures being mixed with sundry pretty discourses of honest love, the description of the country, the court, and the manners of that isle.'

How the lyfe of a young man should be ledde.

There are three things which cause perfection in man, Nature, Reason, Use. Reason I call discipline, Use, Exercise, if anye one of these braunches want, certainly the Tree of Vertue must needes wither. For Nature without Discipline is of small force, and Discipline without Nature more feeble: if exercise or studie be voyd of any of these it avayleth nothing. For as in tilling of the ground and husbandry there is first chosen a fertill soyle, then a cunning sower, then good seede, even so must we compare Nature to the fatte earth, the expert husbandman to the Schoolemaster, the faculties and sciences to the pure seedes. If this order had not, bene in our predecessors, Pithagoras, Socrates, Plato, and who so ever was renowned in Greece, for the glorie of wisdom, they had never bene eternished for wise men, neither canonised as it were for Saints, among those that studie Sciences. It is therefore a most evident signe of Gods singular favour towards him that is endued with al these qualities without the least of the which man is most miserable. But if ther be any one that thinketh wit not necessary to the obtaining of wisdom, after he hath gotten the waye to vertue by Industrie and Exercise, he is an Hereticke, in my opinion, touching the true fayth of learning; for if Nature play not hir part, in vaine is labour, and as I said before, if studie be not employed, in vain is Nature. Sloth tourneth the edge of wit, Studie sharpeneth the minde, a thing be it never so easie is harde to the (idle), a thing be it never so hard is easie to the wit well employed. And most playnly we may see in many things the efficacie of industrie and labour.

The lyttle dropes of rayne pearceth hard Marble, yron with often handling is worne to nothing. Besides this, Industrie sheweth hir selfe in other things, the fertill soyle if it be never tilled, doth waxe barren, and that which is most noble by nature, is made most vyle by neglygence. What tree if it be not topped, beareth any fruite? What Vine if it be not proyned, bringeth forth Grapes? Is not the strength of the bodye tourned to weakenesse with too much delycacie, were not Milo his armes brawne-fallen for want of wrastlyng? Moreover by labour the fierce Unicorne is tamed, the wildest Fawlichon is reclaimed, the greatest bulwarke is sacked. It was well answered of that man of Thessalie, who beeing demanded, who among the Thessalians were reputed most vile; those sayde hee that lyve at quyet and ease, never giving themselves to martiall affaires: but what should one use many words in a thing already proved? It is Custome, Use, and Exercise, that bring a young man to Vertue, and Vertue to his perfection. Lycurgus the lawgiver of the Spartans did nourish two Whelpes both of one sire and one damme, but after a sundry manner; for the one he framed to hunt, and the other to lye alwayes in the chimneys ende at the porridge pot. Afterward calling the Lacedemonians into one assembly he saide: To the attaining of vertue, ye Lacedemonians, Education, Industrie, and Exercise, is the most noblest meanes, the truth of which I will make manifest unto you by tryal; then bringing forth the whelpes, and setting downe there a pot and a Hare, the one ran at the Hare, the other to the porridge pot. The Lacedemonians scarce understanding this mistery, he said: Both of these be of one sire and one damme, but you see how Education altereth Nature.

A Father's Grief.

Thou weepst for the death of thy daughter, and I laugh at the folly of the father, for greater vanitie is there in the minde of the mourner then bitterness in the death of the deceased. But shee was amiable, but yet sinful, but she was young and might have lived, but she was mortall and must have dyed. I [Ay] but hir youth made thee often merry, I but thine age shold once make thee wise. I but hir greene yeares wer unfit for death, I but thy hoary haire should dispyse life. Knowest thou not, Eubulus, that life is the gift of God, death the due of Nature; as we receive the one as a benefite, so must we abide the other of necessitie. Wise men have found that by learning which old men should know by experience, that in life there is nothing sweete, in death nothing sowre. The Philosophers accompted it the chiefeest felicitie never to be borne, the second soone to dye. And what hath death in it so hard that we should take it so heavily? is it straunge to see that cut off, which by nature is made to be cut? or that melten, which is fit to be melted? or that burnt which is apt to be burnt, or man to passe that is borne to perish? But thou grauntest that she should have dyed, and yet art thou grieved that she is dead. Is the death the better if the life be longer? no truely. For as neither he that singeth most, or praieth longest, or ruleth the sterne oftenest, but he that doth it best deserveth greatest praise, so he, not that hath most yeares but many virtues, nor he that hath graiest haire but greatest goodnes, lyveth longest. The chiefe beauty of life consisteth not in the numbring of many dayes, but in the using of vertuous dooings. Amongst plants those be best esteemed that in shortest time bring forth much fruite. Be not the fairest flowers gathered when they be freshest? the youngest beasts killed for sacrifice because they be finest? The measure of life is not length, but honestie, neither do we enter into life to the ende we should set downe the day of our death, but therefore do we live, that we may obey him that made us, and be willing to dye when he shall us.

(From Euphues, the Anatomy of Wit.)

Continue not in Anger.

The sharpe Northeast winde (my good Euphues) doth never last three dayes, tempestes have but a short time, and the more violent the thunder is, the lesse permanent it is. In the like manner it falleth out with the jarres and crossings of friends which, begun in a minuit, are ended in a moment.

Necessary it is that among friends there should be some overthwarting, but to continue in anger not convenient; the Camill first troubleth the water before he drinke, the Frankensence is burned before it smell; friendes are tryed before they are to be trusted, least shining like the Carbuncle as though they had fire, they be found being touched to be without fire.

Friendshippe should be like the wine which Homer, much commending, calleth Maroneum, whereof one pinte being mingled with five quartes of water, yet it keepeth his old strength and vertue, not to be qualified by any discourtesie. Where salt doth grow nothing els can breede, where friendship is built no offence can harbour.

(From Euphues and his England.)

It should be remembered that, in spite of his mania for over-elaborateness and artificiality, Lyly could and did, even in Euphues, make effective use of the mother-tongue in its pithiest shape. Thus, recurring to the proverbial wisdom of the race, he speaks of standing as though one 'had a flea in his eare;' 'Ah! well I wot a new broome sweepeth cleane' shows no trace of Italianisation; nor do 'Always have an eye to the mayne,' 'A burnt childe dreadeth the fire,' 'Children and fooles speake true,' 'Cut thy coat according to thy cloth,' 'He that loseth his honestie hath nothing else to lose,' 'It is too late to shutte the stable doore when the steede is stolne,' 'Is it not a by-word, lyke will to lyke?' 'To run with the hare and holde with the hounde,' and 'Fayre words fat fewe.' This, also from Euphues, would come home even to the contemporary Philistine: 'An Englishman hath three qualities; he can suffer no partner in his love, no stranger to be his equal, nor to be dared of any.'

Lyly's comedies (which were performed before the queen by boys' companies) are more readable than his romance. The earliest seems to have been The Woman in the Moone, produced perhaps before 1583 (though not printed till 1597), and was followed by Campaspe and Sapho and Phao (both published in 1584), Endimion (1591), Gallathea and Midas (1592), Mother Bombe (1594—named from the fortune-teller in the play), and Love's Metamorphosis (1601). Except the blank-verse Woman in the Moone, these comedies (on pastoral and mythological subjects) were written in prose, with occasional passages in verse. They display little dramatic power, but handle the old stories cleverly; and, in spite of its inevitable euphuism, the dialogue is frequently pointed and sparkling.

The following soliloquy by Phao, a poor ferryman, is the opening of Sapho and Phao:

Phao. Thou art a ferriman, Phao, yet a freeman; possessing for riches content, and for honours quiet. Thy thoughts are no higher than thy fortunes, nor thy desires greater than thy calling. Who climbeth, standeth on glasse, and falleth on thorne. Thy hearts thirst is satisfied with thy hands thrift, and thy gentle labours in the day turne to sweete slumbers in the night. As much doth it delight thee to rule thine oare in a calme streame, as it doth Sapho to sway the scepter in her brave court. Envi never casteth her eye low, ambition pointeth alwayes upward, and revenge barketh only at starres. Thou farest delicately, if thou have a fare to buy anything. Thine angle is readie, when thine oare is idle; and as sweet is the fish which thou gettest in the river as the foule which other buy in the market; thou needest not feare poyson in thy glasse, nor treason in thy gard. The wind is thy greatest enemy, whose might is withstood with pollicie. O sweet life, seldome found under a golden covert, often under a thatched cottage!

Hazlitt was a warm admirer of Lyly's Endimion. 'I know few things more perfect in characteristic painting,' he remarks, 'than the exclamation of the Phrygian shepherds, who, afraid of betraying the secret of Midas's ears, fancy that "the very reeds bow down as though they listened to their talk;" nor more affecting in sentiment than the apostrophe addressed by his friend Eumenides to Endimion, on waking from his long sleep: "Behold the twig to which thou laidest down thy head is now become a tree."' The Maydes Metamorphosis (1600), an anonymous play, has on no good grounds been assigned to Lyly. Its lyrics are not unworthy of the age—the fairies' song, for example:

By the moon we sport and play;
With the night begins our day:
As we dance the dew doth fall;
Trip it, little urchins all.
Lightly as the little bee,
Two by two, and three by three,
And about go we, and about go we.

Dr Greg and other critics have disputed Lyly's authorship of a score of delightful songs, included in Six Court Comedies by John Lilly, published by Edward Blount in 1632. Of these the best known is—

Cupid and Campaspe.

Cupid and my Campaspe playd,
At cardes for kisses, Cupid payd;
He stakes his quiver, bow, and arrows,
His mother's doves, and teeme of sparrows;
Loses them too; then downe he throwes
The corall of his lippe, the rose
Growing on's cheek (but none knows how);
With these, the cristall of his brow,
And then the dimple of his chinne;
All these did my Campaspe winne.
At last hee set her both his eyes;
Shee won, and Cupid blind did rise.
O Love! has shee done this to thee?
What shall (alas!) become of mee?

Song from 'Sapho and Phao.'

O cruell Love! on thee I lay
 My curse, which shall strike blinde the day;
 Never may sleepe with velvet hand
 Charme thine eyes with sacred wand;
 Thy jaylours shal be hopes and feares;
 Thy prison-mates, grones, sighes, and teares;
 Thy play to weare out weary times,
 Phantasticke passions, vowes, and rimes;
 Thy bread bee frownes; thy drinke bee gall;
 Such as when you Phao call,
 The bed thou lyst on by despaire;
 Thy sleepe, fond dreames; thy dreames long care;
 Hope (like thy foole) at thy beds head,
 Mockes thee, till madnesse strike thee dead;
 As Phao, thou dost mee, with thy proud eyes;
 In thee poore Sapho lives, for thee shee dies.

The nightingale song, also from Sapho and Phao, is given in the section on Elizabethan song-writers (page 274), where Lyly's importance as a lyricist is recognised.

The Lyly of Euphues is such a very pointed contrast to the Anti-Martinist pamphleteer that (although we say with Harvey, his antagonist, 'Would God Lilly had always been Euphues and never Papp-Hatchett') we give a fragment from Papp with a Hatchett, Lyly's principal contribution to the Martin Marprelate controversy (see page 332)—for, though the authorship has been disputed, it seems to have been his:

If Martin will fight Citie fight, wee challenge him at all weapons, from the taylors bodkin to the watchmans browne bil. If a field may be pitcht we are readie: if they scratch, wee will bring cattles: if scolde, we will bring women: if multiplie words, we will bring fooles: if they floute, we will bring quippes: if dispute the matter, we will bring schollers: if they buffet, we will bring fists. Deus bone, what a number of we will brings be here! Nay, we will bring Bull to hang them. A good note and signe of good lucke, three times motion of Bull. Motion of Bull? Why, next olde Rosses motion of Bridewell, Buls motion fits them best. Tria sequuntur tria, in reckoning Bull thrise, methinkes it should presage hanging. O bad application; Bad? I doo not thinke there can be a better, than to applie a knaves necke to an halter. Martin cannot start, I am his shadowe, one parte of the day before him, another behinde him; I can chalke a knave on his backe thrice a weeke, Ile let him bloud in the combe.

Take heed, he will pistle thee. Pistle me? Then have I a pestle so to stampe his pistles, that Ile beate all his wit to powder. What will the powder of Martins wit be good for? Marie, blowe up a dram of it into the nostrils of a good Protestant, it will make him giddie; but if you minister it like Tobacco to a Puritane, it will make him as mad as a Martin.

Lyly's plays were edited by F. W. Fairholt in 1858 (2 vols.); Euphues is in Arber's English Reprints (1868), and was edited by Croll and Clemons (1916). The Complete Works were edited in 3 vols. by Warwick Bond in 1902. See also Child's John Lyly and Euphuism (1894), and studies by Wilson (1905), A. Feuillerat (in French, 1910), Earl of Crawford (1924), V. M. Jeffery (1909).

Thomas Lodge (1558?–1625), poet, dramatist, and romance writer, was the son of a Lord Mayor of London, studied at Trinity, Oxford, and entered Lincoln's Inn, but took to literature and a wild and rollicking life. He published in 1580 a Defence of Stage Plays in Three Divisions, in reply to Stephen Gosson. Gosson rejoined in Plays Confuted in Five Actions; and Lodge rejoined once more. Gosson, who was neither charitable nor careful about evidence, speaks of Lodge as 'hunted by the heavy hand of God, and become little better than a vagrant, looser than liberty;' and he is generally but not certainly identified with the Young Juvenal of Greene's Groats-worth of Wit. He tried the army, and joined in an expedition to the Canaries against the Spaniards about 1588, writing on the way his euphuistic romance, Rosalynde: Euphues Golden Legacie. Published in 1590, this culminating example of Elizabethan romance (see above at page 238) has very many points of resemblance to his friend Greene's Menaiphon (of 1589). With Cavendish he sailed to South America in 1591. Glaucus and Scilla, or Scilla's Metamorphosis (1589), a volume of verse, seems to have given Shakespeare the plan of Venus and Adonis. Euphues Shadow (1592) was another imitation of Lyly. Robin the Divell and William Longbeard were historical romances. Phillis (1593), his chief volume of verse, contained forty sonnets and short pieces, and one narrative poem. A Fig for Momus (1589) consists of Satyres, Eclogues, and Epistles. He further wrote two second-rate plays, The Wounds of Civill War (1594) and A Looking Glasse for London and England (1594, in conjunction with Greene); and he also translated Josephus, Seneca, and part of Du Bartas. A Margarite of America (1596), another euphuistic romance, gives experiences from his second voyage; and was written, he says, 'in those straits christened by Magellan, in which place to the southward, many wondrous isles, many strange fishes, many monstrous Patagons, withdrew my senses.' From literature as a profession he turned about 1596 to physic, and became a Catholic. He studied medicine, Wood says, at Avignon, and practised in London, being much patronised by Roman Catholic families, till his death by the plague in 1625. Lodge was a very accomplished man. The prose of his romances is elaborate, and they are themselves mostly tedious; but some of his lyrics may fairly rank amongst the finest of the century. Of the exquisite verses in Rosalynde Gosse says, 'Nothing so fluent, so opulent, and so melodious had up to that time been known in English verse.' It has been pointed out that many of the best closely follow French and Italian models, especially Ronsard and Desportes. The Rosalynde contains passages of fine description, with verses interspersed. From this romantic little tale Shakespeare took the incidents of his As You Like It, following Lodge with remarkable closeness. Most of the personages, except Jacques, Touchstone, and Audrey, are taken straight from Lodge, their names being usually changed. Shakespeare has been censured for anachronisms in this comedy—such as introducing a lioness and palm-tree into his Forest of Arden; but he merely copied Lodge, who has the lion, the myrrh-tree, the fig, the citron, and pomegranate—consistency and credibility not being features of romantic tales of this kind. Rosalynde itself followed the Tale of Sir Gamelyn, sometimes printed as Chaucer's in the Canterbury Tales.

Of Rosalynde, in some editions called only Euphues Golden Legacie, Lodge in his dedication to Lord Hunsdon says: 'Having with Captaine Clarke made a voyage to the Ilands of Terceras and the Canaries, to beguile the time with labour I writ this Booke: rough and hatcht in the stormes of the Ocean and feathered in the surges of many perillous seas.' But the artistic convention is that he had found the 'scrowle' signed by Euphues' own hand; and thus the work begins:

There dwelt adioyning to the Cittie of Bourdeaux, a Knight of most honourable parentage whom Fortune had graced with many favours, and nature honoured with sundry exquisite qualities, so beautified with the excellence of both, as it was a question whether Fortune or Nature were more prodigall in disciphnering the riches of their bounties. Wise hee was, and holding in his head a supreme conceite of pollicie, reaching with Nestor into the depth of all civill government: and to make his wisdom more gracious, he had that salet ingenii, and pleasant eloquence that was so highly commended in Ulysses: his valour was no lesse then his wit, nor the stroke of his lance no lesse forcible then the sweetness of his tongue was perswasive: for hee was for his courage chosen the principall of all the Knights of Malta. This hardy Knight thus enricht with vertue and honour, sir-named sir John of Bourdeaux, having passed the prime of his youth in soundry battels against the Turks, at last (as the day of time hath his course) grew aged: his haire was silverhewed, and the map of his age was figured on his forehead. Honour sate in the furrowes of his face, and many yeares were portrayd in his wrinckled liniments, that all men might perceive his glasse was runne, and that nature of necessitie challenged her due. Sir John that with the Phenix knew the terme of his life was now expired, and could with the Swanne discover his end by her songs, having three sonnes by his wife Lineda, the very pride of his forepassed yeares, thought now, seeing death by constraint would compell him to leave them, to bestow upon them such a Legacie as might bewray his love, and increase their insuing amitie. Calling therefore these yong Gentlemen before him in the presence of all his fellow Knights of Malta, hee resolved to leave them a memoriall of all his fatherly care, in setting downe a Methode of their brotherly duties. Having therefore death in his lookes to move them to pittie, and teares in his eyes to paint out the depth of his passions, taking his eldest sonne by the hand hee began.

Oh my sonnes, you see that Fate hath set a period of my yeares, and Destinies have determined a finall end of my dayes, the Holme tree wareth awaywarde, for he stoopeth in his height, and my plumes are full of sicke feathers touched with age. I must to my grave that dischargeth al cares, and leave you to the world that increaseth many sorrowes. My silver haire containe great experience, and the number of my yeares have pend downe the subtilties of fortune. Therefore as I leave you some fading pelfe to countercheck povertie, so I will bequeath you infallible precepts that shall leade you unto vertue. First therefore unto thee Saladine the eldest, and therefore the chieftest pillar of my house, wherein should be ingraven as well the excellencie of thy father's qualities, as the essentiall forme of his proportion, to thee I give foureteene plough-lands, with al my Manour houses and richest plate. Next, unto Fernandine, I bequeath twelve plough-lands: But unto Rosader the yongest, I give my horse, my armor, and my lance, with sixteene plough-lands: for if the inward thoughts be discovered by outward shadows, Rosader will exceede you all in bountie and honor. Thus (my sonnes) have I parted in your portions the substance of my wealth, wherein if you be as prodigall to spend, as I have beene careful to get, your friends will grieve to see you more wastfull then I was bountifull, and your foes smile that my fall did begin at your excesse. Let mine honour be the glasse of your actions, and the fame of my vertues the load-starre to direct the course of your pilgrimage. Time your deeds by my honorable indevors, and shew your selves siens [scions] worthy of so flourishing a tree: least as the birds Halcyones which exceed in whitenes, I hatch yong ones that exceed in blacknesse.

Here we have the family skeleton reproduced in As You Like It. And, as in Shakespeare, the rascally elder brother deprives the two younger of their inheritance, forcing the second to become a mere bookworm, and the youngest to be his own foot-boy. Further, when the foot-boy becomes rebellious, the new head of the house suborns a 'champion' (Shakespeare's wrestler) to kill him in a pretended trial of skill. And so Rosader (i.e. Orlando) finds opportunity to distinguish himself in the eyes of Rosalynde (indifferently spelt also Rosalind and Rosalind), the daughter (not of a banished duke, but) of a dispossessed king of France--the parallel being so far complete.

All but one of the following poems are from Rosalynde. The love-sick Rosader describes his 'sweetheart to the forester, pulling a paper forth of his bosome, wherein he read this':

Rosalind's Description.

Like to the cleare in highest sphere,
Where all imperiall glorie shines,
Of selfe-same colours is her haire,
Whether unfolded or in twines:
Heigh ho, faire Rosalind.

Her eyes are Saphires set in snow,
Refining heaven by every winke;
The gods doe feare when as they glow,
And I doe tremble when I thinke.
Heigh ho, would she were mine.

Her cheekes are like the blushing cloudes
That beautifies Aurora's face;
Or like the silver crimson shroud
That Phœbus' smiling looks doth grace.
Heigh ho, faire Rosalind.

Her lips are like to budded roses,
Whom ranks of lillies neighbour nigh;
Within which bounds she balme incloses,
Apt to entice a deitie.
Heigh ho, would she were mine.

Her necke is like a stately tower,
Where Love himself imprisoned lies,
To watch for glaunces every houre,
From her divine and sacred eies.
Heigh ho for Rosalind.

With orient pearle, with rubie red,
With marble white, with saphire blew,
Her bodie everyway is fed,
Yet soft in touch, and sweete in view.
Heigh ho, faire Rosalind.

Nature her selfe her shape admires;
The gods are wounded in her sight;
And Love forsakes his heavenly fires,
And at her eyes his brand doth light.
Heigh ho, were she but mine.

Then muse not, nymphs, though I bemone
The absence of faire Rosalind,
Since for her faire there is a fairer none,
Nor for her vertues so divine.

Heigh ho, faire Rosalind,
Heigh ho, my heart, would God that she were mine.

'Smiling to herselfe to thinke of her new entertained passion, and taking out her lute, she warbled out this ditty':

Rosalind's Madrigall.

Love in my bosome, like a bee,
Doth suck his sweete;
Now with his wings he plaies with me,
Now with his feete.
Within mine eyes he makes his nest,
His bed amidst my tender breast;
My kisses are his daily feast,
And yet he robs me of my rest:
Ah, wanton, will ye?

And if I sleepe, then pearcheth he
With prettie flight,
And makes his pillow of my knee,
The live-long night.
Strike I my lute, he tunes the string;
He musicke plaies if so I sing;
He lends me every loving thing,
Yet cruell he my heart doth sting:
Whist, wanton, still ye!

Else I with roses every day
Will whip you hence,
And bind you, when you long to play,
For your offence.
Ile shut mine eyes to keepe you in;
Ile make you fast it for your sinne;
Ile count your power not worth a pinne;
Alas! what hereby shall I winne
If he gainesay me?

What if I beate the wanton boy
With many a rod?
He will repay me with annoy,
Because a god.
Then sit thou safely on my knee,
And let thy bower my bosome be;
Lurke in mine eyes, I like of thee,
O Cupid! so thou pittie me,
Spare not, but play thee.

The next is:

Rosader's Second Sonetto.

Turn I my looks unto the skies,
Love with his arrows wounds mine eies;
If so I looke upon the ground,
Love then in every flower is found;
Search I the shade to flie my paine,
He meetes me in the shade again;
Want I to walke in secret grove,
Even there I meete with sacred love
If so I bathe me in the spring,
E'en on the brink I heare him sing;
If so I meditate alone,
He will be partner of my mone;
If so I mourne, he weepes with me;
And where I am, there will he be.
When as I talke of Rosalind
The god from coyness waxeth kind,
And seemes in selfe same love to frie,
Because he loves as well as I.
Sweete Rosalind, for pittie sue,
For why then, love, I am more true;
He if he speede will quickly flie,
But in thy love I live and die.

And Rosader, 'desirous to discover his woes to the woods, ingraved with his knife on the barke of a myrre tree, this pretie estimate of his mistris perfection'—another 'sonetto' (of four quatrains, of which this is the first):

Of all chaste birds the phenix doth excell,
Of all strong beasts the lion beares the bell,
Of all sweet flowers the rose doth sweetest smell,
Of all faire maides my Rosalind is fairest.

This is from Phillis:

My Phillis hath the morning sunne
At first to looke upon her.
And Phillis hath morne-waking birdes
Her risings for to honour.
My Phillis hath prime-feathered flowers
That smile when she treads on them:
And Phillis hath a gallant flocke
That leapes since she doth owne them.
But Phillis hath so hard a heart
(Ah-las that she should have it),
As yeeldes no mercie to desert
Nor grace to those that crave it:
Sweet sunne when thou lookest on
Pray her regard my moane.
Sweet birdes when you sing to her
To yeld some pittie woove her.
Sweet flowers when as she treads on
Tell her her beautie deades one.
And if in life her love she nill agree me,
Pray her before I die she will come see me.

Lodge's trenchant pamphleteering style will be seen from a single paragraph of his reply to Gosson's Schoole of Abuse:

There came to my hands lately a litle (woulde God a wittye) pamphlet, baring a fayre face as though it were the schoole of abuse, but being by me advisedly wayed I fynd it the oftscome of imperfections, the writer fuller of wordes than judgement; the matter certainly as ridiculous as serious. Asuredly his mother witte wrought this wonder, the child to dispraise his father, the dogg to byte his mayster for his dainty morcell. But I see (with Seneca) that the wrong is to be suffered, since he dispraiseth who by costome hath left to speake well; bot I meane to be short: and teach the Maister what he knoweth not, partly that he may se his owne follie, and partly that I may discharge my promise; both binde me. Therefore I would wish the good scholmayster to overlooke his abuses againe with me, so shall he see an ocean of inormities which begin in his first prinsiple in the dispraise of poetry.

An edition of Lodge's works in five vols. 4to was published in 1884 for the Hunterian Club, with an introduction by Gosse. Rosalynde, A Fig for Momus, and others of the pieces have been reprinted separately. See Life by Paradise (1932).

Thomas Kyd (1558–94), the son of a scrivener, was baptised in a City church on 6th November 1558, and was educated at Merchant Taylors' School. Like so many of his contemporaries, he seems to have lived a life of hardship as a literary man. In 1590 he entered the service of a lord—possibly the Earl of Sussex. He was imprisoned in 1593, being associated with Marlowe in a charge of atheism (really Unitarianism), but was apparently soon released. He translated The Housholders Philosophie (1588) from Tasso's Padre di Famiglia; he wrote pamphlet-broadsides describing sensational murders of the day; he seems to have written plays on a Senecan model, and he translated Cornelia (1594) from Garnier, chief of the French Senecans; he probably produced c. 1588 a play on Hamlet no longer extant, and possibly had a hand in Titus Andronicus (see page 360); he may have written Solimon and Perseda (1592) and Arden of Feversham (see page 334). But his credit depends mainly on his Spanish Tragedy, licensed and performed with much success in 1592, though probably written before 1588. And, as some think, the success of the Spanish Tragedy moved him—alone or with others—to produce a First Part of Jeronimo, a sort of introductory play vastly inferior to the earlier; others are confident this first part, which might be called The Wars of Portugal, is by a wholly different person. The Spanish Tragedy was prodigiously popular—there were twelve editions, with alterations and additions, by 1633; and in Dutch and German translations it was as popular abroad. It has many merits; it combines the Senecan rhetoric, the style of the Italian renaissance, and the English tradition; it has been called the first living tragedy on a great scale in English, its highly complicated plot being managed with no little dramatic skill, though there are incredibilities, obvious makeshifts, and wooden characters enough. And it reeks with blood. Besides jealousy, malignity, false accusation, treachery, revenge, and madness, there are two hangings, six other murders or assassinations by stabbing or shooting, and three suicides (two of ladies) enacted on the stage. Horrors and atrocities were largely the staple of the renaissance drama of Italy; and in Kyd's masterpiece we have a typical representation of the horrible that was in Shakespeare's hands to be superseded by the terrible. The Spanish Tragedy has, indeed, some considerable similarity to Titus Andronicus even as we know it, and has several points of resemblance to Shakespeare's Hamlet, as in the rôle of the murdered man's ghost, and the play within a play that brings home their guilt to the guilty and gives opportunity for revenge. On Kyd's share in developing English drama see above at page 241. Webster and Tourneur, later exponents of the Tragedy of Blood, forsook in some respects the Shakespearian model to return to Kyd's.

The story is quite unhistorical, nor is it known to be based on any other play or tale. It tells of 'the love of Don Horatio for the Spanish princess Bellimperia; his murder by Bellimperia's brother, Don Lorenzo, and his own rival in love, the captive prince of Portugal, Don Balthazar; and the dreadful revenge of Horatio's father, Jeronimo, the Marshal of Spain, by means of a play where the murders supposed to be acted are carried out in reality.'

The play is in blank verse, interrupted by irregular rhythms, occasional rhymed verse, and passages of prose; and amid the horrors are brief spells of comedy, grim jokes, and bad puns. Ben Jonson was engaged to make additions to the Spanish Tragedy, though he speaks disrespectfully of Kyd's art, and of the popular taste that hankered after plays such as his (see below at page 406). When, playing on Kyd's name, he spoke of 'sporting Kyd and Marlowe's mighty line,' the facetiously inappropriate epithet was unkindly meant. Lamb thought the additions were 'the salt of the old play,' and must have been by 'a more potent spirit than Ben, perhaps Webster.' Coleridge thought the additions attributed (wrongly) to Ben were very like Shakespeare.

Thus the hero Jeronimo (or Hieronimo), 'run lunatic' for grief at the loss of his son, maintained method in his madness and mingled reason—and poetry—with his frenzy:

Hier. Where shall I runne to breath abroad my woes,
My woes whose weight hath wearied the earth?
Or mine exclames that have surcharg'd the Ayre
With ceaselesse Plaints for my deceased Sonne:
The blustering Winds, conspiring with my words,
At my lament have moov'd the leafelesse trees;
Disroab'd the Meadows of their flowred greene,
Made Mountaines harsh with Spring-tide of my teares;
And broken through the Brazen gates of Hell.
Yet still tormented is my tortured Soule
With broken sighes and relesse passions
That winged mount and hovering in the ayre
Beat at the windowes of the brightest Heavens
Soliciting for justice and revenge:
But they are plac'd in their Imperiall heights
Where countermured with walles of Diamond
I find this place impregnable; and they Resist my woes and give my words no way.

(Act III. sc. vii.)

'The following is part of a passage Lamb, on internal evidence alone, thinks must have been by Webster, though there is no evidence that it is not Kyd's own. Schick, on the other hand, says of the whole passage to which it belongs: 'The original Spanish Tragedy has certainly many ridiculous passages, but here Kyd is outdone by the interpolator.' Hieronimo still raves:

Hier. My son! and what's a son? . . .
A lump bred up in darkness, and doth serve
To balance those light creatures we call women;
And at the nine months' end creeps forth to light.
What is there yet in a son,
To make a father dote, rave, or runne mad?
Being borne, it pouts, cries, and breeds teeth.
What is there yet in a Sonne? He must be fed,
Be taught to go, and speak. Ay or yet
Why might not a man love a Calfe as well?
Or melt in passion o'er a frisking Kid,
As for a sonne? Methinkes a young Bacon,
Or a fine little smooth Horse-colt,
Should moove a man as much as doth a Son;
For one of these in very little time
Will grow to some good use; whereas a sonne
The more he growes in stature and in yeares,
The more unsquar'd, unbevelled he appeares;
Reckons his Parents among the ranke of Fooles,
Strikes cares upon their heads with his mad Ryots,
Makes them looke old before they meet with age;
This is a Son; and what a losse were this,
Considered truely! Oh, but my Horatio
Grew out of reach of those Insatiate humours:
He loved his loving Parents:
He was my comfort, and his Mothers joy,
The very arm that did hold up our house—
Our hopes were stored up in him;
None but a damned Murderer could hate him.
He had not scene the backe of nineteen yeere,
When his strong arm unhorst the proud Prince Balthazar;
And his great minde, too full of honour, took
To mercy that valiant but ignoble Portingale.
Well, Heaven is Heaven still!
And there is Nemesis, and Furies,
And things called whippes,
And they sometimes do meet with Murderers:
They doe not alwayes scape—that's some comfort.
Ay, ay, ay, and then time steales on,
And steales, and steales, till violence leapes forth,
Like thunder wrapped in a Ball of fire,
And so doth bring confusion to them all.

(Act III. sc. xi.)

The closely succeeding passage, also spoken by Hieronimo, and no doubt Kyd's own, has been universally praised, and essays have been written on the allegory contained in it:

But if you be importunate to know
The way to him and where to finde him out,
Then list to me and Ile resolve your doubt:
There is a path upon your left hand side,
That leadeth from a guilty Conscience,
Unto a Forrest of distrust and feare,
A darke some place, and dangerous to passe;
There shall you meet with melancholy thoughts
Whose palefull humours if you but behold

It will conduct you to dispaire and death;
Whose rockie cliffes when you have once beheld
Within a hugie dale of lasting night,
That's kindled with the world's iniquities,
Doth cast up filthy and detested fumes,
Not far from thence where murderers have built
An habitation for their cursed soules:
There is a brazen Caldron fixt by Jove
In his fell wrath, upon a sulphire flame,
Your selves shall find Lorenzo bathing him
In boyling Lead and blood of Innocents.

(Also from Act III. sc. xi.)

This dialogue is also set down by Schick as part of a long interpolation:

Isabella. Deare Hieronimo, come in a-doores.
Oh seeke not meanes to increase thy sorrow.

Hier. Indeed, Isabella, wee doe nothing here.
I doe not crie; ask Pedro and Jaques:

Not I indeed; wee are very merry, very merry!

Isa. How? be merry here, be merry here?

Is not this the place, and this the very tree,
Where my Horatio died, where hee was murdered?

Hier. Was——. Do not say what: let her weep it out.

This was the tree; I set it of a kinnell;

And when our hote Spaine could not let it grow,

But that the infant and the humane sappe

Began to wither, duely twice a morning

Would I be sprinkling it with fountaine water:

At last it grew and grew, and bore and bore:

Till at length it grew a gallows, and did bear our son.

It bore thy fruit and mine. O wicked, wicked plant!

See who knocks there. [One knocks within at the door.]

Ped. It is a Painter, sir.

Hier. Bid him come in, and paint some comfort,

For surely ther's none lives but painted comfort.

Let him come in; one knowes not what may chance.

God's will that I should set this tree! but even so

Masters ungrateful servants rear from nought,

And then they hate them that did bring them up.

(From Act III. sc. xii.)

This is part of another soliloquy of Hieronimo's:

But in extreames advantage hath no time,

And therefore all times fit not for revenge,

Thus therefore will I rest me in unrest,

Dissembling quiet in quietnesse:

Not seeming that I know their villanies,

That my simplicity may make them thinke

That ignorantly I will let it slip:

For Ignorance, I wot and well they know,

Remedium malorum iners est.

Nor ought avails it me to menace them,

Who as a wintry Storme upon a Plaine

Will beare me downe with their Nobility.

No, no, Hieronimo, thou must enjoyne

Thine eyes to observation and thy tongue

To milder speeches than thy spirits afford,

Thy heart to patience and thy hands to rest,

Thy cap to curtesie and thy knee to bow,

Till to revenge thou know when, where and how.

'Evil news fly faster still than good' is a blank verse rendering of the proverb; and 'They reckon no laws that meditate revenge,' also from Act I., might itself be a proverb.

The first part of Jeronimo, the Spanish Tragedy, Cornelia, and the Solyman and Perseda are in Hazlitt's Dodsley; there are separate editions of the Spanish Tragedy by Schick (1898), Greg (Malone Soc. 1923), and it is also in Manly's Specimens (vol. ii. 1898); in 1901 Kyd's works were edited for the Clarendon Press by F. S. Boas. See also C. Crawford's Concordance to Kyd's works in Bang's Materialien (1906-10); J. Fitzgerald's The Sources of the Hamlet Tragedy (1909); and Symonds, Shakspeare's Predecessors (1884). Our quotations follow the quarto of 1633.

George Peele, dramatist, was born probably about 1554-58, went up to Oxford in 1571, and took his master's degree in 1579. By 1581 he had removed to London, where he sought court appointments in vain; for seventeen years lived a roistering Bohemian life as actor, poet, and playwright; and died a discreditable death about 1597-98. He was one of those warned to repentance by Greene in his Groats-worth of Wit (see page 326), but had little share in the bitter feuds of his friends and fellow-authors. His best work, The Arraignment of Paris (1584), is a dramatic pastoral or masque containing some exquisite verse (in a variety of metres, including blank verse more musical than any yet written) and ingenious flatteries of Elizabeth. The following passage, spoken by Diana in Act v., praises both Eliza and her 'Elyzium'—a hardly pardonable pun, yet less extravagant than the concluding compliment to Eliza (also called 'Zabeta'):

There wons within these pleasaunt shady woods,
Where neither storm nor sun's distemperature
Have power to hurt by cruel heat or cold,
Under the climate of the milder heaven;
Where seldom lights Jove's angry thunderbolt,
For favour of that sovereign earthly peer;
Where whistling winds make music 'mong the trees,—
Far from disturbance of our country gods,
Amid the cypress-springs, a gracious nymph,
That honours Dian for her chastity,
And likes the labours well of Phoebe's groves;
The place Elyzium hight, and of the place
Her name that governs there Eliza is;
A kingdom that may well compare with mine,
An auncient seat of kings, a second Troy,
Y-compass'd round with a commodious sea:
Her people are y-cleped Angeli,
Or, if I miss, a letter is the most:
She giveth laws of justice and of peace;
And on her head, as fits her fortune best,
She wears a wreath of laurel, gold, and palm;
Her robes of purple and of scarlet dye;
Her veil of white, as best befits a maid:
Her auncestors live in the House of Fame:
She giveth arms of happy victory,
And flowers to deck her lions crown'd with gold.
This peerless nymph, whom heaven and earth loves,
This paragon, this only, this is she,
In whom do meet so many gifts in one,
On whom our country gods so often gaze,
In honour of whose name the Muses sing;
In state Queen Juno's peer, for power in arms
And virtues of the mind Minerva's mate,
As fair and lovely as the Queen of Love,
As chaste as Dian in her chaste desires:
The same is she, if Phoebe do no wrong,
To whom this ball in merit doth belong.

Another pastoral play, The Hunting of Cupid (1591), is lost. His spirited Farewell to Sir John Norris on his expedition to Portugal (1589, eked out by A Tale of Troy), his Eclogue Gratulatory (1589) to the Earl of Essex, his Polyhymnia (1590) on the resignation of a Queen's champion, his Speeches for the reception of Queen Elizabeth (1591), and his Honour of the Garter (1593) for an installation of Knights are other occasional poems. The historical play of Edward I. (1593) is marred by its baseless slanders against Queen Eleanor, due to the then irrepressible English hatred of all that was Spanish. The following noble and eloquent outburst in praise of England is put in the mouth of the Queen-mother:

Illustrious England, ancient seat of kings,
Whose chivalry hath royalised thy fame,
That sounding bravely through terrestrial vale,
Proclaiming conquests, spoils, and victories,
Rings glorious echoes through the farthest world;
What warlike nation, trained in feats of arms,
What barbarous people, stubborn, or untamed,
What climate under the meridian signs,
Or frozen zone under his brumal plage, shore
Erst have not quaked and trembled at the name
Of Britain and her mighty conquerors?
Her neighbour realms, as Scotland, Denmark, France,
Awed with their deeds and jealous of her arms,
Have begged defensive and offensive leagues.
Thus Europe, rich and mighty in her kings,
Hath feared brave England, dreadful in her kings.
And now, t' eternise Albion's champions
Equivalent with Trojans' ancient fame,
Comes lovely Edward from Jerusalem,
Veering before the wind, ploughing the sea;
His stretch'd sails filled with the breath of men
That through the world admires his manliness.
And, lo, at last arrived in Dover-road,
Longshanks, your king, your glory, and our son,
With troops of conquering lords and warlike knights,
Like bloody-crested Mars, o'erlooks his host,
Higher than all his army by the head,
Marching along as bright as Phœbus' eyes!
And we, his mother, shall behold our son,
And England's peers shall see their sovereign.

The bombastic Battle of Alcazar (1594) was followed by another play now lost. His Old Wives' Tale (1595), a legendary story, part in prose and part in blank verse, afforded Milton a rude outline for his masque of Comus; it has been unkindly criticised by Symonds and by Professor Saintsbury, and defended by Bullen, who thought it the most attractive play after the Arraignment. Peele's Scripture drama, The Love of David and Fair Bethsabe, with the Tragedy of Absalon, was not printed till 1599. It presents a curious contrast to most contemporary Elizabethan work in virtue of its subject; and though later Milton evidently studied it with interest, the suggestion that Peele chose a Scripture theme to disarm Puritan prejudice would imply that the playwright wholly misunderstood the nature of that disapproval. For those who abhorred the stage as a frivolous and irreligious pastime, the representation of sacred characters for the public entertainment could only be a heinous aggravation of the offence; and the exhibition of the Shepherd King, the Psalmist who typified Christ, as an unlawful lover was an audacious defiance of a religious prejudice not confined to the Puritans. Some have thought that the play even contains covert allusions, in allegory, to Mary Queen of Scots and the politics of Elizabeth's reign. A miracle-play in more modern form, it is rather a dramatised story than a perfect drama; but it lends itself admirably to quotation. It used to be highly praised. Campbell called it 'the earliest fountain of pathos and harmony that can be traced in our dramatic poetry;' Charles Lamb disrespectfully thought 'a surfeit' the inevitable consequence of reading much 'of the same stuff;' Bullen condemned it as insipid and cloying; Professor Saintsbury, marvelling at Lamb's faint praise, thinks it 'crammed with beauties.' But as Peele's melodious blank verse lacks variety, so it may be said that his dramatic work, though not without eloquence, grace, and vivacity, lacks power and originality.

From 'David and Bethsabe.'

Of Israel's sweetest singer now I sing,
His holy style and happy victories;
Whose Muse was dipt in that inspiring dew
Archangels still'd from the breath of Jove,
Decking her temples with the glorious flowers
Heavens rained on tops of Sion and Mount Sinai.
Upon the bosom of his ivory lute
The cherubins and angels laid their breasts;
And, when his consecrated fingers struck
The golden wires of his ravishing harp,
He gave alarum to the host of heaven,
That, winged with lightning, brake the clouds, and cast
Their crystal armour at his conquering feet.
Of this sweet poet, Jove's musician,
And of his beauteous son, I prease to sing. press
Then help, divine Adonai, to conduct
Upon the wings of my well-tempered verse
The hearers' minds above the towers of heaven,
And guide them so in this thrice-haughty flight,
Their mounting feathers scorch not with the fire
That none can temper but thy holy hand:
To thee for succour flies my feeble Muse,
And at thy feet her iron pen doth use.

After this 'prologus,' Bethsabe and her maid in the bath are watched by David. Bethsabe soliloquises after singing:

Hot sun, cool fire, tempered with sweet air,
Black shade, fair nurse, shadow my white hair:
Shine, sun; burn, fire; breathe, air, and ease me;
Black shade, fair nurse, shroud me, and please me:
Shadow, my sweet nurse, keep me from burning,
Make not my glad cause cause of my mourning.

Let not my beauty's fire
Inflame unstaid desire,
Nor pierce any bright eye
That wandereth lightly.

Come, gentle Zephyr, tricked with those perfumes
That erst in Eden sweetened Adam's love,

And stroke my bosom with thy silken fan:
This shade, sun-proof, is yet no proof for thee;
Thy body, smoother than this waveless spring,
And purer than the substance of the same,
Can creep through that his lances cannot pierce:
Thou and thy sister, soft and sacred Air,
Goddess of life, and governess of health,
Keeps every fountain fresh and arbour sweet;
No brazen gate her passage can repulse,
Nor bushy thicket bar thy subtle breath;
Then deck thee with thy loose delightful robes,
And on thy wings bring delicate perfumes,
To play the wantons with us through the leaves.

Then the king soliloquises:

What tunes, what words, what looks, what wonders pierce
My soul, incens'd with a sudden fire?
What tree, what shade, what spring, what paradise,
Enjoys the beauty of so fair a dame?
Fair Eva, placed in perfect happiness,
Lending her praise notes to the liberal heavens,
Struck with the accents of archangels' tunes,
Wrought not more pleasure to her husband's thoughts
Than this fair woman's words and notes to mine.
May that sweet plain that bears her pleasant weight
Be still enamelled with discoloured flowers; variegated
That precious fount bear sand of purest gold;
And, for the pebble, let the silver streams
That pierce earth's bowels to maintain the source,
Play upon rubies, sapphires, chrysolites;
The brims let be embraced with golden curls
Of moss that sleeps with sound the waters make
For joy to feed the fount with their recourse;
Let all the grass that beautifies her bower
Bear manna every morn instead of dew,
Or let the dew be sweeter far than that
That hangs, like chains of pearl, on Hermon hill,
Or balm which trickled from old Aaron's beard.

When Bethsabe is persuaded to come to the palace, David again says (to himself):

Now comes my lover tripping like the roe,
And brings my longings tangled in her hair.
To joy her love I'll build a kingly bower,
Seated in hearing of a hundred streams,
That, for their homage to her sovereign joys,
Shall, as the serpents fold into their nests
In oblique turnings, wind the nimble waves
About the circles of her curious walks;
And with their murmur summon easeful sleep
To lay his golden sceptre on her brows.

Lamb and Peele's least enthusiastic admirers agree in praising the verse 'Seated in hearing of a hundred streams,' and many other phrases or detached passages. The following episode shows Peele dealing not unworthily, but in closer dependence on the Scriptural record, with the ethical and religious side of the story:

Nathan and David.

Nathan. Thus Nathan saith unto his lord the king.
There were two men both dwellers in one town:
The one was mighty, and exceeding rich
In oxen, sheep, and cattle of the field;
The other poor, having nor ox, nor calf,
Nor other cattle, save one little lamb

Which he had bought and nourished by the hand ;
 And it grew up, and fed with him and his,
 And eat and drank as he and his were wont,
 And in his bosom slept, and was to him
 As was his daughter or his dearest child.
 There came a stranger to this wealthy man ;
 And he refused and spared to take his own,
 Or of his store to dress or make him meat,
 But took the poor man's sheep . . . [text here is corrupt]
 And dressed it for this stranger in his house.
 What, tell me, shall be done to him for this ?

David. Now, as the Lord doth live, this wicked man
 Is judged and shall become the child of death ;
 Fourfold to the poor man shall he restore,
 That without mercy took his lamb away.

Nath. Thou art the man ; and thou hast judged thyself.
David, thus saith the Lord thy God by me :
 ' I thee anointed king in Israel,
 And saved thee from the tyranny of Saul ;
 Thy master's house I gave thee to possess ;
 His wives unto thy bosom did I give,
 And Judah and Jerusalem withal ;
 And might, thou know'st, if this had been too small,
 Have given thee more ;
 Wherefore, then, hast thou gone so far astray,
 And hast done evil, and sinned in my sight ?
 Urias thou hast killed with the sword ;
 Yea, with the sword of the uncircumcised
 Thou hast him slain : wherefore, from this day forth,
 The sword shall never go from thee and thine ;
 For thou hast ta'en this Hethite's wife to thee :
 Wherefore, behold, I will,' saith Jacob's God,
 ' In thine own house stir evil up to thee ;
 Yea, I before thy face will take thy wives,
 And give them to thy neighbour to possess.'
 This shall be done to David in the day,
 That Israel openly may see thy shame.

Dav. Nathan, I have, against the Lord I have,
 Sinned ; O, sinned grievously ! and, lo,
 From heaven's throne doth David throw himself,
 And groan and grovel to the gates of hell.

Nath. David, stand up : thus saith the Lord by me :
 ' David the king shall live.' For he hath seen
 The true repentant sorrow of thy heart ;
 But for thou hast in this misdeed of thine
 Stirred up the enemies of Israel
 To triumph, and blaspheme the God of Hosts,
 And say, he set a wicked man to reign
 Over his loved people and his tribes,—
 The child shall surely die, that erst was born,
 His mother's sin, his kingly father's scorn.

Song from 'The Arraignment of Paris.'

Ænone. Fair and fair, and twice so fair,
 As fair as any may be ;
 The fairest shepherd on our green,
 A love for any lady.

Paris. Fair and fair, and twice so fair,
 As fair as any may be ;
 Thy love is fair for thee alone,
 And for no other lady.

Æn. My love is fair, my love is gay,
 As fresh as bin the flowers in May,
 And of my love my roundelay,
 My merry merry merry roundelay,

Concludes with Cupid's curse,—
 They that do change old love for new,
 Pray gods they change for worse !

Both. Fair and fair, &c. (repeated).

Æn. My love can pipe, my love can sing,
 My love can many a pretty thing,
 And of his lovely praises ring
 My merry merry merry roundelays,
 Amen to Cupid's curse,—
 They that do change old love for new,
 Pray gods they change for worse !

Both. Fair and fair, &c. (repeated).

A. H. Bullen believed the attribution to Peele of Sir Clyomon and Sir Clamydes to be unfounded (see above at page 240), and regarded the Merry Jests of George Peele as not all fabulous, though they were, of course, not compiled by him, and are largely from French originals. The plays Jack Strawe, Locrine, and Alphonsus Emperour of Germany have been (unconvincingly) credited to him.

Polyhymnia describes the ceremonies connected with the retirement from office of an aged Queen's champion, and ends admirably with what is called—

'A Sonnet.'

His golden locks Time hath to silver turned—
 O Time too swift, O swiftness never ceasing !
 His youth 'gainst time and age hath ever spurned,
 But spurned in vain ; youth waneth by increasing !
 Beauty, strength, youth, are flowers but fading seen ;
 Duty, faith, love, are roots, and ever green.

His helmet now shall make an hive for bees,
 And lovers' sonnets turned to holy psalms,
 A man-at-arms must now serve on his knees,
 And feed on prayers, which are Old Age his alms :
 But, though from court to cottage he depart,
 His saint is sure of his unspotted heart.

And when he saddest sits in homely cell,
 He'll teach his swains this carol for a song :—
 ' Blessed be the hearts that wish my sovereign well,
 Cursèd be souls that think her any wrong !'
 Goddess, allow this aged man his right,
 To be your bedesman now that was your knight !

His works were collected by Dyce (3 vols. 1829-39 ; reissued in 1861) and by A. H. Bullen (2 vols. 1888). See Symonds's Shakespeare's Predecessors (1884) and P. H. Cheffaud's George Peele (Par., 1913).

Robert Greene, born at Norwich in 1558, took his B.A. from St John's College, Cambridge, in 1579. In his Repentance of Robert Greene (1592) he gives a sufficiently graphic sketch of an ill-regulated life, about the events of which we know very little : 'As there is no steele so stiffe but the stamp will pierce ; no flint so harde but the drops of raine will hollowe ; so there is no heart so voide of grace or given over to wilfull follie but the mercifull favour of God can modifie. An instance of the like chaunced to my selfe, being a man wholly addicted to all gracelesse indevors, given from my youth to wantonnes, brought up in riot, who as I grew yeares so I waxed more ripe in ungodlines that I was the mirrour of mischief and the very patterne of all prejudiciall actions. . . . As early pricks the tree that will prove a thorne; so even in my first yeares I began to followe the filthines of mine owne desires and neyther to listen to the wholesome advertisements of my parentes nor bee rulde by the carefull correction of my Master. For being at the Universitie of Cambridge, I lighted among wags as lewd as myselfe, with whome I consumed the flower of my youth, who drew mee to travell into Italy and Spaine, in which places I sawe and practized such villainie as is abhominable to declare. Thus by their counsaile I sought to furnish myselfe with coine, which I procured by cunning sleights from my Father and my friends, and my Mother pampered me so long, and secretly helped mee to the Oyle of Angels, that I grew thereby prone to all mischief; so that beeing then conversant with notable Braggarts, boon-companions, and ordinary spend-thrifts, that practized sundry superficial studies, I became as a Sien [scion] grafted into the same stocke, whereby I did absolutely participate of their nature and qualities. At my return into England, I ruffled out in my silks, in the habit of Malcontent, and seemed so discontent that no place would please me to abide in, nor no vocation cause mee to stay myselfe in; but after I had by degrees proceeded Maister of Arts, I left the Universitie, and away to London, where (after I had continued some short time, and driven myself out of credit with sundry of my freends) I became an Author of Playes and a penner of Love Pamphlets, so that I soone grew famous in that qualitie, that who for that trade growne so ordinary about London as Robin Greene? Yong yet in yeares, though olde in wickednes, I began to resolve that there was nothing bad that was profitable; whereupon I grew so rooted in all mischief, that I had as great a delight in wickednesse as sundrie hath in godlinesse, and as much felicitie I tooke in villainy as others had in honestie—i.e. thus was the libertie I got in my youth the cause of my licentious living in my age, and beeing the first steppe to hell, I find it now the first let from heaven.' There is some ground for hoping that this sad picture, like Gabriel Harvey's malignant amplifications, is somewhat overdrawn. But there is no doubt his life was exceptionally irregular and shameless. Thus, after squandering his wife's fortune, he finally deserted her immediately after their first child was born. But whatever his dissipations, he lost nothing of his literary facility; and it should be noted that his extant works are singularly free from grossness. The significance of Greene and his friends of the 'academic set' is indicated above at page 238. His first 'love-pamphlet,' Mamillia or Looking Glasses for the Ladies of England, appeared in 1583; and before his death, on 3rd September 1592, he had produced some forty plays, poems, and tales, which were highly popular with all classes. The most notable of his prose works are short tales and romances, interspersed with poetry—as Pandosto, the Triumph of Time, or the History of Dorastus and Fawnia (1588), remarkable as having furnished Shakespeare with the plot of his Winter's Tale (see below at Shakespeare); The History of Arbasto, King of Denmark; A Pair of Turtle Doves, or the Tragical History of Bellora and Fidelio; Penelope's Web; Menaphon or Camilla's Alarum to Slumbering Euphues; Euphues his Censure to Philautus, &c. Most of these were written under the influence of Lyly: in his own time Harvey called Greene 'the ape of Euphues.' Menaphon (1589), in other respects also one of his most notable works, contains several of Greene's most perfect poems. The group of works of which the Farewell to Follie, the Mourning Garment, and Never too Late are representative indicate a resolve to write no more mere love-pamphlets and to aim at edification; but Greene made no reform in his life, and he still carried on his dramatic labours, of which also in his final, more comprehensive, and probably sincere repentance on his deathbed he expressed his abhorrence. In another series of pamphlets he utilised his peculiar and extensive knowledge of all town vices and villainies—as A Notable Discovery of Coosnage, Conny-catching, The Black Bookes Messenger, &c. Greene's plays, all published posthumously, are Orlando Furioso, a tragedy; Frier Bacon and Frier Bungay; The Scottish Historie of James the Fourth, slaine at Flodden, entermixed with a pleasant Comedie, presented by Oboram, King of Fayeries (dramatised from a tale in Giraldi Cinthio's Hecatommithi); Alphonsus, King of Aragon; George-a-Greene, the Pinner of Wakefield; and a sort of humorous satirical mystery-play, written in conjunction with Lodge, called A Looking-Glass for London and England, but taking its keynote from Jonah's mission to Nineveh. The Tragical Reign of Selimus sometime Emperor of the Turks was claimed for Greene by Dr Grosart, who published it separately in 1898; Sir A. W. Ward and other editors dispute the claim. Amidst a good deal of bombast and extravagance, there is genuine poetry in these plays. The blank verse of Greene approaches that of Marlowe, though less energetic. His imagination was lively and discursive, fond of legendary lore, and filled with classical images and illustrations. In Orlando he thus apostrophises the evening star:

Faire queene of love, thou mistris of delight,
Thou gladsome lampe that waitst on Phoebes traine,
Spreading thy kindenes through the jarring Orbes,
That in their union prayse thy lasting powers;
Thou that hast staid the fierie Phlegons course,
And madest the Coachman of the glorious waine
To droope in view of Daphnes excellence;
Faire pride of morne, sweete beutie of the even,
Looke on Orlando languishing in love.
Sweete solitarie groves, whereas the Nymphes
With pleasance laugh to see the Satyrs play,
Witnes Orlandes faith unto his love.

Tread she these lawnes, kinde Flora, boast thy pride,
 Seeke she for shades, spread, cedars for her sake.
 Faire Flora make her couch amidst thy flowers.
 Sweet Christall springs,
 Wash ye with roses when she longs to drinke.
 Ah, thought, my heaven! ah, heaven, that knows my thought!
 Smile, joy in her that my content hath wrought.

The comedies have a good deal of boisterous merriment and farcical humour. George-a-Greene, the Pinner of Wakefield, is founded on an old prose History of George-a-Greene, of the Robin Hood type; and there was also an old black-letter ballad, The Jolly Pinder of Wakefield, with Robin Hood, Scarlet, and John, beginning:

In Wakefield there lives a jolly pinder,
 In Wakefield all on a green.

George is a shrewd Yorkshireman, who meets with the kings of Scotland and England, Robin Hood, Maid Marian, &c., and who, after various tricks, receives the pardon of King Edward:

And George-a-Greene, give me thy hand:
 There is none in England that shall do thee wrong.
 Even from my court I came to see thy selfe,
 And now I see that fame speakes nought but trueth.

The following specimen of the simple humour of the play is in a scene between George and his servant:

Jenkin. He spied Madge and I sit together; he leapt from his horse, laid his hand on his dagger, and began to sweare. Now seeing he had a dagger and I nothing but this twig in my hand, I gave him faire words, and said nothing. He comes to me, and takes me by the bosome: You whoreson slave, said he, hold my horse, and looke he take no colde in his feet. No, marie, shall he, sir, quoth I; Ile lay my cloake underneath him. I tooke my cloake, spread it all along, and [set] his horse on the midst of it.

George. Thou clowne, didst thou set his horse upon thy cloake?

Jenkin. Ay, but mark how I served him. Madge and he were no sooner gone downe into the ditch, but I plucked out my knife, cut foure holes in my cloak, and made his horse stand on the bare ground.

Frier Bacon and Frier Bungay is Greene's most entertaining comedy. His friars are magicians; but the Brazen Head is destroyed by a mysterious power as soon as it has attained to speech. Bacon forswears magic, and the piece concludes with Bacon's clownish man Miles being carried off to hell on the back of one of the devils heretofore wont to carry out Bacon's behests. The play was acted in 1591, but may have been produced a year or two earlier. Alphonsus is obviously modelled on Marlowe's Tamburlaine, and, though Greene had at first ridiculed the dramatic use of blank verse, very closely copies Marlowe's style. Here and elsewhere the style is vigorous but overloaded with imagery. In many respects Greene deserves the title of 'Shakespeare's predecessor,' though he is inferior to Marlowe in power and passion and majesty. Greene could and did combine the comic and the serious in a harmony unapproached by his predecessors; he greatly surpassed Marlowe in creating noble women-types. His sympathies are truly English, and he happily utilises various homely English characters.

If Harvey's story is true, Greene's death was in keeping rather with the unrepentant side of his life. He not merely sank into poverty, but was deserted by his friends. Having, at a supper where Nash was a guest, indulged to excess in pickled herrings and Rhenish wine, he contracted a mortal illness, under which he suffered for a month, supported by a poor charitable cordwainer; and he was buried the day after his death (September 1592) in the New Churchyard near Bedlam, the cost of his funeral being 6s. 4d.

On his deathbed Greene wrote a most melancholy tract called A Groats-worth of Wit, bought with a Million of Repentaunce, in which he deplores his fate more feelingly than Nash (page 330), earnestly warns his comrades, and gives a deplorable picture of Elizabethan literary Bohemianism. The plot of the story (not strictly autobiographical, one must hope) is of an usurer with two sons. The first, bred a scholar at the university, denounces usury with such high mightiness in the presence of his father's friends that the old money-lender then and there cuts off his first-born with the third of a shilling, bidding him buy a groat's worth of wit, and at his death leaves all his wealth to the younger son, a vain fool. Roberto forms the unholy scheme of conspiring with a courtesan to plunder his brother Lucanio; the courtesan does reduce Lucanio to beggary, but Roberto is befooled, has to live by his wits, and by-and-by is 'famoized' as an 'arch-plaimaking-poet':

His companie were lightly the lewdest persons in the land, apt for pilferie, perjurie, forgerie, or any villanie. Of these hee knew the casts to cog at Cards, coosin at Dice: by these he learned the legerdemaines of nips, foysters, conni-catchers, crosbyters, lifts, high Lawyers, and all the rabble of that uncleane generation of vipers: and pithily could he paint out their whole courses of craft: So cunning he was in all crafts, as nothing rested in him almost but craftinesse. How often the Gentlewoman his wife laboured vainly to recall him, is lamentable to note: but as one given over to all lewdnes, he communicated her sorrowful lines among his loose truls, that jested at her bootelesse laments. . . .

For now when the number of deceites caused Roberto bee hatefull almost to all men, his immeasurable drinking had made him the perfect Image of the dropsie, and the loathsome scourge of Lust, tyrannized in his loves: living in extreame poverty, and having nothing to pay but chalke, which now his Host accepted not for currant, this miserable man lay comfortlessly languishing, having but one groat left (the just proportion of his fathers Legacie), which looking on, he cried: O now it is too late, too late to buy witte with thee: and therefore will I see if I can sell to carelesse youth what I negligently forgot to buy.

Heere (Gentlemen) breake I off Robertos speech ; whose life in most parts agreeing with mine, found one selfe punishment as I have doone. Heereafter suppose me the said Roberto, and I will goe on with that hee promised : Greene will send you now his groatsworth of wit, that never shewed a mitesworth in his life : and though no man now be by to doe me good, yet ere I die I will by my repentance indevor to doe all men good.

He adds ten moral rules for the guidance of his friends—to set God before their eyes, to oppress no man, to build no house to a neighbour's hurt ; and then renews his appeal to these, in which he refers specifically to Marlowe (as 'atheist'), to young Juvenal (Lodge, as is usually assumed, though A. H. Bullen and Sir Sidney Lee thought Nash had a better claim to the distinction), and to a third (presumably Peele). The 'brother' of atheism (doubtless for brocher or broacher) was formerly assumed to be Kett, burnt for heresy at Norwich in 1589. But as Kett was no atheist but a devout and mystical Unitarian, perhaps Machiavelli himself is meant. Greene then makes his famous assault on Shakespeare :

To those Gentlemen his Quondam acquaintance, that spend their wits in making Plaies, R. G. wisheth a better exercise and wisdom to prevent his extremities.

If wofull experience may moove you (Gentlemen) to beware, or unheard of wretchednes intreate you to take heed, I doubt not but you will looke backe with sorrow on your time past, and endeavour with repentance to spend that which is to come. Wonder not (for with thee wil I first begin), thou famous gracer of Tragedians, that Greene, who hath said with thee like the foole in his heart, There is no God, should now give glorie unto his greatnesse : for penetrating is his power, his hand lies heave upon me, he hath spoken unto me with a voice of thunder, and I have felt he is a God that can punish enimies. Why should thy excellent wit, his gift, be so blinded, that thou shouldst give no glory to the giver? Is it pestilent Machivilian pollicie that thou hast studied? O punish follie ! What are his rules but meere confused mockeries, able to extirpate in small time the generation of mankind. For if Sic volo, sic jubeo, hold in those that are able to command : and if it be lawfull Fas & nefas to doe anything that is beneficiall, onely Tyrants should possesse the earth, and they striving to excede in tyranny, should each to other bee a slaughter man ; till the mightiest outliving all, one stroke were left for Death, that in one age man's life should ende. The brother of this Diabolicall Atheisme is dead, and in his life had never the felicitie he aimed at : but as he began in craft, lived in feare and ended in despaire. Quam inscrutabilia sunt Dei judicia? This murderer of many brethren had his conscience seared like Caine : this betrayer of him that gave his life for him inherited the portion of Judas : this Apostata perished as ill as Julian : and wilt thou, my friend, be his Disciple? Looke unto me, by him perswaded to that libertie, and thou shalt finde it an infernall bondage. I knowe the least of my demerits merit this miserable death, but wilfull striving against knowne truth, exceedeth al the terrors of my soule. Defer not (with me) till this last point of extremitie ; for little knowest thou how in the end thou shalt be visited.

With thee I joyne young Juvenall, that byting Satyrists, that lastlie with mee together writ a Comedie. Sweete boy, might I advise thee, be advised, and get not many enemies by bitter words : inveigh against vaine men, for thou canst do it, no man better, no man so wel : thou hast a libertie to reprove all, and none more ; for one being spoken to, all are offended, none being blamed no man is injured. Stop shallow water still running, it will rage, tread on a worme and it will turne : then blame not schollers vexed with sharpe lines, if they reprove thy too much libertie of reprove.

And thou no lesse deserving then the other two, in some things rarer, in nothing inferiour ; driven (as my selfe) to extreame shifts, a little have I to say to thee : and were it not an idolatrous oth, I would swear by sweet S. George, thou art unworthie better hap, sith thou dependest on so meane a stay. Base minded men al three of you, if by my miserie ye be not warned : for unto none of you (like me) sought those burres to cleave : those Puppits (I meane) that speake from our mouths, those Anticks garnisht in our colours. Is it not strange that I, to whom they al have beene beholding : is it not like that you, to whome they all have beene beholding, shall (were ye in that case that I am now) be both at once of them forsaken? Yes, trust them not : for there is an upstart Crow, beautified with our feathers, that with his Tygers heart wrapt in a Players hide, supposes he is as well able to bumbast out a blanke verse as the best of you : and being an absolute Johannes factotum, is in his owne conceit the onely Shake-scene in a countrie. O that I might intreate your rare wits to be employed in more profitable courses : & let those Apes imitate your past excellence, and never more acquaint them with your admired inventions. I know the best husband of you all will never prove an Usurer, and the kindest of them all will never proove a kinde nurse : yet whilst you may, seeke your better Maisters ; for it is pittie men of such rare wits should be subject to the pleasures of such rude groomes.

In this I might insert two more, that both have writ against these buckram Gentlemen : but let their owne works serve to witnesse against their owne wickednesse, if they persever to mainteine any more such peasants. For other new commers, I leave them to the mercie of these painted monsters, who (I doubt not) will drive the best minded to despise them : for the rest, it skills not though they make a jeast at them.

But now returne I againe to you three, knowing my miserie is to you no news : and let me heartily intreate you to bee warned by my harmes. Delight not (as I have done) in irreligious oaths ; for from the blasphemers house a curse shall not depart. Despise drunkenness, which wasteth the wit, and maketh men all equal unto beasts. Flie lust, as the deathsmen of the soule, and defile not the Temple of the holy ghost. Abhorre those Epicures, whose loose life hath made religion lothsome to your eares : and when they sooth you with tearmes of Mastership, remember Robert Greene, whome they have so often flattered, perishes now for want of comfort. Remember, gentlemen, your lives are like so many lighted Tapers, that are with care delivered to all of you to maintaine : these with wind-puft wrath may be extinguisht, which drunkenness put out, which negligence let fall : for mans time of itselfe is not so short, but it is more shortened by sin. The fire of my light is now at the last snuffe, and the want of wherewith to sustaine it, there is no substance left for life to feede on. Trust not then (I beseech yee) to such weake staies : for they are as changeable in minde as in many attires. Well, my hand is tired, and I am forst to leave where I would begin ; for a whole booke cannot containe these wrongs, which I am forst to knit up in some few lines of words.

Desirous that you should live, though himselfe be dying,
Robert Greene.

The punning allusion to Shakespeare is palpable ; the expressions 'tiger's heart,' &c., are a parody on the line in Henry VI., Part Third :

O Tiger's heart wrapt in a woman's hide.

The Winter's Tale is believed to be one of Shakespeare's late dramas, not written till long after Greene's death ; consequently, if this be correct, the unhappy man could not be meaning to denounce the plagiarism of the plot from his tale of Pandosto. Some forgotten play of Greene and his friend may have been alluded to ; perhaps the old dramas on which Shakespeare constructed his Henry VI., for in one of these also the line 'O tiger's heart,' &c., occurs. Shakespeare was certainly indebted to Marlowe. The Groats-worth of Wit was published after Greene's death by a brother-dramatist, Henry Chettle, who, in the preface to a subsequent work, his Kind Hartes Dreame (1593), apologised indirectly for the allusion to Shakespeare, and does justice to Shakespeare's character as man and actor and playwright. 'I am as sory,' he says, 'as if the originall fault had bene my fault, because myselfe have seene his demeanour no lesse civill than he is exelent in the qualitie he professes ; besides divers of worship have reported his up-rightnes of dealing, which argues his honesty, and his facetious grace in writing, that aprooves his art.' Another posthumously published tract, The Repentance of Robert Greene, Master of Artes, is probably authentic, though it was doubtless 'edited.' (It was reprinted, with A Groats-worth of Wit, in Bodley Head Quartos, 1923.)

Greene's plays are important to students of the drama ; the pamphlets are full of interest of various kinds ; but his literary rank depends mainly on the grace and tenderness of the poetry scattered through his romances.

Content.

Sweet are the thoughts that savour of content ;

The quiet mind is richer than a crowne ;

Sweet are the nights in carelesse slumber spent ;

The poor estate scorns Fortune's angrie frowne :

Such sweet content, such mindes, such sleep, such blis
Beggars injoy, when princes oft do mis.

The homely house that harbors quiet rest ;

The cottage that affoords no pride nor care ;

The meane that 'grees with countrie musick best,

The sweet consort of mirth and musicks fare ;

Obscurèd life sets downe a type of blis,

A minde content both crowne and kingdome is.

Sephestia's Song to her Child.

Weepe not, my wanton, smile upon my knee ;

When thou art olde, ther's grief enough for thee.

Mother's wagge, pretie boy,
Father's sorrow, father's joy ;
When thy father first did see
Such a boy by him and mee,
He was glad, I was woe,
Fortune changed made him so ;
When he left his prettie boy,
Last his sorowe, first his joy. . . .

The wanton smiled, father wept,
Mother cried, babie lept ;
More he crowed, more we cried,
Nature could not sorowe hide :
He must goe, he must kisse
Child and mother, babie blisse.
For he left his pretty boy,
Father's sorowe, father's joy.

Weepe not, my wanton, smile upon my knee ;
When thou art olde, ther's grief inough for thee.

The Shepherd and his Wife.

It was neere a thicky shade
That broad leaves of beech had made ;
Joyning all their tops so nie
That scarce Phœbus in could prie . . .

Where sate the swaine and his wife
Sporting in that pleasing life
That Coridon commendeth so,
All other lives to over-go.

He and she did sit and keepe
Flocks of kids and fouldes of sheepe :

He upon his pipe did play,
She tun'd voice unto his lay,
And for you might her huswife knowe,
Voice did sing and fingers sew ;

He was young, his coat was greene,
With welts of white, seam'd betweene,
Turned over with a flappe

That breast and bosom in did wrappe ;
Skirts side and plighted free,
Seemely hanging to his knee.

A whittle with a silver chape ;

Cloak was russet and the cape

Served for a bonnet oft

To shrowd him from the wet aloft.

A leather scrip of colour red,

With a button on the head ;

A bottle full of country whigge

By the shepherd's side did ligge :

And in a little bush hard by

There the sheheard's dog did lye,

Who while his master 'gan to sleepe,

Well could watch both kiddes and sheepe,

The sheheard was a frolicke swaine,

For though his parell was but plaine,

Yet doone the Authors soothly say

His colour was both fresh and gay ;

And in their writtes plain discusse,

Fairer was not Tityrus,

Nor Menalcas, whom they call

The alderleefest swaine of all :

'Seeming him was his wife,

Both in line and in life ;

Fair she was as faire might be,

Like the roses on the tree ;

dearest of all

pleated

Buxsome, blithe, and young, I weene,
 Beautious, like a Summer's queen :
 For her cheeks were ruddy hued
 As if lilies were imbrued
 With drops of bloud, to make the white
 Please the eye with more delight ;
 Love did lye within her eyes
 In ambush for some wanton prize :
 A leeper lasse than this had beene
 Corydon had never seen.
 Nor was Phillis that faire May
 Half so gawdy or so gay :
 She wore a chaplet on her head ;
 Her cassocke was of scarlet red,
 Long and large, as streight as bent ;
 Her middle was both small and gent.
 A necke as white as Whales bone,
 Compast with a lace of stone ;
 Fine she was, and faire she was,
 Brighter than the brightest glasse ;
 Such a shepherd's wife as she Was not more in Thessaly.

The above description, from The Mourning Garment, is followed by the continuation :

Philador, seeing this couple sitting thus lovingly, noted the concord of country amity, and began to conjecture with himself what a sweet kind of life those men use, who were by their birth too low for dignity, and by their fortunes too simple for envy ; well, he thought to fall in prattle with them, had not the shepherd taken his pipe in hand, and begun to play, and his wife to sing out, this roundelay.

The Shepherd's Wife's Song.

Ah, what is love ? It is a pretty thing,
 As sweet unto a shepherd as a king,
 And sweeter too :
 For kings have cares that waite upon a crowne,
 And cares can make the sweetest love to frowne :
 Ah then, ah then,
 If cuntry loves such sweet desires do gaine,
 What lady would not love a shepherd swaine ?
 His flocks are foulded, he comes home at night,
 As merry as a king in his delight,
 And merrier too :
 For kings bethinke them what the State require,
 Where shepherds carelesse carroll by the fire :
 Ah then, ah then,
 If country loves such sweet desires do gaine,
 What lady would not love a shepherd swaine ?
 He kisseth first, then sits as blyth to eate
 His creame and curds as doth the king his meate,
 And blyther too :
 For kings have often feares when they do sup,
 Where shepherds dread no poyson in their cup :
 Ah then, ah then,
 If country loves such sweet desires do gaine,
 What lady would not love a shepherd swaine ? . . .
 Upon his couch of straw he sleeps as sound
 As doth the king upon his bed of downe,
 More sounder too :
 For cares cause kings full oft their sleepe to spill,
 Where weary shepherds lie and snort their fill :
 Ah then, ah then,

If country loves such sweet desires do gaine,
 What lady would not love a shepherd swaine ?

Thus with his wife he spends the yeare as blyth,
 As doth the king at every tide or sithe,
 And blyther too :

For kings have warres and broyles to take in hand,
 When shepherds laugh and love upon the land :

Ah then, ah then,
 If cuntry loves such sweet desires do gaine,
 What lady would not love a shepherd swaine ?

On the title-page of the later editions of Pandosto we find the fine 'love-passion,' of which this is the first part, as given by Dyce :

Ah, were she pitifull as she is fair,
 Or but as mild as she is seeming so,
 Then were my hopes greater than my despair,
 Then all the world were heaven, nothing woe.
 Ah, were her heart relenting as her hand,
 That seems to melt even with the mildest touch,
 Then knew I where to seat me in a land
 Under wide heavens, but yet [there is] not such.
 So as she shews, she seems the budding rose,
 Yet sweeter far than is an earthly flower ;
 Sovereign of beauty, like the spray she grows ;
 Compass'd she is with thorns and canker'd bower ;
 Yet were she willing to be pluck'd and worn,
 She would be gathered though she grew on thorn.

Greene's plays and poems were edited by Alexander Dyce (2 vols. 1837, new ed. with Peele in 1 vol. 1861); his complete works, with a Life translated from the Russian of Storojenko, are included in the Huth Library (15 vols. 1881-86) of Dr A. B. Grosart. There is an edition by Churton Collins (2 vols. 1905). Sir A. W. Ward reprinted Frier Bacon and Frier Bungay in his Old English Drama (1892). See Robert Greene, by J. C. Jordan (1915); C. M. Gayley's Representative English Comedies (vol. i. 1903); and Simpson's The School of Shakespeare (vol. ii. 1878), which contains Faire Em, a play sometimes ascribed to Greene.

Thomas Nash (1567-1601), a keen and copious satirist, was a native of Lowestoft, in Suffolk, and was of St John's College, Cambridge. He travelled in France and Italy, picked up a livelihood we know not how, and died in distress and debt, after a 'life spent in fantastick satirisme in whose veines heretofore I misspent my spirit and prodigally conspired against good houres.' He became known by his savage denunciation of Puritans, the Marprelate pamphleteers, and in especial of Gabriel Harvey—work begun in the Anatomie of Absurdities (1589), continued in several pamphlets by 'Pasquill of England, Cavaliero,' and renewed from time to time till 1596, in Have with you to Saffron-Walden. Pierce Pennilesse his Supplication to the Devill (1592) assails the tricks by which men secure wealth. It is an odd olla-podrida (not without blasphemy) in which opportunity is found to denounce upstarts and politicians, niggards, prodigals, learned vanity, the pride of merchants' wives, of Spaniards, Italians, Frenchmen, Danes. There is an invective against the enemies of poetry, and praise of the poets and authors—of 'immortal Sidney,' 'Silver-tongued Smith,' 'Merry Sir Thomas Moore'—a defence of plays, and various more or less relevant 'wittie stories.' The versification of Nash is usually hard and monotonous, though sometimes his inspiration is happy. His masque or comedy of Summers Last Will and Testament (1600; Will Summers being a jester of Henry VIII.) is partly in prose, partly in blank verse; but there are some songs in the true Elizabethan manner. Thence comes the line:

Time from the brow doth wipe out every stain;
and thence too the song beginning with this often-quoted verse:

Spring, the sweete spring, is the yeres pleasant King,
Then bloomes eche thing, then maydes daunce in a ring,
Cold doeth not sting, the pretty birds doe sing
Cuckow, juggle, juggle, pu we, to witta woo.

In Pierce Pennilesse, Nash (often spelt Nashe) draws a harrowing picture of the despair of a poor scholar, in verses such as these:

Ah, worthlesse wit! to traine me to this woe:
Deceitfull artes that nourish discontent!
Ill thrive the follie that bewicht me so!
Vaine thoughts, adieu! for now I will repent;
And yet my wants perswade me to proceede,
Since none take pitie of a scholler's neede.

Forgive me, God, although I curse my birth,
And ban the aire wherein I breathe a wretch,
Since misery hath daunted all my mirth,
And I am quite undone through promise-breach;
Oh frends! no frends that then ungently frowne
When changing fortune casts us headlong downe.

The Astrological Prognostication by Adam Foulweather seems to have been levelled partly against Harvey's two brothers, who were interested in astrology, but makes game of astrology and astrological prognostications in general for their oracular but unmeaning truisms by iteration of such forecasts as that in consequence of an eclipse of the sun 'olde women that can live no longer shall dye for age; and yong men that have usurers to their father shall this yeer have great cause to laugh, for the Devill hath made a decree that after they are once in hell they shall never rise again to trouble their executors.' The eclipse also 'foresheweth that manye shall goe soberer into tavernes than they shall come out; and he which drinkes hard and lyes cold shall never dye of the sweat!' On an eclipse of the moon it is to be greatly feared that 'the Danes shall this yeere be greatly given to drinke! Since great floudes are like to ensue through this hiemall distemperature, that diverse men shall be drowned on drie hilles, and fish if they could not swimme were utterly like to perish! and eeles are like to be deare if there are none taken, and plentie of poutes to bee had in all places, especially in those coastes and countries where weomen have not their owne willes.' 'Sho-makers shall prove so proud that they shall refuse the name of souters, and the tailer and the louse are like to fall at martial variance.' 'Diverse persons for want of wine or strong drinke shall go to bedde sober against their willes.' 'Sea-faring men shall have ill-lucke if either their shippes hit against rockes or sticke in the sandes.' But it should be added that Nash's ingenious series of jokes is in idea and method a mere pastiche, with extensions and variations, of Rabelais's Certain, True, and Infallible Pantagruelian Prognostication for the Year that's to Come and Ever and Aye.

Nash was an author by profession—careless, jovial, and dissipated—alternating between riotous excess and abject misery; but he was generally in want. In his Pierce Pennilesse he thus paints his situation in 1592:

Having spent manie yeres in studying how to live, and lived a long time without money; having tyred my youth with follie, and surfeited my minde with vanitie, I began at length to look backe to repentaunce, and addresse my endeavors to prosperitie. But all in vaine: I sate up late and rose early, contended with the colde and conversed with scarcitie; for all my labours turned to losse, my vulgar muse was despised and neglected, my paines not regarded, or slightly rewarded, and I myself (in prime of my best wit) laid open to povertie. . . .

Men of art must seek almes of cormorants, and those that deserve best, to be kept under by dunces, who count it a policie to keep them bare, because they should follow their books the better.

Yet, though he has a sufficiently high opinion of his worth, he is apparently willing to let himself out to one of these wealthy dunces:

Gentles, it is not your lay chronigraphers, that write of nothing but Mayors and sheriefs, and the Deare Yeere and the Great Frost, that can endowe your names with never-dated glory, for they want the wings of choice words to flie to heaven, which wee have; they cannot sweeten a discourse, or wrest admiration from mere reading, as we can, reporting the meanest accident. Poetry is the hunny of all flowers, the quintessence of all scyences, the marrowe of witte, and the very phrase of angels: how much better is it, then, to have an elegant lawyer to plead ones cause than a stutting townsman, who loseth himselfe in his tale, and dooth nothing but make legs; so much it is better for a nobleman or gentleman to have his honour's story related and his deedes emblazoned by a poet than a cittizen. . . . For my part, I do challenge no praise of learning to myselfe, yet have I worne a gowne in the university; but this I dare presume, that if any Mæcenas binde mee to him by his bounty, or extend some sound liberalitie to mee worth the speaking of, I will doe him as much honour as any poet of my beardlesse yeares shall in England. Not that I am so confident what I can doe, but that I attribute so much to my thankfull mind above others, which, I am perswaded, would enable me to work miracles. On the contrary side, if I be evill intreated, or sent away with a flea in mine eare, let him looke that I will rayle on him soundly; not for an houre or a day whiles the injury is fresh in my memory, but in some elaborate pollihed poem, which I will leave to the world when I am dead, to be a living image to all ages of his beggerly parsimony and ignorant liberalitie: and let him not (whatsoever he be) treasure the weight of my words by this book, where I write quicquid in buccam veniret, as fast as my hand can trot; but I have tearmes (if I be vexed) laid in steepe in aqua-fortis and gunpowder, that shall rattle through the skyes, and make an earthquake in a pesant's eares.

His sarcastic temper and his bitter tongue made him quarrel with his friends and patrons, as well as with Puritans and opponents. He was a man of much culture, shows the influence of Aretino and Rabelais, and had a true enthusiasm for real poetic merit, as seen by what he says of Surrey, Spenser, and Sidney. He completed Marlowe's Dido Queen of Carthage, and saw it through the press. Christes Teares over Jerusalem (1593) seemed to imply repentance for his own shortcomings as well as those of his neighbours. The Terror of the Night, or a Discourse of Apparitions, is a hack piece of no importance. But The Unfortunate Traveller, or the Life of Jack Wilton (1594), is a great departure in realistic fiction, and is regarded as having 'inaugurated the novel of England.' In 1597 he was imprisoned for the too free satire of affairs of State in a play, never published, called The Isle of Dogs (1597), and was confined for some months.

M. Jusserand holds that Jack Wilton is the first notable English picaresque story, well worthy to be named as having anticipated Defoe. Jack Wilton, who had as page cozened many creditors at court, has followed Henry VIII.'s army to the Low Countries, and before Turney and Turwin (Tournay and Terouenne) leads a gay and dissolute life, seasoned with playful or malicious practical jokes. M. Jusserand thinks Shakespeare may have been moved by Jack Wilton to compound in Falstaff characteristics of the hare-brained page and the untidy, boastful, dishonest, chicken-livered camp-follower described in the following passage :

There was a Lord in the campe, let him be a Lord of misrule, if you wil, for he kept a plaine alehouse without welt or gard of anie Iuibush, and solde syder and cheese by pint and by pound to all that came (at that verie name of syder, I can but sigh, there is so much of it in renish wine now a dayes). Wel, Tendit ad sydera virtus, thers great vertue belongs (I can tell you) to a cup of syder, and verie good men have solde it, and at sea it is Aqua caelestis, but thats neither heere nor there, if it had no other patrone but this peere of quart pots to authorize it, it were sufficient. This great Lord, this worthie Lord, this noble Lord, thought no scorne (Lord have mercy upon us) to have his great velvet breeches larded with the droppings of this daintie liquor, & yet he was an olde servitor, a cavalier of an ancient house, as it might appeare by the armes of his ancestrie, drawn very amiably in chalke, on the in side of his tent doore.

He and no other was the man I chose out to damne with a lewd monylesse device : for comming to him on a daie, as he was counting his barrels, & setting the price in chalke on the head of everie one of them, I did my dutie verie devoutly, and tolde his alie honor I had matters of some secrecie to impart unto him, if it pleased him to grant me private audience. With me, young Wilton, quoth he? marie and shalt. Bring us a pint of syder of a fresh tap into the three cups here, wash the pot. So into a back roome he lead mee, where after hee had spit on his finger, and pickt off two of three moats of his olde moth eaten velvet cap, and spunged and wrong all the rumatike drivell from his ill favoured Goates bearde, he badde me declare my minde, and there upon he dranke to me on the same. I up with a long circumstance, alias a cunning shift of the seventeens, & discourst unto him what entire affection I had borne him time out of mind, partly for the high descent and linage from whence he sprung, & partly for the tender care and provident respect he had of poore soldiers, that whereas the vastitie of that place (which afforded them no indifferent supplie of drinke or of victuals) might humble them to some extremity, and so weaken their hands, he vouchsafed in his own person to be a victualer to the campe (a rare example of magnificence & honorable curtesie) and diligently provided, that without farre travel, every man might for his money have syder and cheese his bellyfull ; nor did he sell his cheese by the way onely, or his syder by the great, but abast himself with his own hands, to take a shoemakers knife (a homely instrument for such a high personage to touch) and cut it out equally like a true justiciarie, in little pennyworthes, that it woulde doo a man good for to looke upon. So likewise of his syder, the pore man might have his moderate draught of it (as there is a moderation in all things) as well for his doir or his dandiprat, as the rich man for his halfe souse or his denier. Not so much, quoth I, but this tapsters linnen apron, which you weare before you, to protect your apparell from the imperfections of the spigot, most amply bewraies your lowly minde. I speake it with teares, too fewe such humble spirited noble men have we, that will draw drinke in linnen aprons. Why you are everie childs fellow, any man that comes under the name of a souldier and a good fellowe, you will sitte and beare companie to the last pot, yea, and you take in as good part the homely phrase of mine host, Heeres to you, as if one saluted you by all the titles of your baronie. These considerations, I saie, which the world suffers to slippe by in the channell of carelesnes, have moved me in ardent zeale of your welfare to forewarne you of some dangers that have beset you & your barrels. At the name of dangers hee start up, and bounst with his fist on the boord so hard, that his Tapster overhearing him, cried : Anone anone sir, by and by, and came and made a low leg and askt him what he lackt. Hee was readie to have striken his Tapster for interrupting him in attention of this his so much desired relation, but for feare of displeasing me he moderated his furie, and onely sending him for the other fresh pint, wild him looke to the barre, and come when he is cald with a devilles name. Well, at his earnest importunitie, after I had moistned my lips, to make my lie runne glib to his journeyes end, forward I went as followeth. It chaunced me the other night, amongst other pages, to attend where the king with his Lords and many chiefe leaders sate in council, there amongst sundrie serious matters that were debated, and intelligences from the enemy given up, it was privily informed (no villains to these privie informers) that you, even you that I now speak to, had (O would I had no tongue to tell the rest, by this drink it grieves me so I am not able to repeate it). Nowe was my drunken Lord redie to hang himself for the end of the ful point, and over my necke he throws himselfe verie lubberly, and intreated me as I was a proper young Gentleman, and ever lookt for pleasure at his hands, soone to rid him out of this hell of suspense, & resolve him of the rest ; then fell hee on his knees, wrong his handes, and I thinke, on my conscience, wept out all the syder that he had dronke in a weeke before, to move me to have pitie on him ; he rose and put his rustie ring on my finger, gave me his greasie purse with that single money that was in it, promised to make mee his heire, & a thousand more favours, if I would expire the miserie of his unspeakable tormenting uncertaintie. I being by nature inclined to Mercie (for indeed I knew two or three good wenches of that name) bad him harden his eares, & not make his eyes abortive before their time, and he should have the inside of my brest turnd outward, heare such a tale as would tempt the utmost strength of life to attend it, and not die in the midst of it. Why (quoth I) my selfe, that am but a poore childish welwiller of yours, with the verie thought, that a man of your desert and state, by a number of pesants and varlets should be so iniuriously abused in hugger mugger, have [immoderately and lavishly wept]. . . . The wheeler under our Citie bridge carries not so much water over the city, as my braine hath welled forth gushing streames of sorow. . . . My eies have bin dronk, outrageously dronke, with giving but ordinary entercourse through their sea-circled Islands to my distilling dreariment.

It is buzzed in the kings head that you are a secret friend to the enemy, & under pretence of getting a license to furnish the campe with syder and such like provant [provender], you have furnisht the enemy, and in emptie barrells sent letters of discoverie, and corne innumerable.

I might well have left here, for by this time his white liver had mixt it selfe with the white of his eie, & both were turned upwardes, as if they had offered themselves a fayre white for death to shoote at. The troth was, I was verie loth mine hoste and I should parte to heaven with dry lips, wherefore the best meanes that I could imagine to wake him out of his traunce, was to crie loude in his eare, Hough host, whats to pay, will no man looke to the reckning heere? and in plaine veritie, it tooke expected effect, for with the noise he started and bustled, like a man that had beene scared with fyre out of his sleepe, and ranne hastily to his Tapster, and all to be-laboured him about the eares, for letting gentlemen call so long and not looke into them.

Oh, quoth he, I am bought and solde for doing my Country such good service as I have done. They are afraid of mee, because my good deedes have brought me into such estimation with the communalty, I see, I see it is not for the lambe to live with the wolfe. . . .

Answer me, quoth he, my wise young Wilton, is it true that I am thus underhand, dead, and buried by these bad tongues?

Nay, quoth I, you shall pardon me, for I have spoken too much alreadie, no definitive sentence of death shall march out of my wel meaning lips, they have but lately suckt milke, and shall they so sodainly change theyr food and seeke after bloud?

Oh but, quoth he, a mans friend is his friend. Fill the other pint Tapster. What sayd the king, did hee beleve it when hee heard it? I pray thee say, I sweare to thee by my nobility, none in the worlde shall ever be made privie, that I received anie light of thic matter from thee.

That firme affiance, quoth I, had I in you before, or else I would never have gone so farre over the shooes, to plucke you out of the mire. Not to make many wordes (since you will needs know) the king saies flatly, you are a miser & a snudge, and he never hopt better of you. Nay then (quoth he) questionlesse some planet that loves not syder hath conspired against me. Moreover, which is worse, the king hath vowed to give Turwin one hot breakfast, onely with the bungs that hee will plucke out of your barrells. I cannot staie at this time to reporte each circumstance that passed, but the only counsell that my long cherished kinde inclination can possibly contrive, is now in your olde daies to be liberall, such victuals or provisions as you have, presently distribute it frankly amongst poore souldiers ; I would let them burst their bellies with syder, and bathe in it, before I would runne into my Princes ill opinion for a whole sea of it. The hunter pursuing the beaver for his stones, hee bites them off, and leaves them behinde for him to gather up, whereby he lives quiet. If greedie hunters and hungry tel-tales pursue you, it is for a little pelfe which you have ; cast it behind you, neglect it, let them have it, lest it breed a further inconvenience. Credit my advice, you shall finde it prophetically, and thus I have discharged the parte of a poore friend. With some few like phrases of ceremonie, Your honors suppliant, & so forth, and Farewel my good youth, I thanke thee and will remember thee, we parted.

But the next daie I thinke we had a dole of syder, syder in boules, in scuppets, in helmets, & to conclude, if a man would have fild his bootes full, there hee might have had it, provant thrust it selfe into poore souldiers pockets whether they would or no. We made five peals of shot into the towne together, of nothing but spiggots and faussets of discarded emptie barrels : everie underfoote soildior had a distenanted tunne, as Diogenes had his tub to sleepe in ; I my selfe got as many confiscated Tapsters aprons as made me a Tent, as bigge as any ordinarie commanders in the field. But in conclusion, my welbeloved Baron of double beere got him humbly on his marybones to the king, and complained hee was olde and stricken in yeres, and had nere an heire to cast at a dogge, wherefore if it might please his majesty to take his lands into his hands, and allowe him some reasonable pension to live on, hee shoulde be mervailous wel pleased : as for the warres, he was wearie of them, and yet as long as highnes shoulde venture his owne person, hee would not flinch a foot, but make his withered bodie a buckler, to beare off anie blow that should be advanced agaynst him.

The king mervailing at this strange alteration of his great marchant of syder (for so hee woulde often pleasantly tearme him), with a little further talke bolted out the whole complotment. Then was I pittifully whipt for my holy day lie, although they made themselves merrie with it many a faire winters evening after.

The page finds his way to France, where there is war with the Switzers ; to Munster, where Jack of Leyden and the Anabaptists are annihilated ; and to Italy, where he moves in an atmosphere of poison, arson, intrigue, assassination, torture, execution by roasting and breaking on the wheel, and all manner of crimes of violence, and leads a quite unedifying life. In search of a runaway mistress, he runs into a Jew's shop, by whom he is arrested, and—in accordance with Roman law, we are told—is sold to another Jew, a doctor, to be anatomised at leisure ; and the destined victim of this Burke-and-Hare adventure describes at length his sensations in the anticipation of a death from which he is rescued by the cunning of an amorous Roman lady of the papal court. The story is very loosely put together, and is not wholly a picaresque novel. The episode of the Earl of Surrey and the fair Geraldine is sheer euphuistic romance (see page 159); there are passages where this odd defender of the Church of England reviles Calvinists and Scots in the style of the anti-Puritan pamphlets. And there is an enthusiastic panegyric of Aretino, who is thus apostrophised: 'Aretino, as long as the world lives thou shalt live. Tully, Virgil, Ovid, Seneca were never such ornaments to Italy as thou hast been!' Throughout, the victims of crime utter at the crisis of their fate elaborate, overstrained, incredible, and unrealistic speeches.

The story, so interesting in the history of English literature, was in its time so little of a success that Nash never tried this kind of fiction again. His last important piece was Lenten Stuffle (1599), in praise of red herrings and of Yarmouth, where he had been well received. He died in 1601.

See McKerrow's Complete Works of Thomas Nashe, with memoir, in 5 vols. (Bullen, 1904-10); also Grosart's edition in the Huth Library (6 vols. 1883-85); Pierce Penniless (Shakespeare Soc. 1842; Bodley Head Quartos, 1925); Gosse's introduction to The Unfortunate Traveller (1892); Jusserand, The English Novel in the Time of Shakespeare (trans. 1890); and D'Israeli's Calamities of Authors.

Gabriel Harvey (c. 1545 or 1550-1630) was the son of a ropemaker at Saffron Walden—a fact dwelt on in various offensive ways by Greene and Nash in a long and bitter controversy between them and Harvey. He studied at Cambridge, became a fellow of Pembroke Hall, and subsequently held various posts at Trinity Hall, his election to the Mastership being set aside by a royal mandate. From his undergraduate days a distinguished student, he became a fanatical and pedantic classicist, and sought to conform even English verse to Latin metre; he boasts himself to be the inventor of English hexameters. Spenser's intimate friend—addressed in The Shepherd's Calendar as 'Hobbinol'—he persuaded the author of the Faerie Queene for a time to forbear rhyme in his poetry. He was vain, arrogant, cross-grained, and censorious, and a large part of his life was occupied with his controversies, especially that named above. Greene resented Harvey's criticisms; Harvey replied, and after Greene's death published all the unpleasant gossip he could find (Four Letters, 1592; repr. 1923). This brought Greene's friend Nash into the feud. Nash's power of invective ultimately silenced Harvey, who spent his last years in his native town. He printed Latin orations and treatises on rhetoric, letters, &c.; and his English works, including the letters to and from Spenser, poor sonnets, and numerous pamphlets, fill 3 volumes (ed. by Grosart, 1884-85). See monographs by H. Beril (Zür., 1913); G. Harman (1923).

Martin Marprelate was the nom de guerre of a series of Puritan pamphleteers who bitterly attacked with trenchant historical argument and savage personal lampoons Episcopacy, the rites and doctrines disapproved by Puritans, and the official and non-official defenders of the Church. Some of the replies were serious; but some of the self-constituted defenders of the Church out-Martined Martin in Billingsgate, buffoonery, and scurrility. From 1572 there had been keen controversy between the two parties in the Church, of whom Cartwright and Whitgift were the most conspicuous early champions, and Hooker's Ecclesiastical Polity was the chief reply on the part of the Church. But the form the controversy took in the Marprelate pamphlets—numbering between twenty and thirty—must have vexed and revolted all pious and reverent minds in every party. The authorship of the several pamphlets, usually anonymous or pseudonymous, remains more or less debatable. The chief authors on the Puritan side were apparently John Udall (see page 155), who died in prison; Henry Barrow, a barrister (executed); John Penry, a Welsh clergyman (executed); and Job Throckmorton, a well-to-do country gentleman, in whose house many of the tracts were printed, even if he did not himself write part of them. Perhaps the most notable publication on this side was that called Hay [Have ye] any work for Cooper? named from a London street-cry. The serious Admonition on behalf of the Church issued in his own name by Cooper (Bishop then of Lincoln, afterwards of Winchester) in 1589 should hardly be accounted one of the series, though it fell in the very midst of the controversy, at its height in 1588, 1589, and 1590. Amongst volunteers on the Episcopal side were Lyly and Nash; and the style of their handiwork may be seen from the extract at page 316 from Lyly's Pap with a Hatchett.

Richard Stanyhurst (1547-1618), one of Holinshed's collaborators, was by Gabriel Harvey praised as his own aptest scholar, in virtue of his rendering (1582) of the first four books of the Aeneid into English hexameters, on Harvey's pedantic principles. But few save Harvey's set thought Stanyhurst an improvement on Phaer (see page 265): Nash and other contemporary critics had too ample reason for ridiculing and parodying this preposterous achievement, which is not merely awkward, uncouth, and lumbering, but prosaic, and here and there grotesquely inept, and adorned with many monstrous word-forms invented for the occasion. He also translated some of the Psalms into classical metres, with equal unsuccess. Yet Stanyhurst, who was born in Dublin and educated at Oxford, was a really learned man, who wrote much on Irish history, produced a profound Latin commentary on Porphyry, the Neoplatonic mystic, and left some Latin dictional works. He was a devout Catholic, and in 1580 settled on the Continent. He took holy orders and died a priest at Brussels.

A short specimen of Stanyhurst's Virgil his Aeneis (the beginning of Book ii.) will justify his most uncomplimentary critics:

With tentative listning eache wight was setled in harchning :

Thus father Æneas chronicled from loftie bed hautie.
You bid me, O Princesse, to scarrifie a festered old soare.
How that the Trojans wear prest by Grecian armie.
Whose fatal miserie my sight hath witnessed haine :
In which sharp bickring my self, as partie, remained.
What ruter of Dolopans weare so cruel harted in harchkning,
What curst Myrmidones, what karne of canckred Ulysses,
What void of al weeping could eare so mortal an hazard ?
And now with moisture the night from welkin is hastning :
And stars too slumber dooe stur mens natural humours.
How be it (Princely Regent) if that thy affection earnest
Thy mind enflameth too learne our fatal adventures,
Thee toyls of Trojans, and last infortunat affray :
Though my queazy stomach that bloodie recital abhorreth,
And tears with trilling shall baine my phisnomie deeply :
Yet thine hoat affected desire shall gain the rehersal.

A little violence in misplacing accents makes the lines scan as hideous hexameters. And if readers have difficulty in following the English, the easiest interpretation will be got by looking up the original Latin! But it may be hinted that ruter is Dutch ruiter, (Ger. reiter, ritter), a horse-soldier; karne is kerne, an (Irish) foot-soldier; baine, the French baigner, bathe; and that the doubling of the e in thee for the, o in too for to, &c., is to mark quantity.

Thomas Deloney (c. 1550–1600), silk-weaver, has been credited with 'The Blind Beggar of Bednall Green' and other popular ballads, and, after three centuries of neglect, was restored to his true place in the history of the English novel. His stories were written in his closing years in honour of the cordwainers and weavers. The Gentle Craft, sparkling with Merry England scenes, inspired Dekker's Shoemaker's Holiday. F. O. Mann edited his works (1912). See a study by Chevalley (Paris, 1926).

Captain Barnabe Rich (c. 1540–c. 1620), soldier and romance-writer, was of good Essex stock, served in the Low Country wars, and from 1573 spent most of his life in Ireland, latterly in a government post. In his romances he was inspired by Lyly's Euphues; but one of them, The Straunge and Wonderfull Adventures of Don Simonides, a Gentilman Spaniard, has claims to rank as the earliest of modern romances (see above, page 238). From another Shakespeare undoubtedly took the plot of Twelfth Night. He wrote also largely on the distressful condition of his adopted country, denounced the rebellious spirit of the Irish, popery, tobacco-smoking, and feminine extravagance. His verses are very poor; and the translations from Herodotus ascribed to him is by another hand.—Reginald Scot (c. 1538–99), a Kentish man who studied at Oxford, deserves remembrance for his bold impeachment of the witchcraft superstition in his Discoverie of Witchcraft (1584).

George Whetstone (1542–87) produced in 1578 the play of Promos and Cassandra, on which Shakespeare founded his Measure for Measure. He rioted a while at court, served in the Low Countries, engaged in Sir Humphrey Gilbert's unsuccessful expedition to Newfoundland (1578–79), and fought at the battle of Zutphen, where Sir Philip Sidney got his death-wound (1586). He contended for a kind of play intermediate between the monotonous, classical Senecan type and the absurd kind beloved of the vulgar, full of extravagances and impossibilities; see his criticism of the early Elizabethan dramatists above at page 240. His Promos and Cassandra was a translation, with pieces of poetry interspersed, of one of the Hecatomithi of the Italian, Giraldo Cinthio.

Thomas Hughes, who wrote nearly the whole of The Misfortunes of Arthur (1588), also followed Senecan models. He was a Cheshire man, who passed from Cambridge to Gray's Inn.

Anthony Munday (1553–1633), the son of a London draper, was a pamphleteer, translator, chivalry romancer, playwright, balladmaker, and poet; as also actor, stationer, and spy on the English Catholics at Rome. In 1579 he was reproving sin in the Mirror of Mutabilitie, partly in rhyme, partly in blank verse. He was concerned in nearly a score of plays. Francis Meres, in 1598, calls him the 'best plotter' among the writers for the stage; but he rarely showed originality, and as a rule his style is rather poor, both in prose and verse. His extant plays are Fidele and Fortunio (1584; discovered and reprinted, 1909), a modification of an Italian romantic comedy, which may have influenced Shakespeare; John a Kent (1595), based on an old humorous ballad; (with others) Sir John Oldcastle (1600); The Downfall and its sequel (with Chettle) The Death of Robert Earle of Huntington, afterward called Robin Hood of Merrie Sherwodde (1598). Robin thus addresses Much, the clown, and Marian:

Wind once more, jolly huntsmen, all your horns,
Whose shrill sound, with the echoing woods' assist,
Shall ring a sad knell for the fearful deer,
Before our feathered shafts, death's winged darts,
Bring sudden summons for their fatal ends. . . .
Give me thy hand : now God's curse on me light,
If I forsake not grief in grief's despite.
Much, make a cry, and yeomen, stand ye round :
I charge ye, never more let woful sound
Be heard among ye ; but whatever fall,
Laugh grief to scorn, and so make sorrow small. . . .
Marian, thou seest, though courtly pleasures want,
Yet country sport in Sherwood is not scant.
For the soul-ravishing delicious sound
Of instrumental music, we have found
The winged quiristers, with divers notes,
Sent from their quaint recording pretty throats,
On every branch that compasseth our bower,
Without command contenting us each hour.
For arras hangings and rich tapestry,
We have sweet nature's best embroidery.
For thy steel glass, wherein thou wont'st to look,
Thy crystal eyes gaze in a crystal brook.
At court a flower or two did deck thy head,
Now with whole garlands it is circled ;
For what in wealth we want, we have in flowers,
And what we lose in halls, we find in bowers.

Besides translating nine romances (Palladio of England, Amadis de Gaulle, &c.), Munday wrote seven pageants, and produced twenty-four miscellaneous pieces—such as The Defence of Poverty and The Paine of Pleasure. He revised Stow's Survey of London (1618). Miss Byrne edited his John a Kent (Malone Soc. 1923).

Henry Chettle (1565–1607) was a pamphleteer and dramatist who edited Greene's Groats-worth of Wit (1592; see page 327), wrote thirteen plays of considerable merit (of which only The Tragedy of Hoffman is extant; reprinted 1852, 1894), and was part-author (with Dekker, Ben Jonson, Day, Webster, &c.) of thirty-five others, including Robin Hood (or The Death of Robert Earle of Huntington, in collaboration with Munday), Patient Grissill, The Blind Beggar of Bednal Green, and June Shore (see a study by Dugdale Sykes in Notes and Queries, April–May, 1923). Patient Grissill, apparently by Chettle, Dekker, and Haughton, is based on an English prose version of Boccaccio's story, and on a ballad founded on that; but there are marked alterations and great additions for dramatic effect. Many of the characters are Welsh. Besides the ordeal to which Grissill is subjected, there is a subordinate experiment (unsuccessful) by Sir Owen to subdue the spirit of Gwenthian. It has been argued that both plots, as well as the phrase, 'To tame a shrew,' which occurs four times in this piece, may have influenced Shakespeare in his Taming of the Shrew; though, on the other hand, Shakespeare may have been first in the field—the dates of both plays are doubtful; and the too plentiful Welsh-English jargon in Patient Grissill, as well as single phrases like 'pribles and prables,' would, if we knew Grissill to be the earlier play, almost prove that it had helped to mould the talk of Sir Hugh Evans in The Merry Wives of Windsor.

The marquis-lover thus describes the perfections of Grissill, the poor basketmaker's daughter:

See where my Grissill and her father is;
 Me thinkes her beautie, shining through those weedes,
 Seemes like a bright starre in the sullen night.
 How lovely povertie dwels on her backe!
 Did but the proud world note her as I doe,
 She would cast off rich robes, forswear rich state,
 To clothe them in such poore abiliments.

And later he complacently records the result of his experiments thus:

I tried my Grissills patience when twas greene,
 Like a young osier, and I moulded it
 Like waxe to all impressions. Married men
 That long to tame their wives must curbe them in,
 Before they need a bridle; then they'll prove
 All Grissills, full of patience, full of love.

His picaresque novel, Pierce Plainnes Seaven Yeres Prentiship (1595), came but a year after Nash's Jack Wilton.

Anonymous Plays.—From the diary of Philip Henslowe (d. 1616) it appears that between 1591 and 1597 upwards of a hundred different plays were performed by four of the ten or eleven theatrical companies which then existed. Henslowe, successively a dyer, money-lender, pawnbroker (who advanced money and dresses to the players), and owner of house property, had much to do with the building and management of theatres. Chapman, Drayton, Dekker, and other well-known dramatists had works of theirs produced under his management, but not Shakespeare, who was mainly connected with other management. Most of the plays named by him are lost; but several good dramas of this golden age have descended to us, the authors of which are unknown or only guessed at. Several there were, without authority, attributed to Shakespeare; a few possess merit enough to have by serious critics been considered first sketches by Shakespeare. Most of them were republished in Dodsley's Old Plays. Among the most notable are The Merry Devil of Edmonton, The London Prodigal, A Yorkshire Tragedy, Lord Cromwell, The Birth of Merlin, The Puritan or The Widow of Walling-Street, Mucedorus, Locrine, Arden of Feversham, Sir Thomas More, Edward III., The Two Noble Kinsmen. All the above are included among the fourteen plays collected in The Shakespeare Apocrypha (1908), edited by C. F. T. Brooke. Edward III. has scenes in which versification and dialogue are wonderfully Shakespearian: in the Noble Kinsmen Sir Sidney Lee thought he saw frequent and unmistakable signs of Shakespearian work. The original manuscript of Sir Thomas More, a scholarly biographical chronicle play, has scenes written in what some experts claim to be Shakespeare's handwriting. Of the comedies the Merry Devil of Edmonton is the best. Hazlitt thought it was 'assuredly not unworthy of Shakespeare' (though the 'Merry Devil,' a magician called Fabell, has no real share in the plot); and Charles Lamb thought it 'written to make the reader happy.' The Birth of Merlin is probably an old play worked up by Rowley, possibly with help from Middleton.

Arden of Feversham (printed 1592), perhaps the earliest and certainly the best of a series of domestic tragedies or murder-plays, is founded on the story, told at length by Holinshed, of a murder which took place in 1551. Alice, the unfaithful wife of Arden, a Kentish gentleman, joined with her paramour Mosbie and two assassins in murdering her husband. Alice was a step-daughter of Sir Edward North, father of the translator; Mosbie, a tailor by trade, was a servant of Lord North. In 1770 a local Faversham editor of the plays argued strongly that it was Shakespeare's. Tieck translated it into German as a genuine production of Shakespeare. Swinburne inclined to the belief that it was the work of Shakespeare's youth; and A. H. Bullen (who edited Arden in 1887) thought Shakespeare might have revised and improved an older version into this shape (adding single lines and longer passages in the extract given below). Crawford and others hold that the play is Kyd's. Symonds, like Swinburne, valued Arden highly. We subjoin one touching scene between Alice and her paramour—a scene of mutual recrimination, guilt, and tenderness:

Mosbie. How now, Alice? What, sad and passionat?
 Make me partaker of thy pensiveness:
 Fyre divided burnes with lesser force.

Alice. But I will damme that fire within my brest,
Till by the force thereof my part consume,
Ah Mosbie!

Mos. Such deep pathaires like to a Cannons burst,
Discharg'd against a ruinated wall,
Breake my relenting heart in thousand pieces.
Ungentle Alice, thy sorrow is my sore,
Thou knowst it wel, and tis thy pollicie
To forge distressfull lookes to wound a brest
Where lies a heart that dies when thou art sad.
It is not love, that loves to anger love.

Al. It is not love, that loves to murther love.

Mos. How meane you that?

Al. Thou knowest how dearly Arden loved me.

Mos. And then?

Al. And then—conceale the rest, for tis too bad,
Lest that my words be carried with the wind,
And publish in the world to both our shames.
I pray thee, Mosbie, let our Spring-time wither,
Our harvest else will yeeld but lothsome weedes.
Forget I pray thee what hath past betwixt us,
For now I blushe, and tremble at the thoughts.

Mos. What, are you chang'd?

Al. Ay, to my former happy life againe:
From tytle of an odious strumpets name,
To honest Ardens wife, not Ardens honest wife.
Ha! Mosbie, tis thou hast rifled me of that,
And made me slaundersous to all my kin:
Even in my forehead is thy name ingraven,
A meane artificer, that low-borne name.
I was bewitched, woe worth the haples howre,
And all the causes that enchanted me.

Mos. Nay, if thou ban, let me breathe curses forth,
And if you stand so nicely at your fame,
Let me repent the credit I have lost.
I have neglected matters of import,
That would have stated me above thy state:
Forslowde advantages, and spurn'd at time.
Ay, fortune's right hand Mosbie hath forsooke,
To take a wanton giglote by the left.
I left the mariage of an honest maid,
Whose dowry would have weyed down all thy wealth,
Whose beauty and demeanor farre exceeded thee.
This certain good I lost for changing bad,
And wrapt my credit in thy company.
I was bewitcht, that is no theame of thine,
And thou unhallowed hast enchanted me:
But I will breake thy spells and exorcismes,
And put another sight upon these eyes,
That shewed my hart a raven for a dove.
Thou art not faire, I view'd thee not till now,
Thou art not kinde, till now I knew thee not.
And now the raine hath beaten off thy gilt,
Thy worthles copper shoves thee counterfet.
It grieves me not to see how foull thou art,
But maddes me that I ever thought thee faire.
Go get thee gone, a copsemate for thy hyndes, companion
I am too good to be thy favourite.

Al. Ay, now I see, and too soone find it trew,
Which often hath beene tould me by my freends,
That Mosbie loves me not, but for my wealth,
Which, too incredulous, I nere beleaved.
Nay, heare me speake, Mosbie, a word or two,
I'll byte my tongue if it speake bitterly:
Looke on me, Mosbie, or I'll kill myselfe,
Nothing shall hide me from thy stormy looke:

If thou cry warre, there is no peace for me,
I will do penance for offending thee,
And burne this prayer booke, which I here use,
The holy word that had converted me.
See, Mosbie, I will teare away the leaves,
And all the leaves, and in this golden cover,
Shall thy sweete phrases and thy letters dwell,
And thereon will I chiefly meditate,
And hould no other sect but such devotion.
Wilt not thou looke? is all thy love o'erwhelm'd?
Wilt thou not heare? what malice stops thine ears?
Why speaks thou not? what silence ties thy tongue?
Thou hast bene sighted as the eagle is,
And hearde as quickly as the fearefull hare,
And spoke as smoothly as an orator,
When I have bid thee heare, or see, or speak—
And art thou sensible in none of these?
Waigh all my good turns, with this little fault,
And I deserve not Mosbie's muddy lookes.
A fence of trouble is not thickned still;
Be cleare again, I'll nere more trouble thee.

Mos. O no, I am a base artificer,
My winges are feathered for a lowly flight.
Mosbie, fye no, not for a thousand pound.
Make love to you, why 'tis unpardonable,
We beggers must not breathe where gentiles are.

Al. Swete Mosbie is as gentle as a king,
And I too blinde to judge him otherwise.
Flowres do some times spring in fallow lands,
And Weedes in gardens, Roses grow on thornes.
So what so ere my Mosbie's father was,
Himself is valued gentle by his worth.

Mos. Ah, how you women can insinuate,
And cleare a trespasse with your sweete set tongue!
I will forget this quarrel, gentle Ales,
Provided I'll be tempted so no more.

The word 'pathaires' is a crux. Some assume it to be a form of petarre or petard; others take 'deep pathaires' as a misprint for 'deep-set aires,' deep-fetched breaths, or as a misreading of the crabbed MS. of 'deep suspires.'

The Yorkshire Tragedy, another domestic tragedy or murder-play, coarser and cruder, was—impudently—printed with Shakespeare's name in 1608, and included in the 1664 folio. Schlegel, Dyce, and Collier thought they recognised passages which only Shakespeare could have written. Bullen held that it stands apart from the other murder-plays and has nothing in common with them: 'A storm of frenzy sweeps over the stage, and we see a maniac raging furiously, and shudder as the victims fall before his violence. The ravings of Bedlam are mellow music to the murderer's curses in the Yorkshire Tragedy.' The play, based on Stow, turns on the actual murder of his two children and the attempted murder of his wife by Walter Calverley, a Yorkshire squire, who was pressed to death for the crime in 1605. This despairing utterance by the unhappy wife gives a powerful picture of a luckless, reckless gambler:

What will become of us? All will away:
My husband never ceases in expense,
Both to consume his credit and his house;
And 'tis set down by Heaven's just decree,

That Riot's child must needs be Beggary.
 Are these the virtues that his youth did promise?
 Dice and voluptuous meetings, midnight revels,
 Taking his bed with surfeits, ill beseming
 The ancient honour of his house and name?
 And this not all, but that which kills me most—
 When he recounts his losses and false fortunes,
 The weakness of his state so much dejected,
 Not as a man repentant, but half mad
 His fortunes cannot answer his expense,
 He sits and sullenly locks up his arms;
 Forgetting Heaven, looks downward, which makes him
 Appear so dreadful, that he frights my heart:
 Walks heavily, as if his soul were earth;
 Not penitent for those his sins are past,
 But vexed his money cannot make them last.
 A fearful melancholy, ungodly sorrow!

On Arden of Feversham and the Yorkshire Tragedy, see the chapter on 'Domestic Tragedy' in J. A. Symonds's Shakespeare's Predecessors (1884), and Mr A. H. Bullen's introduction to his edition of Arden (1887). The first extract is given from the old text, the second from the modernised version, edited by Collier, with the punctuation altered.

William Warner, born apparently in Yorkshire about 1558, studied at Oxford and became an attorney of the Common Pleas, but from 1585 was known as an author, and died in 1609. He published a series of prose tales called Pan his Syrinx in 1585; he translated from Plautus; and in 1586 came before the public with his famous Albion's England, a kind of rhyming history with interludes and disquisitions; but the history is not exactly history, and the poetry very seldom what it nevertheless seems to have been taken for, though here and there are pithy lines and phrases and episodes well thought out. The work, written in long couplets of fourteen-syllable lines, is managed with some dexterity, but on the whole is shambling, tedious, and monotonous. Yet, though prohibited at first—on the ground of the indelicacy of certain passages, it is said—it was wonderfully well received; quite surprisingly so, since by the time it appeared Sir Philip Sidney's work was done (though not published), the Faerie Queene was being written, and Shakespeare was at work in London. Meres, one of the most often quoted of contemporary critics, expressly says Spenser and Warner 'be our chief heroical makers,' and tells us the best wits of Oxford and Cambridge call Warner our 'English Homer,' and compare him with Euripides! Nash felt confident that Warner had 'in no whit disparaged' English poetry. Before 1612 there had been six editions of Albion's England, every new issue having additions bringing the work down to date, or introducing foreign matters; so that, whereas the first edition had but four books, the sixth had sixteen. The dedication explains the name of the work and its scope: 'This our whole Iland, anciently called Brutaine, but more anciently Albion, presently containing two Kingdomes, England and Scotland, is cause (right Honourable) that to distinguish the former, whose onely occurrents I abridge from our Historie, I entitle this my book Albion's

England.' It begins, nevertheless, with the division of the world after the Flood, takes in some classical mythology, and so reaches the fabulous history of Geoffrey of Monmouth and Brute (whence the spelling Brutaine), the grandson of Æneas and founder of the British monarchy. Arbitrary and elliptical selections from actual history appear from the fifth book on, with curious episodes. Thus Curan, a Dansk prince, falls in love with Argentile, a princess of Northumberland, dispossessed by a cruel uncle; turns 'kitchin drudge' that he may woo her, but is rejected; loses sight of her when she flees from court, and, becoming a shepherd, makes love to her (successfully) under the impression that he is making suit to a 'countrie wench.' The story, given as part of the history of Northumbria, occupies five out of the twenty pages devoted to the whole history of the Heptarchy and of the Anglo-Saxon kings of England. It seems impossible to believe that Warner is not here giving a réchauffé of some version of the old English poem Havelok the Dane (see page 44). The cruel uncle, the Danish prince who becomes a kitchen drudge, and other elements—even the parallel between Argentile and Goldburgh, though Curan rather suggests Horn—seem to put out of court Sir Sidney Lee's belief that the coincidence is accidental. This episode has been specially praised and reprinted or imitated. William Webster plagiarised it in 1617; it was used for the plot of a play attributed to John Webster and Rowley, and for another by William Mason; it was made into a ballad; and it was included by Percy in his Reliques, as was also the episode of 'the Patient Countess.' In Warner's account of the reign of Henry VII., the unfortunate daughter of the Earl of Huntly who was married to Perkin Warbeck is permitted to tell, to the length of six pages, the sad tale how a Scottish knight became distraught through his wife's disloyalty, and to record the distraught conversation of the poor man. Hereon follow the loves, jealousies, and feuds of the Owl, the Cuckoo, the Swallow, and the Bat, with arguments between them and adventures that to them befell. This again is so foreign to Warner's native turn of mind that it seems he was working up relics of some old allegorical poem of the Owl and Nightingale type. There is a good deal about the King of Spain and the Pope, the Inquisition, and the Civil Wars in France; the adventures of Sir John Mandeville fill a long series of chapters; and the first part of the work winds up with a disquisition against atheists, and a summary of physics, ethics, and natural theology. The Continuance of 1606 wandered away from England to the Picts and Scots, Macbeth and Fleance, and to the history of Wales, but returns to contemporary English history in the Gunpowder Plot. Occasional 'merrie jestes' are of unconventional broadness. Warner sometimes introduces a story in the words of a northerner, and wields the Yorkshire dialect with good effect. The story of the execution of Mary Queen of Scots (in the first part) has interest as being practically a contemporary account. Thomas Campbell called this extraordinary pot-pourri 'an enormous ballad.' Of its critics Charles Lamb is the most generous; he read Albion 'with great pleasure, largely for the skill shown in overcoming the difficulties of alliteration and versification.'

The following is from Curan's love-suit:

The Plowmans labour hath no end and he a Churle

If euer one ill-liu'd did dye a Papist God-wards bent,
Then happie she. But so or not, it happie is for vs
That of so dangerous a Foe we are deliuer'd thus.

Robert Southwell, Jesuit martyr and poet, was born at Horsham St. Faith's, near Norwich; about 1561, his father's family being still represented by Lord Southwell, while his maternal grandmother was a Shelley of the house whence the poet sprang. He was educated at Douay, at Paris, at Tournay, and at Rome, being received into the Society of Jesus as one of the 'children' in 1578, and took the vows of a scholastic in 1580. He distinguished himself so highly in philosophy and theology as to be appointed prefect of the English College. He was ordained priest in 1584, and two years later, arriving in England with Garnet, was sheltered by Lord Vaux, and became chaplain to the Countess of Arundel, whose husband was an imprisoned Catholic. The savage laws of 1584 declared it treason for any native-born subject of the queen who had been ordained a Roman Catholic priest since her accession to reside in England forty days, the penalty being death and disembowelment. For six years he ministered secretly but zealously to the scattered adherents of his creed; meanwhile he wrote his Consolation for Catholics and most of his poems. In 1592 he was betrayed, and imprisoned at Westminster and in the Tower. After three years' captivity, and after having been agonisingly tortured no less than thirteen times without betraying any of his fellow-labourers, he was put on trial; the inevitable sentence followed, and on 21st February 1595 he suffered bravely at Tyburn, frankly declaring himself, as he had done throughout, 'a priest of the Catholic and Roman Church, and of the Society of Jesus.' His longest poem is St Peter's Complaint; his most famous, The Burning Babe, a singular piece of spiritualised fancy, of which Ben Jonson said to Drummond of Hawthornden, that 'if he had written that piece, he would have been content to burn many of his own poems.' St Peter's Complaint, Mazonia, and a third volume of verse all appeared after Southwell's death, and were repeatedly reprinted, but spite of Ben Jonson's praise fell into almost complete oblivion. Father Thurston, in 1905, found an Italian source for St Peter's Complaint in Luigi Tanzillo's Le Lagrime di San Pietro, of which Southwell began a draft translation. Opinion is divided as to Southwell's merits: Sewell, the harshest of his critics, said St Peter's Complaint was a 'drawl' of thirty pages of 'maudlin repentance in which the distinctions between the north and north-east sides of a sentimentality are worthy of Duns Scotus.' Archbishop Trench and Dr George Macdonald gave him high praise; though everybody must admit that many of his conceits are extravagant, his hunt after alliteration and antithesis strained. His wording is often odd and at times grotesque—'Day full of dumps' sounds far from solemn. But many of his images are striking, and many of his lines terse and impressive; while, in spite of oversentimentality, the devotional feeling is sincere and the utterance genuinely poetic. His prose papers, some six in number, are of less interest. As a poet he expressly designed to show that virtue and piety were as suitable subjects for poetry as worldly ambitions and sensual joys. He was at pains to write, in contrast to Dyer's 'Fancy' dealing with the torments of love, a more edifying Dyer's Phancy turned to a Sinner's Complainte.

The Image of Death.

Before my face the picture hangs,
That daily should put me in mind
Of those cold names and bitter pangs
That shortly I am like to find;
But yet, alas! full little I
Do thinke hereon, that I must die.
I often looke upon a face
Most vgly, grisly, bare, and thinne;
I often view the hollow place
Where eyes and nose had sometime bin;
I see the bones acrossed that lie,
Yet little think that I must die.
I read the labell vnderneath,
That telleth me whereto I must;
I see the sentence eake that saith,
'Remember, man, that thou art dust.'
But yet, alas! but seldome I
Doe thinke indeede that I must die.
Continually at my bed's head
A hearse doth hang, which doth me tel
That I ere morning may be dead,
Though now I feele my selfe ful well;
But yet, alas! for all this, I
Haue little minde that I must die.
The gowne which I do vse to weare,
The knife wherewith I cut my meate;
And eke that old and ancient chair,
Which is my onely vsuall seat:
All these do tel me I must die,
And yet my life amend not I.

My ancestors are turnd to clay,
And many of my mates are gone;
My yongers daily drop away,
And can I thinke to 'scape alone?
No, no; I know that I must die,
And yet my life amend not I. . . .
If none can 'scape Death's dreadfull dart;
If rich and poore his becke obey;
If strong, if wise, if all do smart,
Then I to 'scape shall haue no way:
Then grant me grace, O God! that I
My life may mend, sith I must die.

The Burning Babe.

As I in hoary Winter's night
Stood shivering in the snowe,
Surpris'd I was with sodayne heat,
Which made my hart to glow;
And liftinge upp a fearefull eye
To vewe what fire was nere,
A pretty Babe all burninge bright,
Did in the ayre appeare;
Who, scorched with excessive heate,
Such floodes of teares did shedd,
As though His floodes should quench His flames,
Which with His teares were fedd.
'Alas!' quoth He, 'but newly borne,
In fiery heates I frye,
Yet none approach to warm their hartes
Or feele my fire, but I;
My faultles brest the fornace is,
The fuell, woundinge thornes;
Love is the fire, and sighes the smoke.
The ashes, shames and scornes;
The fuell Justice layeth on,
And Mercy blowes the coales,
The metall in this fornace wrought
Are men's defiled soules;
For which, as nowe on fire I am,
To worke them to their good,
So will I melt into a bath,
To washe them in my bloode.'
With this He vanisht out of sight,
And swiftly shroncke awaye,
And straight I called unto mynde
That it was Christmas-daye.

Tymes goe by Turnes.

The lopped tree in tyme may grow againe,
Most naked plants renewe both frute and floure;
The soriest wight may finde release of payne,
The dryest soile sucke in some moystning shoure:
Tymes go by turnes, and chaunces change by course,
From foule to fayre, from better happ to worse.
The sea of Fortune doth not ever floe,
She drawes her favours to the lowest ebb;
Her tide hath equall tymes to come and goe,
Her loome doth weave the fine and coarsest webb;
No joy so great but runneth to an ende,
No happ so harde but may in fine amende.
Not allwayes fall of leaf, nor ever springe,
No endlesse night, yet not eternall daye:
The saddest birdes a season finde to singe,
The roughest storme a calme may soone alaye.
Thus with succeeding turnes God tempereth all,
That man may hope to rise, yet fear to fall.

A chaunce may wyne that by mischance was lost ;
The nett that houldes no greate, takes little fishe ;
In some thinges all, in all thinges none are croste ;
Fewe all they neede, but none have all they wishe.
Vnmingled joyes here to no man befall ;
Who least, hath some ; who most, hath never all.

The following is a stanza on Sleepe from St Peter's Complaint :

Sleepe, Death's allye, obliuion of teares,
Silence of passion, balme of angry sore,
Suspence of loues, securitie of feares,
Wrath's lenitiue, heart's ease, storme's calmest shore,
Sense's and soule's repriual from all cumbes,
Benumbing sense of ill with quiet slumbers.

Another poem, Life is but Losse, begins thus :

By force I liue, in will I wish to dye ;
In playnte I passe the length of lingring dayes ;
Free would my soule from mortall body flye
And tredd the track of death's desyred waies ;
Life is but losse where death is deemed gaine,
And loathed pleasures breed displeasing payne.

The best edition of the poems is Grosart's ('Fuller Worthies Library,' 1872). See Mrs Hood's book (1926) and Janelle's (1935).

Samuel Daniel, son of a music-master, was born in 1562 near Taunton, in Somerset, and seems to have been educated under the patronage of the Pembroke family. In 1579 he was entered a commoner of Magdalen Hall, Oxford, where he devoted himself to poetry and history ; at the end of three years he quitted the university without taking a degree. Before 1590 he visited Italy, and soon after became tutor at Wilton to William Herbert (later Shakespeare's friend), son of the Earl of Pembroke and Sir Philip Sidney's sister. Later he was tutor to Anne Clifford, daughter of the Earl of Cumberland. After the death of Spenser, Daniel became 'voluntary laureate' to the court, but was superseded by Ben Jonson. In the reign of James he was appointed to 'allow' or act as censor of new plays, for a time had charge of a company of young players at Bristol, and in 1607 was preferred to be gentleman-extraordinary and groom of the queen's chamber. He lived in a garden-house in Old Street, St Luke's, where, according to Fuller, he would 'lie hid for some months together, the more retiredly to enjoy the company of the Muses, and then would appear in public to converse with his friends.' Daniel is said to have enjoyed the friendship of Shakespeare, Marlowe, and Chapman. His character was irreproachable, and his society appears to have been much courted. Towards the close of his life he retired to a farm he rented at Beckington, in Somerset, where he died 14th October 1619.

The works of Daniel include sonnets, epistles, masques, and dramas ; but his principal production is a History of the Civil Wars between York and Lancaster, a poem in eight books, published in 1604. Musophilus, containing a General Defence of Learning, is an elaborate and thoughtful work by Daniel ; The Defence of Rhyme (1602), against Campion, is admirable prose. His tragedy of Cleopatra (1593), dedicated to his patroness, Lady Pembroke, was modelled on Seneca, and is not one of his most successful efforts ; nor was his second tragedy, Philotas, on the story in Plutarch's Life of Alexander the Great, which provoked suspicion at court that Daniel was satirising the tyranny of princes. Both plays are Senecan rather than Elizabethan, and are influenced by French models. The Queen's Arcadia and Hymen's Triumph are 'pastoral tragi-comedies.' Daniel was extolled by his contemporaries, as Spenser, Lodge, Carew, Drummond of Hawthornden ; although Ben Jonson described him as 'a good honest man . . . but no poet,' and Drayton quotes the opinion of some wise men that he was 'too much historian in verse,' besides saying for himself that 'his manner better fitted prose.' Of modern critics, Coleridge, Lamb, and Hazlitt unite in praising him. As a sonneteer Daniel is altogether admirable ; some of the 'Delia' series rank near the best examples of this form in English. Daniel is an elegant if not a great poet. His writings are pervaded by tenderness and dignity, by thoughtfulness and purity of taste remarkable indeed, but lacking vital energy of movement and memorableness of expression. His tragedies and masques fail in dramatic interest. Southey called Daniel 'the tenderest of the tender poets.'

'The well-linguaged Daniel' (it was William Browne who gave the epithet, now a vox signata) is strangely modern in style ; Coleridge said : 'The style and language are just such as any very pure and manly writer of the present day—Wordsworth, for example—would use ; it seems quite modern in comparison with the style of Shakespeare.' For this reason it is the more desirable that we should adhere throughout to his own spelling also (though the merely typographical archaisms of long ſs, v for u, and i for j are disregarded). The whole epistle from which our first extract is made Wordsworth pronounced very beautiful. Daniel's thoughtful, equable verse flows on unintermittingly, and with a wealth of sound and dignified reflection, and never offends ; but it becomes tedious and uninteresting from its sameness and the absence of salient points—the Civil Wars is especially fatiguing to read. Yet in a letter to Lamb, Coleridge notes that 'Daniel caught and recommunicated the spirit of the great Countess of Pembroke, the glory of the north ; he formed her mind, and her mind inspirited him. Gravely sober on all ordinary affairs, and not easily excited by any, yet there is one on which his blood boils—whenever he speaks of English valour exerted against a foreign enemy.'

From the Epistle to the Countess of Cumberland.

He that of such a height hath built his minde,
And reared the dwelling of his thoughts so strong,
As neither feare nor hope can shake the frame
Of his resolved pow'rs : nor all the winde

Of vanitie or malice pierce to wrong
His settled peace, or to disturbe the same :
What a fair seate hath he, from whence he may
The boundlesse wastes and wilkes of man survey !

And with how free an eye doth he looke downe
Upon these lower regions of turmoyle
Where all the stormes of passions mainly beat
On flesh and bloud ! where honour, pow'r, renowne,
Are only gay afflictions, golden toyle ;
Where greatnesse stands upon as feeble feet
As frailty doth ; and onely great doth seeme
To little minds who doe it so esteeme.

He lookes upon the mightiest Monarch's warres
But only as on stately robberies ;
Where evermore the fortune that prevails
Must be the right : the ill-succeeding marres
The fairest and the best-fac't enterprize.
Great pirat Pompey lesser pirats quailles :
Justice, he sees, as if seduced, still
Conspires with pow'r, whose cause must not be ill.

He sees the face of right t' appeare as manifolde
As are the passions of uncertaine man ;
Who puts it in all colours, all attires,
To serve his ends, and make his courses holde.
He sees that, let Deceit worke what it can,
Plot and contrive base wayes to high desires ;
That the all-guiding Providence doth yet
All disappoint and mocks this smoake of wit.

Nor is he mov'd with all the thunder-cracks
Of Tyrants threats, or with the surly brow
Of power, that proudly sits on others crimes ;
Charg'd with more crying sinnes than those he checks.
The stormes of sad confusion, that may grow
Up in the present for the coming times,
Appall not him, that hath no side at all,
But of himselfe, and knows the worst can fall.

The next extract was specially praised by Coleridge, who, speaking of the first of the quoted stanzas, said : 'What is there in description superior even in Shakespeare? Only that Shakespeare would have given one of his glows to the first line, and flattered the mountain-top with his sovran eye, instead of this poor "A mervailous advantage of his yeares."'

The Death of Talbot—from Book Sixth of the 'Civil Wars.'

Whil'st Talbot (whose fresh ardor having got
A mervailous advantage of his yeares)
Carries his unfelt age as if forgot,
Whirling about where any need appeares :
His hand, his eye, his wits all present, wrought
The function of the glorious Part he beares :
Now urging here, now cheering there, he flies,
Unlocks the thickest troupes, where most force lyes.

In midst of wrath, of wounds, of blood, and death,
There is he most, where as he may do best :
And there the closest ranks he severeth,
Drives back the stoutest powres, that forward prest :
There makes his sword his way : there laboreth
Th'infatigable hand that never ceast ;
Scorning unto his mortall wounds to yeeld ;
Till Death became best maister of the Field.

Then like a sturdy Oke, that having long
Against the warres of fiercest windes made head
When (with some forc't tempestuous rage, more strong)
His down-borne top comes over-maistered,
All the neere bordering Trees hee stood among Crusht with his waightie fall, lie ruined :
So lay his spoyles, all round about him slaine,
T'adorne his death, that could not die in vaine.

On th'other part, his most all-daring sonne
(Although the inexperience of his yeares
Made him lesse skil'd in what was to be done ;
And yet did carrie him beyond all feares)
Into the maine Battalion, thrusting on Neere to the King, amidst the chiefest Peeres,
With thousand wounds became at length opprest ;
As if he scorn'd to die but with the best.

Who thus both, having gained a glorious end,
Soone ended that great day ; that set so red
As all the purple Plaines that wide extend,
A sad tempestuous season witnessed.
So much adoe had toying Fraunce to rend
From us the right so long inherited :
And so hard went we from what we possesst ;
As with it went the blood we loved best.

Which blood, not lost, but fast lay'd up with heed
In everlasting fame, is there held deere,
To seale the memorie of this dayes deede ;
Th'eternall evidence of what we were :
To which our Fathers, wee, and who succeed,
Doe owe a sigh, for that it toucht us neere :
Nor must we sinne so much as to neglect
The holy thought of such a deare respect.

On Early Love—from 'Hymen's Triumph.'

Ah, I remember well (and how can I
But ever more remember well) when first
Our flame began, when scarce we knew what was
The flame we felt ; when as we sate and sighed
And look'd upon each other, and conceiv'd
Not what we ayld, yet something we did ayle,
And yet were well, and yet we were not well,
And what was our disease we could not tell.
Then would we kisse, then sigh, then looke : and thus
In that first garden of our simplenesse
We spent our child-hood. But when yeeres began
To reape the fruite of knowledge : ah, how then
Would she with graver looks, with sweet, stern brow,
Check my presumption and my forwardnes.
Yet still would give me flowers, still would me show
What she would have me, yet not have me know.

Sonnet to Della.

I must not grieve my love, whose eies would rede
Lines of delight, whereon her youth might smile ;
Flowers have time before they come to seede,
And she is yong, and now must sport the while.
And sport, sweet Maide, in season of these yeares,
And learne to gather flowers before they wither ;
And where the sweetest blossomes first appeares,
Let love and youth conduct thy pleasures thither,
Lighten forth smiles to cleere the clouded aire,
And calme the tempest which my sighs doo raise :
Pitty and smiles doe best become the fair ;
Pitty and smiles must onely yeeld thee praise.
Make me to say, when all my griefes are gone,
Happy the heart that sighed for such a one.

Sonnet to Della.

Care-charmer Sleepe, sonne of the sable Night,
 Brother to Death, in silent darknes borne,
 Relieve my languish, and restore the light,
 With darke forgetting of my care, returne.
 And let the day be time enough to mourne
 The shipwracke of my ill-adventured youth;
 Let waking eyes suffice to waile their scorne,
 Without the torments of the night's untruth.
 Cease, dreames, the images of day desires,
 To model forth the passions of to-morrow;
 Never let rising Sunne approve you liers.
 To add more grief to aggravate my sorrow.
 Still let me sleepe, imbracing clouds in vaine,
 And never wake to feele the dayes disdaine.

Uliſſes and the Syren.

Syren. Come, worthy Greeke, Uliſſes, come,
 Possesse these shores with me;
 The windes and Seas are troublesome,
 And heere we may be free.
 Here may we sit and view their toile
 That travaile in the deepe,
 And joy the day in mirth the while,
 And spend the night in sleepe.

Uliſſes. Fair Nymph, if fame or honor were
 To be atteynd with ease,
 Then would I come and rest with thee,
 And leave such toyles as these:
 But here it dwels, and here must I
 With danger seeke it forth;
 To spend the time luxuriously
 Becomes not men of worth.

Syren. Uliſſes, oh, be not deceiv'd
 With that unrell name:
 This honour is a thing conceiv'd,
 And rests on others fame.
 Begotten onely to molest
 Our peace, and to beguile
 (The best thing of our life) our rest,
 And give us up to toil!

Uliſſes. Delicious Nymph, suppose there were
 No honour, or report,
 Yet manlines would scorne to weare
 The time in idle sport:
 For toyle doth give a better touche
 To make us feele our joy;
 And ease finds tediousnesse as much
 As labour yeelds annoy.

Syren. Then pleasure likewise seemes the shore,
 Whereto tends all your toyle;
 Which you forgo to make it more,
 And perish oft the while.
 Who may disporte them diversly,
 Finde never tedious day;
 And ease may have varietie,
 As well as action may.

Uliſſes. But natures of the noblest frame
 These toyles and dangers please;
 And they take comfort in the same,
 As much as you in ease:
 And with the thoughts of actions past
 Are recreated still:
 When pleasure leaves a touch at last
 To show that it was ill.

Syren. That doth opinion onely cause,
 That's out of custome bred;
 Which makes us many other lawes
 Than ever nature did.
 No widdowes waile for our delights,
 Our sportes are without bloud;
 The world we see by warlike wights
 Receives more hurt than good.

Uliſſes. But yet the state of things require
 These motions of unrest,
 And these great spirits of high desire
 Seem borne to turne them best:
 To purge the mischiefs that increase
 And all good order mar:
 For oft we see a wicked peace,
 To be well chang'd for war.

Syren. Well, well, Uliſſes, then I see
 I shall not have thee heare;
 And therefore I will come to thee,
 And take my fortunes there.
 I must be wonne that cannot win,
 Yet lost were I not wonne:
 For beauty hath created bin,
 T' undoo or be undonne.

See Grosart's edition of Daniel's works in the Huth Library (5 vols. 1885-87), and Beeching's Selections (1899). The Defence of Rhyme was reprinted in 1925 (Bodley Head Quartos).

Michael Drayton, born in 1563 at Hartshill, near Atherstone in Warwickshire, was at the age of ten made page to a person of quality—apparently Sir Henry Goodere, to whom he says he owed the most of his education. There is nothing to prove that he went to a university. His first work, The Harmonie of the Church (1591), a metrical translation of parts of the Scriptures, was confiscated for some unknown reason. In 1593 Drayton published Idea, the Shepheard's Garland, a collection of pastorals or 'eglogs'; in 1594, Idea Mirrour, a collection of sonnets or 'quatorzains' (which helped to fix the specific English form of the sonnet); and in 1596, the first form of what, much altered, appeared as The Barons' Wars, originally in a seven-line stanza, finally in 'ottava rima.' It has fine passages, but is not everywhere interesting. England's Heroicall Epistles (1597), on the model of Ovid's Heroides, is polished but unequal. On the accession of James I. in 1603, Drayton acted as esquire to Sir Walter Aston at his investiture as Knight of the Bath; the poet expected patronage from the new sovereign, but was disappointed. The Poemes Lyrick and Pastorall (1606?) contains the famous martial lyric, The Ballad of Agincourt. He published the first part of his most elaborate work, the Polyolbion, in 1612, and the second in 1622, the whole forming a poetical 'chorographically' description of England, in thirty songs or books. The Polyolbion, unlike any other work in English poetry, is full of topographical and antiquarian details, allusions to remarkable events and persons, local sports and customs; yet the inevitable prolixity and monotony of such a scheme is atoned for by the beauty of Drayton's descriptions, the skill of his treatment, the brightness of his fancy, and the delightfulness of his melody, as well as by the multifariousness of his information—information in general so accurate that the poem is quoted as an authority by Wood and Hearne.

In 1619 Drayton collected all his poems (but Polyolbion) that he wanted preserved, and in 1627 published a new volume containing the whimsical and delightful Nymphidia, The Quest of Cynthia, and The Battaille of Agincourt (distinct from the Ballad). In conjunction with Chettle, Dekker, Munday, Webster, and others he had a share in many plays, notably Sir John Oldcastle. His last work, The Muses Elizium (1630), deals with Noah's flood, the birth of Moses, David and Goliath; and the great sonnet, 'Since there's no help,' first published in the 1619 folio, was pronounced by Rossetti as 'almost the best in the language, if not quite.' On his death in 1631, Drayton was buried in Westminster Abbey.

From 'Polyolbion.'

Morning in Warwickshire—a Stag-hunt.

My native country then, which so brave spirits hast bred,
If there be vertue yet remaining in thy earth,
Or any good of thine then breathd'st into my birth,
Accept it as thine owne whilst now I sing of thee
Of all thy later brood th' unworthiest though I bee.

Muse, first of Arden tell, whose foot-steps yet are found
In her rough wood-lands more than any other ground
That mighty Arden held even in her height of pride,
Her one hand touching Trent, the other Severn's side.

When Phoebus lifts his head out of the winters wave,
No sooner doth the earth her flowerie bosome brave,

At such time as the Yeere brings on the pleasant Spring,
But Hunts-up to the morne the feathered sylvans sing :
And in the lower Grove, as on the rising Knoll,
Upon the highest spray of every mounting pole,
Those quiristers are pearcht, with many a speckled breast,
Then from her burnisht gate the goodly glitt'ring east
Gilds every lofty top, which late the humorous Night Bespangled had with pearle, to please the morning's sight ;

On which the mirthful Quires, with their clere open
Unto the joyful Morne so straine their warbling notes,
That Hills and Valleys ring, and even the echoing Ayre
Seems all composed of sounds about them every where.
The Throistle, with shrill sharps ; as purposely he sung
T' awake the listless Sunne ; or chying, that so long
He was in comming forth, that should the thickets thrill ;
The Woosell neere at hand, that hath a golden bill,
As Nature him had markt of purpose, t' let us see
That from all other Birds his tunes should different bee ;
For, with their vocall sounds, they sing to pleasant May ;
Upon his dulcet pype the Merle doth onely play.
When in the lower Brake, the Nightingale hard by,
In such lamenting straines the joyful howres doth ply,
As though the other birds shee to her tunes would draw.
And but that nature, by her all-constraining law,
Each bird to her owne kind this season doth invite,
They else, alone to heare that Charmer of the Night,
The more to use their ears their voyces sure would spare,

That moduleth her tunes so admirably rare,
As man to set in Parts at first had learned of her.

To Philomell the next, the Linnet we prefer ;
And by that warbling bird the Wood-larke place we then,
The Red-sparrow, the Nope, the Redbreast, and the Wren. [tree,

The Yellow pate ; which though shee hurt the blooming
Yet scarce hath any bird a finer pype than she.
And of these chaunting fowles, the Goldfinch not behind,
That hath so many sorts descending from her kind.

The Tydie for her notes as delicate as they,
The laughing Hecco, then the counterfeiting Jay.

The softer with the shrill—some hid among the leaves,
Some in the taller trees, some in the lower greaves—

Thus sing away the Morne, until the mounting Sunne
Through thick exhaled fogs his golden head hath runne,
And through the twisted tops of our close covert creeps
To kisse the gentle shade, this while that sweetly sleeps.
And near to these our Thicks the wild and frightful Heards,
Not hearing other noyse but this of chattering Birds,
Feed fairly on the Launds ; both sorts of seasoned Deere :
Here walk the stately Red, the freckled Fallow there :
The Bucks and lusty Stags, amongst the rascalls strewed,
As sometime gallant spirits amongst the multitude.

Of all the beasts which we for our veneriall name,
The Hart among the rest, the Hunters noblest game :
Of which most princely chase sith none did e'er report,
Or by description touch t' express that wondrous sport
(Yet might have well beseemed the ancients' nobler songs)
To our old Arden heere most fitly it belongs :

Yet shall shee not invoke the muses to her ayde,
But thee, Diana bright, a goddesse and a mayd,
In many a huge-growne Wood and many a shady Grove,
Which oft hast borne thy Bowe, great huntresse, used to rove

At many a cruell beast, and with thy darts to pierce
The lion, panther, ounce, the bear, and tiger fierce ;

And following thy fleet game, chaste mighty Forrests queen,

With thy dishevel'd nymphs attyred in youthful greene,
About the Launds hast scowred, and wastes both farre
and neere,

Brave huntress; but no beast shall prove thy quarries
heere

Save those the best of chase, the tall and lusty Red,
The Stag for goodly shape, and statelnesse of head,
Is fitt'st to hunt at force. For whom when with his hounds

The laboring hunter tufts the thick unbarbed grounds,
Where harbor'd is the Hart; there often from his feed
The dogs of him doe find; or thorough skilfull heed,
The Huntsman by his slot, or breaking earth, perceaves,
Or entring of the thicke by pressing of the greaves,
Where he had gone to lodge. Now when the Hart doth hear

The often-bellowing hounds to vent his secret lair,
He rousing rusheth out, and through the brakes doth drive,

As though up by the roots the bushes he would rive.
And through the combrous thicks as fearefully he makes,
He with his branched head the tender saplings shakes.
That sprinkling their moyst pearle doe sceme for him to weepe;

When after goes the Cry, with yellings lowd and deepe,
That all the forrest rings and every neighbouring place:
And there is not a hound but falleth to the chase.

Rechating with his horne, which then the hunter cheeres,
Whilst still the lustie Stag his high-palmed head upheares,
His body shewing state, with unbent knees upright,
Expressing (from all beasts) his courage in his flight,
But when th' approaching foes still following he perceives,
That hee his speed must trust, his usuall walke he leaves,
And o'er the Champaine flies; which when th' assembly find,

Each followes, as his horse were footed with the wind.
But beeing then imboast, the noble stately Deere,
When he hath gotten ground (the kennel cast are)ere Doth beat the brooks and ponds for sweet refreshing
soyle;

That serving not, then proves if he his scent can foyle,
And makes amongst the heards and flocks of shag-wool'd sheep,

Them frightening from the guard of those who had their keepe.

But when as all his shifts his safety still denies,
Put quite out of his walke, the wayes and fallowes tries;
Whom when the Plowman meets, his teame he letteth stand,

T' assaile him with his goad: so with his hooke in hand,
The Shepherd him pursues, and to his dog doth halow:
When, with tempestuous speed, the hounds and huntsmen follow;

Until the noble Deere, through toil bereaved of strength,
His long and sinewy legs then fayling him at length,
The Villages attempts, enraged, not giving way
To anything hee meets now at his sad decay.

The cruell ravenous hounds and bloody hunters near,
This noblest beast of chase, that vainly doth but feare,
Some banke or quick-set finds; to which his hanch
oppos'd,

He turnes upon his foes, that soone have him inclos'd.
The churlish-throated hounds then holding him at bay,
And as their cruell fangs on his harsh skin they lay,

With his sharp-poynted head he dealeth deadly wounds.

The Hunter, comming in to help his wearied hounds,
He desperately assayles; untill opprest by force,
He who the Mourner is to his owne dying corse,
Upon the ruthlesse earth his precious teares let fall.

(From the Thirteenth Song.)

The woosell is the ouzel; the tydie, a golden-crested wren or a titmouse; nape, the bullfinch; hecco is a name for a woodpecker that assumes some thirty forms as various as hickwall, ickle, yuckel, hee-haw, and heigh-ho; greave is an old form of grove; emboss or imboss, said of a hunted animal, is to take shelter in a thicket; rechating is a particular measure on the horn.

Coleridge notes as admirable a passage on the cutting down of the old English forests:

Our trees so hacked above the ground,
That where their lofty tops the neighbouring countries crowned,
Their trunks, like aged folks, now bare and naked stand,
As for revenge to Heaven each held a withered hand.

Ballad of Agincourt.

Faire stood the wind for France,
When we our Sayles advance,
Nor now to prove our chance
Longer will tarry;
But putting to the Mayne
At Kaux, the mouth of Seine,
With all his martial trayne, Landed King Harry.

And taking many a fort,
Furnish'd in warlike sort,
Marcheth tow'rds Agincourt
In happy howre;
Skirmishing day by day
With those that stop'd his way,
Where the French gen'rall lay
With all his power.

Which in his hight of pride,
King Henry to deride,
His ransome to provide
To the King sending.
Which he neglects the while,
As from a Nation vile,
Yet with an angry smile,
Their fall portending.

And turning to his men,
Quoth our brave Henry then,
Though they to one be ten,
Be not amazed.
Yet have we well begun,
Battels so bravely wonne
Have ever to the sunne
By Fame beene rayssed.

And for myselfe (quoth he),
This my full rest shall be,
England ne'r mourne for Me,
Nor more esteeme me.
Victor I will remaine,
Or on this earth lie slaine,
Never shall shee sustaine
Losse to redeeme me.

Poitiers and Cressy tell,
 When most their pride did swell,
 Under our swords they fell ;
 No less our skill is,
 Than when our grandsire great,
 Clayming the regall seate,
 By many a warlike feate,
 Lop'd the French lillies.

The Duke of Yorke so dread,
 The eager vaward led ;
 With the maine Henry sped,
 Amongst his hench-men.
 Excester had the rere,
 A braver man not there,
 O Lord, how hot they were
 On the false French men !

They now to fight are gone,
 Armour on armour shone,
 Drumme now to drumme did groan,
 To heare was wonder ;
 That with cryes they make,
 The very earth did shake,
 Trumpet to trumpet spake,
 Thunder to thunder.

Well it thine age became,
 O noble Erpingham,
 Which did the signall ayme
 To our hid forces ;
 When from a meadow by,
 Like a storme suddenly,
 The English archery
 Stuck the French horses.

With Spanish Ewgh so strong,
 Arrowes a cloth-yard long,
 That like to serpents stung,
 Piercing the weather ;
 None from his fellow starts,
 But playing manly parts,
 And like true English hearts,
 Stuck close together.

When downe their bowes they threw,
 And forth their bilbowes drew,
 And on the French they flew ;
 Not one was tardie ;
 Armes were from shoulders sent,
 Scalpes to the teeth were rent,
 Down the French pesants went,
 Our men were hardie.

This while our noble King,
 His broad sword brandishing,
 Down the French host did ding.
 As to o'r whelme it ;
 And many a deepe wound lent,
 His armes with bloud besprent,
 And many a cruell dent
 Bruised his helmet.

Gloster, that duke so good,
 Next of the royall blood,
 For famous England stood,
 With his brave brother ;
 Clarence, in steel so bright,
 Though but a maiden knight,
 Yet in that furious fight
 Scarce such another.

Warwick in bloud did wade,
 Oxford the foe invade,
 And cruell slaughter made,
 Still as they ran up ;
 Suffolk his axe did ply,
 Beaumont and Willoughby
 Bare them right doughtily, Ferrers and Fanhope.

Upon Saint Crispin's day
 Fought was this noble fray,
 Which fame did not delay,
 To England to carry ;
 O, when shall Englishmen
 With such acts fill a pen,
 Or England breede againe
 Such a King Harry !

From the 'Virginian Voyage.'

You brave heroique minds,
 Worthy your countries name,
 That honour still pursue,
 Go, and subdue,
 Whilst loyt'ring hinds
 Lurke here at home with shame.

Britons, you stay too long,
 Quickly aboard bestow you,
 And with a merry gale
 Swell your stretch'd sail,
 With vows as strong
 As the winds that blow you.

Your course securely steere,
 West and by south forth keepe.
 Rocks, lee-shores, nor shoies
 When Eolus scowles,
 You need not feare,
 So absolute the deepe.

And cheerfully at sea,
 Success you still intice,
 To get the pearle and gold,
 And ours to hold,
 Virginia,
 Earth's only paradise.

When as the luscious smeli
 Of that delicious land,
 Above the seas that flowes,
 The cleare wind throwes,
 Your hearts to swell
 Approching the deare strand ;

In kenning of the shore
 (Thanks to God first given),
 O you the happy'st men,
 Be frolique then,
 Let cannons roare,
 Frighting the wide heaven.

And in regions far
 Such heroes bring yee forth,
 As those from whom we came,
 And plant our name
 Under that starre
 Not knowne unto our North.

The canzonet, 'To his Coy Love,' that begins :

I pray thee, leave : love me no more,
 Call home the hart you gave me ;
 I but in vaine that Saint adore
 That can but will not save me.
 These poore halfe kisses kill me quite ;
 Was ever man thus served ?
 Amidst an ocean of delight
 For pleasure to be sterved—contains the ingenious conceit :

O Tantalus ! thy paines ne'er tell,
 By mee thou art prevented ;
 Tis nothing to be plagued in Hell,
 But thus in Heaven tormented !

and ends :

Come nice thing, let thy heart alone,
 I cannot live without thee.

Most famous of Drayton's short poems is the Valediction.

Since ther's no helpe, come let us kiss and part !
 Nay, I have done ; You get no more of Me ;
 And I am glad, yea glad with all my heart,
 That thus so cleanly I my selfe can free.
 Shake hands for ever ; Cancell all our Vowes,
 And when we meet at any time againe,
 Be it not seen in either of our browes
 That we one jot of former Love reteyne.
 Now at the last gaspe of Loves latest Breath,
 When, his Pulse fayling, Passion speechlesse lies,
 When Faith is kneeling by his bed of Death,
 And Innocence is closing up his Eyes,
 Now if thou wouldst, when all have given him over,
 From Death to Life thou might'st him yet recover.

The following (modernised in spelling) describes the setting out of Mab, Queen of the Fairies, to visit Pigwigglin, 'a fairy knight' :

From the 'Nymphidia.'

Her chariot ready straight is made ;
 Each thing therein is fitting laid,
 That she by nothing might be stay'd,
 For nought must be her letting ;
 Four nimble gnats the horses were,
 Their harnesses of gossamere,
 Fly Cranion, her charioteer,
 Upon the coach-box getting.

Her chariot of a snail's fine shell,
 Which for the colours did excell ;
 The fair Queen Mab becoming well,
 So lively was the limning ;
 The seat the soft wool of the bee,
 The cover (gallantly to see)
 The wing of a pied butterflie ;
 I trow 'twas simple trimming.

The wheels composed of crickets' bones,
 And daintily made for the nones ;
 For fear of rattling on the stones
 With thistle-down they shod it ;
 For all her maidens' much did fear
 If Oberon had chanced to hear
 That Mab his queen should have been there,
 He would not have abode it.

She mounts her chariot with a trice,
 Nor would she stay for no advice
 Until her maids, that were so nice,
 To wait on her were fitted ;
 But ran herself away alone ;
 Which when they heard, there was not one
 But hasted after to be gone,
 As she had been diswitted.

Hop and Mop, and Drab so clear,
 Pip and Trip, and Skip, that were
 To Mab their sovereign dear,
 Her special maids of honour ;
 Fib and Tib, and Pink and Pin,
 Tick and Quick, and Jill and Jin,
 Tit and Nit, and Wap and Win,
 The train that wait upon her.

Upon a grasshopper they got,
 And, what with amble and with trot,
 For hedge nor ditch they spared not,
 But after her they hie them :
 A cobweb over them they throw,
 To shield the wind if it should blow ;
 Themselves they wisely could bestow
 Lest any should espy them.

Payne Collier edited Drayton's poems for the Roxburghe Club (1836); Bullen and Beeching published Selections (1883, 1899); C. Breit edited the Minor Poems (1907); Nymphidia was reprinted in 1925; and since 1885 the Spenser Society has issued the Polyolbion in 3 vols. folio, four quarto volumes of his poems, and Michael Drayton, a critical study by O. Elton (1895, 1905).

Joshua Sylvester (1563-1618), translator of Du Bartas, was the son of a Kentish clothier, was put to trade against his will, wrote numberless poems and dedications, was groom of the chamber to Prince Henry, and in 1613 became secretary to the English merchants at Middelburg in Holland, where he died. He is now only remembered in a shadowy way as the translator of the Divine Weeks and Works of the French poet Du Bartas. The translation—or rather paraphrase—was highly popular, and earned for him among his contemporaries the epithet of 'silver-tongued Sylvester.' Drayton, Drummond, Bishop Hall, Izaak Walton, and others praise the work, and Milton has been credited with copying some of its expressions. Charles Dunster even said (in 1800) that Sylvester's Du Bartas contains the prima stamina of Paradise Lost; but this is much too unqualified a statement, though no doubt Milton read Sylvester's poem in his youth, and may have got suggestions therein. Dryden in youth preferred Sylvester to Spenser, but by-and-by came to look on his verse as 'abominable fustian.'

Satan's Temptation of Eve.

As a false Lover that thick snares hath laid
 T' intrap the honour of a fair young Maid,
 When she (though little) listning ear affords
 To his sweet, courting, deep-affected words,
 Feels some asswaging of his freezing flame,
 And sooths himselfe with hope to gain his game ;
 And, rapt with joy, upon this point persists,
 That parley'ng Citie never long resists :

Ev'n so the Serpent, that doth counterfeit
All guilefull Call t' allure us to his net ;
Perceiving Eve his flattering gloze digest,
He prosecutes, and, jocund, doth not rest
Till he have try'd foot, hand, and head, and all,
Upon the breach of his new-battered wall.

No, fair (quoth he) beleve not that the care
God hathe, Mankinde from spoyling death to spare,
Makes him forbid you (on so strict condition)
This purest, fairest, rarest Fruit's fruition :

A double fear, an envie, and a hate,
His jealous heart for ever cruciate ;
Sith the suspected vertue of this Tree
Shall soon disperse the cloud of Idiocy
Which dims your eyes ; and further, makes you seem (Excelling us) even equall Gods to him.

O World's rare glory ! reach thy happy hand,
Reach, reach, I say : why dost thou stop or stand ?
Begin thy Blisse, and do not fear the threat
Of an uncertain God-head, onely great
Through self-aw'd zeal : Put on the glistring Pall
Of immortality : doe not fore-stall
(As envious Stepdame) thy posterity
